While the governments of the Union and the states are independent of each other, operate within distinctly different spheres and are designed for the accomplishment of different specific objects, yet, upon general political or governmental policies their interests are common, and what in a political sense stands for the general welfare of the Union necessarily stands for the general welfare of the states. Unquestionably, the states, as separate entities and as component parts of the Union, are each equally with the Union interested in the crystallization and execution of any policy of the federal Union that will tend to perpetuate the permanency of the latter, for largely if not wholly upon the perpetuity of the Union depends the permanency of the states as governmental organizations. It follows, therefore, that the policy of the general government with respect to the subject-matter of the act of Congress above mentioned is necessarily the policy of each of the states, and that within the latter, no less than within the federal government, resides the power of effectuating and applying that policy. In other words, the duty, if it be a duty, of contributing to the carrying out or execution of that policy rests no less upon the states than upon the federal government. And the right of the states to do so does not depend upon any authority vested in them by express language in their Constitutions, nor is it to be controlled by the restrictions or limitations upon the legislative power contained in those instruments, but, as in the case of the federal government, arises from that inherent, dormant power which may legally be aroused to action, exerted and applied by all democratic governments, controlled by written Constitutions, whenever the exigencies of government imperatively require its exertion and exercise—that power which, in a general sense, is analogous to the general war powers of the federal government, under which, as war measures, the latter may, as it is now doing, properly control trade principles and execute an infinite variety of other acts which, under normal conditions, approach if not in truth involve paternalism in government or unwarranted abridgments of individual rights as assured and guaranteed by the Constitution.

Thus, it is clear, the inhibitions of our state Constitution against any gift of public money to any individual, municipal or other corporation (article 4, § 31), and interdicting the appropriation of public money "for the purpose or benefit of any corporation, association, * * * or any other institution not under the exclusive management and control of the state as a state institution" (Const. art. 4, § 22), have no application to this case. Indeed, it has been so held in a decision treating a proposition quite analogous in principle to that submitted for solution here. Daggett v. Colgan, 92 Cal. 53, 28 Pac. 51, 14 L. R. A. 474, 27 Am. St. Rep. 95. That case involves an interesting and instructive discussion of the propositions to which we have hereinabove given considerable attention, and we may, therefore, pardonably and with advantage, reproduce herein an extended excerpt from the learned opinion therein. It should first be explained that the Legislature of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 24) passed an act appropriating a large sum of money to be paid to the California Commission of the World's Fair Columbian Exposition, held in the city of Chicago, and to be used by said commission in the construction of buildings at said fair in which to maintain an exhibit of the industrial products of this state and to defray the expenses arising in connection with such exhibit. The state controller, claiming that the appropriation made by the act was in direct contravention of that part of section 22, article 4, of the Constitution above quoted herein, declined to draw his warrant in favor of said commissioners on the fund so appropriated. After discussing that proposition adversely to the position of the controller, the court, in its opinion, made these significant observations:

> "The defendant further contends that the statute is unconstitutional for the reason that the appropriation thereby made is not for a public use, such as the state is authorized to make; that the maintenance of an exhibition of the products of the state in the manner contemplated does not fall within the legitimate authority of the state government. In passing upon this proposition, it is necessary to bear in mind that what is for the public good, and what are public purposes, 'are questions which the Legislature must decide upon its own judgment, in respect to which it is vested with a large discretion which cannot be controlled by the courts, except, perhaps, where its action is clearly evasive. * * * Where the power which is exercised is legislative in its character, the courts can enforce only those limitations which the Constitution imposes; not those implied restrictions which, resting in theory only, the people have been satisfied to leave to the judgment, patriotism, and sense of justice of their representatives.' Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 154. It is undoubtedly true that public money can be rightfully expended only for public purposes, but as well said by that eminent jurist, Judge Cooley, in delivering the opinion of the court in People v. Salem, 20 Mich. 452, 4 Am. Rep. 400: 'Necessity alone is not the test by which the limits of state authority in this direction are to be defined, but a wise statesmanship must look beyond the expenditures which are absolutely needful to the continued existence of organized government, and embrace others which may tend to make that government subserve the general well-being of society, and advance the present and prospective happiness and prosperity of the people.'

"In view of these principles of constitutional law, which are so well settled as to be placed beyond discussion or dispute, it is manifest, we think, that the court is not authorized to declare the act under consideration void, upon the theory that the expenditure thereby authorized can in no manner be considered as tending to promote the public welfare, which it is one great object of government to secure. The question whether the public interests of the state would be at all advanced by an exhibition of its products such as is contemplated by the act was an appropriate one for discussion in the halls of the Legislature before its enactment, and for the consideration of the Governor before approving it, but it is not one for this court to decide, upon the individual views of its members concerning the wisdom or expediency of such legislation.

"There is no difference, except in degree, between the appropriation contained in this act and those which for years have been made without any question as to their validity, for the support of the state agricultural fair, and the various district agricultural societies throughout the state. The fact that this exhibit of the products of the state is to be made without the limits of the state does not change its essential character, or make it any less an occasion or purpose in which, in an enlarged sense, it may be said that the people of the state have an interest. So, also, it would be hard to distinguish this appropriation in principle from those appropriations which have been made from time to time for the maintenance of horticultural, viticultural, and other similar commissions. None of these, strictly speaking, are required for the proper administration of the government of the state, and possibly, in the opinion of many, call for an unjustifiable and useless expenditure of money. But the power of the Legislature to create such commissions has never been doubted.

"We know from the express declaration of the act of Congress authorizing the Columbian Exposition that the purpose of the exposition is to commemorate the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America, 'by an exhibition of the resources of the United States of America, their development, and of the progress of civilization in the New World'; and that such exhibition is to be of a 'national and international character, so that not only the people of the Union and of this continent, but those of all nations, as well, can participate.' We have no doubt that it was fairly a matter within the power of the Legislature to determine whether, as a matter of public policy and as tending to advance the best interests of its citizens, this state should join with its sister states, and with the government of the United States, in celebrating in the way suggested the historical event referred to.

"It has been held in many cases that a municipal corporation has no authority, under the general powers usually given such corporations, to appropriate money for the celebration of the anniversary of important events in the history of our country, such as the Fourth of July (Hodges v. Buffalo, 2 Denio [N. Y.] 110; Hood v. Lynn, 1 Allen [Mass.] 103) and the surrender of Cornwallis (Tash v. Adams, 10 Cush. [Mass.] 252). See, also, The Liberty Bell [C. C.] 23 Fed. 844. These decisions, however, all rest upon the principle that municipal corporations have no powers except such as are specifically granted by the act of incorporation, or are necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the powers expressly granted. But it has never been doubted that the state could confer upon a city or town the authority to celebrate such important events in the history of the country as appeal to the patriotism or higher sentiments of the people, and to tax their citizens to pay the expense thereof. Thus it was held that the city of Philadelphia had the power under its charter to provide for the entertainment of distinguished visitors upon the occasion of the celebration of the Centennial Anniversary of American Independence. Tatham v. Philadelphia, 11 Phila. [Pa.] 276. So, also, in Massachusetts, by general statutes, the power has been conferred upon towns to celebrate the centennial anniversary of their incorporation (Hill v. Easthampton, 140 Mass. 381 [4 N. E. 811]), and also to appropriate money for the celebration of holidays, and for other public purposes (Hubbard v. Taunton, 140 Mass. 467 [5 N. E. 157]). These cases are authority for the proposition that the state itself, unless restrained by its Constitution, has the power to make appropriations for such purposes, because unless it possesses the power, it could not confer it upon its municipal corporations. Such expenditures are justified under the general power which the state has to provide for the public welfare, the limits of which are perhaps not capable of exact definition, and are the same in principle as appropriations made for the building of monuments to commemorate great historical events, or for the erection in public places of the statues of those who by common consent are classed among the patriots or benefactors of the nation. Undoubtedly this power may be the subject of great abuse, but this is no argument against its existence. The only protection against reckless and improvident appropriations for public purposes must be found in the character of those intrusted with the power of legislation, and in the integrity and firmness of the chief executive of the state."

Obviously, there is a distinction between the act questioned in the Daggett Case and the act involved in this proceeding with respect to the specific objects of the respective appropriations of the public money. Both, however, aim at the accomplishment of the same general object, viz. the promotion of the general public welfare. For, so far as the promotion of the public welfare is concerned, no distinction in importance or effect between the two acts can logically be pointed out. The exploitation of the industrial resources of a state is surely a matter which directly affects and, where such resources are in magnitude such as to demonstrate the natural material wealth and prosperity of the state, promotes the public welfare. No less may be said of public acts looking to the promotion and fostering in the citizens of a state or nation sentiments of patriotism, which, as we have shown, and as is most obviously true, constitutes the essential mainspring of every stable government. What, indeed, would industrial prosperity count for in a country whose government was without the support of the patriotism and loyalty of its subjects? The past political history of Russia, at this writing in the throes of bitter political disturbances and turbulences, may well stand as an answer to the question.

As stated in the opinion in the Daggett Case, supra, the question whether the public interests of the state as well as of the nation of which the former is an essential part will be advanced by the meeting in reunion at Vicksburg of the survivors of both sides of the Civil War that fought at the battle known in history by the name of that city was an appropriate one for discussion in the halls of the Legislature before the appropriation was made by a legislative act, and for the consideration of the executive before approving it. We must assume that the Legislature and the Governor had before them facts and data upon which they were enabled to predicate their judgment that the state and the Union would be materially benefited by the reunion, and thus the public welfare and general well-being of society subserved. Their conclusion regarding the act cannot, therefore, be impeached by the courts.

There is no language or provision in the statute appropriating the money indicating that any individual will or can, if the appropriation be properly expended, or dispensed according to the face of the act, receive a single cent as a gratuity or by way of assistance, but that the money appropriated shall be expended in such manner as the executive shall determine will the better and the more effectively effectuate the specific objects of the appropriation and the ultimate purpose to be thereby subserved. And herein lies the distinction between the appropriation in question and that considered and properly held invalid by this court in the case of McClure v. Nye, 22 Cal. App. 248, 133 Pac. 1145. The act in that case attempted to appropriate the sum of $15,000 out of the state treasury "for the purpose of paying the transportation of certain veterans of the Civil War to Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the battle fought on that battlefield. Obviously, upon the very face of that provision the appropriation amounted to nothing less than a gift of public moneys, and hence flew squarely in the face of the provision of our Constitution against thus disposing of our public revenues. In the present case, as seen, the appropriation is to be used on the occasion of the reunion at Vicksburg for the purpose of effectuating the great, central object of the gathering, as pointed out by the act of Congress and the act here in question, viz. to strengthen the fraternal ties of amity in the United States. As shown, no express provision is made by the act for the payment of the transportation of veterans or other persons to Vicksburg, though we doubt not that if, in furtherance of the paramount and ultimate object of the reunion, it be necessary to apply some of the money in sending representatives from California to the reunion or convention, such expenditure would come within the legitimate purposes of the appropriation and the right of the state to bear.

[2] We are now brought to the consideration of the principal point upon which the Attorney General relies to impeach the constitutional validity of the appropriation, viz. that the act making the appropriation is inconsistent with the provisions of section 34 of article 4 of the Constitution, which is above reproduced in full herein. The gravamen of the Attorney General's argument in support of this position is that the language of the act is so uncertain and indefinite that it cannot be determined therefrom whether the appropriation thereby provided for is or is not for a public purpose. This argument, no doubt, comes from the language of the act, "for the purpose of assisting to defray the expenses of a public nature," etc. It may be conceded that this language is so general as to be ambiguous as to the specific purpose of the appropriation, and if the act contained no further amplification of the purpose for which the appropriation is designed than may be implied from those words—that is, that the appropriation was for some unexpressed or undiscovered purpose—it might be necessary to hold that the position of the Attorney General is well taken. But the language referred to is immediately followed by other language which clearly and with certainty expresses the specific purpose of the appropriation—a purpose which the Legislature has found refers to the general welfare of the state and, therefore, the expenses necessary for its execution a burden which may properly be borne by the state.

[3] There is no ground to support the argument that the appropriation is not for a "single" purpose within the meaning of that word as it is employed in the section of the Constitution mentioned. The sole and only purpose of the appropriation, as is clearly deducible from the language of the act, is to assist in defraying the expenses of a convention of persons who are so to meet in reunion to effectuate a purpose by the execution of which, according to the tenor of the act here in question and the act of Congress above referred to, the public welfare of the state will be subserved.

[4] Nor is there any legal reason which will uphold the objection that the act is invalid because it vests in the Governor discretion as to the expenditure of the money appropriated. This provision was doubtless inserted in the act for the purpose of committing to the judgment of the executive the determination of the manner in which the appropriation may be expended to the best and highest interests of the state. If, for illustration, it becomes necessary to send representatives from the state to the reunion, it is only proper that the Governor, upon whom the act fixes the responsibility for the expenditure of the money, should be clothed with some discretionary power as to the number of persons so to be sent, and as to the amount of money that should reasonably be expended for defraying the expenses of such representatives to Vicksburg and back and while there during the progress of the convention. This should be true, since the act itself does not undertake to point out specifically how the money shall be used. Of course, the presumption is that the executive will perform his duty under the act faithfully and in furtherance of the objects and purposes intended to be subserved thereby.

Our conclusion is that the appropriation is perfectly valid, and, accordingly, a writ of mandate will issue out of this court commanding and requiring the respondent, state controller, to draw his warrant or warrants on the fund appropriated by the act in favor of the Governor of the state of California, as provided by said act, and, in accordance with the stipulation heretofore filed herein by the attorneys of the respective parties, said writ is ordered to issue forthwith.

1. Executors and Administrators 🔑314(6)—Distribution of Estate—Parties.

An administrator has no interest in a controversy to determine rights of inheritance, he being a mere officer of the court holding the estate as a stakeholder, to be delivered in accordance with the order of the court.

2. Executors and Administrators 🔑314(6)—Distribution of Estate—Administrator as Party—Waiver of Objection.

Where an administratrix claiming to be sole heir petitioned that the estate be distributed to her and others claiming to be heirs proceeded to try the case and made only vague objections, that the latter were the "only persons interested," to the administratrix being a party, there was a waiver of the objection.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑1036(2)—Harmless Error—Parties.

Where an administratrix petitioned in her representative and individual capacities alleging that she was sole heir, and cross-petitioners joined issue, and petitioner paid all the expenses of the controversy out of her personal estate, there was no prejudicial error in her appearance in her representative capacity.

4. Bastards 🔑3—Presumptions as to Legitimacy—Rebuttal.

Where an interlocutory decree of divorce is granted, and children are begotten thereafter and are born within 10 months of the death of the husband, the children, as provided under Civ. Code, § 194, are presumed to be his, but such presumption may be rebutted by sufficient evidence that he was incompetent, entirely absent, absent during the period when the child must have been begotten, or only present under such circumstances as afford clear proof that there was no sexual intercourse.

5. Bastards 🔑3—Marriage—Presumptions as to Legitimacy of Issue.

Where communication between husband and wife was such as to have afforded opportunity for sexual intercourse, whatever probabilities exist, no evidence can be admitted to show that any man other than the husband may have been, or probably was, the father of the wife's child.

6. Bastards 🔑5—Legitimacy — Evidence of Prior Act of Infidelity.

That a wife had an illegitimate child was not competent to show that a later child was illegitimate, under Civ. Code, § 194, providing that children born within 10 months after dissolution of marriage are presumed to be legitimate.

7. Bastards 🔑1—Legitimacy — Effect of Interlocutory Decree of Divorce.

An interlocutory decree of divorce does not affect the status of children begotten after its rendition, as they were not parties to such action.

8. Divorce 🔑169 — Interlocutory Decree of Divorce—Effect.

While an interlocutory decree of divorce does not affect the relations of husband and wife, it is a judicial determination that the wife is not thereafter dwelling with him as his wife.

9. Bastards 🔑3—Presumptions of Legitimacy—Interlocutory Decree of Divorce—Evidence.

An interlocutory decree of divorce is admissible to negative Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 5, providing that issue of a wife cohabiting with her husband is indisputably presumed legitimate, and also to show the improbability of an immoral sexual intercourse.

10. Bastards 🔑8—Presumption of Legitimacy—Instructions.

An instruction that an interlocutory decree of divorce on the ground of desertion decreases somewhat the weight of the presumption of legitimacy, in Civ. Code, §§ 193, 194, presuming issue legitimate born within 10 months of dissolution of marriage relation, was erroneous and prejudicial, misleading the jury to believe less evidence was required to overcome the presumption, and that very little weight should be given it.

11. Bastards 🔑5—Interlocutory Decree of Divorce — Conduct of Husband and Wife—Declarations—Evidence.

In an action concerning legitimacy of a child begotten during an interlocutory decree of divorce, evidence of conduct, and declarations concerning such conduct, was admissible to show illegitimacy, although of little weight where access of the husband to the wife was shown.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Cornelius Walker, deceased. Petition by Mabel A. Nason, administratrix and heir of the estate, for distribution of the estate, and cross-petition by Earl Walker and Edwin Walker, by guardian, Mabel E. Walker. From an order distributing the estate, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, cross-petitioners appeal. Reversed.

See, also, 169 Cal. 400, 146 Pac. 868.

Schmidt & Riggins, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Geo. M. Harker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. This proceeding grows out of the following facts: On July 3, 1913, upon the ground of desertion, Cornelius Walker obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce from his wife, Mabel E. Walker. He died on November 20, 1913, leaving an estate of which Mabel A. Nason, a daughter by a former wife, was appointed administratrix. On April 11, 1914, Mabel E. Walker gave birth to twin sons, Earl and Edwin, whose legitimacy as lawful heirs of deceased constitutes the subject of this controversy. On March 29, 1915, Mabel A. Nason, as "petitioner and administratrix," filed her first and final account, accompanied by a petition wherein she alleged that she was the sole heir of deceased, to whom she asked that the estate be distributed. In due time Mabel E. Walker, as guardian of her said minor sons, filed a counter petition alleging that they were children of deceased, and who, with Mabel A. Nason, constituted the only heirs to whom the estate should be distributed. Mabel A. Nason, as administratrix, answered this counter petition, denying all the material allegations thereof other than that she was an heir of deceased. Thereafter, on May 27, 1915, Mabel A. Nason, as administratrix, served notice that she would demand a jury to try the issues, as provided by section 1717, Code of Civil Procedure, and that on June 1, 1915, the administratrix would move the court to settle the issues to be tried. When the case was called for trial on December 9, 1915, Mabel E. Walker waived a jury trial and for the first time made an objection to the participation of any one in the proceeding other than herself, "on the ground that said minors by their guardian are the only persons interested in this proceeding," which objection was overruled and a trial was had before a jury, which rendered a verdict finding that said minors were not the children of deceased. Thereupon the court made its order settling the account and distributing the entire estate to Mabel A. Nason, from which, and an order denying her motion for a new trial, and other orders incident to the settlement of said estate in accordance therewith, Mabel E. Walker, as guardian of said minors, prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first contention made by appellant is that Mabel A. Nason in her capacity as administratrix had no interest in the proceedings, and therefore no authority to participate in the trial or demand the impaneling of a jury to try the issues. In support thereof several authorities are cited, to the effect that an administrator of an estate has no interest in a controversy to determine rights of inheritance, he being a mere officer of the court holding the estate as a stakeholder, to be delivered in accordance with the order of distribution made by the court. Undoubtedly this is true. Roach v. Coffey, 73 Cal. 281, 14 Pac. 840; Estate of Healy, 137 Cal. 474, 70 Pac. 455; Estate of Murphy, 145 Cal. 464, 78 Pac. 960.

[2, 3] Nevertheless the rule is not applicable to the facts disclosed by the record in this case. It clearly appears therefrom that Mabel A. Nason, in filing her petition, appeared before the court not only as administratrix, but in her individual capacity, alleging that she was the sole heir of deceased. Her petition as an individual for distribution of the estate to her as the sole and only heir of deceased was filed prior to the appearance in the proceedings of Mabel E. Walker as guardian of the minors. Her position as an heir was clearly set forth therein, which fact as pleaded was by counter petition recognized and admitted by the guardian of the minors, and reiterated in the answer filed by the administratrix. It further appears that Mabel A. Nason personally paid the costs of the proceedings charged to her in defense against the claims of the said minors, and bore the expense of hiring counsel therein. Up to the time of calling the case for trial, her right as an heir to wage the contest was recognized not only by the guardian, but as well by the court. Appellant made no objection whatsoever to the fact that she appeared as administratrix or in a dual capacity, until after issue of heirship was joined, and the impaneling of a jury called to try the same on December 9, 1915, at which time her counsel, in language, if not misleading, at least not calculated to acquaint the court or opposing counsel with the grounds thereof, made the objection, as shown by a colloquy between the court and counsel for appellant, as follows:

> "Counsel: At this time we wish to interpose another objection and an objection is made to any one participating in this proceeding other than Mabel E. Walker, on the ground that said minors by their guardian are the only persons interested in this proceeding.
> "The Court: Overruled. * * * I cannot understand counsel's position. The petition here is by Mabel A. Nason and she alleges that she is the sole heir. You allege that the two children mentioned in your petition are the children of the deceased and admit that the administratrix is a child of the deceased and entitled to inherit. How can there be any question about her interest?"

To which counsel for appellant replied:

> "We do not believe there is any one interested in this case excepting the minors.
> "The Court: How could that possibly be?"

To which inquiry counsel for appellant made no response, but stipulated that the objection might be considered throughout the whole case. The case was tried upon the theory that Mabel A. Nason had appeared in her personal capacity as an heir of said deceased, contesting the right of the minors to inherit. Not only should appellant, under these circumstances, be deemed to have waived the objection now urged, but, since throughout the proceedings the case was tried as a contest waged by Mabel A. Nason as a conceded heir of deceased contesting the rights of the minors to inherit, the latter could not possibly be prejudiced by reason of such irregularity, which, in case of a new trial and upon the court being made acquainted with the condition of the record, it will no doubt order corrected.

A number of errors are predicated upon rulings of the court in admitting evidence the prejudicial effect of which, it is claimed, was greatly accentuated by instructions given to the jury. At the time of the death of deceased, Mabel E. Walker, mother of the minors, was, and for a number of years prior thereto had been, his wife, though they had not lived together as man and wife for a period of some four years. Excepting for a short time when the husband lived at Santa Monica, they, having separate abodes, resided in the city of Los Angeles, where during all the time the husband was engaged in business. On November 8, 1911, a property settlement was had between them, and on January 10, 1912, the wife brought suit for divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion. This action, however, was dismissed, and thereafter, on April 8, 1913, the husband instituted suit for divorce, alleging that his wife had deserted him since December, 1911. In this action the wife made default and an interlocutory decree was granted July 3, 1913, and thereafter, on April 11th, the twin sons were born.

[4] Section 194, Civil Code, provides that:

> "All children of a woman who has been married, born within 10 months after the dissolution of the marriage, are presumed to be legitimate children of that marriage."

The marriage relation existing between the husband and wife was not dissolved by the interlocutory decree of divorce, but by the death of the husband on November 20, 1913. Estate of Dargie, 162 Cal. 51, 121 Pac. 320; Brown v. Brown, 170 Cal. 1, 147 Pac. 1168; Olson v. Superior Court, 165 Pac. 706. Hence the children, having been born within 10 months succeeding his death, are, under the provisions of said section 194, presumed to be his sons. This presumption, however, as stated in Hargrave v. Hargrave, 9 Beav. 552, may be rebutted and overcome—

> "by proper and sufficient evidence showing that the husband was (1) incompetent; (2) entirely absent, so as to have no intercourse or communication of any kind with the mother; (3) entirely absent at the period during which the child must, in the course of nature, have been begotten; or (4) only present under such circumstances as afford clear and satisfactory proof that there was no sexual intercourse." Estate of Mills, 137 Cal. 304, 70 Pac. 91, 92 Am. St. Rep. 175.

[5] The court instructed the jury that the evidence adduced was insufficient to justify a finding that Cornelius Walker was impotent, or that he was entirely absent so as to have no intercourse or communication with the mother, or that he was entirely absent at the period during which the children must, in the course of nature, have been begotten; and told the jury that the sole question for it to pass upon in determining the issue was whether the presence of Cornelius Walker upon the occasion of conceded visits made upon and meetings with his wife were under circumstances which clearly established the fact that no sexual intercourse was had between them. Hence the jury must be deemed to have considered the evidence adduced only in so far as it bore upon the question thus submitted for its determination. Therefore, in reviewing the alleged errors, we are not concerned with evidence, even though incompetent, which tended to prove the incompetency of the husband, or his absence from the wife to an extent that he could have no intercourse or communication of any kind with her, or absent at the period during which the child must, in the course of nature, have been begotten, unless it also bears upon the question submitted to the jury, namely, that he was only present under such circumstances as afford proof that there was no sexual intercourse. In the consideration of such question, Lord Langsdale, in Hargrave v. Hargrave, supra, said:

> "It is, however, very difficult to conclude against the legitimacy in cases where there is no disability and where some society or communication is continued between husband and wife during the time in question, so as to have afforded opportunities for sexual intercourse; and in cases where such opportunities have occurred and in which any one of two or more men may have been the father, whatever probabilities may exist, no evidence can be admitted to show that any man other than the husband may have been or probably was the father of the wife's child."

See Phillips v. Allen, 2 Allen (Mass.) 453; Cross v. Cross, 3 Paige (N. Y.) 139, 23 Am. Dec. 778.

Not only is the record barren of any evidence tending to show that Cornelius Walker did not, during the period while living separate and apart from his wife, have physical access in the sense of opportunity for intercourse with her; but it, without contradiction, shows that he did at numerous times call upon her at her residence (ostensibly on business), on which occasions (and particularly at about the time when these children were begotten), the wife, without objection, testified they indulged in the procreative act. That he was not impotent, and during the period covering the time when the children were begotten he had access to his wife, by which is meant opportunity for intercourse (Cope v. Cope, 1 M. & Rob. 275; Bury v. Philpot, 2 Myl. & K. 349), cannot upon this record be questioned.

In the Banbury Peerage Case, 1 Sim. & Stu. 159, it was said "that after proof given of access (opportunity) of the husband and wife, by which, according to the laws of nature, he might be the father of a child, no evidence can be received except to deny that such intercourse had taken place."

In Van Aernam v. Van Aernam, 1 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 375, it is said that the mere fact that the wife is living as the mistress of another, the husband not making any effort to break up such relation, is not sufficient evidence from which nonaccess of the husband can be presumed, thus bastardizing the issue.

To the same effect is Phillips v. Allen, 2 Allen (Mass.) 453. In other words, the party insisting upon the illegitimacy of one born in wedlock must prove nonaccess of the husband by evidence other than the fact that he and his wife did not live together, or even that she was living with another, since, having access and being competent, even though another had like opportunity and might be the father, the law, in determining the question, will not permit the indulgence in probabilities, but presumes "that he is the father whom the nuptials show to be so." This "is the foundation of every man's birth and status, * * * the corner stone and very foundation on which rests the whole fabric of human society; and if you allow it once to be shaken, there is no saying what consequences may follow." Routledge v. Carruthers, Nicol. Adult. Bast. 161.

In Powell v. State, 84 Ohio St. 165, 95 N. E. 660, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 255, it is said:

> "Public policy requires that the status of a child born or begotten in lawful wedlock should be fixed and certain, and the immediate exigencies, or even the apparent justice of any particular case, will not justify a departure from the rule so necessary and salutary to the best interests of society. The law is not willing that a child shall be declared a bastard to suit the whim or purpose of either parent, nor upon evidence merely that no actual act of intercourse occurred between husband and wife at or about the time the wife became pregnant. The proof must be such as to show the impossibility of access, and this evidence not only fails to prove that, but on the contrary does show that access was a physical possibility at all of the time from the date that she claims there was a final separation up until the time the divorce was granted. * * * Before such a child can be adjudged a bastard, the proof must be clear, certain, and conclusive, either that the husband had no powers of procreation, or the circumstances were such as to render it impossible that he could be the father of the child."

To the same effect are Dennison v. Page, 29 Pa. 420, 72 Am. Dec. 644; Kraus v. Kraus, 98 Mo. App. 427, 72 S. W. 130; Orthwein v. Thomas, 127 Ill. 554, 21 N. E. 430, 4 L. R. A. 434, 11 Am. St. Rep. 159; Egbert v. Greenwalt, 44 Mich. 245, 6 N. W. 654, 38 Am. Rep. 260; Ewell v. Ewell, 163 N. C. 236, 79 S. E. 509, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 373.

As said in Hargrave v. Hargrave, supra, where the communication between husband and wife was such as to have afforded opportunity for sexual intercourse, whatever probabilities exist, no evidence can be admitted to show that any man other than the husband may have been or probably was the father of the wife's child.

Now, bearing in mind the existence of the marriage, the fact that the husband was competent and that he concededly had access in the sense of opportunity for sexual intercourse with the wife, we come to a consideration of the evidence received and which the jury concluded sufficient to overcome the presumption declared in section 194, Civil Code, to the effect that such children are presumed to be legitimate children of the marriage.

[6] Over appellant's strenuous objection, much evidence was introduced with reference to the birth, paternity, and death of a child born to Mabel E. Walker in February, 1913, the illegitimacy of which and Walker's knowledge thereof the evidence tended to prove, and concerning which the court, among other things contained in a lengthy oral charge covering some 21 pages of printed matter, instructed the jury that the legitimacy or illegitimacy of such child was not involved in the controversy, except as such fact might incidentally throw light upon the relations of the husband and wife, the probability of love and affection between them, and the probability of acts of sexual intercourse occurring between them subsequent to that time; that such evidence bore upon the question of the innocence of the mother of the minors which, since it was a civil case, might be overcome by a preponderance of the evidence; and that such "evidence with regard to the legitimacy of the child born February 1, 1913, * * * was admitted for the purpose of overcoming, so far as it might justly have that weight in your mind, the presumption of the innocence of the mother." It thus appears that this line of testimony was received upon two theories:

First. That if the illegitimacy of the child born February 1st was established, it was a circumstance tending to controvert the presumption arising from conceded access and prove there was no act of sexual intercourse had between husband and wife, as testified to by her, on occasions when he subsequently met and visited her, and particularly at about the time when claimants were conceived. In other words, such fact was calculated to destroy his love and affection for her, in the absence of which no intercourse was had. It cannot be said that an act of intercourse between husband and wife (opportunity therefor being shown) depends upon the existence of conventional love and affection, although it does depend upon opportunity and inclination of the parties at the time to join in the procreative act. Access of the husband to the wife at about the time when the minors were begotten, thus affording opportunity, is conclusively shown; and assuming that the wife gave birth to an illegitimate child on February 1, 1913, such fact was not admissible as a circumstance tending to prove that the husband did not thereafter, at the time when these minors were begotten, he having access to his wife, have sexual intercourse with her. In Estate of Gird, 157 Cal. 534, 108 Pac. 499, 137 Am. St. Rep. 131, it is said:

> "The authorities are practically in accord to the effect that evidence tending to show unchaste conduct of the alleged mother with other men is allowable only in so far as it has a bearing upon the question of the paternity of the child—in so far as it tends to show that another is or may be the father of the child, and hence that it must be directed to a time at or about the time the child was begotten."

See, also, Sabins v. Jones, 119 Mass. 167, where it is held that "evidence of acts of intercourse with other men 12 months before the birth is inadmissible." Hence it follows that if such evidence was sufficient to overcome the presumption of the mother's innocence on the earlier occasion, and did convince the jury that she was guilty of an adulterous act, the fruit of which was the child born in February, 1913, such fact was not a circumstance tending to show there was no act of intercourse between the husband and wife at the time these minors were begotten, and their status, under the presumption declared in section 194, Civil Code, is unaffected thereby. In our opinion, all evidence with reference to the paternity and death of the child born February 1, 1913, and that tending to prove that A. B. was the father thereof, was inadmissible and the prejudicial effect of such error accentuated by the instruction of the court thereon.

[7-9] Although the status of the children, since not parties to the action for divorce, was unaffected by the interlocutory decree (Kleinert v. Ehlers, 38 Pa. 439; Shuman v. Shuman, 83 Wis. 250, 53 N. W. 455), such decree was admissible in evidence: First. For the purpose of negativing the provisions of subdivision 5 of section 1962, Code of Civil Procedure, that "the issue of a wife cohabiting with her husband, who is not impotent, is indisputably presumed to be legitimate." While the interlocutory decree did not affect the relations of husband and wife (Estate of Dargie, 162 Cal. 51, 121 Pac. 320), it was a judicial determination that the wife was not at the time the children were begotten cohabiting with her husband; that is, dwelling with him as his wife. Taylor v. Taylor, 10 Colo. App. 303, 50 Pac. 1049; Robinson v. Robinson, 188 Ill. 371, 58 N. E. 906.

Second. It was likewise admissible as tending to establish a relationship from which, depending upon other circumstances established, and evidence of the disposition and character of the parties, the jury might fairly draw the inference that, notwithstanding opportunity therefor, intercourse was not had on the occasions when the husband visited the wife. Standing alone it might have little weight, while considered with other facts it might be of probative value as tending at least to show the improbability of parties occupying such relation indulging in an act which, though not affecting the legitimacy of the children, must, in the absence of a reconciliation of the parties which the law contemplates may take place (Olson v. Superior Court, supra), be deemed essentially immoral.

[10] While in our opinion the interlocutory decree was admissible in evidence, the court erred in its instruction to the jury that "the law, then, is that the presumption of intercourse between husband and wife after the date of a divorce by an interlocutory decree, is not nearly so strong as the presumption that such intercourse occurred before the entry of such decree." The jury were further told, with reference to the effect, as evidence, of the decree and judgment roll in the divorce action, that while such decree does not destroy the presumption declared in sections 193 and 194, Civil Code, "You are entitled, however, in weighing the evidence in this case, to consider the fact that where a divorce is obtained on the ground of desertion that that fact decreases somewhat, and you are to judge to what extent, the weight of the presumption of legitimacy." The effect of thus instructing the jury was to tell them that after the granting of such decree the presumption declared by sections 193 and 194, Civil Code, should not have full force and effect, but must be deemed of less weight and effect than in cases where no interlocutory decree had been granted. In other words, that where such decree was granted, less evidence was required to overcome the presumption than would be required in the absence of such decree, notwithstanding proof of facts upon which the decree might have been granted. We do not so understand the law. The effect of an interlocutory decree of divorce upon the ground of desertion is but a judicial declaration of such desertion, which fact in a case of this nature might be otherwise established; and since the marriage relation, notwithstanding such decree, continues, how can it be said, as a matter of law, that the presumption is of less weight—requiring less evidence to overcome it—in the one case than in the other? In such cases the law declares the presumption and it is the province of the jury alone to determine under all the circumstances what weight in overcoming the same should be accorded the fact that at the time the children were begotten an interlocutory decree of divorce had been granted. Under the instructions the jury might well have concluded that, instead of the deduction which the law directs to be made from existing wedlock (section 193, Civ. Code, and section 1959, Code Civ. Proc.), very little weight should be attached to such fact. In our opinion, it was prejudicial error to give these instructions.

[11] The objection that the court erred in permitting evidence of the conduct of Walker and his wife towards each other, and of declarations connected with such conduct, goes more to the weight thereof than to its competency. While it might, where access of the husband and wife is shown, be entitled to very little weight in determining the question, nevertheless, under the authority of Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 87, and Wright v. Hicks, 12 Ga. 155, 56 Am. Dec. 451, we cannot say that such evidence was erroneously admitted.

Aside from the erroneous instructions referred to, the lengthy oral charge contains much matter that could serve no purpose other than to confuse in the minds of the jurors the real issue submitted to them, which, as stated, was whether the husband on conceded visits to and meetings with his wife was "only present under such circumstances as afford clear and satisfactory proof that there was no sexual intercourse."

The judgment and orders appealed from are reversed.

PEOPLE v. LEE. (Cr. 379.)

1. Homicide 🔑232, 244(1)—Prosecution—Evidence—Sufficiency.

In prosecution for murder, evidence held sufficient to negative the contention of self-defense and show the killing to have been deliberate, premeditated, and malicious, so that a reversal of the conviction would work a miscarriage of justice.

2. Criminal Law 🔑720(1)—Trial—Argument of Counsel.

Where the district attorney stated that the law was for the court, his further argument as to what constituted a reasonable doubt intended to illustrate the instructions was harmless, if erroneous, in view of the fact that the attorney, when his attention was called to the matter, stated that the jury should follow the instructions of the court.

3. Criminal Law 🔑730(1)—Trial—Argument.

Where the court directed the jury to disregard argument of the prosecutor which was possibly within the range of legitimate argument, it must be assumed that the jury did so and that defendant was in no way harmed.

4. Criminal Law 🔑1171(1)—Harmless Error—Argument of Prosecutor.

In a prosecution for murder committed by a member of a Chinese tong or secret society, argument by the prosecutor that the people of the state might as well bow down to the influence of the Suey Sings if defendant was allowed to escape punishment, being trivial, does not warrant reversal, even if the inference that the persons mentioned had interested themselves in accused's defense was not warranted.

5. Criminal Law 🔑1171(3)—Harmless Error—Argument.

In a prosecution for murder, argument by the district attorney that a witness had assisted in manufacturing testimony for the defense, though not warranted, does not necessitate a reversal, where the court interposed the remark that there was no showing that such witness had ever manufactured any evidence whatsoever, for it cannot be deemed that the jury were misled by the prosecutor's erroneous logic.

6. Criminal Law 🔑419, 420(10)—Evidence—Admissibility—Conversation with Third Person.

A witness testifying as to deceased's threats and demonstration against defendant, made in a club, cannot testify as to his advice to defendant to leave the place and avoid trouble; such statements by the witness being hearsay.

7. Criminal Law 🔑1169(3)—Review—Harmless Error—Admission of Evidence.

In a prosecution for murder, where accused admitted his own attempt at flight, testimony as to the flight of his codefendant, though erroneously received, was harmless.

8. Criminal Law 🔑438—Evidence—Photographs.

In a prosecution for murder, the admission of photographs of the place of the killing was not improper, though the photographs which were taken after the killing showed sticks of wood laid in the street to indicate a witness' idea of the positions of deceased and defendant; the photographs being used as illustrations only.

9. Criminal Law 🔑1144(12)—Appeal—Presumption—Admission of Evidence.

Where accused's testimony indicated that he shot deceased from behind, the admission of photographs of the wounds intending to illustrate the place of entry of the bullets cannot, in the absence of the exhibits, be deemed prejudicial, though probes may have been inserted in the wounds before the photographs were taken.

10. Criminal Law 🔑865(1)—Coercion of Jury.

In a prosecution for murder, where accused's guilt was plain, the court's action in holding the jury in custody during the night after the foreman had stated that the jurors had come to the conclusion that it was impossible to reach an agreement, and in returning them to the jury room after they reported in the morning that it was impossible to reach an agreement, was not, where the court had not indicated what verdict should be rendered but merely offered assistance as to instructions and urged the jury to reach an agreement if possible, erroneous as coercing the jury in rendering a verdict against accused, for the case was an important one, had consumed much time, and the jury should, if possible, have been induced to render a verdict.

11. Criminal Law 🔑765—Instructions Invading Province of Jury.

In prosecution for murder, an instruction that, in determining whether accused acted as a reasonable person upon the appearances as they were presented to him, the test should be what accused had reasonable cause to believe and did believe as a reasonable person at the time of the killing, and that the jury should judge accused's actions in the light of the circumstances surrounding him at the time of the killing, did not withdraw from the jury the consideration of threats made by deceased against him.

Henry Lee was convicted of murder, and, from the judgment and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Ashley, Hugh J. Tye, and Gordon A. Stewart, all of Stockton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was informed against jointly with one Ah Wing for the murder of one Lee Yow Juck. The parties were all Chinamen, and the homicide occurred on February 11, 1916, on Washington street in Stockton in Chinatown of that city. There is ample evidence found in the testimony of white witnesses to show that deceased was crossing Washington street from one side to the other, when defendant and the codefendant came out, observed him, and each fired several shots into the body of the deceased. The deceased was attempting, during this time, to escape, and when on the south side of the street he dropped to the ground, and defendant, being near him, reached over and fired two shots into his temple. Ah Wing also shot the deceased while he was lying on the ground. The two defendants then dropped their pistols and began running to get away. They attempted to escape but were pursued by officers, and, after running a short distance, each of them was apprehended. Eleven shots took effect in the body of the deceased, and caused his immediate death. The evidence of the prosecution shows a clear case of murder, deliberately executed, meriting, it might well be said, the extreme penalty of the law. Indeed, the case is so clear and convincing and satisfactory that the recent amendment to the Constitution (section 4½ of article 6) might well be invoked in the consideration of all of the points made by appellant upon which he bases his contention for a reversal of the judgment. Indeed, it is quite likely that, if the cause for any reason should be reversed, its history might furnish a duplicate of the case of People v. Grill, 3 Cal. App. 514, 86 Pac. 613, wherein the verdict rendered by the jury found the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree and fixed the penalty at imprisonment for life. The cause was reversed on account of an erroneous instruction, and upon a retrial the defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree carrying with it the penalty of death. This judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court (151 Cal. 592, 91 Pac. 515), and the defendant thereafter executed.

[1] Even the testimony of defendant in the case at bar negatives the contention of self-defense and shows the killing to have been deliberate, premeditated, and malicious. We may give a portion of his testimony, giving it in the narrative form. After stating that he saw deceased put his hand in his pocket and that Ah Wing was standing alongside of defendant, he proceeded:

> "I didn't see him take his hand out of his pocket, and I fired and shot at him. He was facing me then a little to one side, and as soon as I fired the first shot he turned around. Then he started to run across the street. I went after him shooting. I was shooting at his person. After he turned around I was shooting at his back. I don't know how many times. I don't know whether he had his hand in or out of his pocket; I didn't see that. He had his hand in his pocket; I couldn't tell what he had. When he was running across the street and I was running after him, I was about three or four feet from him. Juck didn't turn around any more at all. He fell down after he got across the street. When I was running across to Juck, Ah Wing was on one side of me, and he was shooting into Juck's back, too. After we got across the street, Juck fell on the sidewalk. I shot him after he was down. I don't know how many shots I fired then. I was bending over a little when I shot him in the head."

He further testified that, after emptying his pistol, he threw the weapon away and tried to escape. It is true that in his testimony he claimed he believed that his life was in danger, but his recital of the facts must have convinced the jury, as it would any fair-minded man, that he had no reason to believe, and did not believe, that his life was in danger, and that his plea of self-defense was a mere subterfuge without any real foundation for its support. In fact, in view of the record it must have taxed the ingenuity of the able counsel of appellant to present to the jury a plausible argument that there was any excuse or justification for the homicide. So we repeat that, if there ever was a case where a reversal for errors committed during the trial would work a miscarriage of justice, such is the case before us.

We have, however, examined with some care the various assignments of error made by appellant, and, while we are inclined to the view that some of the rulings of the court were erroneous, yet none of them is of sufficient importance to demand more than passing notice, and certainly there is nothing of error sufficiently grave, as shown by the record, to warrant a reversal of the conviction, based, as it is, upon indisputable proof of the defendant's guilt.

[2] The point upon which appellant seems to dwell most earnestly relates to the conduct of the district attorney. It is claimed that he overstepped the bounds of legitimate argument in his address to the jury, and that he sought to introduce improper evidence to the prejudice of the defendant. We deem it unnecessary to notice all the specifications in that particular. One objection to the district attorney's argument to the jury was directed to his statements as to the doctrine of reasonable doubt, as follows:

> "The law is for the court. But sometimes jurymen may think that there is some artificial rule that they must follow, something more than is reasonable, to believe it beyond a reasonable doubt. I think just the common sense rule that you believe it now, and are satisfied, and fully conscientious, and not wishing to do any harm, and not wishing to find him guilty unless he is guilty, and you know the consequences of a thing like that, then it is for you, gentlemen of the jury, to find out if you believe beyond a reasonable doubt, and without any artificial rules or any confusion in your understanding of what the definition of reasonable doubt means."

Upon his attention being called to this statement, the district attorney added:

> "As I stated before beginning, what I have said here is for the purpose of illustration only. You listen to the instructions of the court and determine from them and not what I say."

We can see no merit in the criticism of these statements made by the district attorney. It may be that his effort did not result in making any clearer in the minds of the jury the generally accepted definition of "reasonable doubt," but it certainly did no harm, and any possible prejudicial impression was removed by the direction of the district attorney to follow the instructions of the court.

[3] In commenting upon the incidents connected with the homicide, the district attorney said:

> "You may imagine why the testimony is all one way. Thirty or forty Chinamen along there saw the shooting. I do not see any of them in court telling about it, either for the defense or the prosecution. Do you suppose, gentlemen of the jury, that the prosecution could get any Chinaman in Stockton to come up here and testify that they saw Wing and Lee shoot Juck?"

Upon objection being made to this statement, the court directed the jury to disregard the remark of the district attorney and to strike it from their minds. Said statement of the prosecuting officer was probably within the range of legitimate argument, but at any rate we must assume that the jury followed the admonition of the court to disregard the statement.

[4, 5] Again the district attorney said:

> "If a murder like this was committed on the streets of Stockton, in the presence of five white men—I believe four officers—and the man caught red-handed in the act, and then a proposition of his defense like this is staged, and if they can get away with it, if they can save the man on a thing of that kind, gentlemen of the jury, hadn't the people of the state of California just as well bow down to the power and influence of the Suey Sings?"

This was assigned as error, and the court was asked to instruct the jury to disregard it. The court: "Let the exception be noted. Proceed, Mr. Foltz." We do not think that the court was required to direct the jury to disregard it. We think it was a rational inference that the "Suey Sings" had interested themselves in the defense of appellant, but at any rate it was a matter of such trivial importance as not to justify a reversal of the case even if such remarks of the district attorney were to be deemed improper. The appellant also complains bitterly of the statement of the district attorney that one Ahtye had manufactured the defense in the case. The language of the district attorney was:

> "Say, gentlemen of the jury, to Mr. Ahtye, although you are educated, a graduate of a college, and speak fine English, that you cannot put up a defense like has been shown in this case, and deceive an American jury."

The opinion of the court as to the impropriety of this remark coincided with that of appellant, and the judge said:

> "There is no evidence whatsoever that Mr. Ahtye ever manufactured any evidence in any manner whatsoever in this case. Therefore, disregard the remarks of the district attorney, so far as Mr. Ahtye manufacturing or made any defense in this case whatsoever. There is no evidence in this case to that effect at all."

As to this, we must also assume that the jury followed the admonition of the court. Moreover, there was evidence of interest and activity on the part of Ahtye, and the district attorney, believing, as he undoubtedly did, that the defendant was guilty of deliberate murder, and that his so-called self-defense was simulated, was probably justified in drawing the inference that Ahtye was responsible for the fraudulent claim that was made. But even if he were mistaken as to the proper inference to be drawn from the evidence, we must assume that the jurors were men of intelligence and probity, and not to be misled by the district attorney's erroneous impressions or faulty logic. It is probable that in the heat of argument some statements were made by the district attorney that might very properly have been left unsaid; but we are satisfied from the examination of the record that this officer had no desire to prejudice the rights of defendant or take an unfair advantage of him, and that, while zealous in the discharge of his duty as public prosecutor, he did not violate any of the constitutional rights of appellant. See People v. Yee Foo, 4 Cal. App. 730, 89 Pac. 450. Indeed, we are satisfied that appellant was accorded a fair and impartial trial, and was justly convicted of the offense charged against him.

[6] We may refer to two or three rulings as to evidence made by the court, of which complaint is made by appellant. One Mah Guey was called as a witness for defendant and testified to a singular occurrence at the How Yuen Tong Club between 8 and 9 o'clock that evening immediately preceding the homicide. After testifying that the deceased came in and pointed his finger at Henry Lee and Ah Wing, while at the same time he was pulling a revolver from his pocket and was trying to shoot them, he further testified that he, through the assistance of other Chinamen present there, disarmed the deceased, that the latter demanded the gun back, that he would not give it to him, and that deceased used a vile epithet, said he would go and get another one and come back and kill "you buggers." "After that he left, and when he left I told Ah Lee and Ah Wing to leave the place and avoid trouble." This latter statement as to what he told Ah Lee and Ah Wing was stricken out on motion, and we think correctly so, as it was clearly hearsay, and was no part of any threats or demonstrations made by deceased against said defendant. We may state in this connection that defendant, when on the stand, testified to this same declaration on the part of Mah Guey. There was no objection to it, and it was probably offered as affording some explanation of his reason for leaving the place. At any rate, the jury got the full benefit of it for what it was worth.

[7] Complaint is also made that the court permitted evidence of the flight of the codefendant Ah Wing. This was probably technically erroneous under the ruling of People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 113, 17 Am. Rep. 401, and other cases following it. It appears that in the Stanley Case the defendant and three persons jointly indicted with him were discovered by a policeman in the act of attempting to perpetrate a robbery, and immediately after the attempt they proceeded to a saloon, where they were all soon after arrested by the same and another policeman. After leaving the saloon and while being conducted to the jail, one of them (other than the defendant) broke away from the officers having him in charge, and attempted to escape by fleeing, but after considerable chase he was recaptured. The evidence of the attempt to escape was admitted against the objection of the defendant, and the Supreme Court, referring to the "flight," said:

> "At most, it is but a circumstance tending to establish a consciousness of guilt in the person fleeing; and it would be extending the principle to a great length to hold that the flight of one person tends to establish the guilt of another person."

In that case it is to be observed that there was no evidence of the flight of the defendant, but in the case at bar it is beyond question that the defendant himself as well as Ah Wing attempted to escape; the evidence all shows that appellant himself attempted it, he admitting it on the witness stand; hence it is perfectly apparent that the evidence as to Ah Wing's flight could not possibly have prejudiced the defendant.

[8, 9] Appellant also claims that photographs of the locality of the shooting were improperly admitted in evidence. The objection is based largely upon the fact that one of these contained sticks of wood laid in the street on the next day after the shooting to indicate where the witness C. J. Bartholdt had seen the two defendants and the deceased when he turned after the first shot, the wood not having been there at the time of the shooting. It seems that Bartholdt, before the trial, had pointed out this location, and the sticks of wood were placed there to aid his memory. We think there was no error in the ruling. It comes within the spirit of People v. Clapp, 26 Cal. App. 523, 147 Pac. 469, and cases therein cited. Of course, the photograph was admitted for the purpose of illustration only, and not as evidence of what in fact occurred. As to the photograph of the wounds, it may be that it should not have been admitted, since it appears that probes were inserted therein subsequent to the shooting; but, in the absence of the exhibits, it is apparent that we cannot determine that thereby any prejudicial error was committed. The purpose of the offer was to illustrate the place of entry of the bullets, in support of the contention of the people that deceased was shot from behind. We cannot presume that any such effect was produced. Besides from the testimony of appellant himself, as well as that of other witnesses, there could hardly be any question upon that subject.

[10] It is claimed that the court coerced the jury into rendering a verdict against the appellant. It seems that, after the jury retired, they were brought back into the courtroom two or three times. The first time was to obtain the exhibits that had been offered in evidence; the second time for additional instructions, and again they returned, and the foreman said:

> "We have come to the conclusion it is impossible to come to an agreement after a deliberation for quite a while." Thereupon the court said: "Do you want any of the instructions read?" Thereupon the foreman said: "They have already been instructed. It is perfectly clear to me; it seems to be to the others. The instructions are perfectly plain to me. If any of the other jurors would like an instruction—" The court thereupon asked how the jury stood, and the foreman said: "The last ballot stood eight to four, in—" Whereupon the court questioned each of the jurors as to his belief as to probability of an agreement on a verdict, and each declared that it was impossible to agree. Thereupon the following took place: "Gentlemen, the court is going lock you up for the night, until 9:30 to-morrow. The court will keep you here until 9:30 to-morrow morning. At that time you will be returned into court. A Juror: Return at 9:30 o'clock? The Court: No, return to the jury room. At 9:30 to-morrow morning the court will ask you to come in. By that time you will see whether you have reached a verdict or not." At 9:30 the next morning the jury were called, and the foreman stated that they still disagreed, and the court said: "The court is not satisfied, gentlemen, that you cannot agree on a verdict in this case. It realizes, gentlemen, it is your bounden duty to agree on a verdict, if you can conscientiously do so within the law and the evidence. The court is not satisfied that you cannot agree. It is the instructions of the court that you be returned to the jury room for further deliberation and discussion of the case."

One hour and a half thereafter, the jury returned with the verdict. We cannot say that the court abused its discretion in refusing to discharge the jury, or that it did more than insist that they have ample time for consideration and reflection. The case was an important one; it had consumed many days in its trial, and the court was naturally and properly anxious to have it determined, if it could be done without any infraction of the rights of the defendant. We cannot see that any improper influence was exerted by the court, nor does it appear that the verdict was anything but the deliberate and voluntary act of all the jurors. This circumstance affords, we think, no just ground for criticism, much less a reason for reversing the judgment.

[11] In reference to the instructions we think the jury were correctly and sufficiently informed as to the law of the case. All those necesssary, fundamental, and essential legal concepts relating to the situation were clearly presented, including the nature of the charge, the definition of the various offenses contained therein, the necessity of the prosecution proving beyond all reasonable doubt every material element of any crime contained within said information before the jury would be warranted in finding a verdict of guilty, the presumption of innocence attending the defendant at all stages of the case, the function of the jury to determine the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence, the definition of "reasonable doubt" and "the burden of proof," the right of self-defense, including the doctrine of appearances, and the necessity for the exercise of great care on the part of the jury in reaching a verdict of guilty, and in fact everything which the situation seemed to demand. It is true that certain terms of caution and remonstrance, sometimes given by trial courts to juries, were omitted; but as far as they had any important bearing upon the case they were, no doubt, supplied by arguments of counsel and the common sense of the jury. We deem it unnecessary to notice the specific criticisms of appellant further than to say that we do not regard the following instruction erroneous as claimed by appellant:

> "The question of the sufficiency of the appearances upon which the defendant may act under the plea of self-defense is one of fact for the jury to determine from all the evidence in the case. The acts which a defendant may do and justify under a plea of self-defense depend primarily upon his own conduct, and secondly upon the conduct of the deceased; but there is no fixed rule applicable to every case. In determining whether defendant acted as a reasonable person upon the appearances as they were presented to him, the test is what such defendant had reasonable cause to believe, and did believe, as a reasonable person at the time of the killing, and not what subsequent events may have proved the actual situation to have been. The jury should judge the actions of the defendant in the light of all the circumstances surrounding him at the time of the killing. In other words, as far as possible, the jury should put themselves in the place of such defendant, and then judge him by the standard of what an ordinarily reasonable person acting in good faith would have done if placed in such a situation. In determining the sufficiency of the appearances presented to a defendant at the time of the killing, the jury is not limited to such defendant's estimate of those appearances, unless his estimate of the situation, viewed in the light of all the circumstances surrounding him at the time, was that of a reasonable person."

We are satisfied that said instruction did not withdraw or attempt to withdraw from the consideration of the jury the circumstance of any threat that may have been made by deceased against appellant, as claimed by the latter. The gist of the instruction was that the jury should consider the situation as a reasonable person, and place themselves, if possible, in the position of the appellant, in order to determine whether he was justified in killing deceased. In order to place themselves in the position of appellant, they must, of course, have viewed the conduct of deceased in the light of any threat he may have made against said appellant. In fact, the instruction directs the jury virtually to acquit the defendant if he had reasonable cause to believe, and did believe, that the killing was necessary. This would necessarily include the consideration of any previous hostile demonstration on the part of the deceased. Manifestly the fact that such a threat may have been made would not justify the defendant in killing the deceased, but would be only a circumstance to be considered in connection with the conduct of deceased at the time of the homicide, as showing the probability that defendant was at the time in danger of being killed or receiving great bodily injury, and therefore justified in what he did.

We deem it inadvisable to notice further and more specifically the able argument of counsel for appellant. They certainly have made a strong presentation of a weak case, and to their persuasive skill exercised during the trial, no doubt, their client is indebted for his life.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

LOMBARDI v. KALLOCH et al. (Civ. 2209.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷1011(1)—SCOPE OF REVIEW—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence directly conflicts as to the understanding the parties had of a settlement agreement, the court on appeal will not interfere with the finding of the lower court construing it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Lottie R. Lombardi against I. M. Kalloch and another as copartners. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. B. Tappan, of Oakland, for appellant. Street & Street, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff, Lottie R. Lombardi, brought suit against the defendants, I. M. Kalloch and Francis Fox, copartners and attorneys at law, to recover the sum of $1,000, which it was contended they had retained from her in making a settlement of a suit for divorce between herself and her husband; said attorneys at that time being her counsel in the conduct of that suit. The defense presented by the defendants was that the settlement had been made with her full knowledge and concurrence, and that she was fully informed at the time the settlement was made that one of the conditions of the settlement of the property rights of the contending parties was that $1,000 of the money which she was to receive as a part of that settlement was to be paid to her attorneys as their counsel fee for representing her in the entire matter, and that she had at the time of that settlement and with full knowledge as to what its terms were and as to what her counsel were to receive out of the settlement signed an agreement in which it had been expressly stated that their fees, to be retained by them out of the money she was to receive, were to be the sum of $1,000.

The only point presented in the case is the conflict in the evidence as to her understanding of the matter at the time the settlement was made. There is a sharp conflict in the evidence upon that point, plaintiff testifying that she did not fully understand that her counsel were retaining this amount out of the money which she was then about to receive; and, on the other hand, the defendants both testifying, and being supported by other witnesses, that she did so fully understand the transaction, and that there was no misrepresentation or concealment or fraud or abuse in any way of the confidential relation existing between her and them in the making of that settlement and in the receipt by them of the amount of money for which she now sues. The lower court resolved that conflict in favor of the defendants, and under the well-settled rule we will not interfere with the finding of the lower court upon such a state of the evidence.

It follows that the judgment will be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. DE ANGELLI. (Cr. 680.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑1171(1)—Harmless Error—Misconduct of Prosecutor.

In a trial for murder, the prosecutor's repeated statements that defendant was able to testify without an interpreter, made to induce the court to change its ruling that his testimony should be given through an interpreter, were not prejudicial, especially in view of the fact that if such statements were made without sufficient cause, and with an improper motive, it would operate more to defendant's benefit than to his prejudice.

2. Criminal Law 🔑1037(1)—Appeal—Preservation of Statements—Objections of Counsel.

Statements by the prosecutor alleged to be prejudicial to defendant will not be reviewed on objection, made for the first time on appeal.

3. Witnesses 🔑277(4)—Cross-Examination—Scope.

In a trial for murder, where the court on defendant's direct examination asked several questions relating to his early history, cross-examination by the district attorney to clear up matters referred to in the court's questions, was not beyond the scope of the direct examination.

4. Criminal Law 🔑706—Cross-Examination of Defendant—Use of Memorandum.

Permission to prosecuting officer to consult memorandum of a conversation between himself and the defendant during the defendant's cross-examination, consisting merely of notes made by such officer of a prior conversation with defendant relating to minor details of case, not being either a deposition or a confession, was not error.

5. Criminal Law 🔑406(1)—Evidence—"Confession."

The word "confession" is not a mere equivalent of the word "statement" or "declaration," and does not include statements not amounting to a confession of guilt, or an admission of a fact that may tend to show guilt as in a confession.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Confession.]

6. Criminal Law 🔑406(3)—Evidence—Confessions—Voluntary Character.

The rule that confessions must be voluntary is limited to confessions of guilt, and has no application to admissions of fact which merely tend to show guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Charles De Angelli was convicted of murder in the second degree, and from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Albert C. Agnew, John H. Tolan, of Alameda, and Henry C. Reynolds, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was charged by information with the crime of murder, it being alleged that on August 20, 1916, in the county of Alameda, he willfully and with malice aforethought killed Stefano Coppi. He was convicted of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to life imprisonment. He appeals from said judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The evidence is amply sufficient to support the verdict of the jury.

[1, 2] As to certain acts on the part of the prosecuting officer, claimed by appellant to constitute misconduct, it is true that the former repeatedly during the examination of the defendant stated that the latter was able to testify without the aid of an interpreter, but we are unable to understand how the defendant was prejudiced thereby. From the record it appears that such assertions were not without cause, and they were made with a view to inducing the court to change its ruling that the testimony of the defendant should be given through an interpreter. It may also be said in this connection that if these repeated statements of the representative of the people were made without sufficient cause and with an improper motive, this was doubtless apparent to the jury, and would operate rather to the benefit of the defendant than to his prejudice. Moreover, with reference to the several instances now claimed to constitute misconduct on the part of the prosecuting officer, even if they could be regarded as such, no assignment thereof was made during the trial nor any request made for an admonition to the jury with relation thereto; consequently the objection here made for the first time cannot be considered. People v. Metzler, 21 Cal. App. 80, 130 Pac. 1192.

[3] During the direct examination of the defendant, and in order to clear up some doubts concerning certain circumstances of his early history, the court asked him several questions. Thereafter the district attorney was permitted over objection to cross-examine the defendant concerning the matters therein referred to. It is now claimed that this cross-examination trespassed beyond the scope of the direct examination. We find nothing to criticize in the questions asked by the court. As before stated, they were asked in order to make clear matters elicited by the defendant's counsel; and in any event the state would have a right to cross-examine the defendant on all matters brought out by the court through questions to which no objection was made, and which may be regarded as having been tacitly consented to by the defendant.

[4-6] It is also claimed that the court erred in permitting the prosecuting officer to consult a memorandum of a conversation between himself and the defendant while cross-examining the latter. The objection and argument here seem to be based upon the assumption that the memorandum constituted a deposition or confession; and the contention is that if it was the former the defendant was entitled to an inspection thereof before he could be examined concerning it; or if the latter, that there should have been a showing made that it was given freely and voluntarily and not under the incitement of fear or hope of reward. But the memorandum was neither a deposition nor confession. It consisted merely of notes made by such officer of a prior conversation had with the defendant in relation to minor details of the case. In no sense did it purport to be an acknowledgment of guilt; in fact the statements therein recorded barely came within the category of admissions. The word "confession" is not the mere equivalent of the word "statement" or "declaration." People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 158. The term is restricted to acknowledgments of guilt. People v. Parton, 49 Cal. 637; People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 461. It does not include statements not amounting to a confession of guilt, or admissions of fact that may tend to show guilt as in a confession. People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 86, 45 Pac. 175. The rule that confessions must be voluntary is limited to confessions of guilt, and has no application to admissions of fact which merely tend to show guilt. People v. Parton, supra; People v. Velarde, supra.

COLUMBIA COFFEE & SPICE CO. v. LE BARON BROS. & NELSON. (Civ. 2184.)

Appeal and Error 🔑1011(1)—Findings—Conflicting Evidence.

The appellate district court will not disturb a finding of the trial court on conflicting evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by the Columbia Coffee & Spice Company against Le Baron Bros. & Nelson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry G. W. Dinkelspiel, of San Francisco, for appellant. Edward J. Linforth, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The only question to be determined on this appeal is as to whether there is evidence in the record to sustain the trial court's finding as to where certain merchandise, consisting of a quantity of onions and potatoes, was to be delivered in good, merchantable condition. It is claimed by the plaintiff that the defendant agreed that said produce should arrive in a marketable condition at a distant foreign port; while the defendant, on the other hand, contends that San Francisco was the point of delivery to which the guarantee as to the condition of the produce had reference. The evidence shows that part of the goods on their arrival at the foreign port was decayed and unmerchantable, but there is evidence to sustain the finding of the court that the extent of defendant's warranty was that the potatoes and onions should be in good, marketable condition at San Francisco. This court therefore, under the familiar rule relating to the presence of a conflict in the evidence, will not disturb the finding of the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

OLIPHANT v. HOME BUILDERS. (Civ. 1909.)

1. Corporations 🔑304—Officers—Contracts—Construction.

A contract whereby defendant was employed as managing agent of the plaintiff corporation did not divest the board of directors of its authority to manage and control the affairs of the corporation, but gave plaintiff power to enter into contracts without the authorization of the directorate.

2. Corporations 🔑307—Officers—Duties.

It is the duty of a corporate agent acting in a fiduciary capacity to make full and complete disclosure to his superior officers and directors as to all business transacted by him on behalf of the corporation.

3. Corporations 🔑294—Manager—Employment—Contract—Discharge.

Where plaintiff, engaged as manager of the defendant corporation, with knowledge of a resolution of the directors requiring all contracts to be executed by the president and manager, entered into a contract with a third person for the avowed purpose of protecting such third person, and when questioned by the directors and his superior officers denied the existence of the contract, such conduct warranted the corporation in terminating plaintiff's contract of employment.

4. Master and Servant 🔑74—Contracts—Compensation.

A contract providing for plaintiff's employment at an annual salary of $6,000, payable at the rate of $500 per month, does not entitle employé to payment in advance; the ordinary rule being that services are paid for after they have been performed, unless there is a contract to the contrary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. A. Raker, Judge.

Action by F. H. Oliphant against the Home Builders, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hickcox & Crenshaw, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Garrett & Bush, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant certain money alleged to be due to the plaintiff on account of services rendered. Defendant appeals from the judgment entered against it.

[1] In June, 1914, a written contract was made between plaintiff and defendant whereby plaintiff was employed for a period of one year as a managing business agent at an annual salary of $6,000, payable at the rate of $500 per month. By the writing which expressed the contract, it was agreed that the employment should relate back and commence on the 31st day of May, 1914. Plaintiff entered upon the employment and continued therein until the 10th day of February, 1915, when the board of directors of defendant by resolution proposed to discharge him and terminate the contract. The sole question here presented is as to whether defendant corporation had sufficient cause to dispense with the services of plaintiff and end the contractual relations prior to the expiration of the year mentioned in the contract. In its answer the defendant set up that the plaintiff was discharged from its employ—

"for cause, and for the reason that he was insubordinate, did not obey the instructions of the proper officials of said corporation or the instructions given him by the board of directors, and because he was using the moneys of the defendant corporation for improper purposes, and not for the best interests of said defendant corporation."

That portion of the written contract determining the character of the employment is as follows:

"That the party of the first part (the corporation) does by these presents employ the party of the second part for a period of one year from date to manage, take charge of and conduct the business of the party of the first part along such lines as the said party of the second part may deem expedient and best at a yearly salary of $6,000, payable at the rate of $500 per month."

The trial judge by his findings negatived the allegation of defendant's answer that the discharge of plaintiff was for sufficient cause. It appears from the evidence given that, after entering upon his office as managing agent, the plaintiff initiated an extensive business policy, especially in connection with the exploitation of certain lands in the San Fernando Valley in Los Angeles county. As the defendant had no title to these lands, the advisability of expending large sums of money, as appears was done, with a view of acquiring title and marketing that property, was the subject of considerable discussion and resulted in opposition on the part of certain of the directors of defendant corporation. When plaintiff first took hold of the matter of the San Fernando lands he did not consult with the directors, but proceeded on his own responsibility, and the first notice that the directors had of his action was furnished them by an advertisement in a newspaper. It was later determined by both the directors and stockholders that the expenditures in that matter should be continued, this policy being apparently dictated by the consideration that, as a large amount of money had theretofore been expended, the protection of the investment required that additional money be used in the same project. There were other matters in which the policy of the manager was opposed to that of some of the directors. We make this statement preliminarily as showing that the plaintiff assumed to act under his contract of employment as the directing head of the corporation, and that he assumed to act in the making of contracts without first obtaining the sanction of the directors. However broad the terms of the contract of employment, we do not believe that it may be said that they were broad enough to divest the board of directors of the authority imposed upon that board by law to manage and control the affairs of the corporation; nor do we think there was any intent on the part of the board to so delegate its power. It may be said perhaps that as to the San Fernando land project, as the acts of plaintiff in that matter were finally ratified, sufficient cause was not shown upon which to base a rescission or termination of the contract under which plaintiff was employed.

[2, 3] There was, however, as is shown in the transcript of the evidence, the case of the making of a supplemental contract with one Stoltz. The by-laws of the corporation were not introduced in evidence, but the president testified that, shortly after plaintiff was appointed as manager, a resolution was adopted requiring that all contracts be executed by the president and manager. A contract was in existence between the corporation and Stoltz which had for its object the securing, through the services of Stoltz, funds with which to construct a business building on certain property. Upon certain conditions, Stoltz was to receive a payment of $15,000. On October 2, 1914, the plaintiff wrote to Stoltz a letter in the form of an offer to contract, which supplemented the original contract made and obligated the corporation to pay to Stoltz for six months the sum of $375 per month, with the condition that that amount would be reduced to $125 per month if Stoltz was successful in doing what the original contract provided he was to do. By written acceptance, Stoltz agreed to the terms of this contract. The matter of the making of this supplemental contract was not divulged by the plaintiff, and inquiries of the plaintiff, both by the president of the corporation and a director during a directors' meeting, as to whether there was any other contract in existence of which notice had not been given, received a negative response from the plaintiff. In explanation of this matter the plaintiff stated that he made the supplemental agreement with Stoltz for the purpose of protecting the latter in the event that the directors "or some of them" might want to "side step" the paying of the compensation to Stoltz under the original contract. As an agent of the corporation acting in a fiduciary capacity, it rested upon plaintiff to make full and complete disclosures to his superior officer and the directors as to all business transacted by him in the corporation's behalf. That a breach of this obligation gave to the corporation the legal right to rescind the contract of employment and discharge the plaintiff, we have no doubt at all. It seems quite evident that the plaintiff assumed that he possessed the largest authority to bind the corporation by his acts as manager, and assumed that the policy adopted by him was not subject to direction or supervision. As to the matters to which we have referred, the testimony was uncontradicted. Plaintiff made no denial of the assertions of the president and director who stated that plaintiff had denied that any other contract was outstanding of which the officers had no knowledge, and there was no dispute at all but that the Stoltz contract had theretofore been made. Plaintiff did not deny knowledge of the resolution of the board of directors which required that contracts be executed by the president and manager. In view of this state of the record, we think that the contention of appellant that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the finding made by the trial judge, wherein it was determined that no cause existed for the discharge of the plaintiff, should be sustained. While that matter is not made the subject of discussion on this appeal, it may be suggested that there is a strong reason also for holding that plaintiff acquiesced in the rescission of his contract. After receiving notice of the action of the board of directors discharging him, he took his effects away from the office and did not thereafter offer to perform any services in the capacity of manager prior to the commencement of this action.

[4] Neither do we think that the written contract of employment authorized the plaintiff to collect his compensation in advance as in this action he sought to do as to the February, 1915, salary. The ordinary rule is that services are paid for after they have been performed, unless there is a special contract to the contrary. The contract here exhibited contains no terms to that effect.

The judgment is reversed.

GRAY et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 2275.)

1. Master and Servant ⟹417(7)—Injuries to Servant — Workmen's Compensation Act—Review—Conflicting Evidence.

On petition to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, a finding of fact by the commission on conflicting evidence cannot be set aside.

2. Master and Servant ⟹405(2)—Injuries to Servant—Evidence—Joint Employers.

In a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) for compensation for the death of a servant, evidence held to warrant a finding that the employers were jointly engaged in business of rock crushing, in which the fatality occurred.

Petition by H. N. Gray and another for writ of review to Industrial Accident Commission and others to review an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the death of a servant. Writ dismissed, and award affirmed.

J. E. Manning, for petitioners. Warren H. Pillsbury, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. [1] In support of the application for the writ it is urged first that the decedent, to whose dependents an award was made by the respondent Industrial Accident Commission was guilty of willful misconduct in returning to the place from which he had been taken earlier in the day and where he ultimately met with the accident which caused his death. Now the evidence shows that he was ordered to go from that place, where he was engaged in loading dirt on cars, to another place some little distance away. The evidence does not show that he was warned not to return to the place where he was originally working, nor does it show that it was explained to him what the dangers of the place were from which he was taken. He was simply told to go and work somewhere else. He went and worked for a while at the place indicated on the same character of work which he had been doing; and later on, the work at that place becoming slack, or there not being any dirt to load, or some such reason, he went back to the place where he had been working earlier in the morning, apparently with the intention of keeping employed where there was work to do. Now there is no direct evidence—there was none before the commission that we can see—that at the time that he returned to this place he actually knew of the dangers that were incident to his being there; and, that being so, the question whether his act in returning was willful misconduct is one which is only inferable from the argument now made that he must have seen the dangers of the place, and that he willfully returned to a place that was dangerous knowing the dangers of it and knowing that he was taken away from it because of the dangers existing there. Now that is only an inference to be drawn from his action; but the commission did not draw it, nor upon this application can we.

[2] The only remaining point is as to whether or not H. N. Gray and P. B. Gray were jointly interested in the business of rock crushing; and upon that point we think that the record shows sufficient evidence to warrant the finding that they were, although H. N. Gray did testify that the rock-crushing business was separate and apart from the selling of the rock when crushed, which was conducted by P. B. Gray. Nevertheless the commission did not apparently see fit to believe him in that statement in view of all the other circumstances in the case, which, among other things, showed that the rock was taken at the quarry by (Mrs.) P. B. Gray, there delivered to her, that she sold it, and if there was a balance due she paid it to Mr. H. N. Gray. She kept all the books of the entire concern, of both departments of the rock-crushing plant and of the sales made, and Mr. H. N. Gray kept no books at all; all of his accounts were kept by her, and if he wanted any money he got it from her. We think the evidence upon the whole supports the implied finding of the commission that Mr. H. N. Gray and Mrs. P. B. Gray were jointly interested and had jointly employed the deceased to work for them.

The award is affirmed, and the writ dismissed.

DICK v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑835—STREET GRADING—DAMAGE FROM SURFACE WATER—EVIDENCE—FINDINGS.

In an action for the alleged destruction of crops owned by plaintiff on leased land, by surface water which by a system of street grading was collected at one place and overflowed upon the land, evidence held to sustain findings following the allegations of the complaint.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑835—STREET GRADING—SURFACE WATERS—DAMAGES.

A city by virtue of its power to create and improve streets has no absolute and unconditional right to intentionally divert water therefrom to protect the streets, and to discharge it by artificial means in increased quantities upon the property of an adjoining owner.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑845(4) — STREET GRADING—SURFACE WATERS—DAMAGE.

In an action for the destruction of crops owned by plaintiff on leased land from surface waters collected by a system of street grading and overflowing upon the land, evidence held not to require finding that rains of certain years were so unprecedented that city need not have calculated on their probability.

4. RELEASE 🔑35—INJURY TO LEASED PREMISES—LANDLORD'S WAIVER OF DAMAGES—EFFECT.

In such action, the fact that plaintiff's landlord had waived all damages resulting from the improvement of the streets in consideration of the granting of the petition for the improvement, where it appeared that the city had constructed the work differently from the work sought by the petition of the landlord and other property owners, could not be set up as a waiver as against the tenant.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑232(1½)—OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In such case, where defendants in their answer did not set up the waiver, an objection to waiver on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and that no foundation had been laid therefor, and that it was not a waiver of the condition shown to exist in the case, was sufficient to raise the point that the defense of waiver based on landlord's petition containing a waiver was not within the issues presented by the pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Louie Dick against the City of Los Angeles and P. P. O'Brien and others, constituting the Board of Public Works of the City. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Judgment against the City of Los Angeles, and order denying its motion for a new trial affirmed, and judgment against defendants O'Brien and others, and order denying their motion for new trial reversed.

Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., and Charles S. Burnell, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for appellants. Lloyd, Cheney & Geibel and Ovila N. Normandin, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover damages for the unlawful destruction of crops owned by the plaintiff on leased land. The defendants are the city of Los Angeles and three persons who constituted the board of public works of that city. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Vermont avenue in the city of Los Angeles runs in a northerly and southerly direction. It is crossed by Slauson avenue running in an easterly and westerly direction. The right of way of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company adjoins and parallels Slauson avenue on the north side at and in the vicinity of the crossing of Vermont avenue. The land on which the crops were grown consists of about 13 acres adjoining the north side of the railroad right of way and fronting along the westerly line of Vermont avenue a distance of 590.25 feet. At all times mentioned in the complaint the land was owned by F. P. Dalton and two other persons, and was occupied by the plaintiff as tenant of the owners; the tenancy being from month to month. The damage to plaintiff's crops of vegetables was caused by the overflow of water from Vermont avenue, resulting from two certain rainstorms which occurred in January or February, 1913, and at about the same period of the year 1914. During the latter part of the year 1911 and the early part of the year 1912, the city of Los Angeles caused certain work to be done, consisting of the grading, paving, guttering, and curbing of Vermont avenue from Santa Barbara street to the south line of Fifty-Eighth street (the next street north of Slauson avenue), and the grading and curbing of Vermont avenue to the Santa Fé right of way, and the grading, macadamizing, guttering, and curbing of Slauson avenue at and adjoining its intersection with Vermont avenue. The plaintiff bases his cause of action upon certain alleged facts concerning the plan and construction of said improvements, and alleges that the flooding of his land was caused by those improvements as constructed.

[1] The principal facts in issue at the trial are shown by certain findings of the court which follow and affirm the allegations of the complaint, as follows: In finding 4 it is stated:

> "That the specifications and construction of said work were and are such that at the said intersection of Slauson avenue and Vermont avenue, the grade of Slauson avenue was not made and is not the same grade as Vermont avenue, and the drainage of Vermont avenue ended there in a cul-de-sac, except as to a small culvert box and a small amount of drainage down the right of way of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company when the water backs up to a sufficient height. That as a part of said work and as a manifest fault in the construction and plans, defendants filled up a ditch or waterway on the westerly side of Vermont avenue and made no provision for carrying off the water theretofore carried therein, but on the contrary made said street carry the water theretofore carried by said ditch up to said Slauson avenue and there deposit same without any drainage except the small culvert box aforesaid. That as constructed said culvert box drains away only a small portion of the water carried to and deposited at said place by ordinary rains and said water thereupon backs up and floods plaintiff's land and adjacent lands. That defendants had constructed a culvert box on the easterly side of Vermont avenue under said Santa Fé railway right of way into Slauson avenue, but said box caused water to run from Slauson avenue back into Vermont avenue and was nailed up."

In finding 5 it is said:

> "* * * That said work upon and paving of Vermont avenue conducted a greatly increased flow of water southerly along said Vermont avenue, being water that had not theretofore flowed there; that defendants had a pipe or drain under Vermont avenue from the east to the west side thereof immediately north of the Santa Fé right of way, by which drain the waters which had formerly flowed in a southerly direction on Vermont avenue were diverted from the easterly side of Vermont avenue to the westerly side of Vermont avenue and deposited upon plaintiff's said leased land; that the said defendants failed to provide for the drainage or escape of such increased flow of waters or the adequate escape of any waters flowing south on Vermont avenue at this locality, but on the contrary banked up and stopped the same."

The court found and the evidence shows that prior to the paving of Vermont avenue no storm, drainage, or other waters ran upon or through plaintiff's said leased lands so as to injure the same.

Appellants claim that the findings are not sustained by the evidence. Prior to the street work, Slauson avenue had been higher than Vermont at the intersection of the streets. The land in the vicinity had not been included, at that time, within the city limits. The country's road workers had filled that part of Vermont avenue for some distance north of the railroad right of way in order to raise the road to a convenient level for driving across the right of way. Prior to the street work there were culvert boxes, one on the east side of Vermont avenue and one on the west side of Vermont avenue, to carry water under the right of way and under Slauson avenue. When the street work was done, these culvert boxes were retained and an additional box for the passage of water was placed alongside the old one on the west side of Vermont avenue, and thereby the drainage facilities were increased; although, as we shall see, the increase was not enough to carry all the water that might come to that point during heavy rainstorms. Respondent claims that Slauson avenue was higher after it was paved than before. We do not so understand the testimony. Apparently the fact was, as stated by the witness Matteson (of the city engineer's office), that Slauson avenue at that crossing was not at a greater level after the paving work was done than it was previous thereto, relative to Vermont avenue. Fifty-Eighth street extends easterly from Vermont avenue, and if extended westerly would pass through the plaintiff's land. Matteson's uncontradicted testimony is that the elevation of the curb on the west side at Fifty-Eighth street was changed by decreasing it two-hundredths of a foot, and that "the curb at Slauson was 1 foot 7 inches lower than the track before the paving, it is the same now." We understand that the track referred to is the Santa Fé railroad track at its Vermont avenue crossing. The essential fact is that after the street work was done, as also before the work was done, there would always be some accumulation of water on Vermont avenue immediately north of the railroad, whenever the water came down that avenue faster than it could escape through the culverts or through a ditch next to the railroad right of way. And since the general grade of the country fell away toward the west, any large accumulation of water at that place on Vermont avenue would naturally find its way across the plaintiff's land. This tendency was probably increased by the fact found by the court that the defendants filled up a ditch or waterway on the westerly side of Vermont avenue and made no provision for carrying off the water theretofore carried therein. Appellants attack this finding, but we think not successfully. The witness Dalton said that the gutters on both sides were narrowed by the filling in of earth "to make the approach to the railroad," and we have not observed that there was any other evidence on that point.

The court found also:

> "That said work upon and paving of Vermont avenue conducted a greatly increased flow of water southerly along said Vermont avenue, being water that did not theretofore flow there."

Counsel for appellants claim that there is no testimony in the record which supports this finding. In response, our attention is directed to the testimony of the witness Hufford, which is to the effect that, prior to the paving of Vermont avenue, water would run down Vernon avenue (a street parallel to Slauson avenue and about a mile north thereof); "there was a little high sand ridge, and the water would come down there practically on Santa Monica avenue to Vernon avenue, and take down Vernon avenue to the west, and, after they put in the street paving through there, they naturally put it down to the grade, which lowered it lower than either side, the water would naturally run from the west back to the east, and from the east back to the west to Vermont avenue." Thus it was shown, and not contradicted, that there was a sand ridge running across Vermont avenue which kept water from running down Vermont avenue from points at or north of Vernon avenue, and that this ridge was removed when the city in doing the street work on Vermont avenue paved the street at the level of the established grade. Counsel for respondent only offer, in addition to the foregoing facts, their own suggestion that the natural result of the paving itself added to the flow of the water by substituting a paved surface for the dirt surface theretofore existing.

It is not necessary to discuss the other specifications of the particulars in which it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings. There is no evidence that the city diverted to Vermont avenue, and to the land occupied by the plaintiff, any natural stream of water. Nor was there any stream whatever other than the ditches which carried surface water when it reached the streets. The natural drainage of surface waters in that part of the city is toward the west. Whenever rainstorms caused surface waters to drain from the east of Vermont avenue so as to reach that thoroughfare, they ran down Vermont avenue, except as above stated.

Los Angeles Cemetery Ass'n v. City of Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 461, 37 Pac. 375, is a case relied upon by both sides in this action. In that decision the court, following Palmer v. Waddell, 22 Kan. 352, said that:

> "The rule that the owner of a tract of land may obstruct the flow of surface water across his land appears to and does have an exception, which is where surface water, having no definite source, is supplied by the falling rains and melting snows from a hilly region or high bluffs, and, owing to the natural formation of the surface of the ground, is forced to seek an outlet through a gorge or ravine, and by its flow assumes a definite or natural channel, and escapes through such channel regularly during the spring months of every year, and in seasons of heavy rains."

It was held in Los Angeles Cemetery Ass'n v. City of Los Angeles, supra, that, since the embankment placed by the city across First street did obstruct the flow of a natural water course of the kind above described, the case came within the exception stated, and the city could not lawfully turn the flow upon adjacent lands to their injury. But the city was protected from liability in that action, because the overflow which caused plaintiff's damage was occasioned by an extraordinary flood, which could not have been reasonably foreseen. In the same case the court affirmed the general rule and stated the exception, by saying that as to ordinary surface water, if the injury to plaintiff was caused by grading a public street to its established grade, and plaintiff could grade its property so as to conform to the established grade, whereby the surface water would flow off, and not stand upon its property, the plaintiff could not recover. But the court held that the rule has no application to a case where surface water assumes the form of a regular stream or water course and the case comes within the exception before stated. In Conniff v. San Francisco, 67 Cal. 45, 7 Pac. 41, the court said:

> "It is well settled that a municipal corporation has no right * * * to stop up a natural channel through which waters run by an embankment made in grading a street, under its general power to grade and improve streets."

In Lampe v. San Francisco, 124 Cal. 546, 57 Pac. 461, 1001, the court said:

> "As we understand it, damages are claimed because the grading of the street, which is the property of defendant, prevents the surface water from flowing off the lands of the plaintiff and onto the lands of defendant as it had been wont to flow. The question is as to whether or not defendant is liable for damages caused by the obstruction of the flow of surface waters from the lands of plaintiff, occasioned by the necessary and lawful grading of defendant's street in front of plaintiff's said lands. Upon the solution of this question depends the result as to whether or not this judgment shall be affirmed."

The court then quotes with approval from Dillon on Municipal Corporations, to the effect that, where the work of grading or improving streets has caused damage by surface water to private property and the damage has resulted solely as a consequence of the proper execution of a legal power by the corporation, there is no implied liability therefor. The court further said:

> "There is in some of the books an apparent exception to the general rule in that class of cases where the surface water, owing to the conformation of the country, has found for itself a definite channel in which it is accustomed to flow, in which class of cases it is said that the municipal corporation, in making an embankment while grading its streets, should erect a culvert or waterway so as not to obstruct the flow of the surface waters in their well-defined channel."

The ditch on the west side of Vermont avenue which it is specially complained was made narrower by the street work here in question was not a channel which the water had found for itself and had none of the characteristics of a natural channel. It had been formed on one side by the plaintiff or his predecessors who threw up the earth at the end of the rows in plowing. On the other side of the ditch a wall had been formed by reason of the work done by the county, as we have heretofore stated, before this land became a part of the city of Los Angeles. Moreover, it does not appear that the water which came into Vermont avenue from Vernon avenue was derived from any water course, or had any characteristics other than that of surface water which comes to a street and runs along its gutters.

[2] From the decisions thus far mentioned it might seem to follow that the plaintiff in this case has not established a cause of action. But notwithstanding these decisions, we are unable to say that the nonliability of cities, for damages caused under circumstances like those shown in this case, is clearly and finally established. In none of those cases did the city, by its street grading work, cast upon private property water which by a system of streets was collected in large quantities at one place, with consequent overflow and damage to adjacent land. In Lampe v. San Francisco, supra, the court refers to Stanford v. San Francisco, 111 Cal. 198, 43 Pac. 605, and summarizes that case in these words:

> "The question in that case was as to whether or not the city was liable for damage caused by the accumulation of surface water which was the necessary consequence of paving the streets. It appears that by reason of the grading of the street large quantities of surface water accumulated and broke over the curbing and ran into the basement occupied by the plaintiff. In the opinion, after discussing the principle upon which the city was held liable, it is said: 'Nor is this case within that numerous class of cases where it is held with almost entire unanimity that a municipality is not bound to protect from surface water those who may be so unfortunate as to own property below the level of the street.' In this case there is no allegation that the grading of the street caused surface waters to accumulate in unusual quantities, and that such surface waters were turned upon the lands of the plaintiff."

The plain inference is that, if such allegation had been made, the complaint would have stated a cause of action. The two decisions last above mentioned are in harmony with the conclusion reached by Mr. Dillon. In section 1736 of his work on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.), he says:

> "We agree to the doctrine that the municipality is not bound to protect from surface water those who may be so unfortunate as to own property below the level of the street; nor is the duty a perfect one, to adopt a system or mode of drainage which will have this effect; and, if one be adopted, there is in general, as hereafter shown, no liability except as to ministerial duties in connection therewith. It is possible there may be no middle ground; but we are unable to assent to the doctrine that by reason of their control over streets, and the power to grade and improve them, the corporate authorities have the absolute and unconditional legal right intentionally to divert the water therefrom, as a mode of protecting the streets, and to discharge it, by artificial means, in increased quantities and with collected force and destructiveness, upon the property, perhaps improved and occupied, of the adjoining owner."

[3] Appellants contend that the flooding of plaintiff's crops occurred only during extraordinary and unprecedented rainfall, and that for this reason he is not entitled to recover. The court's finding against this contention is not entirely without support in the evidence. The plaintiff's witness Wildasin, on cross-examination, said:

> "I don't know that I could of my own knowledge state whether or not the rain this last winter, 1913, was a heavier rain than is usual in Los Angeles in that part of the city. I know we had a lot of wet years and we have had some very dry years, and I remember 1884 being a very wet year, and somewhere along in the '90's. I don't think it is a question of big rains. I have lived 30 years in that neighborhood, and in that time I don't know of many rains as heavy as those in January and February of this year, with the possible exception of 1884 and 1889. It is among the heaviest at least."

This testimony comes short of being such evidence as would compel the trial court to decide that the rains of 1913 and 1914 were so excessively unusual and so unprecedented that the city in making its plans need not have calculated upon the possibility or probability of such rains.

The fact is, and it was admitted by Mr. Matteson and found by the court, that it was contemplated (but no official action was taken to that end) that the city would obtain a right of way or open a street to flow water from Vermont avenue westerly across and at about the center of plaintiff's leased land; and that the city proceeded to complete its Vermont avenue work without waiting to obtain said right of way or to open said street.

[4, 5] Further, it is contended that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover because his landlords had waived all damages which might result from the improvement of the streets. It was shown in evidence that on June 17, 1909, said property owners, together with other owners of property fronting on Vermont avenue between Santa Barbara avenue and Slauson avenue, petitioned the city council to improve Vermont avenue, between those limits by doing certain work, which included asphalt paving of the street together with other work specified, and requested that such improvements be made according to the official grade of the street. In that petition they said:

"In consideration of the granting of said petition and of doing the work therein mentioned, we (each for himself) do hereby waive any right which we may now have or may hereafter have, to make or prosecute any claim or demand against the city of Los Angeles, or the contractors for said improvement, for damages caused by said improvement or arising from the nature thereof, and particularly by any damages to our property occasioned by any cuts, excavations, retaining walls, fills, culverts, storm drains or sewers in, along or across the street in which said work is to be done."

Let it be assumed, although the proposition is disputed, that the plaintiff's claims herein are subject to that stipulation, and that it limits his right of recovery herein to the same extent that the rights of his landlords would be limited if they were making this claim for damages caused to crops of their own on said land. The contention may be answered in two ways. The appellants did not allege in their answer anything whatever in regard to said petition, and claimed neither waiver nor estoppel. Appellants respond to this that no objection was made when the waiver was offered in evidence. On inspection of the record we find that objection was made that the evidence was incompetent, irrevelant, and immaterial, that no foundation had been laid therefor, that it was not a waiver of the conditions shown to exist in this case, and that it would in no event be binding upon the plaintiff. We think that this was sufficient to cover the point that the defense which the document was offered to sustain was not included within the issues presented by the pleadings. And it was true, as stated in the objection, that the document did not contain a waiver under the conditions shown to exist. The petition called for asphalt paving to be done throughout the entire distance down to Slauson avenue, whereas in fact the paving as completed did not include Vermont avenue, between Slauson avenue and Fifty-Eighth street. It was admitted that that last section of the paving was omitted or postponed for the reason above noted, that the city authorities were expecting to extend Fifty-Eighth street westerly across the land occupied by the plaintiff and that drainage facilities would be obtained along that new street. The city, having elected to make these differences between the work as constructed and the work as asked for by the petition of the property owners, should not be permitted to take advantage of a waiver which was only made upon conditions with which the city did not comply.

We agree with appellants that no cause of action was stated or proved as against the defendants O'Brien, Handley, and Johnson. As to those defendants, the judgment and order are reversed. The judgment against the city of Los Angeles is affirmed, and the order denying the motion of the city of Los Angeles for a new trial is affirmed.

LILLARD v. ABBOTT HARDWARE CO.

Appeal and Error ⚷757(1) — Briefs — Incorporating Record.

Where appeal is under alternative method, appellant must, under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, print in his brief such portions of the record as he desires to call to the attention of the court in support of his argument, and, not incorporating enough to illustrate his points or show error, there must be affirmance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Frank Z. Lillard against the Abbott Hardware Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jones & Weller, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Leo V. Youngworth, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. In this case the appeal is taken by the defendant from an adverse judgment. It was taken under the procedure known as the alternative method by which typewritten transcripts of the clerk's and reporter's records are provided to be filed in the appellate court. In such cases it is the duty of the appellant to print in his brief such portions of the record as he desires to call to the attention of the court in support of his argument. See section 953c, Code Civ. Proc.; also Cunnison v. Miller et al., 167 Pac. 890, and collection of cases cited therein. In this case no part of the judgment-roll is printed in or with the brief of appellant, and none of the testimony given at the trial is therein printed, except very brief and fragmentary extracts which are wholly insufficient to illustrate the points made or show error. For that reason, following the uniform holding of the Supreme Court and of this court, the judgment must be affirmed.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re BAKER'S ESTATE.

GOULD v. PATROSSO.

1. COSTS 🔑135—SECURITY FOR PAYMENT—NONRESIDENTS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1036, allowing the court to require additional security from nonresidents, does not authorize the sufficiency of the sureties to be questioned by exception and justification.

2. WILLS 🔑161—NONCONTESTING CLAUSE.

Where a will is void because of undue influence and mental incapacity, a provision therein, prohibiting heirs from contesting it, is also invalid, and, when alleged, requires no answer from contesting heirs.

3. WILLS 🔑230—CONTEST—ESTOPPEL.

An heir is not estopped from contesting a will on the ground of undue influence and mental incapacity by a provision that legatees, etc., contesting the will, should receive no part of the estate.

4. INSANE PERSONS 🔑26 — MENTAL INCAPACITY—PRESUMPTIONS.

Successive adjudications by a foreign state that testator was insane and later became sane created rebuttable presumptions of insanity between the two adjudications and of sanity after the second adjudication.

5. WILLS 🔑55(1) — MENTAL INCAPACITY — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence that testator had been several times declared insane, together with his deposition when later declared sane, held to sustain a verdict of mental incapacity.

6. WILLS 🔑400—REVIEW—NECESSITY OF DECISION.

Where a verdict of testator's mental incapacity was sustained by the evidence, it is unnecessary to decide whether the evidence also sustains a finding of undue influence.

7. EVIDENCE 🔑341—DOCUMENTS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1918, subd. 6, authorizing documents to be certified by the legal keeper thereof, a copy of testator's commitment to an insane asylum, certified by its superintendent, was admissible.

8. EVIDENCE 🔑349—DOCUMENTS — ADMISSIBILITY.

Under the direct provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1905, testator's being declared insane in a foreign state may be proved by a copy of the proceedings certified by the clerk with the court's seal annexed and the presiding magistrate's certificate that the attestation was in due form and by the proper officer.

9. WILLS 🔑53(2)—MENTAL INCAPACITY——ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Whether evidence regarding testator's insanity for some 50 years prior to his death is too remote rests largely in the trial court's discretion.

10. WILLS 🔑53(2) — MENTAL INCAPACITY — ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence regarding testator's insanity for some 50 years prior to his death held admissible, where contestants claimed the insanity was permanent and of long standing.

11. EVIDENCE 🔑349—DOCUMENTS—ADMISSIBILITY IN EVIDENCE.

Documents on file in a foreign court may be proved by oral evidence or by copies testified to be correct, since they stand upon the same ground as lost documents, which Code Civ. Proc. § 1855, expressly authorizes to be proved by copy or oral evidence.

12. WILLS 🔑53(1) — MENTAL INCAPACITY — ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In a will contest, witnesses may testify whether testator's appearance and manner was rational or irrational as regards both his actions and sayings.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Petition by Julius V. Patrosso to revoke the probate of the will of Samuel F. Baker. From a judgment setting aside the probate of the will, Will D. Gould, as executor, appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Blanchard, Wm. T. Kendrick, and Will D. Gould, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco, and Thos. C. Ridgway, of Los Angeles (Kingsley Cannon, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by Will D. Gould, as executor of the last will of Samuel F. Baker, deceased, and also as residuary legatee, under said will, from a judgment of the lower court revoking a previous order of that court admitting said will to probate.

Samuel F. Baker died on May 8, 1912. His will was admitted to probate by an order of the superior court made on May 24, 1912. The decedent left as his surviving heirs at law his brother Horace Baker, his sister Julia F. Baker, and his sister Mary J. Farrand. On May 23, 1913, said Mary J. Farrand filed her petition to revoke the probate of said will, alleging as grounds of contest that the testator at the time of making the same was of unsound mind, and that he was acting under the undue influence of the said W. D. Gould. After filing the said petition, and while it was pending, in February, 1914, Mary J. Farrand died. Thereupon Gould, as executor of the will, moved to dismiss the proceeding on the ground that the right to contest the will did not survive the death of the heir. The motion was granted, and judgment of dismissal given accordingly. From this judgment an appeal was taken to this court, in which the court determined that the proceeding to contest the will did not abate by the death of the contestant, but that the right to contest survived, and that the prosecution thereof could be continued by the personal representative of the contestant, and the judgment dismissing the cause was reversed. Estate of Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 150 Pac. 989. Thereafter, in the court below, Julius V. Patrosso, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Mary J. Farrand, was substituted as contestant, and the cause proceeded to trial, resulting in the judgment setting aside the probate of the will, from which the present appeal is taken.

I. Mary J. Farrand was not a resident of the state. Upon the filing of her petition for revocation Gould, as executor, demanded that she file the undertaking for costs required of nonresident plaintiffs by section 1036 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thereupon the undertaking required by that section was given, it being signed by two persons as sureties, each of whom made the affidavit required by section 1057 of the Code of Civil Procedure, respecting his property. Gould thereupon filed a paper, stating that he excepted to the sufficiency of the sureties upon said undertaking, and that he required that said sureties justify as sureties in the manner provided by law. The sureties did not justify, except by the affidavit aforesaid, attached to the undertaking. Within ten days thereafter Gould moved the court to dismiss the proceeding on the ground that the contestant had not caused the sureties on said undertaking for costs to justify as such sureties. The court denied the motion. On the trial the appellant renewed the objection and moved to arrest the proceedings on the ground that there had been no justification of the sureties upon the undertaking for costs. The objection was overruled, and the court proceeded with the trial. The appellant assigns these rulings as error. They are without merit.

[1] Section 1036 does not authorize a proceeding against the sureties on an undertaking for costs, filed by a nonresident plaintiff, of the character here attempted. It provides that if the security provided by the undertaking is insufficient, the court may order a new or additional undertaking. It does not authorize the sufficiency of the sureties to be questioned by way of exception and justification. That method is provided with respect to some classes of undertakings, such as appeal bonds, injunction bonds, undertakings upon which a corporation is the sole surety (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 529, 948, 1057a), and some other classes of undertakings. But with respect to an undertaking for costs given by a nonresident plaintiff, no such method of procedure is provided, and the only remedy, if the security is insufficient, is that provided by section 1036. The appellant did not resort to that method. Consequently his motion was properly denied and his objection was properly overruled. We are not to be understood as intimating that in any event the failure to give additional security when properly ordered by the court below would operate to deprive that court of jurisdiction of the cause. Section 1037 provides that when an order is made for additional security, as provided in section 1036, and none has been given, the court, after 30 days, may dismiss the action or proceeding. It does not follow that the court is bound to dismiss it, or that if it refuses to do so its further proceedings therein are without jurisdiction and void.

[2, 3] II. The appellant filed a so-called cross-complaint in the court below, alleging therein that the contestant was estopped from maintaining this contest by reason of a clause in the will declaring that, if any legatee or devisee contest the will, such legatee or devisee should receive no part of the estate. This cross-complaint was duly served upon the contestant, and she did not answer the same within the 10 days allowed by law therefor. Thereupon her default for not answering was entered by the clerk at the request of Gould. He now contends that by reason of this default the contestant has forfeited her right to proceed with the application to revoke the will. One ground of contest is that the testator was of unsound mind at the time of the execution of the will. It would be a strange doctrine which held that one who was of unsound mind could not execute a will, and that at the same time he could by a clause in a will otherwise invalid, prevent any persons interested in the estate from maintaining a contest thereof. The invalidity which attaches to a will on the ground of insanity in the testator at the time of its execution attaches to all of its provisions, and is as effective upon a declaration therein forbidding a contest as upon any other part of it. It would be equally strange if a will procured by undue influence of another could be safeguarded by a provision inserted therein that any person who sought to set it aside on the ground of such undue influence should receive no part of the estate, and should therefore be disqualified from maintaining a contest upon that ground. It follows that the so-called cross-complaint, assuming for the present that a cross-complaint in any event is a proper pleading in a case for the revocation of the probate of a will, did not state any facts which the contestant was called upon to answer, and it is immaterial whether she did formally answer or not. Her failure to do so did not estop her from proceeding with the cause.

[4-6] III. The appellant claims that the evidence does not sustain the verdict with respect to insanity and undue influence. At the time of his death the testator was 87 years of age. He left an estate of the value of more than $25,000. The theory of the contestant was that he became insane early in life; that his insanity was of a fixed and permanent character, continuing throughout his life, that he had an insane delusion that his brother and sisters were endeavoring to obtain his property, and that this delusion led to and controlled the making of the will. In support of this theory evidence was introduced showing that he was adjudged insane in 1858 in San Francisco, Cal., and was thereupon committed to the hospital for the insane at Stockton, where he remained for something less than a year, and was discharged; that he was again adjudged insane in the state of Massachusetts in 1876, and a guardian of his person and estate was appointed; that thereupon he was committed to an asylum for the insane in that state, where he remained for a period of about 13 years, and was then transferred to the state farm, from which place he escaped in the year 1892; that in 1877 he was adjudged insane by the Supreme Court of the state of New York, where some of his property was situated, and a guardian was appointed for his estate; that this guardianship continued until the year 1902, at which time, in a proceeding for that purpose in the Supreme Court of New York in Westchester county, it was adjudged that he had become competent to manage himself and his affairs, and that the guardian theretofore appointed for his person and estate be discharged. Other evidence was given tending to show that his insanity was of long standing and was of a fixed and permanent character, and that his delusion concerning the purpose of his brother and sisters to obtain his property and their attempts in that behalf, continued until the time of his death.

The adjudication in 1902 by the Supreme Court of New York, declaring that he was competent to manage himself and his affairs was not a conclusive adjudication that he was then sane. Prior to that judgment the legal presumption would be that the insanity previously adjudged to exist would continue. Thereafter the legal presumption would be that he was sane. Each of these presumptions was disputable. After the adjudication in 1902, that he was competent, the disputable presumption that he was sane, arising therefrom, was subject to contradiction by competent evidence. The appellant contends that there was no sufficient evidence to rebut this presumption of his subsequent sanity. While the evidence that he was insane from that time until his death is not as strong as that showing his previous insanity, we think there was sufficient to sustain the verdict. The history of the case prior to that time, as disclosed by the evidence, strongly indicated that his insanity was likely to continue during his life, and that while it might become less acute as he grew older, he would never entirely recover. In the proceeding to have him restored to sanity in New York, his deposition was taken at great length. His testimony on that occasion is sufficient of itself to support the conclusion that he was then of unsound mind. Other circumstances appearing in the evidence and occurring at intervals from that time until his death tended to show that this condition continued thereafter, and that he still retained an insane delusion that his relatives had attempted to take from him his property and had had him imprisoned for that purpose. Without further discussion it is sufficient to say that the evidence on this subject supports the verdict of the jury.

Inasmuch as the verdict declaring him to be of unsound mind at the time the will was executed is sufficient to sustain the judgment, it is unnecessary to enter into any discussion of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding of the jury that the will was procured by undue influence, or of the alleged errors of law relating to that subject.

IV. A large number of alleged errors in rulings made during the trial are presented in the brief of the appellant. It will be necessary to notice only a few of them.

[7] A copy of the commitment under which the testator was confined in the insane asylum at Stockton in 1858, certified by the superintendent of the asylum, was admitted in evidence. Subdivision 6, § 1918, of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides that an official document of this character may be proven by a copy certified by the legal keeper thereof. The superintendent of the insane asylum is the legal keeper of the commitments under which persons are confined in such asylum. The authentication was therefore legal, and the copy was properly allowed in evidence.

[8] The record of the proceedings in Massachusetts, whereby the testator was adjudged insane and a guardian appointed for him, was proven by a copy certified by the clerk having the legal custody thereof, with the seal of the court annexed, and by a certificate of the presiding magistrate that the attestation was by the proper officer and in due form. This was in exact accordance with section 1905 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The admission of the copy in evidence was not error.

[9, 10] Objections were made to these documents and other evidence tending to show his insanity at a period beginning more than 50 years before his death and continuing until the year 1901, on the ground that it was too remote. The question whether evidence of this character is too remote from the time of the execution of the will is a matter resting very largely in the discretion of the trial court. No general rule can be given on the subject. Each case must depend upon its particular circumstances. Where the evidence tends to show that the insanity developed early in life, and was of a fixed and permanent character, the period during which the insanity may be shown is, of necessity, greatly extended. Its persistent character can best be shown by proof of its existence during a long period of time, and evidence thereof is properly admissible in such cases. "There seems to be no agreed definition of the limit of time within which such prior or subsequent condition is to be considered; and in the nature of things no definition is possible." 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 233, p. 292. The following decisions support the rulings of the court below as to this evidence under the conditions of this case; State v. Jones, 50 N. H. 382, 9 Am. Rep. 242; United States v. Holmes, 1 Cliff. 108, Fed. Cas. No. 15,382; Herster v. Herster, 122 Pa. 239, 16 Atl. 342, 9 Am. St. Rep. 95; People v. Griffin, 117 Cal. 583, 587, 49 Pac. 711, 59 Am. St. Rep. 216. Of course, all the evidence on the subject was material only because of its bearing on the question of the sanity of the testator at the time of the execution of the will. Its weight was for the jury to determine. The jury was correctly instructed by the trial court as to its duty in considering and applying this evidence.

[11] The testator, shortly after he was charged with insanity in Massachusetts, wrote two statements of the occurrences which led to the adjudication. These documents were on file in the Supreme Court of New York as a part of the papers in the proceeding in which he was there adjudged insane. The deposition of Horace Baker was given, to the effect that the witness had examined the papers on file in New York, that the same were in the testator's handwriting, and that he had made a correct copy thereof, which he produced, and the same was admitted in evidence in the court below over the objection of the appellant. The statements made in the writings tended strongly to show the insanity of the testator at that time. The documents consisted of declarations of the testator himself. While they might have been proven by copies of the documents certified by the keeper of the records in New York, this method of proof does not exclude all other methods. The papers, being out of the jurisdiction, could not be produced at the trial by means of the ordinary processes of the court. They stand upon the same footing as lost documents, and therefore their contents may be proven by oral evidence, or by copies shown by the testimony of witnesses to be true copies. Code Civ. Proc. § 1855; Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 99 Cal. 73, 33 Pac. 786.

[12] The witness Horace Baker, brother of the testator, was allowed to testify to conversations had with the testator in his lifetime, and in relation thereto to state whether or not the manner and conversation of the testator impressed him as rational or irrational. Objections were made to these questions, and others of like character, and much of the brief is taken up with the presentation of the alleged errors in ruling upon them. It is well settled that it is competent to ask a witness who describes the conduct of another whose sanity is in question, whether or not the appearance and manner of the person at the time was rational or irrational, not only with respect to his actions, but also with respect to his sayings. People v. Manoogian, 141 Cal. 595, 75 Pac. 177; People v. Lavelle, 71 Cal. 352, 12 Pac. 226; Holland v. Zollner, 102 Cal. 636, 36 Pac. 930, 37 Pac. 231; People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 260, 46 Pac. 1073.

V. A great number of rulings made in the course of the trial are mentioned in the briefs, and are claimed to have been erroneous. Many of them are not even argued. All of them which we have not already discussed are trivial in character, and we will not extend this opinion by further discussion of them. If any of them are erroneous, which we do not admit, the error was not of sufficient importance to have affected the result of the trial. This applies also to the giving and refusal of instructions.

We concur: SLOSS, J.; LAWLOR, J.

ALLAN v. GUARANTY OIL CO.

1. PLEADING 🔑34(3)—CONSTRUCTION—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—INFERENCE OF PREVENTION BY ADVERSE PARTY.

In suit to recover money paid to defendant for the execution of a lease of oil land on the ground that defendant was neither the owner nor entitled to possession, and had not delivered possession to plaintiff, general objection to the sufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action could not be urged against its defective allegation that plaintiff had performed his part of the contract, where the ultimate fact that defendant had prevented plaintiff from performing could be inferred.

2. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑76—OIL LEASE—COVENANT FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT—DEMAND FOR POSSESSION.

Where the lessor of oil lands was neither the owner nor entitled to possession, demand upon the lessor for possession by the lessee was unnecessary to give the latter a cause of action for breach of an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, since demand upon the lessor would have been futile, especially after assertion of a paramount title by the real owner.

3. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑76—OIL LEASE—COVENANT FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT—YIELDING TO PARAMOUNT TITLE — BURDEN OF PROOF.

Plaintiff, lessee of oil lands, by yielding to the paramount title without a prior demand for possession on the lessor, undertook the burden to prove the validity of such paramount title in his suit against the lessor for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment.

4. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑76—OIL LEASE—COVENANT FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT—BREACH —PLEADING DEMAND.

In suit for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment by the lessee of oil lands against the lessor, where the complaint set up the paramount title, and lack of title or right of possession on the lessor's part, an allegation of demand on the lessor for possession was unnecessary.

5. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑76—OIL LEASE—EVICTION.

Where there could have been no actual eviction of plaintiff lessee, who had never been in possession, an allegation of eviction was unnecessary.

6. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑76—OIL LEASE—COVENANT FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT—EVICTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In suit by the lessee of oil lands for the lessor's breach of its covenant for quiet enjoyment, evidence held to support finding that plaintiff lessee, in a former suit wherein the holder of paramount title to the land asserted it, was one of the defendants designated under a fictitious name.

7. Mines and Minerals 🔑76—Oil Lease—Covenant for Quiet Enjoyment — Eviction—Notice of Suit—Judgment.

To constitute a suit by the true owner of the paramount title the equivalent of an eviction, no notice thereof by the lessee to the lessor is necessary, nor need the paramount title have been established by judgment.

8. Mines and Minerals 🔑76—Oil Lease—Covenant for Quiet Enjoyment—Breach—Paramount Title—Burden of Proof.

The burden is on the lessee, suing for the lessor's breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment, to prove that the paramount title is in the one who brought a former suit to quiet title, of which the lessor was not notified by the lessee, and that the paramount title, not having been established by judgment, was not in the lessor.

9. Mines and Minerals 🔑58 — Signing Lease—Necessity.

Where the signing of lease by the lessee was not contemplated by the parties to render it complete, signing was not otherwise necessary.

10. Mines and Minerals 🔑76—Breach of Covenants by Landlord—Recovery by Tenant.

Where the lessor of oil lands broke both its express covenant to give possession and its implied covenant of title, the lessee was entitled to recover.

11. Mines and Minerals 🔑76 — Lease — Covenant for Quiet Enjoyment—Pleading.

Under a lease of oil lands requiring the lessee to begin work immediately, he could not state a cause of action for the lessor's breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment without setting forth a compliance or an attempted compliance with the requirement.

12. Mines and Minerals 🔑76 — Lease — Covenant for Quiet Enjoyment—Pleading.

Where the lessee of oil lands by his lease had three months in which to commence work, by alleging that suit to quiet title by the owner of paramount title was begun within seven days after the execution of the lease, the lessee was able to state a cause of action against its lessor for breach of its covenant for quiet enjoyment without averring his own performance.

13. Mines and Minerals 🔑76—Oil Lease—Lessee's Action for Breach of Covenant—Complaint.

In a lessee's suit against his lessor for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment, the complaint, not setting out the particular covenants, but incorporating the whole lease, including the pertinent provisions, was sufficient against general demurrer, though the lessor might have demurred specially for uncertainty.

14. Mines and Minerals 🔑73—Oil Lease — Covenant for Quiet Enjoyment — Intent of Parties.

No particular words in lease need be used to effectuate a covenant for quiet enjoyment; the intent of the parties controlling.

15. Mines and Minerals 🔑76—Oil Lease—Covenant for Quiet Enjoyment—Breach—Pleading.

In a lessee's action against his lessor for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment, it was not necessary for the lessee to allege that the lessor had failed to protect him according to the covenant so long as he took upon himself the burden of proving that the lessor had no rights in the property.

16. Limitation of Actions 🔑24(1)—Statute of Limitations—Express Contract in Writing.

Action on an express contract in writing must be brought within four years.

17. Trusts 🔑257 — Action by Trustee — Party in Interest.

A trustee, with whom a lease was made, with whom all negotiations were had by the lessor, and to whom assignments of the rights of the beneficiaries were made, was the real party in interest, authorized to sue, for the purposes of his action for the lessor's breach of its covenant for quiet enjoyment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 369, providing that trustee may sue without joining beneficiaries, and that person with whom a contract is made for another's benefit is a trustee within the section.

18. Appeal and Error 🔑1071(6) — Harmless Error—Failure to Find.

Where plaintiff was clearly the real party in interest for the purposes of the action within Code Civ. Proc. § 369, failure to find on the issue raised by the answer that plaintiff was not the real party in interest, and therefore not entitled to sue, was not prejudicial to defendant.

19. Stipulation 🔑14(7)—Evidence—Depositions.

Where, by stipulation, defendant's failure to be represented at the taking of depositions merely permitted it to object to the form of the questions, and not to the validity of the deposition as a whole, depositions taken in the absence of defendant were admissible.

20. Appeal and Error 🔑1051(1)—Harmless Error—Evidence.

The admission of evidence by plaintiff's witnesses that a third person was defendant's agent in the negotiations with plaintiff was harmless to defendant, where such an agency between the person and defendant was sufficiently established by other evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Suit by Thomas Allan, trustee, against the Guaranty Oil Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Weaver, McCracken & McKee, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Collier & Clark and Arthur J. Abbott, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Plaintiff sued to recover certain sums of money alleged to have been paid by him to defendant for the execution of a lease of oil land, on the grounds that the defendant was neither the owner nor entitled to the possession of the land in question, and that it had not delivered possession thereof to plaintiff. The lower court rendered judgment for the plaintiff for $12,086.50, being $10,000 principal and $2,086.50 interest. From the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

It appears that one McAllister and one Herolz had been in negotiations with the defendant for the right to go upon certain land, which defendant claimed to have at its disposal, in order to search for oil. Separate contracts were made with each of them, and $2,500 paid by each to the defendant as a bonus for the execution of the contract. The one with McAllister was formally executed, but Herolz's contract was not so executed for the reason that it was intended to consolidate it with a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant. Each of these contracts gave the exclusive right for 20 years to drill for oil on 20 acres of land, upon a royalty basis, with an option of purchase. The contracts reserved certain easements in favor of the defendant. Thereafter a similar contract was made with the plaintiff, representing a syndicate of several persons, including McAllister, Herolz, and one Sunley. This contract consolidated and superseded the two former ones already mentioned, covering the 40 acres which made up the two former holdings. It declared that the lessor, Guaranty Oil Company, party of the first part, "agrees to immediately place at the disposal of" Thomas Allan, trustee, the 40-acre tract of land thereby leased to Allan, the party of the second part. It also contained a reservation of easements to defendant, and the following clause:

> "First party agrees to protect second party against the claims of any party or parties, should any contests ever arise as to the ownership of same."

One of the provisions required the plaintiff to begin immediately upon the erection of a derrick upon the premises. This contract was drawn May 29, 1911, by plaintiff's Vancouver solicitors and forwarded to defendant. On May 31, 1911, defendant by telegram accepted all the conditions, but did not formally execute the instrument. On June 2, 1911, another instrument covering the same property and for the same purposes was executed by the defendant and sent to plaintiff's solicitors. The provisions of the second contract are practically like those of the first, except that the plaintiff was given three months within which to begin work on the first derrick. The consideration for this consolidated contract was the payment to defendant by plaintiff of $5,000 in addition to the $5,000 theretofore paid by McAllister and Herolz. This consolidation was had with the knowledge and consent of the latter persons, who had on May 29, 1911, assigned to plaintiff as trustee all their rights to their contracts, for the purpose of syndicating their interests with the plaintiff and others. On June 9, 1911, the Lucky Boy Oil Company filed in the superior court of Kern county an action to quiet title to the land in question against the defendant herein, joining other persons under fictitious names, among whom plaintiff claims to be included. On March 2, 1912, the plaintiff filed suit against the defendant for a return of the money paid, attaching as an exhibit the contract drawn May 29, 1911. The complaint was amended December 31, 1912, and an answer filed. On August 6, 1913, by stipulation of counsel, the contract executed June 2, 1911, was substituted for the earlier one, the former having been mislaid by the Vancouver solicitors and not discovered until August 4, 1913.

The court found the making of the McAllister and Herolz contracts and their consolidation with the Allan contract of May 29, 1911, which in turn was superseded by the contract of June 2, 1911. Further it found that defendant had received $10,000 for the making of the contract; that plaintiff had been and was at all times ready, able, and willing to perform the terms of the contract, but that the defendant was not at the time of the execution thereof, and never had been the owner of the premises described in the contract, and had not and could not deliver possession thereof or any part thereof to the plaintiff; that defendant's only interest in the premises had been under an agreement of purchase with the Lucky Boy Oil Company, but that all rights thereunder had been forfeited by it prior to the making of the contract with the plaintiff; and that the Lucky Boy Oil Company was during all the times mentioned herein the true owner of the premises and entitled to the possession thereof. The court also found:

> "That said defendant at all times mentioned herein knew that it was not the owner of said premises or any part thereof, and was not entitled to the possession of said premises or any part thereof, and that it was unable and would be unable to perform said contract on its part to be performed, according to the terms thereof, or at all."

[1] The first assignment of error is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant, because it does not allege that the plaintiff had performed his part of the contract. The contract attached to the complaint shows that plaintiff had three months from June 2, 1911, within which to begin work on the first derrick, and that suit was filed by the Lucky Boy Oil Company on June 9, 1911, seven days after the execution of the contract. The complaint avers that the defendant never delivered, and never was able to deliver, possession of the land to plaintiff, and that plaintiff has never had possession of said land, or any part thereof, and thus shows that plaintiff was prevented, and therefore excused from performing his part of the contract. A general objection to the sufficiency of the complaint cannot be urged against a defective allegation where the ultimate fact of prevention can be inferred.

[2-4] Before considering the other questions as to the sufficiency of the complaint it is proper to state that the contracts in suit are leases of the land described therein. This is not seriously disputed by the defendant, and was settled as to similar contracts with this defendant in Kline v. Guaranty Oil Co., 167 Cal. 476, 140 Pac. 1, and Commins v. Guaranty Oil Co., 29 Cal. App. 139, 154 Pac. 882. See, also, Graciosa Oil Co. v. Santa Barbara, 155 Cal. 144, 99 Pac. 483, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211. Defendant claims that the complaint is framed upon the theory of a breach of the implied covenant of quiet enjoyment, and as such is defective in not showing a demand upon defendant for possession, and an eviction. Granting, for the moment, that defendant's theory of the nature of the action is correct, it cannot be held that under the circumstances of this case a demand upon defendant for possession was necessary, since if the findings are true that defendant was neither the owner nor entitled to possession, demand upon it would have been futile, especially after the assertion of a paramount title by the real owner. Plaintiff by yielding to the paramount title without a prior demand undertook the burden of proving the validity of such title. Having done so, all occasion for a demand was obviated, and since the complaint set up the title of the Lucky Boy Oil Company and lack of title or right of possession on the part of the defendant, an allegation of demand was unnecessary. Rawle on Covenants for Title, §§ 138, 139; 24 Cyc. 1051.

[5-7] Defendant's further contention is that the complaint should have alleged an eviction. It did not set forth an actual eviction, which would have been impossible, since plaintiff had never been in possession. Kline v. Guaranty Oil Co., supra. But it did allege facts showing the equivalent of an eviction by reason of the assertion of a paramount title and right to possession by the Lucky Boy Oil Company in its suit to quiet title against the defendant and the plaintiff. The court found that the plaintiff was a party defendant, sued under a fictitious name. Defendant claims there is no evidence to support the finding that plaintiff was sued in that action. It did appear, however, that there were several defendants joined in the suit to quiet title whose names were not known to the Lucky Boy Oil Company, and who claimed to have some interest in the property. In view of the fact that the plaintiff's lease gave him some color of interest in the property, and that he would have been a proper party defendant, the finding that the plaintiff was one of the defendants designated under a fictitious name must be accepted. In order to constitute such suit by the true owner the equivalent of an eviction, no notice by the lessee to the lessor is necessary, nor need the paramount title have been established by judgment.

[8-10] But in such case the burden is on the lessee to prove that the paramount title is in the one who brought the suit to quiet title and not in the lessor. Rawle, Covenants for Title, § 124; McGary v. Hastings, 39 Cal. 360, 2 Am. Rep. 456; Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, p. 535. It follows that the amended complaint did state a cause of action for breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment, and that the court properly denied defendant's motion to exclude all evidence that might be offered in support of the complaint. There is nothing in defendant's contention that the lease itself is incomplete because not signed by the plaintiff as evidence of his assent to the terms imposed upon him. There is nothing in the record to show that such signing was contemplated by the parties, and it is not otherwise necessary. In Spinney v. Downing, 108 Cal. 666, 41 Pac. 797, cited by defendant, such an intent did appear. Whether the case be regarded as an action on the implied covenant of title or on the express covenant to give possession is not very important, except, possibly, on the question of the statute of limitations, concerning which we need express no opinion. Both covenants were broken, and that fact entitled plaintiff to recover. 1 Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, §§ 81, 82.

[11, 12] Defendant's principal contention is that the court erred in failing to find upon the issue of the statute of limitations raised by the defendant in its answer to the amendment of August 6, 1913. This error is claimed to be prejudicial on the ground, as alleged, that the lease of June 2, 1911, constituted a new cause of action, and that the suit on the covenant implied therefrom was barred within two years and could not therefore be relied upon on August 6, 1913. We agree with defendant that the lease of June 2, 1911, did give rise to a different cause of action than the one set up under the lease of May 29, 1911. Under the earlier lease which required that plaintiff begin work immediately, he could not state a cause of action, without setting forth a compliance or attempted compliance with such requirement. But under the later lease plaintiff had three months within which to commence work, and by alleging that the suit to quiet title was started within seven days after the execution of the lease, the plaintiff was able to state a cause of action without averring performance. The two leases are two distinct transactions; in fact, we do not see why the later one did not entirely supersede the earlier one and render it of no effect whatever. It may be conceded for the sake of argument, therefore, that the filing of the original complaint on March 2, 1911, did not stop the running of the statute on the second lease.

[13, 14] However, we are of the opinion that the complaint of August 6, 1913, states a good cause of action for breach of the express covenant in the lease that the defendant will protect the plaintiff against any party or parties on any contest ever arising as to the ownership of the land in question, and the agreement to place the land "at the disposal" of plaintiff, upon which the statute of limitations did not run until four years after June 2, 1911. The complaint does not set out these particular covenants, but it does incorporate the whole lease, including these provisions. This is sufficient against general demurrer, even though defendant might have demurred specially for uncertainty. The phraseology may not be such as is usual in a covenant for quiet enjoyment. But no particular words need be used. The intent of the parties controls. In this case, considering the nature of the instrument and the activities to be engaged in thereunder, it is clear that what was intended was that the plaintiff should not be disturbed in his possession and use of the land in question. The complaint sufficiently alleges a breach of the covenant in setting out that the title and right to possession are not in the defendant, but in a third party, and that such third party had brought suit against the lessor and the lessee to quiet title to the premises.

[15, 16] It was not necessary for plaintiff to allege that defendant had failed to protect him according to the covenant, so long as he took upon himself the burden of proving that the defendant had no rights in the property. In such case, any call upon the defendant for protection must have been futile. The findings, too, support the action as one on the express covenant, for they show the making of the lease and its breach by reason of the assertion of the ownership and right to possession by the Lucky Boy Oil Company. Whether or not the defendant was aware of this theory of the action, it could not have been misled because, under the facts as found, it was not in a position to interpose a defense to the action. As a result, the institution of the new cause of action on August 6, 1913, was within the four years allowed on an express contract in writing.

[17, 18] The lower court also failed to find upon the issue raised by the answer that the plaintiff is not the real party in interest, and therefore not entitled to bring the action. It appears, however, that the lease was made with Thomas Allan, trustee; that all negotiations were had by defendant with reference to Thomas Allan, trustee; and that the assignments of the rights of McAllister and Herolz were made to Thomas Allan, trustee. Since the plaintiff was clearly the real party in interest for the purposes of this action (Code Civ. Proc. § 369), failure to find on this issue was not prejudicial.

[19, 20] Defendant alleges a number of errors committed during the course of the trial. The first was in the introduction of certain depositions taken in Vancouver on the stipulation of counsel. It is urged that the stipulation required that the defendant be represented at the examination. A reading of the stipulation shows, however, that failure of defendant to be represented merely permitted it to object to the form of the questions and not to the validity of the deposition as a whole. For the same reason it was not error for the court to refuse to strike out the statement of plaintiff's counsel that he had an understanding with counsel for defendant that the latter might not be represented at the examination. The second error pointed out by defendant is in the admission of certain evidence by witnesses for the plaintiff to the effect that Sunley was the agent of the defendant in the negotiations with the plaintiff. Whether or not this was error, it could not have been prejudicial because such an agency between Sunley and the defendant was sufficiently established by other evidence.

Other points are made by the defendant, including the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and of the findings to support the judgment. None of these points is well taken.

Judgment and order affirmed.

I concur: SLOSS, J.

SHAW, J. I concur. I think it necessary to add, however, that nothing said in the opinion is to be understood as an intimation that, where a lease is in writing. the obligation of the lessor, under section 1927 of the Civil Code, to secure to the lessee the quiet possession of the property leased, during the term, although not expressed in terms in the lease, is not a contract in writing, within the meaning of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, fixing four years as the limitation for actions upon a liability "founded upon an instrument in writing."

DUPES v. SUPERIOR COURT OF KERN COUNTY et al. (L. A. 5204.)

DIVORCE ⟹312—APPEAL—JUVENILE COURT—JURISDICTION.

Where a divorce decree awarding custody of the litigants' children was pending upon appeal, a juvenile court had jurisdiction over the custody of such children, at least pending the divorce action's final determination.

In Bank. Eugenia N. Dupes obtained an alternative writ of prohibition from the District Court of Appeal against the superior court of the county of Kern and Howard A. Peairs, Judge thereof, and upon petition the proceedings were transferred to the Supreme Court. Alternative writ dismissed.

George W. Macknight, Ray H. Fitzgerrell, and P. N. Meyers, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Emmons & Johnstone and Chas. N. Sears, all of Bakersfield, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Eugenia N. Dupes sought and obtained from the District Court of Appeal an alternative writ of prohibition directed to the superior court of Kern county, sitting as a "juvenile court." By it that tribunal was prohibited from interfering with the petitioner's custody of her two minor children. Upon petition the matter was transferred to this court.

An action for divorce between T. W. Dupes and Eugenia N. Dupes was tried in the superior court. T. W. Dupes was the plaintiff, and his wife by answer and cross-complaint demanded custody of their two minor children, as he had done in his pleading. Pending the trial and pursuant to stipulation the court made an order awarding the custody of the children to the mother. Judgment went in favor of the father, and the court made an order that he should have custody and control of the children, but this order was held by the District Court of Appeal to be of no force pending the appeal of the mother from the judgment against her. In re Dupes, 31 Cal. App. 698, 161 Pac. 276. After the mother had resumed possession of the children following the decision in the proceeding on habeas corpus, a warrant for their arrest and detention was issued by a judge of the superior court of Kern county other than the one who had presided at the trial of the action for divorce. The petition upon which this warrant was based was filed by one J. H. Dupes, an uncle of the minors, and it contained numerous allegations of the misconduct of Eugenia N. Dupes, some of which, if true, tended to establish immorality and depravity on her part. The judge of the "juvenile court" after overruling the demurrer of Mrs. Dupes to the petition, fixed a day for a hearing thereon, but was restrained by the alternative writ of prohibition.

The question presented, therefore, and the only one, is whether or not the fact that the superior court, in the action for divorce, had made an order providing for the custody of the minor children of the litigants deprives the "juvenile court" of jurisdiction to dispose of them in any manner. In answering this question we must first consider the difference between an action for divorce and a proceeding under the juvenile court law. In an action for divorce the purpose is to determine whether or not the court should dissolve the ties of marriage, and in such an action it sometimes becomes necessary to provide for the custody of minor children. It is true that the court has very extensive powers touching the children of those who are engaged in such a suit. The court may bestow them upon one or the other of the parents or may provide for placing them with a third person. Does it follow that, having made an order in such a case, the court is impotent to make any disposition of the children through any of its departments or under any of its functions or powers? We must answer this question in the negative. The "Juvenile Court Act" is intended to provide for the protection of children who have become, or from their surroundings may become, depraved and to punish those responsible for or contributing to the dependency or delinquency of such children. Matter of Maginnis, 162 Cal. 200, 121 Pac. 723; Nicholl v. Koster, 157 Cal. 416, 108 Pac. 302. By that law the state as parens patriæ has provided proper machinery for rescuing children from influences likely to debauch them and to make them, in the future, charges upon the public either as criminals to be restrained or paupers or incompetents to be maintained. The mere fact that a litigation is pending between the parents, and that an order regarding the custody of the children has been made therein, does not take away the power of the state nor prevent the exercise of that power under the juvenile court law.

It is suggested that if a general and unqualified order should be made by the "juvenile court" awarding the custody of these children, it might be in conflict with the judgment in the action for divorce if that judgment should be affirmed on appeal, and that we would then be confronted with the problem of determining the relative value of two adjudications of the same court, each being of the same formal dignity and apparent force. But it is not necessary, in this case, for us to contemplate such a contingency. On the contrary, we must assume that, whatever eventually may be the order of the "juvenile court," it will be so drawn that it will not conflict with the judgment in the action between the parents.

It is argued, also, that, inasmuch as all of the essential allegations of the unfitness of Mrs. Dupes contained in the petition of her brother-in-law correspond with those made in her husband's complaint, therefore that part of the superior court acting as a "juvenile court" in the hearing of the petition and the decision thereon will really be passing upon exactly the same question as the one decided by the division exercising the functions of a divorce court. We do not see that this circumstance makes the slightest difference in the power and jurisdiction of the "juvenile court." That court has the authority to decide what is best for the present welfare of the children, and if it appears that the mother is an unfit person, in contemplation of law, to have them in her charge and under her influence, the "juvenile court" may place them in a suitable environment and under proper influences during the months which, in the usual course, must elapse before the appeal in the action for divorce can be decided. In passing upon the question regarding the fitness or unfitness of the mother, the court will be aided by evidence of her conduct in the past, and it will make no difference if exactly such evidence may have been adduced in some other action in which the parties and the issues were not the same as in the proceeding inaugurated by the uncle of the minors.

Let the alternative writ be dismissed.

FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND et al. v. BRUSH et al.

1. Master and Servant 🔑405(2)—Workmen's Compensation Act—Relation—Evidence.

In a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279), evidence held not to warrant a finding that a son of a man employed to cut wood by the cord, and who was helping his father, was an employé.

2. Master and Servant 🔑367—Workmen's Compensation Act—Who are "Employés."

One employed to cut wood by the cord and posts at a fixed sum, where there was no agreement as to hours or method of work, was an independent contractor, and a son helping him for half that his father received for the work was not an employé, within the Workmen's Compensation Act, and was not entitled to compensation for injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé.]

In Bank. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Martin A. Brush to obtain compensation for personal injuries, opposed by the Round Valley Land Company, a corporation, the employer, and the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, a corporation. Compensation was awarded, and employer and insurance company applied for a writ of review, and certiorari was issued. Award annulled.

Alfred C. Skaife and Guy Le Roy Stevick, both of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, and Warren H. Pillsbury, of Oakland, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. A writ of certiorari was issued, directed to the Industrial Accident Commission, for the purpose of reviewing an award of compensation to Martin A. Brush, a laborer, injured while cutting wood on the premises of the Round Valley Land Company.

The father of the applicant, one Seymour Brush, had made an agreement with the superintendent of the Land Company's property to cut 60 to 80 cords of wood, or as much as would be required for the use of the company in its kilns for the ensuing year. By the terms of this arrangement Seymour Brush was to be paid $1.75 a cord for firewood and six cents for each post cut by him. He was not required to cut any fixed amount of wood, but there was an understanding that he was to keep at work until told by Harrington, the superintendent, that a sufficient quantity of cut wood had been produced. There was no agreement regarding the hours of work nor the methods to be pursued. Brush entered into an arrangement with his son, Martin A. Brush (the man who was injured subsequently), whereby they agreed that they should work together, pile their wood together, and have it measured, and that the amount received for the work should be equally divided between them. The applicant testified that Mr. Harrington told him at times to assist his father with the work.

[1] This was denied by the superintendent, but giving to the testimony of Martin Brush all possible force it would not justify a finding that he was hired by the representative of the Round Valley Land Company to do the chopping. The father received payment whenever he asked the land company for an advance, and the final settlement was made with him. The company was not a party to the agreement whereby the proceeds of the work were to be equally divided. The most that may be said of the company's participation in causing Martin to be engaged in the work is that its representative knew he was so employed and approved of his activity.

[2] In holding that the father and the son were both employés of the land company, the Industrial Accident Commission sought to differentiate this case from Donlon Bros. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715, on the grounds that the man injured was not a remote contractor but the son of the man who directly negotiated with the superintendent of the land company, and that "there was in this arrangement no element of profit or loss usually attendant upon independent contracts or commercial transactions." Neither supposed ground of distinction is good. The fact that in the Donlon Case the man injured was the subcontractor twice removed from the owner of the trees, does not change the principles regarding employment of independent assistance by one who engages to do certain work. Nor does the agreement considered in the Donlon Case differ in essence from the one made with the elder Brush. We fail to see what "the element of profit and loss usually attendant upon independent contracts or commercial transactions" has to do with the case. That element is entirely a false quantity in this discussion. It is conceded by learned counsel for the Industrial Accident Commission that if Seymour Brush was not an employé but an independent contractor the award of the Industrial Accident Commission must be annulled, whether the son, Martin A. Brush, was a partner or an employé of his parent, and this must be true under the authority of Donlon v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, and Western Indemnity Company v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721. In the former case, which was very similar to this one, Mr. Justice Henshaw, who delivered the opinion of the court, commenting on the finding of a majority of the commissioners that the injured woodchopper was an employé of the Donlon Bros., said:

> "Commissioner Weinstock filed his dissent, holding that the relation of employer and employé necessarily involves the element of personal service, which is not delegable, and that the facts clearly established that such relationship did not exist; that Kataoka, the only one with whom petitioner had dealings, was an independent contractor, and that this relationship extended to the subcontractor. In this we think the dissenting commissioner was clearly right."

In the other case cited above, the following language was used:

> "It has been said that the true test of a contractor is that he renders service in the course of an independent occupation, following his employer's desires in the results but not in the means used (1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence [6th Ed.] 396), but in weighing the control exercised we must carefully distinguish between authoritative control and mere suggestion as to detail or the necessary co-operation where the work furnished is part of a larger undertaking. Standard Oil Co. v. Anderson, 212 U. S. 221, 222 (53 L. Ed. 480, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252). The same principles are announced in Fink v. Missouri Furnace Co., 82 Mo. 276 (52 Am. Rep. 376)."

Measured by this definition, it is clear from the undisputed facts presented by the record that Seymour Brush was not an "employé" or a "servant," in contemplation of the Industrial Compensation Act, but an independent contractor.

It follows that the award must be annulled, and it is so ordered.

FICKERT v. ZEMANSKY, Registrar of Voters, et al. (S. F. 8544.)

CERTIORARI ⇐25—MATTERS REVIEWABLE.

A petition, alleging that the registrar of voters under San Francisco Charter, cc. 3, 5, relating to recall of officers, fraudulently refused to fix a time and place for a hearing or to investigate claims that names on the recall petition were forged and not signed in the presence of the solicitor, but which did not set forth any specific facts nor any particular persons whose signatures were falsely procured, did not state such an abuse of his power as to constitute an excess of his jurisdiction, but stated nothing more than an error of law, not reviewable by certiorari.

In Bank. Certiorari by Charles M. Fickert against J. H. Zemansky, Registrar of Voters of the City and County of San Francisco, and others, to annul a certificate of the sufficiency of a petition for the recall of the former as district attorney. Proceeding dismissed.

Harry I. Stafford, Aylett R. Cotton, Grover O'Connor, and U'Ren & Beard, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ, for petitioner. Thomas V. Cator, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff filed in this court an application for a writ of review to annul a certificate of the sufficiency of a petition for his recall as district attorney, issued by the defendant Zemansky, as registrar of voters of the city and county of San Francisco, and asking that in the meantime, and until the hearing of his application, the board of election commissioners of said city and county be restrained from calling such election. An order upon the defendants to show cause why an alternative writ of review should not issue was thereupon made. The matter has been presented and submitted to the court upon said order to show cause. The question for determination is whether or not the allegations of the petition are sufficient to authorize the issuance of such writ of review.

The matter in controversy was considered at some length in the case of Baines v. Zemansky (S. F. No. 8505) 168 Pac. 565, decided by this court on October 20, 1917, that case being an application by the plaintiff therein for a writ of mandate to compel the registrar of voters to proceed with his investigation as to the sufficiency of said petition, and thereupon to certify the result of such examination. The registrar in that case, by way of answer, stated that he had failed to make said certificate because he was restrained from so doing by a writ of prohibition and by a restraining order, each issued out of the superior court of said city and county, in two certain actions pending therein. The allegations of the present petition for a writ of review are, in substance, a repetition of the allegations of the respective complaints in the two actions in the superior court mentioned in the former proceeding and set up in the answer of the registrar.

On July 21, 1917, James A. Young, Nellie Harpold, and A. P. Carroll filed with the board of election commissioners a petition for the recall of said Fickert as district attorney, signed by 15,214 persons. Thereupon the registrar, upon investigation, found that the same contained only 10,219 legal signatures, and refused to certify the same as sufficient. Within 20 days thereafter the said filers of said recall filed a supplemental or amended petition signed by 5,104 persons. The registrar ascertained that said supplemental petition contained 3,050 legal signatures, and determined that the original and amended or supplemental petition together were lawfully signed by 13,269 qualified persons. 11,837 signatures are necessary to authorize a recall election. The registrar held the said petition, as so amended, to be sufficient, and executed his certificate of the sufficiency thereof, as provided in section 3 of article 11, chapter 3, of the San Francisco charter. It is this certificate which the plaintiff herein seeks to annul by his proceeding in certiorari.

The powers of the court in a proceeding in certiorari, and the office of the writ of review, have been thoroughly settled by our decisions. In Whitney v. Board, 14 Cal. 499, the court said:

> "We have already seen that the writ can be granted only where the jurisdiction of the inferior tribunal has been exceeded, and * * * it is clear that the courts are confined to the determination of the question of jurisdiction. Beyond this, they have no right or authority to go; and they have nothing whatever to do with the proceedings before the inferior tribunal, except so far as an examination of such proceedings is necessary for the determination of this question. * * * It brings up no issue of law or fact not involved in the question of jurisdiction. Under no circumstances can the review be extended to the merits. Upon every question, except the mere question of power, the action of the inferior tribunal is final and conclusive. * * *"

This rule is now the settled law of the state.

Under the provisions of the San Francisco charter, the filing of a petition for the recall of an officer, purporting to be signed by 10 per cent. of the total vote cast for mayor at the last preceding election, gives the registrar of voters jurisdiction, and makes it his duty to investigate and determine whether or not such petition conforms to all legal requirements of the charter relating thereto, and whether or not it contains signatures of registered voters to the number necessary to authorize a recall election. Article 11, c. 5, § 1; chapter 3, § 2; Baines v. Zemansky, supra. If a signature to the petition is called in question, the charter requires him to mail a notice to the purported signer, stating the fact that his name is attached to the petition, and citing him to appear at a time and place stated, to affirm or deny the genuineness of his signature, and provides that if he does not appear and deny the same, or does not return a verified affidavit denying the same within the 15 days allowed to the registrar for such investigation, his signature must be counted as genuine. The methods of procedure and the kind of evidence to be taken or considered by the registrar in ascertaining whether or not the petition conforms to the other legal requirements of the charter are not prescribed, except by a provision to the effect that to ascertain whether or not the signers are qualified voters he must compare their signatures with the registration affidavits.

Section 2 of chapter 3, further requires that each section of such petition shall be verified by the person soliciting signatures thereto, by his affidavit stating that he is the person who solicited the signatures; that he has numbered each signature seriatim; that no person signed it except in his presence; that said section has not been left at any time where any person could sign it except in his presence; that each signature was made in his personal presence, and is to his best knowledge and belief the genuine signature of the person whose name it appears to be; and that such solicitor was and is a duly qualified voter of the said city and county. These affidavits are required as safeguards against fraud and perjury by the persons getting up said petition. Unquestionably the registrar is required to examine these affidavits as well as the several sections of the petition, to ascertain whether or not they conform to the legal requirements of the charter. The time allowed is very short, and his inquiry must necessarily be of a summary character. The extent of the inquiry and the nature of the other evidence he may take in respect to these matters are not specified. The subject is left to his discretion. In determining what evidence he will take and what he will reject he acts in the exercise of the jurisdiction and discretion confided to him by the charter. If he mistakenly refuses to receive proof that he should accept and consider, it cannot be deemed to be other than an error of law committed in the exercise of his jurisdiction. Perhaps a clear abuse of discretion could be reached by a proceeding in mandamus. That question is not before us. But errors of this character cannot be considered or determined in certiorari. Central P. R. Co. v. Board, 43 Cal. 365; People v. Burney, 29 Cal. 459; Morley v. Elkins, 37 Cal. 457; C. P. R. R. Co. v. Board, 46 Cal. 670.

The petition herein alleges that 174 sections of the said original and supplemental petition, containing 6,125 signatures, all of which were counted by the said Zemansky as genuine, and without which the said petition would be insufficient, were fraudulent, in that many of the signatures thereto are forged, in that many of said sections were left out of the presence of the solicitor where any one could sign without his knowledge, and in that many of said signatures had been made out of his presence. It is not alleged that all of the signatures are forged, nor how many were forged, nor that all of the signatures were made out of the presence of the solicitor, nor that any specific number of them were so made. It is alleged that immediately upon the filing of the supplemental petition above mentioned, and within the 15 days allowed by the charter for examining the same, the plaintiff demanded of the registrar that he fix a time and place for a hearing and allow the plaintiff to offer proof of the said allegations, and that the registrar refused to receive or consider such evidence, or allow an opportunity for the same to be presented, but that, although he knew that the said allegations of fraud were true, he nevertheless disregarded them, refused to investigate concerning the same, and that, having ascertained from the records of registration that the petition contained the required number of signatures of persons registered thereon as voters, he made his certificate that it was sufficient.

The evidence offered by the plaintiff would be merely contradictory of that contained in the affidavits attached to the several sections. No specific facts were set forth, nor any particular persons named as those whose signatures were falsely procured. Assuming that the registrar might conceive it to be his duty to receive evidence upon such vague charges as these, we are satisfied that his discretionary powers relating to such investigation must authorize him to determine, within reasonable limits, at least, how far his investigation shall go. His determination not to enter upon the inquiry demanded of him was not such an abuse of his power as to constitute an excess of his jurisdiction. At most it was in the nature of an error of law committed by him in the exercise of that power and, under the authorities above cited, his action in that respect cannot be corrected in certiorari. We are therefore of the opinion that no writ should issue in the case.

It is ordered that the proceeding be dismissed.

MERCANTILE TRUST CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO v. SUNSET ROAD OIL CO. et al.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑996 — INFERENCES FROM FACTS PROVED.

The Supreme Court on appeal cannot say which of two opposing inferences, both within the bounds of reason, should have been drawn by the trial court.

2. NEW TRIAL 🔑6—DISCRETION OF COURT.

In deciding a motion for new trial, a trial court has large discretionary power.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑977(1) — REVIEW — ORDER ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

An order denying or granting a motion for new trial will not be reversed on appeal unless an abuse of discretion appears.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑854(6) — REVIEW — MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS.

An order granting motion for new trial in general terms must be sustained on appeal if there is any ground upon which it could properly have been made.

5. MORTGAGES 🔑183—CORPORATION BONDS—PRIORITY.

Where a bank held the personal debt of corporation officers, but was induced to release them in consideration of bonds of the corporation in the sum of $240,000, the corporation property being worth $500,000, and the person inducing such transactions thereafter caused bonds greatly in excess of the value of the corporate property to be issued to him without consideration on parity with those issued to the bank, he was estopped from participating in the proceeds from the security until the bonds of the bank were satisfied.

6. ESTOPPEL 🔑52—MORTGAGE LIENS.

Where holder of corporation bonds secured by mortgage sued to foreclose, and another holder who obtained his bonds without consideration to the prejudice of plaintiff's rights sought to enforce an equal lien, the estoppel asserted by plaintiff against him was a defense not lost by lapse of time nor subject to statute of limitations.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; H. A. Peairs, Judge.

Suit by the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco against the Sunset Road Oil Company and others, wherein the Kern Valley Bank and W. R. Williams, as Superintendent of Banks, filed cross-complaints. From an order granting a new trial on the motion of the cross-complainants, certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gavin McNab and R. P. Henshall, both of San Francisco, for appellants. A. A. De Ligne, of Sacramento, and Denman & Arnold and Donzel Stoney, all of San Francisco, for nonappealing defendants. Morrison &

Brobeck and A. E. Shaw, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the defendants above named from an order granting a motion of the Kern Valley Bank and W. R. Williams, superintendent of banks, for a new trial of the action.

The complaint states a cause of action for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed to secure bonds issued by the Sunset Road Oil Company. The Sunset Road Oil Company was organized in June, 1905. In the early part of July, 1905, it authorized the creation of a bonded debt of $2,000,000, to be evidenced by 1,990 bonds for $1,000 each, and 100 bonds for $100 each, running 20 years, at 5 per cent. annual interest. On July 15, 1905, it duly executed to the plaintiff, Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco, a deed of trust or mortgage to secure the payment of the proposed bonds, transferring and conveying to the trust company for that purpose certain parcels of property in Kern county, and also all other property, real and personal, which said oil company then owned or might thereafter acquire. In pursuance of this mortgage or trust deed, bonds were prepared for issuance, and a large number of them amounting to $1,495,000, were sold by the company to divers persons. The oil company failed to pay interest on the bonds. The principal was thereupon declared due and payable, and on March 4, 1911, the plaintiff began this action to foreclose said deed of trust as a mortgage.

Thereafter the Kern Valley Bank, and Williams, as superintendent of banks, on its behalf, appeared in the action and filed a cross-complaint, making the appellants herein parties thereto, alleging that the said appellants each claimed to hold certain of the bonds of said oil company; that said bank was the owner of 459 of said bonds of the par value of $1,000 each, and 4 bonds of the par value of $100 each, amounting to $459,400; that the bonds held by the appellants were by said appellants fraudulently procured to be issued, that they were issued without any consideration, and that in consequence thereof they are invalid, and that the holders are not entitled to participate in the proceeds of any sale of the property upon the foreclosure, and asking that the bonds held by the bank be declared to be a prior lien upon the said properties, paramount to the liens of the bonds held by the appellants respectively, and that the said bank's bonds be first paid out of the proceeds. The court below upon the trial made findings declaring that the bonds issued to the appellants respectively were not fraudulently issued, that they were issued for a valuable consideration, and that the cause of action stated in the cross-complaint was barred by the statute of limitations, and, concluding therefrom that the Kern Valley Bank was entitled to no relief upon its cross-complaint, gave judgment for the foreclosure of the trust deed and sale of the properties covered thereby, and directing the payment of the bonds of all the parties pro rata out of the proceeds. Thereupon the Kern Valley Bank moved for a new trial. This motion was granted, and an order was made directing a new trial, from which this appeal is taken.

Of these outstanding bonds the Kern Valley Bank holds $459,400, the Metropolis Trust and Savings Bank, as pledgee in trust for sundry persons, $173,200, and the Canadian Bank of Commerce, as pledgee to secure the debt of Tevis, $365,000. The ownership of the remaining $497,400 is not stated in the findings.

The Kern Valley Bank acquired bonds to the amount of $244,200 in December, 1905, in satisfaction of a debt of $244,200 theretofore due to the bank from Jewett & Blodget, a firm composed of Solomon Jewett and H. A. Blodget, both of whom were, during all this period, directors of the bank, and bonds to the amount of $190,000 were acquired by the bank in December, 1907, in exchange for an individual debt of said Blodget to the bank, amounting to over $223,000. It is not shown how the bank acquired the remaining $25,200 of its bonds.

The principal controversy upon the cross-complaint of the Kern Valley Bank arises from the claim that the two blocks of bonds taken for the Jewett and Blodget debt, and the H. A. Blodget debt, respectively, should be preferred in payment from the proceeds of the property over all other bonds issued by the Sunset Road Oil Company.

The cross-complaint of the Kern Valley Bank, among other things, alleged the following facts: In May, 1905, the firm of Jewett & Blodget owed the Kern Valley Bank $244,200 upon certain promissory notes, which were secured to be paid to the bank by first mortgage liens upon the same property that is described in the trust deed herein sought to be foreclosed. The board of state bank commissioners then had legal supervision and control of the affairs of said bank, and objected to said debt of Jewett & Blodget on the ground that the bank's loan to them was made while they were officers of the bank, and that the securities held by the bank therefor could not be readily converted into cash, and notified the bank that, unless said indebtedness was liquidated forthwith, the bank would be closed by said board. To avoid this disaster the appellant W. S. Tevis, at the instance of Blodget, undertook to assist in extricating said bank from its difficulties, and in that behalf he represented to said board that the Sunset Road Oil Company was organized for the purpose of taking over all of the said properties which said bank, as aforesaid, held as security for the payment of said Jewett & Blodget debt, and that it had authorized the issuance of bonds thereon, to be secured by first mortgage on the said real estate, that he could procure for the bank such first mortgage bonds of said oil company to the amount of $244,200, face value, in exchange for the Jewett & Blodget debt, and he agreed that said bonds so exchanged should be a first and prior lien to any other indebtedness which might then exist or thereafter be incurred by said oil company. The said board, being in control of the affairs of said bank, on its behalf accepted the said proposition, and thereupon caused the said bank to receive said bonds in satisfaction of the Jewett & Blodget debt, and delivered over to Jewett & Blodget the notes theretofore held by the bank as evidence of said debt. The real estate so held by the bank as security for said Jewett & Blodget debt was transferred to said oil company, and was by it conveyed to the plaintiff herein, as security for the bond issue theretofore authorized by said oil company. Before said exchange of bonds for the Jewett & Blodget debt was effected, Tevis, in conjunction with the appellants Beal & Blodget for the purpose of defrauding the said bank and decreasing the amount of its security for said bonds, and for their own advantage, caused the said oil company, of which they had control, to issue to Tevis $400,000 of said bonds, ostensibly in consideration of the aforesaid conveyance of said properties by him to the oil company. The $244,200 of bonds afterwards given to said bank in exchange for the Jewett & Blodget debt were a part of the $400,000 so issued to Tevis. Thereafter the said appellants Tevis, Blodget, and Beal, without the consent of said bank or said commissioners, procured other bonds of said issue to be issued without adequate consideration, and delivered to themselves and others, amounting to $790,300, of which Tevis received and still holds and controls nearly $400,000, which, upon the face of said trust deed, would have equal right to payment with the bonds so exchanged to said bank. The bank commissioners relied on said representations and promises, and did not know of any issue of bonds in excess of the $244,200 to be exchanged for the Jewett & Blodget debt, and would not have consented to such exchange if they had known that other bonds were to be or would be issued upon an equal footing therewith. The value of the properties covered by the trust deed does not exceed $500,000.

The court below found that the bank did not have any liens whatever upon the property afterwards mortgaged as security for the said Sunset Road Oil Company's bonds, and that there were no representations made by Tevis to the effect that the bonds taken for the Jewett & Blodget debt should be a first lien, or paramount to the other bonds of the authorized issue.

[1-4] There is evidence in the record sufficient to support a finding of the truth of the aforesaid facts alleged in the cross-complaint. The evidence as to some of them is inferential. It is not within the province of this court on appeal to say which of two opposing inferences, both within the bounds of reason, should have been taken by the trial court. Conflicting inferences, if reasonable, stand upon the same plane as conflicting evidence. In deciding a motion for a new trial the court below has large discretionary power. Its order either denying or granting such motion will not be reversed on appeal unless an abuse of discretion appears. In considering the evidence upon such motion that court has power to draw inferences from the evidence opposed to those which were drawn by it upon the trial, provided they are not unreasonable. The order granting the motion for a new trial was general in its terms. It did not specify the reasons upon which the motion was granted. This court must uphold the order if any ground upon which it might have been granted is supported by the record. We are therefore bound to assume that the court, upon its last consideration of the evidence, believed that the inferences in favor of the Kern Valley Bank should prevail, rather than those against it, and we cannot say that this was an abuse of discretion.

[5] The question therefore arises whether upon these facts the bank was entitled to any relief. Of this we have no doubt. The bank was induced to give up its first lien on the property for the debt of $244,200 owing to it from Jewett & Blodget, and accept in exchange a like amount of bonds of the oil company secured by the same property, upon the promise that these bonds should be a first lien thereon, and thereupon it released Jewett & Blodget from the debt. The person who made the promise, according to the facts assumed, thereupon caused the issue to himself of additional bonds upon the same property in parity with those of the bank, and for no consideration except the property upon which the bank formerly held a prior lien. The same person afterwards caused additional issues of bonds to himself which also have an equality in law with those of the bank. All this was done without the consent of the bank. The amount of all these bonds exceeds the value of the property hypothecated as security. The effect of allowing such person to claim a part of the proceeds of the property would be to reduce the value of the bank's security below the amount of its debt. Under these circumstances the person who thus obtained and holds the additional bonds will be estopped from participating in the proceeds from the security until the bonds of the bank are satisfied. The circumstances indicate that these additional bonds were caused to be issued by Tevis and his associates with no bad intent, but in the belief that the property hypothecated as security was of sufficient value to satisfy them all. This, however, would not affect the result. Tevis had agreed that the bonds issued to the bank should have priority, and as the bank acted on that agreement, he, at least, is bound by it, regardless of his intent in issuing the subsequent bonds.

[6] This estoppel is in the nature of a defense to the claim of Tevis, made through the medium of plaintiff's foreclosure, to enforce his right to an equal lien on the property. Such defense is not lost by lapse of time, and the statute of limitations has no application thereto.

There are many other questions arising in the case and presented in the briefs which it is unnecessary to consider. Our conclusion upon the question we have discussed is sufficient to support the order granting the new trial. We express no opinion concerning the merits of the other questions.

The order is affirmed.

MERCANTILE TRUST CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO v. SUNSET ROAD OIL CO. et al.

1. NEW TRIAL 🔑159—PARTICULAR ISSUES.
Where the mortgagee suing for foreclosure established its right to foreclose without dispute, and a controversy arose over the rights of a holder of bonds secured by the mortgage as against other parties than the plaintiff, a new trial should have been limited to issues other than the rights of plaintiff, in order to avoid the necessity of plaintiff producing evidence at the new trial.

2. CORPORATIONS 🔑479 — MORTGAGES — RIGHTS OF BONDHOLDERS—FORECLOSURE.
Where a corporation gave a trust deed securing its bonds providing that in case of sale under foreclosure any bondholder could bid in the property and could use toward payment of his bid the bonds and coupons held by him at the time, each bondholder had a direct interest in the validity of the bonds held by the other bondholders, so that, where one sought foreclosure, and it was so decreed, and a new trial was granted in favor of another, judgment of foreclosure was properly vacated, since each bondholder had the right to know just what he would be required to pay if he bought the property, and such amount could not be determined until the rights of all the bondholders were finally adjudicated.

Suit by the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco against the Sunset Road Oil Company and others, wherein the Kern Valley Bank and W. R. Williams, Superintendent of Banks, filed a cross-complaint. From an order granting a new trial on motion of the cross-complainants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck and A. E. Shaw, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Gavin McNab, R. P. Henshall, and Jno. E. Bennett, all of San Francisco, for nonappealing defendants. A. A. De Ligne, of Sacramento, and Donzel Stoney and Denman & Arnold, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order granting the motion of the Kern Valley Bank and W. R. Williams, superintendent of banks, for a new trial of the action, being the same order that was under consideration in the appeal of other persons from said order, numbered on our register of actions L. A. No. 3996. 168 Pac. 1033. We refer to the decision in that case for a more complete statement of the nature of the action.

[1] The issues tendered by the Kern Valley Bank and Williams, in the cross-complaint, do not affect the right of the plaintiff to foreclose the trust deed, set forth in its complaint. The questions raised related solely to the rights of different holders of bonds purporting to be secured by the trust deed to participate in the proceeds of the foreclosure sale. The plaintiff contends that the order granting a new trial should not extend to the entire case so as to require it again to prove such allegations of its complaint as may be controverted by the answers of the various parties. This point is well taken. There was no dispute at the trial concerning the validity of the trust deed or the right of the plaintiff to a foreclosure thereof. The order granting a new trial might well have excluded from its operation all issues arising upon the complaint itself and limited the new trial to the issues arising upon the said cross-complaint. The matter, however, is practically of no importance; for we do not understand that there are any issues taken upon the allegations of the complaint, except mere formal denials which were not insisted upon at the trial, and which cannot be successfully supported upon a new trial. If they are insisted upon, no appreciable time will be required to dispose of them upon such new trial. For these reasons we do not deem it necessary to modify the general order granting the new trial.

[2] The plaintiff further insists that, since its right to foreclose the trust deed is not in fact disputed by cross-complainants, the court below should not have vacated the judgment of foreclosure, but should have ordered a new trial only of the issues made upon the cross-complaint, leaving the judgment of foreclosure to stand, to the end that the plaintiff may proceed to sell the property covered by the trust deed without delay, and that the controversy over the right of the respective bondholders to priority should be postponed until after such sale, and reduced to a controversy over the application of the proceeds. The provisions of the trust deed dispose of this contention adversely to the plaintiff. It provides that in case of a sale under foreclosure thereof any holder of bonds may bid for the property at such sale, and that, if his bid is accepted, he may, in settling the same, use toward its payment the bonds and coupons thereon held by him at the time, if the sale produces enough to pay the entire debt, interest, and costs, or his just share of such proceeds, if there is a deficiency. This right being secured to each bondholder by the deed of trust itself, it follows that each has a direct interest in the validity of the bonds held by the other bondholders, and that, if there are any circumstances which estop one of such bondholders from asserting an equality of his bonds with the others, or with any one of them, the person so entitled to such estoppel has the right to have such dispute determined prior to the sale, in order that he may know the amount of money he must produce in case he should bid at such sale. While this would not prevent a foreclosure of the trust deed, it does make it necessary to postpone the sale until the matter can be determined. The question was before the court with respect to this deed of trust and this foreclosure thereof, in Mercantile Trust Co. v. Miller, 166 Cal. 568, 137 Pac. 913. It was there determined that the Kern Valley Bank, and the superintendent of banks in its behalf, had an interest in the determination of this question, before the judgment and sale, and therefore that they had a sufficient interest to authorize them to appeal from the judgment. It is not true, as contended by the plaintiff, that all of the justices concurring in that judgment did not agree to this proposition. The concurrence in the judgment was of necessity a concurrence in the proposition stated. As we have held in case No. 3996, 168 Pac. 1033, aforesaid that the order granting a new trial upon the cross-complaint should be affirmed, and have so ordered, it follows from what is said above that the order granting a new trial of the entire case is not prejudicially erroneous with respect to plaintiff.

The order is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SLOSS, J.; MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem.

MERCANTILE TRUST CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO v. SUNSET ROAD OIL CO.

UNION OIL CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. MERCANTILE TRUST CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO.

1. Mortgages 🔑590—Foreclosure—Effect—Leases.

Foreclosure of a mortgage made prior to a lease ends the leasehold in the absence of equitable grounds in favor of the lease.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑854(6)—Review—Motion for New Trial—Grounds.

An order granting a motion for new trial in general terms must be sustained on appeal if there is any ground upon which it could properly have been made.

3. Mortgages 🔑448—Foreclosure—Default—Pleading—Sufficiency.

Where corporation bonds bore interest payable semiannually in January and July, with coupons calling for the payment of such installments of interest, a complaint in May, 1911, alleging a default in payment of all coupons on the 15th day of January, 1908, or thereafter, and that demands were made more than one year prior to the suit, and that the entire debt had been declared due three months prior to the suit, sufficiently showed default.

4. Trial 🔑105(1)—Incompetent Evidence—Failure to Object—Effect.

Incompetent evidence admitted without objection is to be regarded as sufficient to establish the fact involved.

5. New Trial 🔑81—Grounds—Insufficient Evidence—Raising Objection.

In suit to foreclose mortgage, where absence of direct testimony of presentation of coupons to the trustee for payment was not suggested except by motion for nonsuit, the grounds of which were not sufficiently specific to direct the attention of the court to the precise point made, the failure to produce the best kind of evidence does not justify the granting of a new trial where there is no evidence to the contrary.

6. Corporations 🔑478—Mortgages—Foreclosure—Construction.

Where a deed of trust provided that, if default is made in payment of principal or interest and continues for six months after presentment for payment, the trustee may take possession of the premises and declare all sums due and payable, and that, if the principal is due, and default is made and continued for six months, the trustee may take possession and foreclose the mortgage, and that such rights shall be in addition to the ordinary right of foreclosure, there was no intention to limit the right of the mortgagee to resort to the courts for relief whenever the principal sum was due and unpaid, though six months had not elapsed.

7. Contracts 🔑32—Execution—Requisites—Agreement to be Reduced to Writing.

Where the parties understand that the terms of the compact are to be reduced to writing and signed by them, the assent to its terms must be evidenced in the manner agreed upon or it does not become a binding or completed contract.

8. Landlord and Tenant 🔑22(3)—Leases—Execution.

Where the proposed lessee, learning of an outstanding deed of trust, required as condition of signing lease that all bondholders subordinate their liens to the lease, whereupon lengthy correspondence and negotiations between the parties were had, but the lessee went into possession before all the bondholders had acquiesced, there was no valid subsisting lease upon the terms agreed upon, so that the lessee, though it went into possession, could not assert priority of its lease over the bonds and mortgage securing them.

9. Estoppel 🔑54—Reliance on Conduct of Other Party—Knowledge.

It being of the essence of an estoppel in pais that the party asserting it should not only have been ignorant of the true state of facts, but should have relied on the representation of the adverse party, such proposed lessee, knowing all the facts, and by its letters having recognized that the negotiations were not concluded, could not set up an estoppel in pais against the bondholders.

10. Corporations 🔑479 — Mortgages — Rights of Parties—Special Agreements.

Where a corporation's property mortgaged to secure bonds was leased to another corporation under agreement that royalties should be paid to the trustee to care for the interest payments on the bonds, the lessor corporation and one of its officers could not bind the bondholders without their consent by a second agreement by which the royalties should be paid to the officer on his agreement to care for interest payments on certain bonds to the exclusion of others.

11. Appeal and Error 🔑958—Review—Discretionary Orders—Amending Pleadings.

The granting or withholding of permission to file amended pleadings rests largely in the discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be reviewed on appeal unless an abuse of discretion appears.

12. Pleading 🔑238(4)—Amendment During Trial—Motion for New Trial.

Though the court denied leave to amend pleadings at the conclusion of the trial it could reconsider the rulings, on motion for new trial.

13. Appeal and Error 🔑933(4) — Review —Presumptions.

Where at close of trial a party was denied leave to file amended answer and cross-complaint which might properly have been granted, if the refusal could have been prejudicial the court on appeal from the order granting the new trial must assume that the new trial was granted for that reason and affirm the order.

14. Mortgages 🔑455—Foreclosure—Cross-Complaint—Adverse Title—Claim by Lessee.

In suit to foreclose mortgage on leased property of the mortgagor, the lessee could not on its cross-complaint tender the issue of its claim of adverse title.

15. Corporations 🔑482(1) — Mortgages — Foreclosure—Rights of Lessee.

Where a corporation gave a mortgage to a trustee as single security in favor of all bondholders, and defaulted and leased the premises, whereupon some bondholders agreed to subordinate their lien to the rights of the lessee, and others did not so agree, the nonassenting bondholders being entitled to foreclosure and priority, and having no rights superior to the assenting bondholders, the foreclosure was required to be in favor of all the bondholders, and the rights of the lessee terminated in the absence of the lessee's allegation that it was ready and willing to pay off the bonds held by nonassenting owners.

16. New Trial 🔑6—Discretion of Court.

The wide discretion allowed to the superior court on motions for new trial will not justify the granting of such motion where, in its findings and judgment, the court reached the only conclusion which it could properly have reached on the record.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Suit by the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco against the Sunset Road Oil Company and others, wherein the Union Oil Company of California filed a cross-complaint. From an order granting a new trial on the motion of the cross-complainant, the plaintiff and the defendant Oil Company and others appeal. Reversed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, A. E. Shaw, Gavin McNab, and R. P. Henshall, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Lewis W. Andrews, Thomas O. Toland, and Andrews, Toland & Andrews, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage or trust deed made by Sunset Road Oil Company to the plaintiff to secure an issue of bonds. Its general features are set forth in our opinion in Mercantile Trust Co. of San Francisco v. Sunset Road Oil Co. (L. A. No. 3996) 168 Pac. 1033, where the appeal was from an order, made in the same case, granting the motion of the Kern Valley Bank and the superintendent of banks for a new trial.

One of the defendants named in the complaint was Union Oil Company of California. It filed its answer and a cross-complaint.

[1] The interest asserted by the Union Oil Company is based on a lease from Sunset Road Oil Company to it of the major part, if not all, of the property covered by the trust deed. This lease bore date December 10, 1908, and was recorded December 31, 1908, long after the execution and recording of the trust deed. Under this lease, which was for a term beginning with its date, and ending with the close of the year 1928, Union Oil Company went into possession of the demised premises, and expended large sums of money in their development and operation as oil-producing lands. Its sole concern in the litigation is the protection of its possession as lessee. The mortgage was prior to the lease. and, in the absence of equitable grounds sufficient to overcome this legal status, a foreclosure sale would, of course, end the leasehold interest. McDermott v. Burke, 16 Cal. 580. The effort of the Union Oil Company was to prevent such foreclosure, or to secure, in some form, an adjudication that, by reason of certain transactions which we shall outline, its rights under the lease were entitled to protection even if a foreclosure should be had. With respect to the right to foreclose at all, the Union Oil Company, by denials in its answer, made the claim that there had not been, at the time of the institution of the action, such a default as would authorize foreclosure proceedings. Its contention that its rights as lessee should be recognized and protected, notwithstanding a foreclosure, were based upon the claim that the plaintiff, Mercantile Trust Company, and all of the bondholders, had agreed, prior to the execution of the lease of December, 1908, and the taking of possession thereunder, that all of such bonds should be subordinated to the rights of the Union Oil Company as lessee. It asserted that it had gone into possession and made large expenditures on the faith of this understanding, and claimed, by virtue of the alleged contract, and by way of estoppel, the right to have any sale on foreclosure made subject to its lease.

The findings of the court were against the claims of the Union Oil Company, and the judgment provided for a foreclosure and the distribution of the proceeds of the sale among the holders of all bonds, without in any way recognizing the alleged rights of the lessee.

Subsequently the Union Oil Company made its motion for a new trial which was granted, and from the order so made an appeal (No. 4128) is taken by the plaintiff, and another (No. 4152) by the Sunset Road Oil Company, W. S. Tevis, and others. Both appeals will be discussed in this opinion.

[2] The order granting the motion is in general terms. It must therefore be sustained here if there be any ground upon which it could properly have been made. Although the voluminous record shows a great number of assignments of error, the substantial matters in controversy narrow themselves down to the two of which we have spoken; i. e., whether the right to a foreclosure had ripened at the time the complaint was filed, and whether the Union Oil Company had shown any ground upon which its right of possession as lessee might be held to have priority over the right of the plaintiff, or of the bondholders, to foreclose in such manner as to cut under the lease.

[3] On the first of these questions it may be remarked incidentally that no appeal was taken from the decree of foreclosure by the Sunset Road Oil Company, the mortgagor and owner of the property, and that the judgment has become final as to it. Assuming that the lessee of the mortgagor is in a position to make the point under discussion, it is quite clear, on the record, that there is no merit in the contention that there had not been such a default as to justify the institution of the action. The bonds of the Sunset Road Oil Company bore interest payable semiannually, on the 15th days of January and July of each year, and bore coupons calling for the payment of such installments of interest. The amended complaint, which was filed in May, 1911, alleged a default in the payment of all interest coupons maturing on the 15th day of January, 1908, or thereafter. It further alleges that demands were made upon the plaintiff by holders of coupons for the payment of the same more than one year prior to the commencement of the action, but that the Sunset Road Oil Company has ever since failed and refused to furnish the plaintiff with funds for the payment of any interest or coupons. It is further alleged that on February 27, 1911, prior to the commencement of the action, the plaintiff declared the principal sum of the bonds immediately due and payable, and demanded payment thereof of the Sunset Road Oil Company, but said Sunset Road Oil Company neglected to pay the same or any part thereof.

[4, 5] These allegations are denied by the Union Oil Company. The findings in support of them are, however, fully sustained by uncontradicted evidence. The evidence tending to show presentation of coupons to the trustee for payment might, perhaps, if objected to, have been excluded as hearsay. Such objection was not, however, made, and it is well settled that incompetent evidence admitted without objection is to be regarded as sufficient to establish the fact. McCloud v. O'Neall, 16 Cal. 392; Curiac v. Packard, 29 Cal. 194, 197; Janson v. Brooks, 29 Cal. 214, 223; Williams v. Hawley, 144 Cal. 97, 102, 77 Pac. 762. The want of direct testimony of such presentation was not suggested at the trial except by motion for nonsuit, and the grounds of motion were not sufficiently specific to direct the attention of the court or of opposing counsel to the precise point now made. If they had been, the necessary proof would, in all probability, have been supplied. Under these circumstances the failure to produce the best kind of evidence will not justify the granting of a new trial, where there is no evidence to the contrary.

> "If default shall be made in the payment of the principal or interest moneys mentioned in said bonds, * * * and if such default shall continue for the period of six months after the same, or any of them, shall have been properly presented for payment at the place provided therefor, * * * the trustee may * * * enter into * * * and take possession of all and singular the premises, * * * and may or shall declare all sums secured hereby to be immediately due and payable."

There is a further provision that in case the principal moneys shall have become or been declared to be due, and default made in the payment thereof, and such default shall have continued for a period of six months, then the trustee may take possession, and may foreclose the mortgage or deed of trust, and sell and dispose of all the rights, property, etc. It is argued that, under these clauses, the option to declare the principal due does not arise until there has been a six months' default in the payment of interest, and that then a further period of six months must elapse before a right of foreclosure arises. But the remedy contemplated by the later provision is a right of entry and sale by the trustee without judicial proceedings. The instrument goes on to declare that "the foregoing provisions" for foreclosure and sale "shall be in addition to the ordinary right of foreclosure by entry, by suit, or by action." It is plain, therefore, that there was no intention to limit the ordinary right of the mortgagee to resort to the courts for relief whenever the principal sum was overdue and unpaid. Toler v. East Tenn. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 67 Fed. 168, 179; Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Chicago & N. P. R. Co. (C. C.) 61 Fed. 543, 546; Morgan's L. & T., etc., Co. v. Texas Centr. Ry., 137 U. S. 171, 11 Sup. Ct. 61, 34 L. Ed. 625; Guaranty Trust Co. v. Green Cove R. Co., 139 U. S. 137, 142, 11 Sup. Ct. 512, 35 L. Ed. 116.

We pass to the consideration of the second and more important question, i. e., whether the Union Oil Company made out a case which, under any rational view of the evidence, would have justified the court in holding that its rights were superior to those of the plaintiff, as trustee, or of any of the holders of bonds. While a great mass of testimony and documentary evidence was introduced, there is no substantial conflict upon the points which are material in this regard. The following state of facts appears to have been established beyond question: Toward the end of 1908 the Sunset Road Oil Company was in serious financial difficulties. Its properties were subject to this large bond issue, aggregating almost $1,500,000, it was in default in payment of interest on the bonds, it was in arrears on account of royalties on a portion of its lands held under lease, it had a large floating indebtedness, and its returns from the operation of its oil wells were not sufficient to enable it to meet any substantial part of these demands, if, indeed, they equaled the actual cost of operation. At this juncture H. A. Blodget, who was largely interested in the Sunset Road Oil Company, and was one of its officers, opened negotiations with the Union Oil Company, with a view to having the latter corporation take a lease of the property and prosecute its active development. The managing officers of the Union Oil Company expressed their willingness to take such a lease, but, being or becoming aware that there was an outstanding bond issue, stated that the Union Oil Company would not go on with the proposed transaction unless its possession as lessee were protected as against the mortgage and the bonds secured by it. This condition was acceptable to Blodget and his associates, and steps were taken to procure the assent of the various bondholders to an agreement making the bonds and mortgage subject or subordinate to the lease. At the outset it seems to have been contemplated that the plaintiff, as trustee, should execute some writing subordinating said mortgage to the rights of the Union Oil Company as lessee. The trustee was approached, but did not state whether it would, in any event, make such an arrangement. It did, however, declare that an indispensable condition to its joining in the plan, if it should join, would be the assent of the holders of all bonds outstanding. While Blodget and his associates, among whom was C. N. Beal, were endeavoring to get the various holders of bonds to agree to the proposed arrangement, papers were drawn for carrying the plan into effect. These included: First, a form of indorsement to be made upon the bonds; second, an instrument to be signed by the holders of the bonds, for delivery to the trustee; and, third, a notice to be given by the trustee to the Union Oil Company when said trustee should have received for indorsement all of the bonds, together with the instructions of the bondholders for their indorsement. It may be remarked that these papers plainly indicated that all of the outstanding bonds were to be delivered to the trustee and indorsed as provided, and that the royalties accruing under the lease were to be paid to the trustee. The papers were all sent to the Union Oil Company for its approval. They were held by that company for several weeks, and then returned, with a letter, under date of January 20, 1909, stating that the attorney for the Union Oil Company "reports that they are in satisfactory shape." The same letter states that the papers will be returned "in order that you may complete the work necessary to be done for the accomplishment of the Sunset Road Oil Company's lease to the Union Oil Company." The lease itself had been executed some time in December, and recorded on December 31, 1908. There is some evidence from which the court might have inferred that the execution and recording had taken place, in advance of the completion of the negotiations for subordination, at the suggestion of persons connected with the Sunset Road Oil Company. Be that as it may, it is entirely clear from the evidence that all parties contemplated that any arrangement finally made was to be evidenced in writing, and that the drafts submitted to, and subsequently approved by, the Union Oil Company constituted the form of writings by which this end was to be accomplished.

[7] It is elementary that, where "it is a part of the understanding between the parties that the terms of their compact are to be reduced to writing and signed by the parties, the assent to its terms must be evidenced in the manner agreed upon, or it does not become a binding or completed contract." Spinney v. Downing, 108 Cal. 666, 41 Pac. 797; Las Palmas, etc., Distillery v. Garrett, 167 Cal. 397, 139 Pac. 1077.

[8] Until the return of the papers by the Union Oil Company the parties were still negotiating regarding the terms of the writings which were intended to ultimately embody the proposed agreement respecting the subordination of the bonds to the lease. These papers were never, in fact, executed, and it follows that no binding agreement was ever reached. The Union Oil Company did not, however, await either the execution of the writings or the ascertainment of the fact that they would not be executed. It went into possession on or about January 1, 1909, and immediately began the active prosecution of work under its lease. In the meantime many bondholders had been approached by Blodget and Beal, and most of them had expressed their willingness to join in the proposed arrangement. Unquestionably, however, all of them contemplated, as did the Sunset Road Oil Company and the Union Oil Company, that any arrangement ultimately made should be embodied in writing, and their verbal assent neither bound them, nor did it afford to the Union Oil Company any justification for proceeding on the faith of a proposed or contemplated agreement which, as it knew, had not actually been made. It is true that in various letters to the Union Oil Company Blodget or Beal expressed the confident hope that the assent of all bondholders would be obtained. There seems to be little reason to doubt their good faith in these expressions. But, as a matter of fact, they never did succeed in getting the unanimous action contemplated. The Kern Valley Bank was the holder of $190,000 of bonds. While the evidence is not clear on the subject, there was some testimony to the effect that its managing officers had at one time expressed their willingness to join in the proposed agreement of subordination. But when it came to taking final action, which, as we have said, was to be in writing, they declined to go forward. The National Tube Company, holding $14,500 of bonds, after hesitating for a considerable time, expressed its willingness to participate, but by this time the Kern Valley Bank had finally announced its refusal. There were other bondholders who, so far as the evidence shows, had never assented, and some of them had not even been approached. One of the holders, who had signed the proposed agreement, to be delivered to the trustee, had done so on the express condition that all royalties arising from the lease were to be paid to the trustee for the benefit of the bondholders, and this, as above stated, appears to have been a part of the general plan in contemplation. At any rate, the evidence leaves no room for doubt that the Union Oil Company, instead of awaiting the consummation of the proposed agreement, took the chance of going into possession and making large expenditures under its lease. Under these circumstances the court could not have found that it accepted the lease, and went into possession under it, pursuant to an agreement on the part of the trustee and the holders of the bonds that such bonds should be subordinate to the lease. There is no evidence whatever that the trustee, plaintiff in the action and appellant here, ever assumed to make such an agreement, and, so far as the bondholders are concerned, the only agreement which any of them contemplated making was the written agreement which, as we have seen, was never consummated.

[9] What we have said disposes, in effect, of the claim that these transactions afford a foundation for a claim of estoppel. It was, no doubt, the desire and expectation of the Union Oil Company that the proposed lease should be given a status superior to that of the trust deed and the bonds secured thereby. But the Union Oil Company knew, as well as did the persons with whom it was negotiating, that the consent of the bondholders was necessary to the consummation of such an arrangement. It was also known to all concerned that the plan in view was to be made effective by means of the execution of written documents. The Union Oil Company executed the lease, took possession, and began active operations with full information, not only that the writings intended to be signed by the bondholders and the trustee had not been signed, but that a number of bondholders had not even given an informal assent to the scheme of subordination. On December 2, 1908, Mr. Stewart, an officer of the Union Oil Company, writing to Mr. Blodget, said:

> "We are assuming that everything is going to be arranged satisfactorily between us, and are therefore getting ready our force and equipment for the work in Sunset, but will spend no money until everything is buttoned up."

On December 10, 1908, the lease was executed, and on the 17th of the same month it was ratified by the board of directors of the Union Oil Company. On the 18th day of December, Mr. Blodget wrote to Mr. Stewart outlining the proposed plan, viz. to have all of the bonds, issued and to be issued, stamped with notice that they were subject to the lease, and "when done" to have the trustee advise the Union Oil Company. The letter further stated that forms of agreement would be sent to the Union Oil Company as soon as settled, and that the trustee would instruct said Oil Company to pay all royalties to it. On December 24, 1908, Mr. Orcutt, of the Union Oil Company, wrote to Mr. Blodget, stating his understanding that it would be necessary to have the bondholders or the trustee consent to the lease, and requesting that this work be hastened "as fast as possible, as we are anxious to enter into possession of the property." On December 26th Mr. Beal, an officer of the Sunset Road Oil Company, wrote a letter to the Union Oil Company, saying, among other things:

> "The matter of securing the consent of the Sunset Road Oil Company bondholders to the lease is well under way, papers to carry the purpose into effect having been prepared by our attorneys and submitted to the trustee."

On December 31, 1908, Mr. Beal again wrote to the Union Oil Company, inclosing the drafts of the three documents which were to be signed for the purpose of accomplishing the subordination of the bonds. It is perfectly evident that at this stage the Union Oil Company was fully informed that the negotiations had not reached the stage of a binding or effective agreement. The letters to it conveyed direct information of this fact, and its own letters disclosed in plain terms its understanding that the steps required to protect it in its lease were being prepared, but that, in Mr. Stewart's phrase, everything had not been "buttoned up." Having full and accurate knowledge of the real situation, the Union Oil Company cannot claim to have been misled. It is of the essence of an estoppel in pais that the party asserting such estoppel should not only have been ignorant of the true state of facts, but that he should have relied upon the representation or admission of the adverse party. Biddle Boggs v. Merced M. Co., 14 Cal. 279, 367; Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 307, 13 Pac. 866; Montgomery v. Keppel, 75 Cal. 128, 133, 19 Pac. 178, 7 Am. St. Rep. 125.

[10] The evidence supplies a further answer, and a conclusive one, to the claims of contract and estoppel set up by the Union Oil Company in the pleadings upon which it went to trial. Those pleadings made no reference to any agreement subsequent to the Union Oil Company's taking of possession. Some of the cross-defendants set up in their answers a written agreement dated March 24, 1909, between W. S. Tevis, Union Oil Company, and Sunset Road Oil Company. This agreement recited the existence of the lease; that royalties would become payable from the lessee to the lessor thereunder; that the Sunset Road Oil Company's properties were subject to the mortgage here sued upon, under which $1,362,000 of bonds were outstanding, all of which "are now in default in interest payments"; and that under the mortgage the bondholders might cause to be made a foreclosure, which, if made without the bonds being rendered subject to the lease, might cause the property to be sold free and clear of such lease. It further recited that Tevis owns or controls all of the bonds except $210,000 thereof; that the Sunset Road Oil Company has issued to the Union Oil Company, and the latter has accepted, an order directing the payment of all royalties under the lease, not theretofore disposed of, to Tevis. Following these recitals, Tevis agrees that he will cause all of the outstanding bonds, except the $210,000, to be made subject to the lease, and to cause to be made upon each of them an indorsement in a prescribed form. He further agrees, as to the $210,000, that as long as he receives all royalties under the order accepted by the Union Oil Company, he will keep the interest paid on said $210,000 of bonds, so as to leave the holders thereof without grounds for foreclosure of the mortgage. The Union Oil Company accepts the order to pay all royalties to Tevis, and covenants and agrees to all the terms of the contract. This agreement affords convincing proof that the alleged agreement, subordinating the bonds to the lease, had not been made at the time of the execution of the lease, or the taking of possession thereunder. The recitals of the agreement of March 24th, which are binding between the parties thereto, show clearly the understanding of all of them that the bonds had not been made subject to the lease, and that it was desired to provide for their being so made. It cannot be justly claimed that the agreement of March, 1909, was a mere amplification or continuance of the alleged earlier agreement. The original negotiations contemplated the payment of royalties to the trustee, for the benefit of the bondholders, while under the later contract all royalties were to go to Tevis. Certainly the bondholders could not, without their consent, be bound by an agreement making so important a change in their rights, and it is not to be supposed that the parties to the contract of March 24th attempted to so bind them. The later writing must be regarded as a new agreement, binding only on the parties to it, and independent of all prior transactions or negotiations on the part of others.

So, too, the written contract of March 24th furnishes an additional argument against the claim of estoppel. When it was made and signed, the Union Oil Company had already expended $75,000 upon the property. Obviously the said company was not then relying upon any belief or understanding that the bondholders had theretofore bound themselves to subordinate their bonds, but was, on the contrary, bargaining for the covenant of Tevis that he would cause some of the bonds to be subordinated, and would, on certain conditions, pay interest on the rest. It is impossible to see, therefore, how the court could have made any findings in support of the positions asserted by the Union Oil Company in the pleadings upon which it went to trial. Those pleadings set up an alleged agreement by the trustee and all the bondholders, made at or prior to the execution of the lease, that, in consideration of such execution, the bonds should be, and were, made subordinate to the rights of the lessee. They further sought to set up an estoppel, based upon the execution of the lease and the taking of possession thereunder by the Union Oil Company, and the expenditure of large sums of money upon the faith and in the belief, induced by the acts and representations of the bondholders and the trustee, that the right of foreclosure would not be exercised to the detriment of the lessee's right of possession.

[14] We think, however, that the proposed amendments, if allowed to be filed, could not have availed the respondent. In so far as they sought to set up a claim of title adverse to that of the mortgagor, the issue tendered was not one which could be adjudicated in the foreclosure suit. Croghan v. Minor, 53 Cal. 15; Ord v. Bartlett, 83 Cal. 428, 23 Pac. 705; Murray v. Etchepare, 129 Cal. 319, 321, 61 Pac. 930. What we have said in our discussion of the questions of estoppel and agreement to subordinate furnishes a sufficient answer to the claim, asserted in the proposed amendments, that the respondent is entitled to a lien equal in rank to that of the mortgage for its expenditures under the lease.

It was also sought by the proposed amendments to set up rights under the contract of March 24, 1909. The amended cross-complaint, which the Union Oil Company asked leave to file, alleged that by virtue of this contract the bonds owned or controlled by Tevis "are and should be held by the court to be subject to the rights of this cross-complainant under said lease." It further alleged that Tevis had failed to perform his agreement to keep the interest paid on the $210,000 of bonds not owned or controlled by him. The making of this contract had already been set up in the pleadings of some of the cross-defendants, who had alleged that the Union Oil Company had failed to perform the obligations imposed upon it under the agreement. The court found that the contract had been made, but declined to find on the issues relative to the performance of the obligations arising under it, deeming this controversy to be one not properly arising in the foreclosure suit, but to be determined in a separate action between Tevis and the Union Oil Company.

While the amended pleading offered for filing alleges that Tevis had not paid interest on the $210,000 of bonds, it fails to allege that the respondent had paid the accruing royalties to Tevis. His agreement bound him to keep the interest paid only so long as the royalties were paid to him. But, apart from this, it goes without saying that, if in fact there was a default on the coupons, there was no power in Tevis to waive or impair the rights which such default conferred upon the holders of bonds not owned or controlled by him. And his agreement did not assume so to do. We shall not stop to consider whether, by this contract, he undertook to accomplish a present subordination of the bonds which he did control, or merely promised to bring about that condition at some later time. It appears in the record that some of the bonds owned by Tevis did, in fact, bear an indorsement of subordination in the form prescribed in the agreement of March, 1909. We may therefore, going beyond various objections of a more or less technical character which are urged against the proposed amended cross-complaint, proceed to a consideration of what is really the fundamental question on the merits of this litigation, i. e., whether the agreement on the part of the holders of some, but not all, of the bonds to subordinate their bonds to the rights of the Union Oil Company under its lease, could give to such lessee a right to resist foreclosure, or to obtain any of the relief sought by it in its pleadings.

[15] The mortgage to the trustee was a single security in favor of all the bondholders. Dickerman v. Northern Trust Co., 176 U. S. 181, 206, 20 Sup. Ct. 311, 44 L. Ed. 423. The mortgagor having defaulted, the nonassenting bondholders were clearly entitled to foreclose, and to have the proceeds of sale applied to the payment of their bonds. But the assenting bondholders were also entitled to subject the security to the payment of their bonds. As between the different bondholders, there were no priorities or preferences. Those who agreed to subordinate their bonds did not agree to surrender their lien upon the property mortgaged, or to make their bonds and lien subordinate to that of the nonassenting holders. As was said in a case presenting a similar situation:

> "The bonds are as valid now as before the execution of the agreement. * * * The security of the first mortgage is still pledged for their payment, as before." Poland v. Lamoille V. R. Co., 52 Vt. 144.

Accordingly, if there be any foreclosure, it must be a foreclosure for the benefit of all outstanding bonds entitled to share in the security. The court could not order the property sold in parcels until the nonassenting bondholders were paid, and then allow the rest to be sold subject to the lease. Such a sale would be in violation of the right of all bonds to share equally in the security, and would give to a part of them a prior lien upon some or all of the property. Furthermore, as we have already pointed out, if there were any sale of the property on foreclosure, such sale would necessarily terminate, as against the purchaser, the lease of the Union Oil Company. We see no possible way in which a court of equity could protect the rights of the lessee as against the holders of subordinated bonds, except, perhaps, by permitting the lessee to pay off the principal and interest due on all bonds not subordinated, and then directing a foreclosure, subject to the lease, for the benefit of the others. But if the Union Oil Company desired relief of this nature, it should have offered to make such payment. Its request for leave to file amended pleadings was made after the trial, when it conclusively appeared that a large amount of the bonds had not been subordinated to this lease. If it desired to obtain the opportunity of paying off the holders of bonds who were entitled to foreclose the mortgage without regard to its lease, it should have made an allegation of its willingness and ability to make such payment. Those who seek equity should offer to do equity. Bell v. Walsh, 7

Cal. 84; Buena Vista F. & V. Co. v. Tuohy, 107 Cal. 243, 40 Pac. 386; Peshine v. Ord, 119 Cal. 311, 314, 51 Pac. 536, 63 Am. St. Rep. 131.

In Poland v. Lamoille Valley R. Co., supra, a railroad company had made a mortgage to secure an issue of $2,300,000 in bonds. It had also made a second and a third mortgage to secure other bonds. Thereafter, in order to obtain money necessary to complete its road, it had made a fourth mortgage of $500,000 of "preference bonds." Under the last mortgage the preference bonds were not to be issued until the holders of $1,800,000 of the first mortgage bonds had agreed to make their bonds subject to the preference bonds. The requisite number did so agree; the holders of the remaining $500,000 did not. In an action for the foreclosure of the various mortgages it was held that the first mortgage should be foreclosed, but that the $1,800,000 of bonds held by the assenting bondholders should be treated as a security in favor of the holders of the preference bonds. This case is cited by the respondent in support of its contention that it is entitled to some relief as against the holders of subordinated bonds. The decision does not, however, meet the requirements of the present case. In the Vermont case it was distinctly held that the nonassenting bondholders were not entitled to any priority in the foreclosure of the security as against the assenting bondholders. The first mortgage had to be foreclosed for the benefit of all of the first mortgage bonds alike. But the preference bondholders held a subordinate lien on the same property, and in the enforcement of this lien, which was a proper subject for adjudication in the action, they were entitled to be subrogated to the position of the $1,800,000 of first mortgage bonds which had agreed that the preference bonds should have priority. All of the parties were creditors having claims secured by mortgage of the same property, and the question was merely as to the application of the proceeds of the security among the different creditors. Here we have an entirely different situation. Union Oil Company is not a creditor of the mortgagor, and has no lien upon the mortgaged property. It has a right, as against certain bondholders, that they shall not foreclose their security in such manner as to terminate its lease. But the security must be foreclosed in the interest of other bondholders, and such foreclosure terminates the lease. The result is that, in the absence of a subordination by all bondholders, the Union Oil Company must seek its remedy by personal action for damages against those bondholders who have broken their agreement to protect the lease as against foreclosure; it having failed, as above suggested, to offer to pay off all bonds not subordinated.

[16] If these views be correct, the other assignments of error specified by the Union Oil Company do not require detailed notice. Further findings, or different rulings on the admission or rejection of evidence, could not have affected the findings made on uncontradicted evidence, or the legal conclusions which followed. A new trial could not benefit the Union Oil Company. Upon any further hearing the result must be the same as that already reached.

The wide discretion allowed to the superior court on motions for new trial will not justify the granting of such motion where, in its findings and judgment, the court reached the only conclusion which it could properly have reached on the record. Flood v. Petry, 165 Cal. 309, 318, 132 Pac. 256, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 861.

HENDERSON v. NORTHAM et al.

1. Pleading 🔑409(3)—Waiver of Defects—Sufficiency of Denial.

Where plaintiff treated the answer as sufficient to require proof of the allegations of the complaint, he must be deemed to have waived all objections to sufficiency of the denial.

2. Negligence 🔑6 — Cause of Injury — Failure in Statutory Duty.

While failure to perform a duty imposed by statute is evidence of negligence, the act or omission in order to warrant its consideration by the jury must contribute directly to the injury.

3. Highways 🔑184(2)—Negligent Driving—Failure in Statutory Duty—Evidence.

In action for injury when struck by automobile, the omission of the operators of the car to stop and give their names and owner's name and address could not be considered by the jury, since it in no way contributed to the injuries.

4. Evidence 🔑220(3)—Admissions—Acquiescence in Statements by Others.

To render statements made in the presence of a party, and uncontradicted by him, binding as his admissions, it must clearly appear that he heard and understood them, and that the circumstances were such that his acquiescence therein may be fairly inferred from his silence.

5. Evidence 🔑220(3)—Admissions—Acquiescence.

In action for damage when struck by automobile, it being in issue whether defendant owned the car involved, evidence that several days before at a racing meet it was announced that defendant would race such a car, and that defendant was present 15 minutes before and 15 minutes after the announcement, is not admissible as an admission of ownership.

6. Evidence 🔑472(2) — Admissibility — Opinion—Damages.

In action for damages in automobile collision, plaintiff could not state what, in his opinion, his damages were.

7. Highways 🔑184(3)—Negligent Driving of Automobile—Question for Jury.

It cannot be said as a matter of law that the operation of an automobile in a manner to make a loud noise, creating dust and smoke, constitutes negligence.

8. Negligence 🔑136(9)—Question for Jury—Facts.

Negligence is a question of fact for the jury even when there is no conflict in the evidence if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence.

9. Highways 🔑184(4)—Automobile Accident—Negligence—Instructions.

In action for damages in automobile collision where some evidence indicated speed of 40 to 50 miles per hour, and other evidence indicated a speed of not to exceed the statutory limit of 20 miles per hour, an instruction that it was negligence to drive at a high rate of speed was erroneous.

Action by John M. Henderson against Leotia Northam and others. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Gurney E. Newlin and Roy V. Reppy, both of Los Angeles, and F. E. Borton, of Bakersfield, for appellants. R. H. Wilson, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. Action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff as the result of defendants' negligent operation of an automobile.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $2,500, for which judgment was entered. The appeal is from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

It appears that on Sunday afternoon, April 27, 1913, plaintiff and his wife, by means of a buggy drawn by a horse, were traveling near Bakersfield in a southerly direction on a highway known as Union avenue when an automobile going in the same direction, occupied by two men alleged to be defendants Toft and Nelson, passed in a manner that frightened his horse, causing it to leave the road and precipitate the buggy against an electric light pole, in colliding with which plaintiff was thrown to the ground, receiving the injuries which, with some slight property damage, forms the basis of the action. The theory of the complainant, and that upon which the trial was had, is that, while defendant Northam was not present at the time of the accident, she was the owner of the car described as a large, powerful, blue racing machine of Simplex make, which, at the time and place, her codefendants, as her agents and employés and within the scope of their authority, were engaged in operating, or that all of defendants were copartners engaged in the joint enterprise of racing said car for their mutual profit.

[1] Mrs. Northam filed a separate answer wherein she denied that on the day in question Toft and Nelson, or either of them, were operating her car, or any car, on Union avenue, or in the vicinity of the place where the accident occurred, and Toft and Nelson joined in an answer containing like denial, from which, if true, it followed that plaintiff's injury was caused by a car other than that of Mrs. Northam and by an automobile driven by others than Toft and Nelson. Notwithstanding such denials the court instructed the jury that the pleadings in the case admitted that the car which was being operated by Toft and Nelson was the Simplex car belonging to the defendant Mrs. Northam. We must assume the instruction had reference to the car, the operation of which at the time caused plaintiff's injury. Respondent justifies the giving of the same upon the ground of the alleged insufficiency of the denial to raise an issue. Under section 452 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that pleadings "must be liberally construed, with a view to substantial justice between the parties," we are constrained to hold that, conceding the denial to be somewhat complex and artificially drawn, it was a sufficient negative to present an issue, the determination of which question was for the jury. Moreover, this was the view of the answer taken by the plaintiff, who introduced much evidence, the sole purpose of which was not only to identify the car causing the accident as that owned by Mrs. Northam, but to identify Toft and Nelson as the men operating it as alleged in the complaint. Having treated the answer as sufficient to require proof of the allegation of the complaint, plaintiff must be deemed to have waived all objections as to the sufficiency of the denial. Reclamation Dist. v. Hershey, 160 Cal. 694, 117 Pac. 904.

[2, 3] Evidence was offered which without contradiction tended to prove that the men in the automobile witnessed the accident occasioned by their operation of the car, but did not stop and give their names and addresses, as to which the court instructed the jury in effect that the neglect and failure of the operators of the car to stop and give his or their names and the name of the owner of said car and their addresses was a fact to be considered by it in arriving at a verdict. While failure to perform a duty imposed by statute is evidence of negligence (Driscoll v. Market St. Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 553, 32 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203), the act or omission in order to warrant its consideration by a jury in actions of this character must contribute directly to the injury. "However, improper or illegal it may have been in the abstract, an action for damages cannot be founded upon it." McKune v. Santa Clara, etc., Co., 110 Cal. 480, 42 Pac. 980. The omission of the parties operating the car to stop after the accident occurred, since it in no way contributed to plaintiff's injury, was not a subject for the consideration of the jury; hence the giving of the instruction was prejudicial error. As well might a blind man base an action for injury upon the failure of one to comply with an ordinance requiring the placing of a light to warn travelers of an obstruction in the street.

[4, 5] As stated, one theory which plaintiff sought to develop at the trial was that Mrs. Northam, the owner of the car, and Toft and Nelson were copartners engaged with her in the joint enterprise of racing the car for money. It appears that on April 26 and 27, 1913, there was an automobile race meet at Bakersfield, and that all of defendants attended the same, Toft and Nelson in charge of the car arriving there in the evening of April 25th, and defendant Northam going by train. As showing the existence of such copartnership and that Mrs. Northam as the owner of the car had it taken to Bakersfield for the purpose of entering it in the races as a partnership venture, the court, over defendants' objection, received evidence to the effect that on the afternoon of April 26th some one paraded the track in front of the grand stand, and by means of a megaphone announced to the large crowd assembled upon the grounds that Mrs. Northam had entered her car with Toft as driver in a 50-mile race to be run the next day for a wager of $2,500; the announcer introducing some one unknown to the witness as Toft. While the witness could not say that Mrs. Northam was present and heard the announcement, he did see her in her car at one end of the grand stand about 15 minutes before the making of the announcement, and later about 15 minutes after the announcement was made saw her drive away.

We know of no principle of law under which this evidence was admissible. To render statements made by another in the presence of a party, and because uncontradicted by him, binding as his admissions, it must clearly appear that he heard and understood them, and that the circumstances were such that his acquiescence therein may be fairly inferred from his silence. Where Mrs. Northam was when this announcement was made is not made to appear. True, she was in an automobile at one end of the grand stand some 15 minutes before, and was seen driving away some 15 minutes thereafter, but it cannot be said from this fact that she heard the megaphone announcement. Leach v. Dickerson, 14 Ind. App. 375, 42 N. E. 1031; Schilling v. Union R. Co., 77 App. Div. 74, 78 N. Y. Supp. 1015. Conceding, however, that she did hear the statement made and that it was her duty to contradict the same, there is not a scintilla of evidence disclosed by the record which tends to prove that she remained silent. Indeed, for aught that appears to the contrary, she may by like use of a megaphone have repudiated the declaration as being false and untrue. In itself and standing alone the declaration did not constitute evidence affecting defendants. In a proper case evidence of statements made in the presence of a party may be admissible primarily for the purpose of showing acquiescence therein by conduct which implies assent. If, however, it is not followed by some proof of conduct on the part of the one sought to be bound thereby, it is clearly inadmissible. People v. Mallon, 103 Cal. 514, 37 Pac. 512. To have warranted the admission of such evidence it devolved upon plaintiff to show conduct on the part of Mrs. Northam from which her assent could fairly be implied.

[6] To the question put to plaintiff, "What do you consider as being the amount of the damages that you have suffered by reason of the injury to your person?" he, over defendants' objection, was permitted to answer, "It is about $15,000." The question as to damages resulting from plaintiff's personal injuries was for the jury to determine upon testimony as to the extent of such injuries. Our attention is directed to no case constituting authority for the admission of such opinion testimony by one who is injured. The rule is that the witness may state the facts showing the extent of the injuries, the measure of which is the ultimate fact to be found by the jury. De Wald v. Ingle, 31 Wash. 616, 72 Pac. 471, 96 Am. St. Rep. 927; Ohio, etc., Ry. Co. v. Nickless, 71 Ind. 271; Andreson v. Ogden Union Depot, etc., Co., 8 Utah, 128, 30 Pac. 305. The testimony was stamped with the approval of the court as to its competency as proof of the amount of damage sustained by plaintiff, and hence it cannot be said that it did not in some degree influence the jury in estimating the amount of damage claimed.

[7-9] Among other instructions the court gave one to the effect that the driving of Mrs. Northam's car by Toft and Nelson in a manner which made a loud noise, created dust and smoke, and traveling at a high rate of speed which frightened plaintiff's horse constituted negligence. It cannot as a matter of law be said that the operation of an automobile in a manner to make a loud noise, creating dust and smoke, constitutes negligence. The instruction is likewise objectionable because of the use of the indefinite term "high rate of speed," which the jury might understand to be the statutory limit of speed not in excess of 20 miles an hour, as was the provision of the law at the time of the alleged accident. There was evidence to the effect that the automobile was being operated at a speed of 40 to 50 miles an hour, and other evidence which, if believed by the jury, would have justified a conclusion that the car at the time was not being driven in excess of 20 miles an hour, which rate of travel, accompanied by noise, smoke, and dust caused by the operation of the car, might or might not in the minds of the jurors, depending upon all the circumstances, constitute negligence. The rule is that negligence is a question of fact for the jury even when there is no conflict in the evidence if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence. Wahlgren v. Market St. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 656, 62 Pac. 308, 64 Pac. 993; Hampton v. Occidental Steamship Co., 139 Cal. 706, 73 Pac. 579. Other instructions given are subject to like objections.

The order denying defendants' motion for a new trial is reversed.

JOHNSTON v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.

1. DEEDS 🔑156—CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT.
At common law the benefit of a condition subsequent in a grant of real estate could be reserved only to the grantor and his heirs.

2. DEEDS 🔑156—CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT—WHO MAY RECEIVE ON BREACH OF CONDITIONS—RESIDUARY DEVISEES.
Under Civ. Code, § 1046, providing that a right of re-entry or repossession for breach of condition subsequent can be transferred, a residuary devisee of the grantor is entitled to real estate for breach of condition, although such breach was subsequent to death of grantor.

3. DEEDS 🔑93—CONSTRUCTION.
Although a deed employs words usual in conveying complete title in fee, it must be read like other contracts, with the purpose of carrying out the intention of the parties.

4. DEEDS 🔑155 — CONSTRUCTION — CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT.
A deed employing the usual words in conveying land in fee, but which refers to the purpose of the conveyance as delineated on a map entitled "Map * * * on the Subject of Water Supply for Irrigation," and provides that when the lands ceased to be used for said purposes of the "erection and maintaining of said dam, reservoir, and ditch, they should revert to the grantor," etc., created a condition subsequent that such dam should be used for no other purpose whatever than irrigation, and such reservation was a contingent estate capable of passing by will or transfer.

5. INJUNCTION 🔑62(1)—CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT—DEED—ASSIGNMENTS.
If the grantee used such property for a fairground, a park, or a place for storing municipal property, or a site for a public building, an assignee of the grantor could have invoked the power of equity to prevent such a consummation.

6. DEEDS 🔑156—CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT—RIGHT TO SUE FOR BREACH.
An estate which would be sufficient to support an assignment, whereby the assignee has the power to prevent use of real estate by a grantee of his assignor for other than a certain purpose, is sufficient foundation for a right by a residuary devisee of the grantor to sue for breach of a condition subsequent.

7. DEEDS 🔑212—CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT—BREACH—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.
In an action to recover real estate for breach of a condition subsequent that the land was to be used only for irrigation purpose, evidence held not to support a finding that defendants have not ceased to use the land for that purpose, although the grantee, a city, did use some of the water to fill a lake in its park.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action to quiet title by John Griffin Johnston against the City of Los Angeles. From a judgment allowing partial recovery, both appeal. Affirmed as to appeal of the City, and reversed as to plaintiff's appeal.

Charles Lantz and Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., and Myron Westover, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. On December 13, 1877, Dr. John S. Griffin, plaintiff's predecessor, executed a deed reciting the nominal consideration of $1 whereby he granted to the city of Los Angeles the land which is the subject of this suit. The deed contained a provision (which we shall presently quote) to the effect that, if the city should cease to use the premises for the purposes outlined in the grant, the property should revert to the grantor, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns. In November, 1910, this action to quiet title, based upon the theory of the city's abandonment of the premises for the purposes contemplated by the grantor, was commenced. The city of Los Angeles denied that it had ceased to use the land for the maintenance of a dam, reservoir, etc., and after trial of the issues joined the court rendered judgment granting plaintiff's prayer as to a part of the property and denying it as to the remaining portion. Each party to the action appeals from that portion of the judgment which is adverse, and the plaintiff also appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

For a better understanding of the issues it will be necessary to quote from Dr. Griffin's deed to the city. It contains the following description of the land and the purposes of the grant as well as the conditions which would work a reversion:

"Beginning at a point in the prolongation of the southerly line of Downey avenue in the city of Los Angeles, from which beginning point the southwest corner of said Downey avenue and Thomas street bears south 89 degrees west 2,490 feet; thence in a northerly direction about 2,600 feet following the contour of the ground by horizontal curves to a point near the east line of the city; thence in a southerly direction about 3,000 feet, still following the contours of the ground by horizontal curves to a point near the easterly end of the proposed dam or reservoir No. five (5); thence westerly 850 feet across the valley to a point which would be on the same elevation as the end of the last-mentioned course, or five (5) feet higher than the bottom of the new ditch which is to supply water to said proposed reservoir No. 5, the end of the last-mentioned course being the westerly end of said proposed dam; thence northerly 800 feet following the contour of the ground by horizontal curves to the point of beginning.

"The above-described parcel of land includes all of the land lying within or below a horizontal plane extending northerly from the top of the dam as proposed, the top of said dam to be five (5) feet higher than the bottom of the ditch as now constructed, and containing twenty-four (24) acres of land, more or less.

"And the said party of the first part also grants, as aforesaid, to the party of the second part, so much of his land situated below and to the south of said dam as is now necessary or may hereafter become necessary to be used for the proper erection, protection and maintenance of said dam and reservoir, including the land on which the present or future slope of the embankment of said dam may necessarily rest, and also the right of way over and upon the lands of the party of the first part for the purposes of constructing and maintaining and repairing said ditch and dam, and also the right to excavate, transport, and use all earth, stone, rock, and gravel from, over, and upon all lands belonging to the party of the first part, which are now or may hereafter become necessary for the purposes of constructing, or maintaining, or repairing the said ditch, dam, or reservoir. It is hereby understood by and between the parties to these presents that the reservoir, dam, and ditch herein referred to are the reservoir, dam, and ditch delineated on a map entitled 'Map of the City of Los Angeles and Vicinity Accompanying the Report of Consulting Engineers on the Subject of Water Supply for Irrigation, Dated July 27, 1877,' and more fully described and located by the field notes and report accompanying said map, now in possession of M. Kelleher, city surveyor, said reservoir being designated on said map as reservoir No. five (5), and being also shown on the annexed plat herewith recorded, to which reference is hereby made. * * *

"It being also expressly understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that in case the party of the second part shall cease to use the said premises for the said purposes of the erection and maintaining of said dam, reservoir, and ditch, that then and in that case the said premises hereinbefore conveyed shall revert to and become the property of the said party of the first part, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns."

It seems very clear, from the terms of the deed and particularly the words of the paragraph last quoted, that Dr. Griffin's gift to the city was made in contemplation of the continued maintenance of a reservoir and ditch as parts of a system of irrigation, and that it was his intention, clearly expressed in the deed accepted by his grantee, that failure on its part to maintain such instrumentalities and for the very purposes designated in the indenture would work a forfeiture. For example, any one reading the deed would be forced to the conclusion that after the reservoir had been established and the ditch constructed and used the disuse of the ditch and the dedication of the reservoir solely to the purposes of a public swimming pool would amount to a perversion of the grant and give to the grantor the right to recall his gift; or if the city should continue to use the reservoir, but should devote the water, not to irrigation, but to the creation of electric power, a similar result would follow. The court, however, put a different construction upon the deed, as will readily appear from a consideration of the findings.

The court found, among other things, that the city accepted the deed; that it constructed the dam and ditch referred to in said instrument and in the report there specified of the board of engineers on the subject of water supply for irrigation dated July 27, 1877; that thereafter the ditch and dam were used continuously for general irrigation purposes by the city until the year 1904, at which time its use for said purposes was discontinued; that since that time the city has several times each year used the water from said reservoir for the purpose of replenishing a lake in one of the public parks owned by the said city—a park which was not in existence until ten years after the execution of Dr. Griffin's deed; that for a portion of the time between 1904 and 1909 the water from the reservoir was used without permission from or compensation to the city upon privately owned land near the dam; that the original irrigation ditch which was constructed to take water from the reservoir has not been maintained, but since 1904 the city has kept up a ditch leading from the reservoir to its park, using as a part of it that portion of the original ditch being about 150 feet thereof which was conveyed by the deed from Griffin; and that "all the water used in replenishing said lake has been taken from said reservoir, except on occasions when the reservoir was dry or the water was too low therein, on which occasions water was supplied for said lake from the city water system."

There were further findings by which the good condition of the dam since 1904 was declared and certain repairs to the water gate and the valve to the service pipe were described. The court also found as follows:

"Since the year 1904 water has not been conveyed into or from said reservoir through pipes or ditches constituting part of said general irrigation system as had been done prior thereto, and the ditches leading into and out of said reservoir have been destroyed, at and near the points where they formerly entered and left said reservoir, * * * and the rights of way upon which said ditches were constructed beyond said land conveyed by said Griffin deed have been released by said city, and quitclaim deeds therefor executed and delivered to the owners of the lands over which they passed, and the spillway originally constructed to prevent overflow of said dam has been filled up by the construction of an electric railway; but the rainwater and storm water from a large area has ever since said year 1904 drained into said reservoir, and said reservoir has since that time held such water, when not dry, and such water has been used in the manner herein specified."

According to the findings, the reservoir was entirely dry during the latter half of the year 1910, and in August of that year plaintiff caused a part of the bed of said reservoir to be plowed. At times people living near the reservoir complained of its unsanitary condition when the water was low and foul, and at other times when copious rains had filled it the city's employés or others caused it to be partially drained to prevent injury to the adjoining lands from overflow. Since 1904 the amount of water obtained for the park and taken from the reservoir has required the use of "ten acres of the land conveyed by said Griffin deed lying within contour lines above said dam and easterly of Mission road."

In 1903, as the court also found, the land described in the deed from Dr. Griffin was conveyed by the city to its board of water commissioners. Thereafter, in 1905, after condemnation proceedings duly taken, Mission road was opened across the property in such manner as to separate about one acre of the westerly portion of the land from the rest of the tract. Within the lines of the roadway were included 1½ acres of the land. The board of water commissioners paid an assessment of $4,383.15 upon the property east of the new road, but no award was made for the land taken and no payment was made of a purported assessment on the acre to the west of Mission road, but "said land on said westerly side was permitted to be sold by said city to a private party." Plaintiff's counsel stipulated that title to all streets included in the property was in the city. There were further findings that in 1910 the board of water commissioners adopted a resolution declaring this westerly portion of the property no longer useful as part of the site for a reservoir and advising its abandonment and sale for a price not less than $500. On August 15, 1911, this resolution was rescinded. It was found that the plaintiff is the residuary devisee under the will of John S. Griffin, who died in August, 1898, distribution having been made to him by decree made and entered August 2, 1909, and containing the following language:

> "And that all the residue of said estate, whether described herein or not, be distributed to said John Griffin Johnston."

While the decree described certain property specifically, the land here in controversy was not included in the description.

The conclusions of law were that as to the land east of Mission road and north of the dam embracing ten acres, as to the dam itself, and as to that ground south of the dam on which the present slope of the embankment rests, the city and its agencies have not at any time ceased to use said portion of the premises in the manner specified in the Griffin deed; that said portion is owned by the board of public service commissioners of the city of Los Angeles; that title to all roads not within said ten acres is vested in the city; that all of the remaining land, by reason of the cessation of public use, has reverted to and vested in plaintiff in fee simple; and that neither party should recover costs. Judgment was entered accordingly.

It will be noted that Dr. Griffin died years before the city ceased to use the entire tract as a part of its irrigating system, and the first point made by the city is that plaintiff. as residuary devisee, took no estate in the premises by devise, because the right of reentry, if any, arose after the death of the grantor, and could not therefore be the subject of testamentary devise. It is argued that Dr. Griffin parted with every vestige of interest or estate in the land, retaining nothing which he could convey or transmit by descent; that any future relation between him and the property would be created by breach of the condition on the part of the grantee or its successors or assigns; and that such mere possibility of reverter was not a right to re-enter which could be assigned or devised. Counsel for the city of Los Angeles take the position also that the right to re-entry existed only in the grantor or his heirs.

[1] It is quite true that at common law the benefit of a condition subsequent in a grant of real estate could be reserved only to the grantor and his heirs, and this rule still prevails in states in which the common law has not been swept aside by statute. Such cases as Upington v. Corringan, 151 N. Y. 143, 45 N. E. 359, 37 L. R. A. 794, and others cited by counsel for the city, discuss this rule and trace its origin to a wish to discourage maintenance.

[2] But in California, by Code provision "a right of re-entry, or of repossession for breach of condition subsequent, can be transferred." Section 1046, Civ. Code. This, as the Code commissioners said of it at the time of its adoption, reverses the rule in force in New York. But, say counsel for the city, there is no right, no estate—nothing upon which an assignment may operate until after breach of condition. With this view we cannot agree.

[3] The deed of Dr. Griffin does, it is true, employ the words of conveyance usual in the transmitting of complete title in fee, but instruments of this kind are to be read, like other contracts, with the purpose of carrying out the intention of the parties.

> "It is impossible to lay down an invariable and universal rule of construction. The tendency of modern decisions is to uphold conveyances, and give effect to the intention of the parties, regardless of technical rules of construction." Faivre v. Daley, 93 Cal. 664–671, 29 Pac. 256.

[4] Applying this rule to the deed before us, we are forced to the conclusion that it was the intention of the parties to that instrument that the city should enjoy the use of the property for its reservoir and ditches so long as it maintained them as a part of its irrigation system as then contemplated; that its right to hold the land should be forfeited upon its abandonment of the property for the designated use; and that the reservation in favor of the grantor was one which should pass to heirs or assigns of the grantor. It was a contingent estate, not a mere naked possibility of a future right, and therefore it was a species of property capable of passing by will or transfer. Section 699, Civ. Code.

[5] If the city, ignoring the limiting words of the grant, had prepared to use the land for a fairground, a park, or a place for storing municipal property, or as a site for a public building, there can be no doubt that the grantor's assignee could have invoked the power of equity to prevent such a consummation. Pavkovich v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co., 150 Cal. 39, 87 Pac. 1097; Newlove v. Mercantile Trust Co. of San Francisco, 156 Cal. 657, 105 Pac. 971.

[6] And it is equally certain that the estate necessary to support the assignment in such a case is sufficient foundation for the right asserted by the plaintiff in this action. Taylor v. McCowen, 154 Cal. 798–805, 99 Pac. 351. We conclude, therefore, that the plaintiff has succeeded to the right of the grantor.

There is no force in the contention that under the terms of the deed the city was bound merely to erect and maintain the dam, ditch, and reservoir, but that the contemplated use of the water was not required; and Reclamation District No. 551 v. Van Loben Sels, 145 Cal. 181, 78 Pac. 638, cited to support this contention, does not do so. In that case the grant provided that the property should be used for reclamation purposes reverting to the grantor when abandoned and used no more for such purposes. The court found that the land was used and had been continuously used for such purposes and this court sustained the finding as supported by the evidence. In the case at bar the evidence and the findings are that since 1904 the property has not been devoted in any manner or degree to the objects for which it was conveyed, namely, "the erection and maintaining of said dam, reservoir, and ditch"; nor does the case of Behlow v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co., 130 Cal. 16, 62 Pac. 295, support the counsel for Los Angeles in their contention that, irrespective of use, the mere existence of the dam prevents the successful assertion of plaintiff's claim. In that case it was held that irregular use of the property for railroad purposes sufficiently complied with the obligation to devote the land to railroad purposes only. But here it was shown that, aside from the occasional conducting to the lake in the park of the rainwater which had filled the reservoir, the city made no pretense of "maintaining" the dam, reservoir, or ditch, or of "making use of the premises" for such maintenance. The lake had other sources of supply, and so little did the city's mandatories depend upon the reservoir as a means of filling the lake in the park that the appliances connected with the reservoir were permitted to get out of repair. In October or November, 1905, the reservoir was drained by the opening of the water gate by a French woman living near—"an act of meanness," as one of the findings characterizes it. During half of 1910 there was no water at all behind the dam, and the water commissioners who held title for the city solemnly declared the property abandoned so far as public use was concerned. Perhaps, as now asserted, this declaration did not bind the city, but, taken with all of the other testimony upon this subject, it has certain evidentiary value which must be regarded.

[7] We fail to find any evidence or findings to support the conclusion of law that "defendants have not ceased to use" the indicated ten acres "in the manner specified in the Griffin deed."

It is contended by the city and admitted by plaintiff that restraints of this character are to be construed strictly against the grantor; but, giving such interpretation to the deed before us, we are compelled to hold that plaintiff is in a position to maintain his action, and to have his title quieted as to all of the land included in the original grant to the city by his predecessor in interest except that part of it to which, by his stipulation, he admits the city has title. This conclusion is supported by such authorities as Papst v. Hamilton, 133 Cal. 631, 66 Pac. 10, Firth v. Marovich, 160 Cal. 257, 116 Pac. 729, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1190, and Parsons v. Smilie, 97 Cal. 647, 32 Pac. 702.

That part of the judgment from which the city of Los Angeles appeals is affirmed. Those parts of the judgment and the order from which plaintiff appeals are reversed.

MASSACHUSETTS BONDING & INS. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 8329.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑417(3) — WORKMAN'S COMPENSATION ACT—CERTIORARI.

Award of Industrial Accident Commission can be annulled by a proceeding in review, if the commission exceeded its powers, if the award was procured by fraud or was unreasonable, or if the findings of fact upon which it was made do not support it; but upon no other grounds, and it cannot be set aside for errors of procedure only or for insufficiency of the evidence, if there is substantial evidence to support it, or for rulings on evidence amounting only to error and not affecting jurisdiction.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑419—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS — POWERS OF COMMISSION—PROCEDURE.

The Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) empowers the Industrial Accident Commission to adopt reasonable and proper rules of practice, and it need not follow the practice of the courts, so that notice that an award would be amended, unless good cause against it was shown within 10 days, was not improper.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑419—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS — AWARD — MATTERS CONCLUDED.

Where the insurer and employer did not attack the finding of the original award that the injured person was the employé of the master, it could not, on a proceeding for an amendment of the award, contend that the relationship did not exist.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑419—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACTS—AWARD — WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

Where the Accident Commission gave notice that an award would be amended in the absence of good cause shown, and the insurer appeared and objected on the ground that the relation of master and servant did not exist, its failure to object on other grounds waived them.

5. Master and Servant 🔑419—Workmen's Compensation Acts—Proceeding of Commission—Validity.

If it was error for the Industrial Accident Commission to serve notice that unless the employer or insurer showed good cause the award would be amended, as placing the burden of proof on the employer, such error did not vitiate the amended award.

6. Master and Servant 🔑419—Workmen's Compensation Acts—Temporary Compensation—Effect.

Payment of an award for temporary disability and the release thereon were no bar to the subsequent proceeding for compensation for the permanent disability caused by the same injury.

7. Master and Servant 🔑382—Workmen's Compensation Acts—Awards—Validity.

Under specific provisions of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 32b, a release given on payment of a temporary disability award is not valid unless approved by the commission, or unless it provides for payment of full compensation.

8. Master and Servant 🔑401—Workmen's Compensation Acts—Proceedings—Admissions.

A statement of a physician on which an award is founded, though not sworn to, when made a part of the application for an award, and not controverted, has the same standing as an admission of fact made by the pleadings in an ordinary action at law.

In Bank. Proceeding by J. B. Kelley for workmen's compensation, opposed by C. M. Manley and Jesse Marks, employers, and by the Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Company, insurer. On application of the insurer for a writ of review of an award by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of the applicant. Application denied and award affirmed.

John Ralph Wilson, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco (W. H. Pillsbury, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an application for a writ of review of an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of J. B. Kelley, against said petitioner as insurance carrier, and C. M. Manley, and Jesse Marks, as employers of said Kelley.

Kelley was injured in May, 1914. He immediately applied to the commission for compensation, and an award was made on April 28, 1915, allowing him $472.50 as a temporary disability indemnity. This sum was paid in full on May 29, 1915, and Kelley's receipt taken therefor. Thereafter, on January 15, 1917, Kelley applied to the commission for a permanent disability rating, under section 25d of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 293), on the ground that his injury had developed into a permanent disability, and that he was entitled to an additional allowance on that account. His application stated the facts, and had attached thereto a certificate of a surgeon describing the permanent disability. Thereupon the commission issued and served upon the petitioner herein a notice stating the fact that the physician's report accompanying Kelley's petition showed that Kelley had suffered a permanent disability equal to 18 per cent. of the total disability, and that, unless good cause to the contrary be shown in writing and filed with the commission within 10 days from the date of said notice, the previous findings and award would be amended so as to provide a further allowance to Kelley of $337.50. Within the 10 days said company filed with the commission an answer in writing, stating that it objected to the proposed amendment, on the ground that at the time of the injury Kelley was not in the employment of Manley, whom alone it had insured, and that it was not responsible for any compensation payments whatever. It made no other objection to the proposed amendment. Thereupon the commission considered the matter, and made an award allowing said Kelley the sum of $337.50, to be paid by said insurance company, C. M. Manley, and Jesse Marks. It is this award which the petitioner here seeks to have annulled by means of a writ of review.

[1] The proceeding in review is not an appeal. The award can be annulled in such proceeding, if the commission exceeded its powers in making it, or if it was procured by fraud, or if it is unreasonable, or if the findings of facts upon which it was made do not support it, but upon no other grounds. Section 84. It cannot be set aside for errors of procedure only, or for insufficiency of the evidence, where there is substantial evidence to support the findings, or for rulings upon the admission or exclusion of evidence, amounting only to error and not affecting the jurisdiction.

[2] The petitioner claims that there was no jurisdiction to make the award, because of the fact that the notice did not state the time for hearing, but merely declared that the proposed amendment would be made unless good cause to the contrary was shown in writing within 10 days. The Workmen's Compensation Act empowers the commission to adopt reasonable and proper rules of practice in proceedings before it. Any notice or method of procedure which does not transgress the constitutional mandate regarding due process of law, or the provisions of the act itself, is within the power of the commission. It is not obliged to follow the methods in use in the ordinary courts of the land. The method here provided gave the parties interested an opportunity to make such objection and opposition before the commission to the proposed amendment as they desired. So far as we can perceive it is not open to any objection on constitutional grounds. The act provides that such awards may be amended, "if opportunity to to heard is given." This method afforded such opportunity, and does not contravene the provisions of the act in that regard.

[3] The sole objection made by the written answer of the insurance company was without merit. The original findings and award declared that Kelley was in the employment of both Manley and Marks at the time of his injury. This finding and award was not attacked by any proceeding in review, as provided in the act, and it had become final long before the new proceeding was begun. It was conclusive upon the parties with regard to their relation to the injured person.

[4] Accompanying the petition of Kelley for the permanent allowance was the doctor's certificate stating the nature of the disability. The notice to the insurance company referred to this certificate, and stated the intention of the commission to make the amendment of the award, unless good cause to the contrary was shown. The appearance of the insurance company, its objection on the ground that it was not liable at all because Manley was not the employer of Kelley, and its failure to make other objection or to offer any other proof concerning the disability stated in the physician's certificate, was a waiver of any other objection to the proceeding. The procedure adopted by the board is much less formal than that prevailing in the ordinary judicial tribunals, but that fact does not make its awards invalid.

[5] It is claimed that the notice stating that the amendment would be made unless good cause to the contrary was shown placed the burden of proof upon the insurance company instead of upon Kelley, where it belonged. Even if this were true it would not avoid the award. It would be mere error as to the proper method of procedure. In any event the company is not injured thereby, since it did not seek any opportunity to introduce evidence upon the facts alleged against it.

It is not always necessary for a tribunal of this character, or indeed for any tribunal, to have formal evidence offered and received, in order to make an order or judgment. Here the company was fairly informed of the purpose of the commission to make the award upon the conditions stated in the notice. They were advised of the facts upon which it was to be made. Instead of offering evidence to the contrary, they submitted the case upon the facts stated. Their conduct in the matter, although not expressed by any formal writing, was substantially the same as that of one who appears in court and submits his cause upon a demurrer to the allegations of the charge against him. It was an admission of the truth of the allegations. An award made in such a manner is not, for that reason, made without jurisdiction of the cause by the tribunal making it. Nor can it be said that it was made without evidence. The admission of the parties, made by their tacit acquiescence, is equal in value to the formal evidence of witnesses, and may be made the basis of an award.

[6, 7] The payment of the temporary disability award, and the release thereon, was no bar to the subsequent proceeding for compensation for the permanent disability caused by the injury. It did, in terms, purport to release the company from all claims for compensation by reason of the injury, but the money paid was sufficient only to satisfy the award previously made, and there was no consideration for the release of any additional right or of any demand for the permanent disability finally resulting from the injury. Furthermore, by the provisions of the act (section 32b), no release is valid unless it provides for the payment of full compensation, or unless it shall be approved by the commission. This release was not approved by the commission and it did not provide for payment of full compensation. Therefore it is not valid under the act.

[8] The question whether the report of the physician on which the award was founded, and which was not sworn to, was competent evidence does not arise in the case. It was a part of the application made by Kelley, and it was not controverted in any way by the company. As above indicated, it was in substance the same as the allegation of a complaint in a superior court which is not controverted by the answer. The facts stated in it have the same standing as an admission of fact made by the pleadings in an ordinary action at law.

These comprise the objections made to the validity of the award in question. We find no sufficient cause for annulling it.

The application is denied and the award is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WHITNEY. (Cr. 383.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 29, 1917.)

RAPE ⚷52(1)—STATUTORY OFFENSE—CREDIBILITY AND PROBABILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, evidence by prosecutrix that she slept with defendant during a term of years, in the house, and with the consent of defendant's wife, held not too incredible to sustain a verdict of guilty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

George F. Whitney was convicted of a statutory offense, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Hatton & Scott, of Modesto, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was convicted of statutory rape, the prosecutrix being under the age of consent. She was an adopted child, and had lived with defendant and his wife for six years. She was nearly 18 when the act of intercourse charged in the information is alleged to have taken place. She testified that immediately after being taken into the home of the Whitney's she began to sleep in the same bed with the defendant, and that this practice, with occasional intermissions, was continued during all the years that she lived with them. She further testified that this was agreeable to Mrs. Whitney; in fact, that the latter preferred to sleep alone. She declared also that defendant had improper relations with her at frequent intervals over nearly the whole of this period. She was subjected to a rigid cross-examination covering 250 pages of the transcript, but her testimony was unshaken. In fact, as often happens in such protracted cross-examinations, she fortified and strengthened the impression made by her examination in chief. The only point made by appellant in his brief of nearly 200 pages is that the story is inherently improbable, and therefore it should be rejected by this court and the conviction reversed.

We have taken pains to read with some care all of her testimony, and far from saying that it is altogether incredible, the impression we receive is that it bears the earmarks of truth and sincerity. At any rate, all the considerations advanced by the learned counsel for appellant were for the cognizance of the jury, and we must assume that they received careful and conscientious attention. We may add that the story of the prosecutrix does not approach so near the line of the improbable and incredible as in many convictions upheld by this and other appellate courts. The question has been fully discussed at various times, and nothing of good can be accomplished by attempting to add to what has been said. It is sufficient to refer to the following cases: People v. Kaiser, 119 Cal. 458, 51 Pac. 702; People v. Logan, 123 Cal. 414, 56 Pac. 56; People v. Rongo, 169 Cal. 75, 145 Pac. 1017; People v. Lewis, 18 Cal. App. 364, 123 Pac. 232; People v. Crawford, 24 Cal. App. 403, 141 Pac. 824.

SATTERWHITE v. GARRISON, County Auditor. (Civ. 2116.)

1. Officers 🔑30 — Eligibility — Holding Other Office.

Const. art. 4, § 19, providing that no senator or member of the assembly shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, hold or accept any office, trust, or employment under the state, provided that this shall not apply to any office filled by election by the people, applies to a member of the Legislature, who was holding two offices at the time the amendment took effect.

2. Officers 🔑30 — Eligibility — Holding Other Office—"Office, Trust, or Employment Under This State."

A deputy district attorney, though generally known as a county officer, holds an "office, trust, or employment under this state," within Const. art. 4, § 19, prohibiting members of the Legislature from holding any such office, trust, or employment.

3. Officers 🔑30 — Eligibility — Holding Other Office—"Office Filled by Election by the People."

A deputy district attorney does not hold an office filled by election by the people, within the exception contained in Const. art. 4, § 19, as, though the office of district attorney is filled by election, the Political Code, by providing for the appointment, salary, and term of office of the deputy district attorney, recognizes his office as distinct from that of the district attorney.

4. Officers 🔑30 — Eligibility — Holding Other Office.

Const. art. 4, § 19, precludes members of the Legislature from seeking or holding any appointive office or employment in or under any department or subdivision of the general state government by the seeking or holding of which his independent action as such member of the Legislature might be influenced or affected.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste and William H. Donahue, Judges.

Petition by William T. Satterwhite for a writ of mandate directed to E. F. Garrison, as Auditor of the County of Alameda, State of California. From a judgment for defendant, the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

D. C. Dutton, of Oakland, for appellant. W. H. L. Hynes, Dist. Atty., and James M. Koford, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Alameda, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner, being a deputy district attorney of the county of Alameda, applied to the superior court for a writ of mandate directed to the defendant, auditor of that county, commanding him to issue and deliver to the petitioner a warrant for the amount of his salary as such deputy district attorney for the period between December 21, 1916, and the end of that month—the defendant having theretofore declined to do so, basing his refusal upon the ground that the petitioner having been elected a member of the Legislature was, by section 19 of article 4 of the Constitution as amended and in effect on said 21st day of December, inhibited from holding any office or employment under the state during the term of his legislative mandate. The trial court upheld the contention of the defendant—which was raised upon demurrer to the petition—denied leave to amend said petition, and entered judgment in favor of defendant for his costs. Petitioner appeals from such judgment.

that the amendment to said section of the Constitution taking effect December 21, 1916, does not apply to him for the reason that he was holding the two offices in question at the time said amendment took effect, and that to apply it to his case would be to make the amendment retroactive. It is unnecessary, in our view, to discuss at length this first objection of the appellant as the question was exhaustively considered by the District Court of Appeal for the Third District in the recent case of Chenoweth v. Chambers, 164 Pac. 428, in which the same contention was made and held to be untenable. We are satisfied to follow the reasoning and authority of that case.

[2] It is next urged by appellant that the constitutional inhibition does not apply to him for the further reason that a deputy district attorney is not the holder of an "office, trust or employment under this state." The language of the particular section is as follows:

> "No senator or member of the assembly shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, hold or accept any office, trust or employment under this state: Provided, that this provision shall not apply to any office filled by election by the people."

While it must be conceded that a deputy district attorney is not one of the state officers provided for by the Constitution and he is what is generally known as a county officer, we think the terms of the Constitution "office, trust or employment under this state" have a much broader signification than that contended for by appellant, and that his office must be held to be covered by them. In People v. Leonard, 73 Cal. 230, 14 Pac. 853, it was held that a supervisor—who also is a county officer—is the holder of a "civil office of profit under this state." So also of a county superintendent of schools in Crawford v. Dunbar, 52 Cal. 39; and of a sheriff in Searcy v. Grow, 15 Cal. 117. We think these cases are not overruled by Nicholl v. Koster, 157 Cal. 416, 108 Pac. 302, which holds that probation officers are not "officers of the state government," but are "minor officers of the local county government"; the term "officers of the state government" being evidently much more restricted and of narrower import than the clause of the Constitution now under consideration.

[3] This second contention of the appellant must therefore be rejected, as also his third, that a deputy district attorney, if the holder of any office at all, occupies one "filled by election by the people," and therefore is not affected by said constitutional provision. The argument in support of this last proposition is that as a deputy district attorney is the holder of no office distinct from his chief, and is in contemplation of law the district attorney, who holds by election, his deputy therefore is the holder of an "office filled by election by the people." But the Political Code of this state by providing for the appointment, the salary, and term of office of a deputy district attorney, recognizes him as an entity distinct from his chief. His office being filled by appointment, it would be absurd to regard it as one "filled by election by the people," and therefore not affected by the constitutional inhibition which we are considering.

[4] Upon the merits of the whole case we are of the opinion that the intent and purpose of the framers in proposing, and of the people in adopting, this constitutional provision was the preclusion of members of the law-making branch of the state government from seeking or holding any appointive office or employment in or under any department or subdivision of the general state government, by the seeking or holding of which his independent action as such member of the Legislature might be in any wise influenced or affected.

For the reasons above set forth the judgment is affirmed.

CHURCH v. FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND. (Civ. 1875.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 2, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 26, 1917.)

1. INSURANCE 🔑665(1) — ACCIDENT POLICY — CAUSE OF INJURY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.
Evidence held to support judgment in favor of holder of accident policy.

2. INSURANCE 🔑265—ACCIDENT INSURANCE —WARRANTIES—MATERIALITY.
Where the court found that a statement in an application that insured was mentally and physically sound was true, it was immaterial whether or not it was a warranty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by Arthur R. Church against the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Abrahams, J. Crider, Jr., and Chas. W. Fricke, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Porter & Sutton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The only point requiring notice in this appeal by defendant from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff upon an accident policy issued to him by defendant is whether or not the evidence supports certain findings of the court upon which the judgment is based.

On July 14, 1913, defendant issued to plaintiff, who was a member of the Los Angeles fire department, an accident insurance policy, the express consideration for the issuance of which, other than the premium specified, was "the agreements and statements in the copy of application set forth hereon, which statements the insured makes and warrants to be true by the acceptance of this policy." This copy of application, to which, however, plaintiff did not attach his signature, contained a statement as follows: "I am in sound condition mentally and physically." We may dismiss from consideration the effect of plaintiff's failure to sign this so-called application, and concede for the purposes of this case that his acceptance of the policy to which it was attached was the same in effect as though he had signed the same, for the reason that the court upon sufficient evidence found "that plaintiff was in sound condition, mentally and physically, on the 14th day of July, 1913, at the time said policy was issued." The facts connected with the accident as a result of which plaintiff was injured are as follows: It appears from the evidence that on the evening of April 14, 1914, plaintiff was awakened by a fire alarm, and, in some unexplained manner, fell through the pole hole used by the firemen as a means of descending from the room occupied by them to the ground floor. As a result of this fall the bone designated as the femur of the right hip was fractured. Plaintiff was taken to the receiving hospital, where, shortly after his arrival, he became unconscious, which condition continued for some eight weeks.

The evidence upon which appellant bases its contention that plaintiff was not in sound condition, as found by the court, is that some ten years prior to the time of the issuance of the accident policy, namely, in September, 1904, he, while serving in the fire department was injured by the falling of a roof, a part of which struck him on the head, and, while of insufficient force to knock him down, he was three or four days later, as a result thereof, the subject of a delirious attack. As a remedy for this condition resort was had at the time to a trepanning operation, which afforded immediate relief, and from thence to April 14, 1914, at the time of the injury indemnity for which is herein sought, there was nothing in plaintiff's manner, appearance, complaint, or feeling to indicate that his condition was other than sound, both mentally and physically; in other words, his physical and mental condition was absolutely unimpaired by the operation mentioned. Nevertheless defendant insists that the unconscious condition of plaintiff following the fracture of the hip joint occurring in April 1914, was due, not to such injury, but to the operation in trepanning the skull some ten years prior thereto. And such was the opinion of a medical expert called as a witness on behalf of defendant. As against this testimony, however, was that of plaintiff himself to the effect that since the operation he had never during the intervening time experienced any ill effects therefrom, together with that of his fellow employés that during all of said time he had appeared in a normal condition, and that of other physicians, which clearly tended to negative the testimony given by Dr. French, the expert called on behalf of defendant. Plaintiff was not questioned with reference to whether or not he had previously sustained any accident, nor the nature thereof.

[1, 2] He was not subject to any disease or disorder, and the court was justified in concluding that the unconscious condition following the fracture of the hip was, as stated by one of the medical witnesses, attributable to the shock and suffering which it entailed, rather than to the operation performed ten years before to relieve the pressure upon the brain due to the former accident. While there is some conflict of evidence, that in support of the finding is ample to justify the same. This being true, the question as to whether or not the unsigned application constituted a warranty becomes immaterial; for, conceding it to be a warranty, the finding is that it was true.

PEOPLE v. CRANE. (Cr. 374.)

1. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑47 — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, evidence held so insufficient to show that money appropriated was that of the prosecutrix as to render it error not to grant motion for a directed verdict for defendant.

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑901—HARMLESS ERROR —EVIDENCE.

Where the court erroneously refused to direct a verdict for defendant at the close of the state's evidence, it was cured by defendant later supplying the required evidence.

3. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑44(1) — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction of embezzlement.

4. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑472 — EXPERT TESTIMONY—ADMISSIBILITY.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, where defendant, an attorney, claimed the money was advanced to apply on his fees as well as on the expenses of a suit, and prosecutrix claimed there was a contract for a specified sum, to cover two cases, defendant claiming it covered only the one case, it was error to exclude testimony of an expert as to the reasonable value of defendant's services in the case in which the appropriation occurred.

5. WITNESSES 🔑394 — IMPEACHMENT — REHABILITATING WITNESS.

Where a witness was impeached by testimony that she said she lied for defendant before the grand jury, it was error to refuse to admit a check to show witness was at the place of making such statement before the grand jury met.

6. EMBEZZLEMENT 🔑47—DEFENSES—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where prosecutrix claimed money given defendant attorney, was only to pay for detective services, and that defendant had already received his fees, which defendant denied, it was error to refuse to instruct to acquit if such money was advanced for "fees, costs, and expenses."

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; John Hancock, Judge.

H. Stanley Crane was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Reversed.

Ben Berry and La Fayette J. Smallpage, both of Stockton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The appellant, H. Stanley Crane, was charged by indictment of the grand jury of the county of San Joaquin with the crime of embezzling the property of Mrs. Helen Kleppel. He was thereupon duly tried and convicted of the crime charged. Defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, and he was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for a term of five years. Defendant prosecutes this appeal from the order and the judgment.

The defendant, an attorney at law, was retained by Mrs. Helen Kleppel, the prosecuting witness, to obtain a divorce. It appearing that Mrs. Kleppel's husband contemplated fighting the divorce by cross-complaining that Mrs. Kleppel had been improperly intimate with one Frank Kaplan, defendant decided that detectives would be necessary not only to disprove such a charge against Mrs. Kleppel, but to prove a like charge against her husband. For this purpose, claims the prosecuting witness, defendant demanded $400, which was finally obtained through Kaplan and paid defendant, he having received prior to that time but $20 to cover the costs of commencing suit. It is this $400 which it is charged defendant embezzled. Defendant claims that the money was paid to cover his fees and expenditures in the case as well as detective hire, and that its use lay in his discretion. In opposition to this Mrs. Kleppel seems to have confusedly taken three positions. It appears that at this time defendant was also retained by Mrs. Kleppel's father, H. Buccholz, to collect several debts against Kleppel, amounting to some $1,600, as well as to render other legal services. For these services Buccholz was charged $385. Mrs. Kleppel claims that it was understood that this charge was to include defendant's fee for services in the divorce action. She also claims that defendant promised to conduct her case gratuitously. And she seemed at times to be of the impression that defendant was charging her for her divorce, some $800 (the $400 for detectives and the amount properly chargeable to her father). Defendant claims that no such agreements were had, that the work done for the father was entirely separate and well worth the fee charged, thereby strengthening his claim that the $400 covered only reasonable divorce fees and costs.

Defendant assigns as grounds for reversal: First, that the court erred in the decision of questions of law arising during the course of the trial, in that it denied defendant's motion for a directed verdict, and in that it made erroneous rulings as to the admissibility of evidence; second, that the court erred in instructing the jury; and, third, that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence. At the close of the prosecution's case in chief, defendant moved for a directed verdict of not guilty on the ground that it had not been proved that the $400 was the personal property of Mrs. Kleppel, but that it was supplied by Kaplan; and that even if it were Mrs. Kleppel's property, it had not been proved that no detectives were employed.

The only evidence appearing as to the ownership of the money, at the time the motion was made, is as follows:

"Mr. Foltz: Q. Just state what, if any, conversation there was between you and Mr. Crane the first time, about the $400. A. He stated I had to clear myself of that, and have to prove Kleppel's guilt. I told him I was innocent, and it was up, though, to let Mr. Kaplan know about it. So he went with me that evening out to Kaplan's ranch. Mr. Kaplan not being there, we had to go to the Waterloo road. He was working at a place there. Q. Never mind that part of it, that first conversation. Was there any more said between you and him than what you mentioned now—what you just mentioned—anything said about any amount? A. He said he needed $400. I asked him what he wanted it for. He said he needed $400 for that. I said I didn't have that money. Q. Did he tell you at that time what he needed it for? A. He said for detective work. Q. Did he say how many? A. He said he had to hire two detectives. Q. For what purpose, did he state? A. Proving that I was innocent, and finding Kleppel guilty. Q. Then you say you went out to the Waterloo road to Frank Kaplan's place? A. Yes. Q. How far does he live from where your father lives and where you lived? A. About four miles; that is, on the Linden road. He was staying at that time on the Waterloo road, helping some friends out. Q. State whether or not there was any conversation there with Mr. Kaplan and Mr. Crane and you. A. He asked me to go in and get Frank out; then he took Frank up to our ranch, away up on the Linden road, and he had a talk with Frank, and got in the machine at the time. Q. What was said at that time? A. He asked Frank if he was guilty. He stated, 'No.' He said we were both innocent of the charge. And, he said, well, he had to prove that, and he had to have detectives, and that I was to raise $400. Then he wanted Frank to raise it, and he said he didn't see what he had to do with it; he was innocent. Then he says I had to raise that, that was all there was to it. Then he forbid me mentioning the subject. Q. What, if anything, did he say to Frank there at that time? A. Well, * * * he spoke to Frank a few minutes while I went in the house. * * * He told Frank if he didn't clear himself he would be a ruined man. * * * Frank told him he didn't have the money either; neither one of us had it. Q. Then when he got to the Kaplan ranch (subsequently) who did you see? A. He spoke to Mr. Kaplan a long time behind the barn. In the meanwhile Frank went in the house and dressed, and when he came out I asked where he was going. He said he was going to see if he could borrow money from some friend, and then proceeded out to Sperry's addition, and the money was borrowed from a gentleman out there. I don't know the name. * * * Q. Did you see the money paid over? A. No, I didn't see any of that. The only thing I seen was when Frank laid the check down in

Mr. Crane's office, on Mr. Crane's desk. * * * Q. How much was this check for? A. For $400. Q. Who gave that to Mr. Crane? A. Frank gave it to Mr. Crane."

And later the prosecuting witness testifies: "Of course that was the first time he [her father] had heard anything of it, because he had not even known that Frank was paying for these detectives."

Frank Kaplan's testimony appears from the following:

"Q. Just go on and tell all he said about that. A. Well, he said that I would have to clear myself, and the only way to do it would be to raise enough money to employ a couple of detectives to get evidence against Mr. Kleppel; and he said that Mrs. Kleppel didn't have any money, and he thought being that I had been mixed up with it, I ought to help raise the money, and I told him at the time I had nothing whatever to do with it, and that I had no money. So then Mrs. Kleppel— Q. Did you tell him at that time whether—what else did you tell him; go ahead? A. Then Mrs. Kleppel, she wanted to try to raise the money to clear us. Then they went away that night. Q. What, if any, conversation took place at that time between you three? A. Well, he stated that Mrs. Kleppel couldn't get the money, and they wanted me to try and raise the money. * * * Q. Well was there anything finally done about the money at that time? A. Yes. Q. What was done; what agreement was made between you, if any? A. Well, I borrowed the money. * * * Q. Then what did you do after you got the $400? What did you do with it? A. I deposited it in the bank. * * * Q. State whether or not any money was paid—if any check was given to Mr. Crane after that time, after you put the money in the bank. A. Yes, sir."

[1-3] There is nothing in this testimony to suggest that the money was loaned by Kaplan to Mrs. Kleppel. In fact it would indicate just the contrary, that Kaplan borrowed the money and himself paid it as a matter of self-protection. The fact that subsequently Mrs. Kleppel voluntarily promised to and did reimburse Kaplan is of no consequence, and does not serve to disprove that at this time the money paid was Kaplan's. There being no legally sufficient evidence, therefore, to prove that the money alleged to have been embezzled was Mrs. Kleppel's personal property, the court erred in denying appellant's motion for a directed verdict, and such error is reversible, unless subsequently cured. But the required evidence was thereafter supplied by the defendant himself, and we cannot say, therefore, upon the whole record that defendant was prejudiced in said ruling. After testifying that Mrs. Kleppel had spoken to Kaplan about borrowing the money, and that Kaplan had said "he would go to town and raise the money there, or borrow the money there, and would make her the loan," he adds, "I tried to explain to Mr. Buccholz Frank Kaplan had loaned her money to pay the general expenses of her case; that included the employment of detectives." While this evidence is indeed meager, it leaves no doubt in our minds that defendant understood and intended to state that the money was loaned by Kaplan to Mrs. Kleppel. It must have been so understood by the jury, and we cannot say that the conclusion is unwarranted and the error not cured.

Without setting forth the evidence tending to prove that no detectives were employed, it is enough to say that it was sufficient, and although it is of a negative character, this was about the only sort of evidence left open to the prosecution. But here again if we admit that the showing for the people was somewhat inadequate, it was aided by the testimony of the defendant. He admitted that he appropriated $204 of the $400; his claim being that he was entitled to do so under his contract with Mrs. Kleppel. The jury had the right, however, to accept her version of the contract and his as to the use of the money. The amount which he thus admits to have appropriated would satisfy the requirement of the indictment, and in connection with the terms of the trust would make out the offense.

[4] Appellant contends that the court erred in rejecting the testimony of George R. McNoble, an attorney at law, attempted to be used as an expert by defendant. After stating to McNoble in a hypothetical question all the legal services that appellant had rendered Mr. Buccholz, he was asked what he believed would be a reasonable attorney's fee. A general objection to the testimony was sustained. As to this appellant claims that the reasonableness of his charge for the services in the Buccholz Case had an important and relevant bearing upon the question whether he would probably undertake other services without additional remuneration. This is based supposedly upon the theory that lawyers usually charge all that their services are reasonably worth. However, they are not to be distinguished in that respect from the members of other professions or occupations. The rule seems to be that where an express contract is asserted on one side and denied on the other, evidence of the reasonable value of the services is not admissible to affect the probability that an express contract was executed. When it is admitted, however, that an express contract was made, but there is a disagreement as to the amount agreed upon, then such evidence is deemed proper and important. One claim of the prosecuting witness was that there was a contract for a certain amount, but it was to cover two cases. The defendant, on the other hand, insisted that it was intended simply to include his services in the Buccholz Case. Do not these opposing contentions involve the consideration of what was the amount to be paid for each of these cases? And are we not thus confronted by a situation similar to the one mentioned above wherein such evidence is held to be admissible? In other words, it was the contention of appellant that it was agreed that his fee for the Buccholz Case was to be the sum of $385 or about $400, whereas the effect of the testimony of the prosecuting witness is that it was to be less than that since a portion of it was to cover the other case. We, therefore, have a case for the operation of the rule announced in Ellis v. Woodburn, 89 Cal. 129, 26 Pac. 963, and we think the evidence should have been received.

[5] Appellant claims that he was prevented from rehabilitating witness Helen Spaulding. Miss Spaulding had testified that as stenographer of appellant she had overheard the latter tell Mrs. Kleppel that his charge in her divorce case would be $500, and that she knew the detectives who had been employed. She was, as is easily to be seen, a very important witness for appellant. She was impeached by the testimony of one Mrs. F. G. Schneider to the effect that after testifying before the grand jury, Miss Spaulding had come to the Dameron Hospital and there stated that she had lied for Crane. Appellant thereupon attempted to show that Miss Spaulding had visited the hospital but once as the bearer of a check from Crane to a patient therein, that this was before the hearing before the grand jury, as would be shown by the fact that the check was cashed before the grand jury met. Though Miss Spaulding was allowed to state that her visit to the hospital had been made before the hearing of the grand jury, any testimony as to why she was sent was rejected as hearsay. It is obvious that had this important witness been allowed to answer the question, her rehabilitation in connection with what subsequently could have been shown would probably have been complete. The evidence sought was not subject to the objection of hearsay. It was not offered to prove the truth or falsity of the matters therein contained, but merely as a collateral circumstance relevant to fix the time at which the witness had visited the hospital, and its rejection was as harmful to defendant as the impeachment itself must have been.

[6] As to the instructions requested by appellant and rejected by the court, consideration need only be accorded to one, since the others were covered by instructions given. Appellant requested that the jury be instructed:

> "If you find from the evidence in this case that Mrs. Kleppel paid the defendant the $400 on account of fees, costs, and expenses in her divorce case, you must find the defendant not guilty."

The instruction very clearly contains the gist of appellant's defense. It states the theory upon which the defense was largely conducted. His contention was that he received the money for expenses and to cover his fee. The only evidence in opposition to this was the testimony of the prosecuting witness whose reputation as to truth, honesty, and integrity was bad. In fact, we may say that the case upon its merits is not entirely clear. The showing for the people was rather weak and unsatisfactory. It seems, therefore, especially important that every legal right to which he was entitled should have been accorded to appellant, and we think the jury should have been specifically instructed as requested in reference to this vital contention as to his understanding of the agreement and his appropriation of the money. The general instruction in the language of section 511 of the Penal Code ought to have been supplemented, as suggested, in order that the jury might be fully advised as to the legal bearing of appellant's claim.

We are not prepared to say that the evidence is altogether insufficient to support the verdict, but for the reasons stated, we think the judgment and order should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

BEECHAM v. BURNS, City Clerk.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑757(1)—BRIEFS—STATEMENT OF FACTS.

In a case in which a clerk's transcript and a reporter's transcript were prepared as prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, a brief not containing any part of the judgment roll, but only a statement in the language of appellant's counsel narrating facts said to have been found by the court, and containing no part of the alleged findings except certain documents, and instead of setting out a copy of the portion of the transcript containing testimony offered merely stating that certain facts were shown or that a certain witness testified to a certain fact, and not containing any copy of the record of the judgment or any reference thereto or any statement or copy showing the terms of the notice of appeal, did not comply with section 953c, requiring the parties to print in their briefs or in a supplement appended thereto such portions of the record as they desire to call to the court's attention.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1050(1)—EVIDENCE 🔑186(2)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

In an action to compel a city clerk to certify to the sufficiency of a petition for the recall of a trustee in which it appeared that the election returns for the election at which he was elected were lost and could not be found, the former city clerk testified that copies of the results in the several precincts signed by members of the election boards came into his hands; that therefrom he compiled a memorandum showing the results of the election and gave the same data to a newspaper reporter; that he compared the statement printed in the newspaper with his own written statement, and found them in agreement, and thereupon destroyed his own memorandum; that at the time of the canvass of the vote he read off to the canvassing board from the official returns of the several precincts the votes received in each precinct; that thereupon the board passed the resolution declaring the names of the persons elected; that he made a comparison between the returns as read off and the memorandum prepared by him; and that there was no difference between them. Thereupon he was permitted to refresh his memory from the newspaper clipping, and then state the number of votes received by the several candidates, without, however, giving the figures for the several precincts separately. Held, that this was substantially the best evidence that could be produced under the circumstances, and it was not prejudicial error to admit it over the objection that it was not secondary evidence, but a mere conclusion of witness as to the contents of the election returns, because it depended upon additions made by the witness.

3. WITNESSES ⟹255(5)—REFRESHING RECOLLECTION—COPY OF MEMORANDUM MADE BY WITNESS.

That the memorandum from which the witness refreshed his memory was a printed copy of the original memorandum which he made raised no legal obstacle to the reception of the testimony.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⟹159(1)—RECALL OF OFFICERS—PETITION—WITHDRAWAL OF NAMES.

St. (Ex. Sess.) 1911, p. 128, provides relative to the recall of city officers for the filing of a petition that the clerk shall examine and from the registration records ascertain whether the petition is signed by the requisite number of voters, and attach his certificate showing the result; that if he certifies the petition is insufficient it may be supplemented by the filing of additional duplicates of the original petition which shall likewise be examined; and that if the petition be still insufficient, no action shall be taken thereon, but that the petition shall remain on file as a public record. Held that, as the clerk has no authority to alter the petition or to receive extraneous evidence of its contents, or to base his certificate upon statements of the electors, but must ascertain from the registration records whether the petition filed is signed by the requisite number of voters, signers may not withdraw their names or have them withdrawn by the clerk after the petition has been filed.

Action by William E. Beecham against C. Y. Burns, City Clerk. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Lyon and Fredericks & Hanna, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Roy A. Linn and Muhleman & Crump, all of Los Angeles, and William M. Humphreys, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The record on appeal in this case consists of a typewritten "Clerk's Transcript on Appeal" and a typewritten "Reporter's Transcript on Appeal" prepared in the manner prescribed by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. Upon such a record it is required that the parties "print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court." Section 953c, Code Civ. Proc.

[1] The brief for appellant opens with the statement that this is an action to compel appellant, as city clerk of the city of Venice, to certify to the sufficiency of a certain petition for the recall of J. J. Lewis, one of the city trustees of the city of Venice. Appellant has not printed in or with his brief any part of the judgment roll, but has given us a statement in the language of his counsel narrating facts which he says were found by the court. No part of the alleged findings has been printed, except copies of three documents which, according to the brief, the court found had been filed with the board of trustees of the city by the city clerk, all relating to the proposed recall of Trustee Lewis. So also, referring to some portions of the testimony received at the trial, the brief of appellant informs us that certain facts were "shown," or that a certain witness testified so and so, without setting out a copy of that portion of the transcript containing such testimony. Therefore (although some testimony is properly set forth) it may well be doubted whether appellant has directed our attention to the record in any manner of which we are required to take notice, to an extent which would enable us to apply to the case the principles of law upon which he relies. Probably the appeal is from a judgment rendered in the action, or from some part of such judgment, although the brief does not in terms say so; neither does it contain any copy of the record of the judgment or any reference thereto or any statement or copy showing the terms of any notice of appeal.

In McKinnell v. Hansen, 167 Pac. 887, the writer of this opinion said:

> "Counsel for appellants have not printed in their brief or in any supplement appended thereto any portion of the judgment roll, nor have they printed therein a sufficient portion of the evidence to enable the court to determine the merits of the objections urged in their argument. * * * We are not left in a position where we are able to assume that the quotations in the brief are complete as to the points argued, or to say that the record does not contain the evidence necessary to sustain the findings of fact."

The judgment was affirmed and the decision was, as to the point above stated, approved by the Supreme Court on denial of petition for rehearing. Id., 167 Pac. 888.

In the same case in this court Justice James said:

> "Neither by the statute nor rule of court is a party excused from printing in his brief such portions of the 'record,' which includes both the clerk's and the reporter's transcripts, as he may desire to call to the attention of the appellate court."

While we do not doubt that a judgment herein might be based upon the foregoing grounds alone, we shall pass over these objections so far as to state briefly other reasons why the judgment should be affirmed.

It is argued that the judgment of the lower court in this action should be reversed: (1) Because the court erred in permitting the introduction of incompetent testimony for the purpose of establishing the number of votes cast at the general municipal election held in the city of Venice in April, 1914, and because there is therefore no legal evidence upon which to base a finding of the number of votes cast at that election; (2) upon the ground that the electors signing a recall petition have the right to withdraw their names from such petition after it has been filed with the clerk and at any time until action has been taken thereon.

It is admitted by counsel for appellant that it was shown at the trial that Lewis was elected city trustee at the election of April, 1914, for a term of four years; that it was shown that the election returns for that election could not be found and had not been seen since the time of the city election held in April, 1916; that it was shown that none of the tally sheets in the hands of any election officer could be produced; that the witness Charles S. Thatcher testified that he was city clerk of the city of Venice at and after the April election of 1914, and that he was present when the board of trustees canvassed the votes cast at the April election of 1914. As these are admissions against the interest of appellant, they are, of course, not a part of the record upon which he relies. But when he tells us that said Thatcher testified that the only action taken by the board of trustees was the adoption of a resolution in words and figures as set forth in the brief, and does not give us any copy of the testimony of the witness, he fails to properly present the evidence upon which he relies. If, again, we pass over this objection and assume that, as set forth in the resolution, the canvassing board merely declared the result of the election and did not make any record of the exact number of votes received by the several candidates, we will be brought to the question whether the court erred in permitting certain testimony as secondary evidence whereby to establish the facts which the court is said to have found, viz., that the entire vote cast in the city of Venice for all candidates for the office which the incumbent occupies, at the last preceding general municipal election of that city at which such officer was voted for, was 2,053 votes, and that the number of names necessary to require the calling of a recall election was 514.

[2, 3] By reading that portion of the testimony of Charles S. Thatcher which is set forth in appellant's brief, and by reading in connection therewith the much more complete evidence set forth in the brief for respondent, we find that in the election of April, 1914, there came into the hands of the witness as city clerk "copies of the results" of the votes cast in the several precincts, such copies being signed by the members of the election boards, as required by section 1261, Political Code; that from these so-called "unofficial returns" the witness compiled and made in writing a memorandum showing the results of the election; that the witness gave the same data to a reporter of a newspaper; that a statement covering the same subject-matter was printed in that newspaper on the following day; that the witness compared the printed statement with his written statement, and found that the two tabulations were in agreement; that thereupon he destroyed his own memorandum and kept the newspaper statement in the form of a clipping from the paper. The witness further testified that at the time of the canvass of the vote by the canvassing board he as city clerk read off to the board from the official returns of the several precincts the number of votes that each person received in each precinct; that thereupon the board passed the resolution declaring the names of the persons elected; that he made a comparison between the returns as read off from the official returns and the memorandum which he had prepared and found that there was no difference between them.

Upon the facts thus shown, including the fact of the loss of the official returns, the court permitted the witness to refresh his memory from the newspaper clipping and then to state to the court the number of votes received by the several candidates for the office of city trustee at said election. This is the alleged error. The point presented is not that secondary evidence of the contents of the lost election returns was not admissible; the objection urged is that the evidence received did not constitute such secondary evidence. It is true that the witness testified merely to the number of votes received by each candidate for the office of city trustee at such election in all of the precincts of the city, and did not give the figures for the several precincts separately. Thereby the testimony as given depended upon additions made by the witness, instead of the several items out of which the additions were made. The rule invoked is that the conlusion of the witness is not admissible in evidence, but that he must state the facts from which such conclusion might arise. We think that substantially the evidence was the best that could be produced under the circumstances, and at least it is clear that no prejudicial error was committed. The memorandum showing the votes by precincts was there in the hands of the witness, and the accuracy of his figures as stated in his testimony could have been tested by cross-examination. The fact that the memorandum was a printed copy of the original memorandum which the witness had made raises no legal obstacle to the reception of the testimony. In People v. Brown, 3 Cal. App. 178, 84 Pac. 670, the court, after stating that a witness may refresh his memory from a memorandum written under his direction at the time when the facts were fresh in his memory and he knew the same were correctly stated in the writing, further said that:

> "The rule is not different where the witness has a copy of the original in his hands, which he has compared, and swears that the same is an exact copy of the original memorandum."

In Commonwealth v. Ford, 130 Mass. 64, 39 Am. Rep. 426, where the witness had made a written memorandum of certain facts, which memorandum had been destroyed after it was printed in a newspaper, it was held that the witness might use the printed report for the purpose of refreshing his recollection. The court said:

> "In order to refresh the recollection of a witness, it is not important that the paper, book or memorandum should have been written or printed by the witness himself, or that it should be an original writing. It is sufficient if he saw it while the facts stated therein were fresh in his memory, and he knows that they are correctly transcribed or printed. Upon inspecting it, he can state the facts if thereby called to his recollection."

See note, in which other cases are collated, in Ann. Cas. 1913B, at page 582.

[4] The remaining question in this case is based upon the claim that certain signers of the recall petition requested the clerk to withdraw their names therefrom after the petition was filed with the clerk and before that officer had certified the result of his examination as required by the statute. The statute referred to is found in Statutes Extra Session 1911, p. 128. 1915 Ed., Deering's Gen. Laws, p. 1219. In Laam v. McLaren, 28 Cal. App. 632, 153 Pac. 985, this statute was under consideration, and it was decided that the signers of a recall petition may not withdraw their names therefrom after the petition has been certified to the board by the clerk as sufficient, notwithstanding that the attempted withdrawal preceded formal action on the petition by the board. To the same effect is the decision in Locher v. Walsh, 17 Cal. App. 727, 121 Pac. 712. In neither one of those cases, nor in any decision to which we have been referred, have the courts of this state ruled upon the question of the right of the petitioner to withdraw his name after the petition has been filed and before the clerk has certified its sufficiency. In Locher v. Walsh the statute under consideration, while not the identical statute before us in the present case, was identical therewith as to the provisions here under consideration. The court pointed out that the statute made no provision for the withdrawal of names from the petition, and observed that the statute in its provisions prescribing the clerk's duty to "examine and from the records of registration ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified voters" seems to deal with the petition filed with the clerk, and not a petition after names have been withdrawn therefrom. The statute now before us contains the same words last above quoted, and requires that the clerk attach to said petition his certificate showing the result of said examination. It is then provided that:

> "If by the clerk's certificate the petition is shown to be insufficient, it may be supplemented within ten days from the date of such certificate by the filing of additional papers, duplicates of the original petition except as to the names signed. The clerk shall, within ten days after such supplementary papers are filed, make like examination of the supplementing petition, and if his certificate shall show that all the names to such petition, including the supplemental papers, are still insufficient, no action shall be taken thereon; but the petition shall remain on file as a public record."

The clerk is not clothed with authority to alter the petition when it has been filed; he is not authorized to receive extraneous evidence of its contents, or to base his certificate upon statements made to him by electors who have signed it. His certificate must show the result of an examination whereby "from the records of registration" he shall ascertain whether or not "said petition" is signed by the requisite number of qualified voters. In our opinion, the signers of such petitions may not withdraw their names or have their names withdrawn by the clerk at any time after the petition has been filed. Applying this ruling to the facts as appellant claims that they were in this case, the original and supplemental petitions contained an aggregate number of names of qualified electors exceeding in number the required 514.

BEECHAM v. BURNS, City Clerk.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by William E. Beecham against C. Y. Burns, City Clerk. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles W. Lyon and Fredericks & Hanna, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Roy A. Linn and Muhleman & Crump, all of Los Angeles, and William M. Humphreys, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is said to be an action to compel appellant, as city clerk of the city of Venice, to certify to the sufficiency of a certain recall petition for the recall of one Carlos L. Smart, a trustee of that city. In all respects necessary to be considered for the purposes of a decision, this case is like No. 2387, Beecham v. Burns, 168 Pac. 1058, in which our decision is this day filed. Upon the authority of that decision the judgment in this action is affirmed.

FACUNDAS et al. v. CURTIS, City Clerk.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑159(1)—RECALL—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

The petition for the recall of two trustees, filed with the city clerk, consisted of five sections all fastened together. Each section consisted of three or more sheets fastened together under a separate cover. Showing the signatures and constituting the last page inside the cover of each section was an affidavit of the person who circulated the petition in due form. St. (Ex. Sess.) 1911, p. 128, provides that the signatures to the petition need not be appended to one paper, but that each such separate paper shall have attached thereto an affidavit by a qualified elector of the city or town. Held, there being no question as to the sufficiency of the number of signatures, the petition was sufficient under the statute.

Proceedings in mandamus by Walter Facundas and others to compel Fay Curtis, as City Clerk of the City of Taft, to certify the sufficiency of a petition for the recall of two trustees of the city. Peremptory writ issued.

Edson Abel, of Taft, for petitioners. Emmons & Johnstone, of Bakersville, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel the defendant as city clerk of the city of Taft to certify the sufficiency of a petition for the recall of two trustees of that city.

The only point urged on behalf of the respondent relates to the form of the recall petition. He claims that the petition does not comply with that portion of the statute which reads as follows:

"The signatures to the petition need not all be appended to one paper. * * * Each such separate paper shall have attached thereto an affidavit made by a qualified elector of the city or town, * * * and sworn to before an officer competent to administer oaths, stating that the affiant circulated that particular paper and saw written the signatures appended thereto; and that according to the best information and belief of the affiant, each is the genuine signature of the person whose name purports to be thereunto subscribed, and of a qualified elector of the city or town. * * *" Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 128; 1915 Ed. Deering's Gen. Laws, p. 1219.

The petition as filed consists of five sections, all fastened together. Each of those sections consists of three or more sheets fastened together under a separate cover. Each section consists of a copy of the petition, followed by the signatures. Following the signatures and constituting the last page inside the cover of that section is an affidavit of the person who circulated the same, in which affiant says:

"That he is a qualified elector of the city of Taft, county of Kern, state of California; that he personally circulated the within and foregoing petition and saw written the signatures appended thereto; that according to his best information and belief, each is the genuine signature of the person whose name purports to be thereunto subscribed, and of a qualified elector of the city of Taft, county of Kern, state of California."

It is our opinion that the petition as thus prepared and filed sufficiently complies with the foregoing provisions of the statute. This being so, and since it is not denied that the number of signatures is actually sufficient to comply with the requirements of the law, as alleged by the plaintiffs herein, we are satisfied that the peremptory writ should issue; and it is so ordered.

EISENRING v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY, et al. (Civ. 2402.)

DIVORCE ⚷221 — AWARD OF ALIMONY TO HUSBAND—STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 137, providing that when an action for divorce is pending, the court, in its discretion, may require the husband to pay alimony to enable the wife to support herself and her children or to prosecute or defend the action, in a husband's action for divorce, the court had no authority to order the wife to pay the husband suit money and alimony pendente lite, the court's power being restricted in its exercise to the wife, while the law contemplates that the husband, except in the cases provided in section 176, shall support himself from his property or by his labor.

Petition for writ of prohibition by Sarah Eisenring against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and W. H. Thomas, Judge presiding. Alternative writ made permanent.

Alfred H. McAdoo and Duke Stone, both of Los Angeles, and David E. Bergman, for petitioner. Griffith Jones, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Prohibition. In an action for divorce brought by Charles Eisenring against his wife, petitioner herein, the court, upon application therefor by the husband, made an order requiring the wife, at a time specified therein, to pay the husband suit money and alimony pendente lite. She refused to comply with the order; whereupon she was cited to appear and show cause why she should not be adjudged guilty of contempt.

The contention of petitioner is that this order is void, and hence the court had no jurisdiction to proceed against her as for contempt for failure to comply therewith. We are in full accord with this contention.

Concededly authority to make such order finds no support at common law; hence, if authority therefor exists, it must be by virtue of some statutory provision. Section 137, Civil Code, provides that:

"When an action for divorce is pending, the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself and her children, or to prosecute or defend the action."

Clearly the power of the court under this provision is restricted in the exercise thereof to the wife, and no similar provision is made in favor of the husband. To our minds, this section measures the power of the court in the matter of allowing suit money and alimony pendente lite, and, as said in Hagert v. Templeton, 18 N. D. 525, 123 N. W. 283, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 234 "was intended to be exclusive and to embrace the entire subject-matter of the allowance of alimony pendente lite." In Groth v. Groth, 69 Ill. App. 68, it is said:

"If alimony from a wife to a husband is a proper thing upon circumstances, legislation is necessary to authorize it. * * * The statute gives her—not him—alimony. To give it to him is not to administer existing, but to make new, law."

To like effect is Greene v. Greene, 49 Neb. 546, 68 N. W. 947, 34 L. R. A. 110, 59 Am. St. Rep. 560; Glynn v. Glynn, 8 N. D. 233, 77 N. W. 594; Brenger v. Brenger, 142 Wis. 26, 125 N. W. 109, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 387, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1050, 19 Ann. Cas. 1136; Hoagland v. Hoagland, 19 Utah, 103, 57 Pac. 20.

The law contemplates that the husband, save and except in the cases specified in section 176, Civil Code, shall support himself out of his property or by his labor. The case of Livingston v. Superior Court, 117 Cal. 633, 49 Pac. 836, 38 L. R. A. 175, cited by respondent, was an action brought under this section to compel the wife to support the husband out of her separate property, and upon a trial thereof and the facts being established that he had no separate property, and, in the absence of community property, being unable through infirmity to support himself, as provided in said section, the court made its order requiring the wife to pay him a specified sum monthly. For such action express statutory authority exists; but neither section 176, nor what is said in the Livingston Case, supports respondent's contention. The point here made was urged in the case of Hagert v. Templeton, supra, where the court, having before it a similar question and construing like statutory provisions, held that no authority, statutory or otherwise, existed for the making of an order requiring the wife to pay suit money and alimony to the husband pendente lite.

The alternative writ heretofore issued is made permanent.

DUNHAM v. McDONALD. (Civ. 1827.)

1. Payment ⇨85(1)—"Mistake"—Recovery.

Under Civ. Code, § 1577, defining "mistake" to exist where caused by unconscious ignorance or forgetfulness of a fact past or present, material to the contract, or belief in the present existence of a thing material to the contract which does not exist, or in the past existence of such a thing which has not existed, a party may recover back money paid through error regardless of his own carelessness if the opposite party has not been caused to suffer damage thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mistake.]

2. Money Received ⇨11—Action—Demand as Prerequisite.

In an ordinary action for money had and received by one party for the use of another, demand is unnecessary before suit is brought, which rule applies generally in all cases where by reason of a contract, express or implied, the obligation of the debtor is fully liquidated, and the duty rests upon him at all times to pay.

3. Payment ⇨89(2)—Mistake—Overpayment—Demand.

Where the cross-complaining defendant was to account to plaintiff according to the several amounts which he was entitled to offset for disbursements, and through mistake did not include in his calculations all of the items he was entitled to charge against plaintiff, plaintiff not having any better knowledge of the circumstances and facts than defendant, a demand for payment was a prerequisite to filing of the cross-complaint for moneys paid over by him on account of the mistake.

4. Payment ⇨89(4)—Recovery of Money Paid by Mistake—Showing of Existing Debt—Pleadings.

It was necessary for defendant to show by appropriate allegation in his cross-complaint for money paid over by mistake to plaintiff that it had not been repaid; i. e., that there was an existing debt.

5. Pleading ⇨147—Allegations of Cross-Complaint Aided by Main Pleadings.

Allegations of the cross-complaint are not to be helped out by any allegations or admissions contained in the main pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by F. H. Dunham against Wm. Z. McDonald. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed.

Snyder & Woods and W. C. Snyder, all of Santa Paula, for appellant. Geo. L. Keefer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal from an affirmative judgment entered in favor of defendant. Plaintiff brought this action to recover moneys which he alleged remained in the hands of defendant and to which plaintiff was entitled. On the 18th day of August, 1910, pursuant to negotiations theretofore had, defendant addressed a letter to the plaintiff at Santa Paula, Cal., in the following terms:

"I hereby confirm my verbal agreement with you as follows: In case I accept the lease on certain ground owned by G. W. Faulkner and contracted for in that certain lease and agreement dated August 13, 1910, I have agreed with you: First. Out of any profits coming to me, either in land, cash, royalty, or otherwise, after I have settled with Consulting Geologist H. R. Johnson, whose portion of all such is to be one-eighth interest. Second. And after I have deducted the actual expenses incurred by reason of the geological examination of the leased lands and the exploitation of said leased lands by development, sale or otherwise, then from the interest then remaining to me in such lands, cash, or royalty, or otherwise, I am to give you the equivalent of one-fourth of all such remaining interest so accruing to me, either in land, cash, royalty or otherwise, that may be received therefrom by me, which is to be in full payment to you for all your services rendered in aiding me to procure said lease."

Written acceptance of this proposition was made by the plaintiff. Thereafter defendant disposed of his rights in the land and lease. Plaintiff in his complaint alleged that defendant received the sum of $13,500 as consideration for his rights in the land, but that defendant by communications and statements led the plaintiff to believe that defendant only received the sum of $10,000, that settlement was made upon the basis of the $10,000 consideration, and that after October 22, 1912, plaintiff for the first time learned that defendant had received more than $10,000 for his interest in the land and lease. The prayer of the complaint was for judgment for the sum of $765.62. Defendant in his answer took no issue upon the allegation in plaintiff's complaint that he had led plaintiff to believe in the manner alleged that the total consideration for the sale of his interest in the land was the sum of $10,000. He proceeded, however, after admitting that the sum of $13,500 was received, to allege that that sum was the gross amount, and that the defendant had expended such a sum of money on account of the disbursements mentioned in the written contract as to result in his having overpaid the plaintiff. Defendant filed a cross-complaint in which he sought to recover the sum of $749.29 on account of such alleged overpayment. It is upon the prayer of this cross-complaint that recovery was allowed to the defendant by the court. A second amended cross-complaint was filed during the course of the trial. Oral demurrer was made thereto that the alleged cross-complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. No objection was made to the form of the demurrer, which was promptly overruled by the trial judge, and it was stipulated that the allegations of the cross-complaint might be deemed to be denied. The trial then proceeded. It is the contention of appellant first that the cross-complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that the court erred in overruling the demurrer. It is argued first that there was no sufficient statement of facts entitling the defendant to maintain any claim on the account by reason of any alleged mistake. Particularly is it urged that the facts as alleged constituting the mistake are not such as to afford ground for a cause of action. In that part of the amended cross-complaint most material to this consideration is the following:

> "That on or about August 4, 1911, and January 26, 1912, when defendant paid respectively $437.50 and $1,750 to plaintiff, and which sums make up the $2,187.50 received by plaintiff, the expenses above mentioned had been incurred, and paid by plaintiff, and through the First National Bank of Ventura, Cal., and through the Ventura Development Company of Ventura, and defendant thought he had all the items of said expense well in mind, but through inadvertence and unconscious forgetfulness of some of said items of expense he made a clerical error in computation, and overpaid plaintiff the sum of $749.29; and defendant alleges that he did not realize his said mistake in overpaying plaintiff until plaintiff commenced this action, and then defendant for the first time got together vouchers from said development company and said bank for the actual and necessary expenses connected with the said transaction, which vouchers were the means of proving to defendant that he made the said mistake. Wherefore defendant prays for judgment against plaintiff for the sum of $749.29 and for defendant's costs in this action."

[1] It does reasonably appear from the allegation quoted that all of the matters which the defendant alleged he had overlooked were within his easy reach; in other words, that the means of knowledge was at hand at all times. However, by a statute of this state (section 1577, Civ. Code) mistake is defined to exist where it is caused by:

> "(1) An unconscious ignorance or forgetfulness of a fact past or present, material to the contract; or (2) belief in the present existence of a thing material to the contract, which does not exist, or in the past existence of such a thing, which has not existed."

It appears to be the settled law that a party may recover back money paid through error, regardless of his own carelessness, with the condition only that the opposite party has not been caused to suffer damage thereby. In the case of National Bank of California v. Miner, 167 Cal. 532, 140 Pac. 27, quoting from a New York decision, our Supreme Court declares:

> "'It is now settled, both in England and in this state, that money paid under a mistake of fact may be recovered back, however negligent the party paying may have been in making the mistake, unless the payment has caused such a change in the position of the other party that it would be unjust to require him to refund.'"

Under such a state of the law the cross-complaint of the defendant, while showing negligence on his part, nevertheless, no affirmative allegations appearing in the answer to bring the case within the exception noted, did contain facts, so far as the alleged mistake was concerned, to entitle defendant to recover. Also included within the general grounds of demurrer were the objections that the amended cross-complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action: (1) Because it was not alleged that demand for the payment of the money had been made of the cross-defendant prior to the filing of the cross-complaint; (2) it was not alleged that the money had not been paid.

[2] In the ordinary action for money had and received by one party for the use of another, demand is unnecessary to be made before suit is brought. Quimby v. Lyon, 63 Cal. 394. This rule applies generally in all cases where by reason of a contract, express or implied, the obligation of the debtor is fully liquidated and the duty rests upon him at all times to pay. See Pierce v. Whiting, 63 Cal. 538. We apprehend that this duty to pay does not arise until the debtor has knowledge, or should have knowledge by reason of the circumstances, that he actually owes the claimant money. If he does not know and under the circumstances is excused from inquiring to ascertain the fact, then it would seem that he should be entitled to have demand made upon him and the opportunity to settle before suit. This case, under the allegations of the amended cross-complaint, is of that complexion.

referred to the same contract which we have quoted hereinbefore, from which it appears that he was to make his accounting to the plaintiff according to the several amounts which he was entitled to offset, and which disbursements he himself was to make. He alleges that through mistake he did not include in his calculation all of the items which he is entitled to charge against the plaintiff. He does not allege that the cross-defendant had any better knowledge of the circumstances and facts than he had. Under such circumstances we think that a demand for payment was a prerequisite to the filing of the cross-complaint.

[4] It seems too clear for argument that it was necessary also to show by appropriate allegation in the cross-complaint that the money claimed by the defendant of the plaintiff had not been paid—in other words, that there was an existing debt.

[5] Allegations of the cross-complaint are not to be helped out by any allegations or admissions contained in the main pleadings. Coulthurst v. Coulthurst, 58 Cal. 239; Harrison v. McCormick, 69 Cal. 616, 11 Pac. 456. For the reasons last stated, we think that the demurrer to the amended cross-complaint should have been sustained.

Other objections made by the appellant require an examination of the evidence to determine their validity, insufficiency of the proof being assigned. As the action of necessity must be retried, and different evidence may be offered at that time, we do not think it profitable to enter upon an examination of that portion of the record.

CARTER v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⟿362—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION.

An employer is not liable under St. 1913, p. 279, to pay workmen's compensation if the injury did not occur in the usual course of his business prior to amendment of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831).

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⟿362—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION.

A purchaser of grain on the cars who, owing to a shortage of cars, casually employed the applicant to help load grain left by the sellers on the platform, was not liable to pay compensation; the work not being in the usual course of his business.

Certiorari to State Industrial Accident Commission.

Application by Roy E. Ladd for workmen's compensation, opposed by C. T. Carter, employer. To review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of the applicant, the employer brings certiorari. Award annulled.

Daly Robnett, of Alturas, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This case comes up on certiorari to review the findings and award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of Roy E. Ladd against C. T. Carter. From the return to the writ it appears that Carter was engaged in the business of buying and shipping grain; that he had purchased about 60 carloads of wheat in Modoc county f. o. b. the cars at the nearest railroad station. After the sellers (farmers) had loaded part of the grain, a shortage of cars occurred, necessitating the placing of several loads upon the railroad platform awaiting the arrival of the cars. When the required cars arrived, the farmers, whose duty it was to load the grain, were at their homes, some 12 miles from the station, and in order to avoid the delay incident to sending for them, Carter employed Ladd for four days to load the grain that was on the platform. It was while loading this that Ladd slipped and broke his kneecap, for which injury the commission awarded him indemnity against Carter. As a basis for his protest Carter claims that Ladd was not an "employé" within the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, since his employment was both casual, and not in the usual course of the business or occupation of Carter. Respondents admit that Ladd was a "casual" employé, but insist that "loading grain" was a part of the usual course of the business of Carter. The sole question for determination is, then, whether upon the facts as disclosed by the record "loading grain" was included within the usual course of Carter's business, which was buying and shipping grain.

[1, 2] Respondents claim that, as grain cannot be bought and shipped without loading it, loading is an incident of shipping. Though this is quite true, it does not necessarily follow that loading grain was within the usual course of business of Ladd's employer. There is no evidence in the record that such was the case. It does appear, however, that of the 60 carloads more than 59½ were loaded by the sellers, and both buyers and sellers testified that the general custom in that community was for the sellers to do all loading, and that the buyer had nothing whatever to do with it. The

⟿For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes occasion calling for the employment of the applicant was accidental and unforeseen, and, as appears from the custom, wholly excluded from Carter's usual course of business. The argument of respondents might well be carried a step further to the effect that the hauling of the grain was an incident to the shipping, since only by that means could the grain be brought to the station. Yet, had Carter found it necessary in an emergency to cart one or two loads from the ranches some 12 miles distant, we do not believe that it could be correctly said under the facts of this case that carting grain was a part of his usual course of business. No more, then, was the loading.

The decided cases in this state interpreting said provisions of the statute excluding from its operation one who is a casual employé and whose employment is not in the usual course of the business of the employer, when carefully considered, seem to uphold petitioner's contention herein. They involve different facts, but the principles therein stated are controlling here. It is sufficient to refer to Maryland Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 748, 158 Pac. 1031; London, etc., Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 173 Cal. 642, 161 Pac. 2; La Grande Laundry Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 777, 161 Pac. 988. We may repeat that, while the loading of the grain was a necessary incident to the shipping, and that without said loading the shipping and sale could not be had, yet it is perfectly plain that the loading was not within the usual business of the employer. The employment must come within the normal operations of the usual and ordinary business of the employer in order to make him liable. This usual and ordinary business here did not involve the loading of the grain, but embraced simply the purchase and transportation after the grain was loaded upon the cars.

In other words, the applicant was casually employed to do work which was not ordinarily and usually done by or under the direction of the employer in the business in which he was engaged, and if we are to be guided by the language of said act in force at the time of the accident, we must reach the conclusion that the applicant was not entitled to recover. The law, it may be said, was amended by the Statutes of 1917 (page 831), so that no longer is the employment required to be within the usual course of the business of the employer, and if such had been the law when this unfortunate occurrence happened there could be no doubt of the legality of the award, but, as the law existed at that time, we see no escape from the conclusion that the award should be annulled, and so it is ordered.

YOLO WATER & POWER CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 1707.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑417(7)—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION PROCEEDINGS—REVIEW OF FINDINGS.

An award of the Industrial Accident Commission must be sustained if there is any evidence to support its finding that the injured person was an employé of the party from whom compensation is sought.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑361—COMPENSATION FOR INJURIES—RELATION OF PARTIES.

An employer's foreman had full authority to hire whatever help he needed, and did hire men admitted to be employés of his employer, and also hired men and teams for a lump sum, and on at least one occasion hired a team separately. He also furnished his own team on some occasions, and the injured person at the time of his injury was driving the foreman's team. The foreman directed the drivers to exactly the same extent as other employés, and intended to engage the injured person as an employé of his employer, and the injured person, who had worked for the employer on numerous occasions, intended to work as usual as its employé. The foreman made no profit on the injured person's services as driver, the injured person being paid the usual wages for driving, and the foreman retaining the amount usually paid for a team. Held, that the injured person was an employé of the general employer, and not an employé of the foreman; the contention that, when the foreman obtained a team and man together, he stood in the position of contractor, being without merit.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) by Pietro Supparto to obtain compensation for personal injuries, opposed by the Yolo Water & Power Company, alleged employer. Compensation was awarded, and the employer files a petition for writ of review against the Industrial Accident Commission, Pietro Supparto, and W. C. Wallace. Award affirmed.

Theodore A. Bell, of San Francisco, and Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, Warren H. Pillsbury, of Oakland, and A. C. Murray, of Woodland, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. [1] This case comes up on certiorari to review the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission to the effect that Pietro Supparto, at the time of his injury, was an employé of the petitioner. Petitioner claims that the evidence shows solely that Supparto was an employé of Wallace, and therefore the commission acted beyond its jurisdiction in awarding Supparto compensation against petitioner. If there be any evidence to support the finding of the commission, its award must be sustained. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721.

[2] W. C. Wallace was petitioner's foreman, employed at a wage of $5 a day. He had full authority to hire whomever he pleased to assist him in the company's work. It is admitted that men so employed were employés of the company, and were so recorded on the company's books, receiving $2.25 per day. But when a team and a man were hired a lump sum of $4.50 was paid, and the man's labor was not segregated upon the company's books, but it appears that the man always received $2.25, and $2.25 went for the team.

Very often Wallace furnished his own team, among others used by the company, and sometimes employed one of the men on his own ranch to drive it. Wallace directed the performance of the work as foreman, and, as far as indicated by the record, directed drivers to exactly the same extent as he did the undoubted employés working under him for petitioner. Supparto had always dealt with Wallace as foreman, had worked for petitioner under him innumerable times as a laborer, and had always been paid by check by petitioner directly, with the exception that upon one occasion a few days before his accident he had worked as a driver, for which he had not been paid at the time of his injury. On the day of the accident Supparto had applied as usual to Wallace for work, and Wallace had told him he could use him on the Central canal. Thereupon Wallace with Supparto drove to the canal, and proceeded to unload hay, when the injury occurred. Under these circumstances petitioner claims that the facts come squarely within the case of Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, and that Supparto was an employé of Wallace, with whom the corporation contracted, so it is claimed, to furnish teams. The position of petitioner is that, when Wallace employed a man merely, he was an employé, that, when a team was furnished separately (as Wallace testified was done on at least one occasion), the driver was an employé, but when Wallace obtained a team and man together, then he stood in the position of a contractor to furnish teams for their work, though he still continued also in the capacity of foreman. The contention of petitioner seems to us very technical and unsubstantial.

There is abundant evidence to support the award, and the Western Indemnity Case is clearly distinguishable. Supparto testifies that he intended to work as usual as an employé of the company, and not of Wallace, on the day of his injury, and Wallace in his verified answer and testimony declares that he intended to engage Supparto as an employé of the company. Wallace made no profit on Supparto's services as driver. Supparto was paid $2.25 per day for driving, which was petitioner's regular rate of pay for workmen, and Wallace retained $2.25 a day for his team.

In the Western Indemnity Co. Case it clearly appears that Stevens was engaged in a permanent business of "teaming and grading," and contracted to furnish teams and drivers for the work. In the present case Wallace was not by trade a contracting teamster, and the evidence is too vague and indefinite to warrant a finding that Wallace had contracted to furnish teams. The evidence as a whole indicates rather that Wallace regarded himself as foreman, and in that capacity employed men and teams. Wallace could not have sued petitioner for breach of contract for failing to accept teams tendered by him, nor could petitioner have sued Wallace for failure to furnish teams, because of this indefiniteness. Stevens did not act as foreman for Tittle, hiring and discharging his men, as did Wallace here, but worked under the foreman of the general contractor. Had Stevens been discharged, his teams must necessarily have been ruled off the work with him. But for aught that appears here Wallace could have been discharged, and yet the teams secured by him retained. There are other points upon which the cases can be distinguished, but the above are sufficient to deprive the case cited of the force claimed for it by petitioner.

To recapitulate: The evidence shows that Wallace was authorized to employ laborers for petitioner, and, acting under that authority and as the agent for the corporation, he did employ the applicant to do work for said petitioner, and while so engaged as such employé in the very work for which he was employed, said applicant was injured. Not only would we be entirely unwarranted in annulling the award, but it should be said that under the evidence the commission could not have reached a different conclusion.

McCULLEY et al. v. FEE et al. (Civ. 1702.)

RECEIVERS ⚿212 — PURCHASES — LIABILITY OF CREDITORS—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

Merely because some of the creditors, on the advice of whose attorney a receiver was appointed, became sureties on his bond, they are not liable, on the theory of his being their agent, for purchases made by him; they in his conduct as receiver having had nothing to do, and in no way having constituted him their agent in the purchase.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Action by R. E. McCulley and another against C. H. Fee and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

B. B. Robinson, of Cedarville, and C. S. Baldwin, of Alturas, for appellants. Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiffs, as copartners, brought the action against defendants to recover for the value of certain wagons alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant W. R. Wilkinson, who, it is alleged, was at the time acting in the capacity of receiver of Fandango Lumber Company, a corporation. The remaining defendants are alleged to have been creditors of the said corporation, and that defendant Wilkinson was appointed as said receiver at their suggestion, and that, in the conduct of the business of the said corporation by said Wilkinson under said appointment as receiver, he was acting as their agent. It is alleged, also, in the complaint, that Wilkinson has departed from the state and still continues to absent himself from the state. He was not served with summons, as we understand, and the theory of the complaint was, and the claim now made is, that the defendants other than Wilkinson are liable upon the theory that Wilkinson was their agent. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the defendants had judgment for their costs, from which plaintiffs appeal.

It appears that one E. G. Peterson commenced an action in the superior court of Modoc county against the said Fandango Lumber Company, a corporation, the Sunset Lake Lumber Company, a corporation, and W. R. Wilkinson, trustee, as defendants, to recover judgment for claims held by sundry creditors of said Fandango Lumber Company previously assigned to plaintiff in the action. Pending the action and upon the complaint therein and the affidavit of the plaintiff, said W. R. Wilkinson was appointed receiver of the assets and property of the defendants. It appeared, also, that previous to the appointment of the receiver the said Wilkinson had been made trustee by a trust deed made by the directors of the Fandango Lumber Company conveying its property in trust to Wilkinson for the benefit of the creditors of said corporation. This trust deed is not in the record. The order of appointment of Wilkinson as receiver recited that he was appointed "with the usual powers of receivers in such cases upon his filing a bond with the clerk of this court and executed to the state of California in the penal sum of $10,000 conditioned for the faithful performance and discharge of his duties in the usual form." Wilkinson executed a bond as required by the court as principal, and among the sureties on his bond were the defendants Fee, Lowell, Stephens, and Peterson.

The court found:

> "That in the transactions between the said W. R. Wilkinson with the plaintiffs in this case as set forth in their complaint filed herein, including the trading of lumber belonging to the said Fandango Lumber Company for wagons, the said W. R. Wilkinson had no order or authority from the court for so doing, nor was he acting under any authority or direction of these defendants now in court or any of them, or at their instance or upon their behalf, nor was he in doing any of said acts acting as receiver as aforesaid, but was acting wholly and entirely in his individual capacity and not otherwise."

Upon the claim made by plaintiffs that Wilkinson was acting in the capacity of agent for defendants, and hence that the latter are liable as principals, the court made the following finding:

> "That the said W. R. Wilkinson was not, when acting as receiver as aforesaid, in any way or manner the agent of these defendants now in court or of any of them, and was not their agent, nor was he acting under any authority or direction from them or any of them in the purchase of the said wagons from plaintiffs as set forth in the said complaint, and had no authority to bind, nor did he bind, these said defendants in any way as agent for them, or otherwise in the purchase of said wagons or any of them."

As to the averments in the complaint that Wilkinson, as receiver, made representations to the plaintiffs that in the purchase of said wagons he was acting as such receiver and was making the purchases for the use and benefit of said Fandango Lumber Company and defendants as creditors thereof, the court finds as follows:

> "That any representations that were made by the said W. R. Wilkinson at the time of the purchase of the wagons from plaintiffs as set forth in the complaint were made by him without any authority from these said defendants or any of them, and without their knowledge, and that no part or portion of said wagons, or any profit in any way that may have been derived therefrom by the said W. R. Wilkinson, was ever received or had by the said defendants now in court or any of them."

Appellants state in their brief that:

> "Respondents in this case are not sued because they were bondsmen of Wilkinson, neither are they sued for damages for malicious abuse of process, or malicious prosecution. The case was based and tried on the theory of agency, and, according to the view of appellants, the facts fit that theory of the law."

Some question is raised as to the validity of Wilkinson's appointment as receiver, appellants claiming that it was void. Whatever view may be taken of this question, it is clear from the evidence that he was acting in that capacity apparently in good faith, and whatever he did was done under the claim of being receiver in the action. While appellants do not claim that the respondents other than Wilkinson were liable on their bond, they do claim, however, that because of the fact that they became sureties for Wilkinson, and that he was acting for the benefit of the creditors of said Fandango Lumber Company, Wilkinson must be held to have acted for them and as their agent.

The finding of the court that Wilkinson made the purchases without any authority from the said respondents, or any of them, and without their knowledge, and that they received no benefit from said purchases. is fully supported by the evidence.

So far as we can discover from the record, Wilkinson was appointed receiver upon the advice of the attorney for all the creditors, of whom respondents are but a part and that these respondents became sureties for Wilkinson in good faith, believing that the appointment of a receiver was for the benefit and advantage of all the creditors; but, in the conduct of Wilkinson as receiver, these respondents had nothing to do and in no way, so far as the evidence discloses, constituted Wilkinson as their agent in the purchase of the wagons sold to him by plaintiffs. We are unable to perceive any ground upon which the said respondents can be held liable in this action.

We are of the opinion that the findings are supported by the evidence and that they are ample to support the judgment.

Judgment is therefore affirmed.

ALLEN v. CHATFIELD. (Civ. 2218.)

1. PARTIES 🔑7(2)—"TRUSTEES OF EXPRESS TRUSTS"—CONTRACTS FOR BENEFIT OF ANOTHER.

One taking a contract to purchase land in his name for the benefit of another became a trustee of an express trust, and could sue thereon in his own name alone, under Code Civ. Proc. § 369, providing that certain trustees could sue without joining the beneficiary.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Trustee of Express Trust.]

2. ASSIGNMENTS 🔑117—ASSIGNMENTS OF INTEREST AS SECURITY—WHO MAY SUE.

One assigning a contract to purchase land for the purpose of raising money to pay on such contract retains the title to the contract, and may sue thereon in his own name in view of Civ. Code, § 2924, providing that a transfer of interest in land as security is to be deemed a mortgage, and section 2888, providing that, notwithstanding an agreement to the contrary, a contract for a lien transfers no title.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Edward O. Allen against Thomas F. Chatfield. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Theodore J. Savage, of San Francisco, for appellant. Henry Eickhoff, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. The object of this action was to recover $5,000 paid by the plaintiff to the defendant on account of the purchase of certain real property according to the terms of a written contract.

The facts of the case and the controversy arising out of the transaction, with the exception of the points raised upon this appeal, were fully presented to the Supreme Court in a former appeal taken herein and determined by that court in a very comprehensive opinion written by Mr. Justice Shaw. Allen v. Chatfield, 172 Cal. 60, 156 Pac. 47. A second trial being had, the defendant for the first time raised the point that plaintiff was not the real party in interest, and therefore not entitled to recover. Upon this issue the trial court, upon the evidence introduced, found against the contention of the defendant, and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of his demand, from which judgment defendant prosecutes this appeal.

It appears from the evidence without conflict that plaintiff took the contract here involved in his own name, but for the benefit of another person; and it is the defendant's contention that such other person is the real party in interest, and the one entitled to sue upon the contract, and not the plaintiff.

[1] Having taken the contract in his name for the benefit of another, plaintiff became a trustee of an express trust, and was therefore authorized to sue in his name alone. The Code of Civil Procedure (section 369) provides:

> "An executor or administrator, or trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. A person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another, is a trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section."

The reason for the exception established by this section of the Code of Civil Procedure readily reaches also the case of an agent contracting in his own name for an undisclosed principal or group of principals.

> "The defendant contracted directly with plaintiff as a principal, and in such a case the law allows the agent treated as a principal to sue in his own name on the contract, whether the fact of agency was or was not known to the other contracting party. 1 Chit. Pl. 8; Pom. Code Rem. §§ 141, 177; Mechem, Ag. § 755; Phillips v. Henshaw, 5 Cal. 509; Du Bois v. Perkins, 21 Or. 189, 27 Pac. 1044." Tustin Fruit Ass'n v. Earl Fruit Co., 6 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 37, 53 Pac. 693.

> "In Code pleading since the year 1848 the trustee of an express trust has stood in all the Codes as one of the few exceptions to the rule that a civil action must be brought in the name of the real party in interest." 30 Cyc. 85.

See, also, Martin v. Mask, 158 N. C. 436, 74 S. E. 343, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 641, and notes.

> "It [the exception] is intended manifestly to embrace, not only formal trusts declared by deed inter partes, but all cases in which a person, acting in behalf of a third party, enters into a written, express contract with another, either in his individual name, without description, or in his own name expressly in trust for or on behalf of or for the benefit of another, by whatever form of expression such trust may be declared. It includes, not only a person with whom, but one in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another." Considerant v. Brisbane, 22 N. Y. 389.

Section 369 of the Civil Code of Procedure of California corresponds with legislation to the same effect found in other states. Under such provisions it has been held that the person in whose name the contract was made might sue to enforce his causes of action from it arising because, while he is not technically what would at common law have been called "a trustee of an express trust," yet the statute referred to expressly provides that this term shall include "a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another." Cremer v. Wimmer et al., 40 Minn. 511, 42 N. W. 467.

> "It is further argued for the appellant that plaintiff is not the real party in interest, and no facts are stated in the complaint showing him to be the trustee of an express trust, and therefore his action cannot be maintained. We think the complaint sufficient, and the action properly brought. A trustee of an express trust is a person with whom, or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another, and he is authorized to sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. Code Civ. Proc. sec. 369." Walker v. McCusker, 71 Cal. 594, 598, 12 Pac. 723, 725.

The real beneficiary of the contract might in due time and in his own name have proceeded to secure its benefits, but the rights of the trustee in this respect remained unaffected. Being the trustee of an express trust, he could also, by virtue of the provisions of section 369 of the Code of Civil Procedure, have maintained a like suit. Horseshoe Pier, etc., v. Sibley, 157 Cal. 442, 108 Pac. 308.

> "As the plaintiff held the legal title, it did not concern the defendant, whether he held it in trust for Mrs. Townsend or not. So far as concerned the defendant, he was the real party in interest, and might sue in his own name. Walker v. McCusker, 71 Cal. 594 [12 Pac. 723]." Anson v. Townsend, 73 Cal. 415, 15 Pac. 49.

[2] It is true, as claimed by defendant, that prior to the commencement of this action plaintiff had assigned this contract to one E. P. Vandercook; but it also appears that the assignment was made for the purpose of securing repayment to Vandercook of the sum of $1,000 advanced by him to be used, and which was used, in making a payment to defendant on account of said contract. The transaction then, while it conferred upon Vandercook a lien, did not vest in him the absolute ownership of the contract, but the plaintiff retained sufficient interest therein to authorize him to sue upon it.

> "Every transfer of an interest in property other than in trust, made only as a security for the performance of another act, is to be deemed a mortgage, except when in the case of personal property it is accompanied by actual change of possession, in which case it is to be deemed a pledge." Civ. Code, § 2924.

It was competent for the plaintiff to show that the so-called assignment was intended to be only a pledge to secure payment of the $1,000 advanced by Mr. Vandercook.

> "The fact that a transfer was made subject to a defeasance on a condition, may, for the purpose of showing such transfer to be a mortgage, be proved (except as against a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer for value and without notice), though the fact does not appear by the terms of the instrument." Civ. Code, § 2925.

> "Notwithstanding an agreement to the contrary, a lien or a contract for a lien, transfers no title to the property subject to the lien." Civ. Code, § 2888.

Construing this section, it was held that under the provisions of the Civil Code even a mortgagor giving a chattel mortgage is not thereby divested of his title to the property, but still remains its owner, while the mortgagee has only a lien thereon, citing Civil Code, § 2888; Bank of Ukiah v. Moore, 106 Cal. 673, 39 Pac. 1071; Shoobert v. De Malta, 112 Cal. 218, 219, 44 Pac. 487, 53 Am. St. Rep. 207.

ANDERSON v. WILSTRUP. (Civ. 2119.)

BROKERS 🔑43(3)—EMPLOYMENT TO SELL LAND—WRITING—DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

An agreement authorizing or employing a broker to sell real estate, required by Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, to be in writing, sufficiently describes the property, the state, county, street, and road of location being given, together with the acreage and a specific description of the character of the improvements thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by A. H. Anderson against H. Wilstrup. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with direction.

James M. Thomas, of San Francisco, for appellant. Thos. P. Boyd, of San Rafael, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. By this action plaintiff sought to recover the sum of $312.50 as a commission alleged to have become due from defendant upon a broker's written contract for the sale of land.

The only point involved in the case is whether or not the authorization of sale describes the property sufficiently to satisfy the statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6). It was conceded at the trial that, if such description be sufficient, plaintiff was entitled to a judgment.

The trial court found in favor of the defendant, and this appeal is from the judgment thereupon entered.

The portion of the contract pertinent to the question involved is as follows:

> "For and in consideration of the services to be performed by A. H. Anderson I hereby employ him as my sole and exclusive agent to sell for me that certain real property situate in the county of Marin, state of California, and described as follows, to wit: 68½ acres on Olive avenue or Black Point road, barn, chicken house 26x40, Brooder house, 14x30, windmill, well and spring, house of five rooms, running water, 14 acres marsh land."

We are of the opinion that this description contains all of the particulars necessary to identify the premises to be sold, and substantially meets the requirements of the statute. The office of a description is not solely to identify the land, but also to furnish a means of identification. Accordingly, it has been held that a contract to employ a broker to sell real estate will not be declared void merely because of a defect, uncertainty, or ambiguity in the description of the property, but that such defect may be cured, though not created, by such evidence. Proulx v. Sacramento Valley Land Co., 19 Cal. App. 529, 126 Pac. 509. It is only where the question remains a matter of conjecture what property is intended that instruments affecting land will be held void for uncertainty. While it is usual in the case of country lands to describe them with reference to townships, sections, courses, surveys, monuments, and, also by reference to land of adjoining owners, these modes are not exclusive. It often happens that contracts of this character are entered into hastily and under such circumstances as to make it impractical to obtain this specific description for inclusion in the contract. To reject the description here involved would be to declare that only the usual method here indicated might be followed. Courts hold that contracts of this character must specifically or with sufficient certainty describe and identify the land. This, we think, has been done in the present instance. The state, county, street, and road are given, together with the acreage and a specific description of the character of the improvements contained thereon. If for convenience a more exact location was desired in order to identify the property, a mere inquiry as to whether the vendors owned the exact acreage as located, or a reference to the public county records, would have afforded the information. Hines v. Copeland, 23 Cal. App. 36, 136 Pac. 728.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, and the trial court directed to render judgment in favor of appellant in accordance with the prayer of the complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by M. Cohn against N. Harada. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant. Snyder & Snyder, of Stockton, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that he sold and delivered to defendant two horses on December 11, 1916, for which defendant promised and agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of $375; that the whole amount thereof is still owing and unpaid with interest thereon from the 11th day of December, 1916, at the legal rate.

Defendant demurred generally to the complaint on the ground of insufficiency of facts, based upon the failure of the complaint to allege at what time payment was to be made for said horses. The demurrer was overruled and defendant answered, denying the averments of the complaint; admitted that on December 11, 1916, plaintiff sold to defendant two horses for the said sum and alleged that by the contract of sale, plaintiff "warranted said horses to be sound and not over five years of age at that date, and thereby induced defendant to purchase the same, and to promise to pay the above-named sum therefor"; alleged that all of plaintiff's representations as to said horses' soundness and age were false and untrue; that, in fact, said horses were, and each of them was, over the age of five years and unsound in this: "That the hock on one of the legs of each of said horses had been wrenched, and then blistered for the purpose of removing a spavin and the effects of such unsoundness"; that the purchase price agreed upon was $375 and no more, and that on said date, plaintiff "gave a written bill of sale of said horses to defendant, who could not read it, wherein it was falsely and fraudulently provided that defendant should pay plaintiff the further sum of $20 in case one of said mares had a colt"; alleged that said provision for the payment of said further sum was unauthorized and formed no part of said agreement for sale, and was "falsely and fraudulently inserted therein for the purpose of injuring and defrauding defendant out of the above-named sum," and that upon the discovery by the defendant of said unauthorized provisions in said agreement, defendant "promptly rescinded the said agreement of sale and served" notice upon the plaintiff on December 20, 1916, and alleged that defendant "returned said two horses to the place from which he received them, to wit, the stables of Casper Stein," in the city of Stockton, "where said two horses are now, and ever since have been, subject to plaintiff's order." It was stated in said notice that the two horses delivered to defendant on December 11, 1916, were not as warranted "in respect to age and soundness, and that the insertion of $20 in the price to be paid therefor was fraudulent and unauthorized."

The cause was tried by the court without a jury and the court made the following findings:

First. That on the 11th day of December, 1916, plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant two horses for which defendant agreed to pay the sum alleged in the complaint, to wit, $375.

Second. That defendant has not paid said sum or any part thereof and the whole amount is due, together with interest from the 11th day of December, 1916, at the legal rate.

Third. That it is not true that by said contract of sale or otherwise, plaintiff warranted said horses to be sound and not over five years of age at that date, or that he warranted said horses to be sound or over said age at that date, or that plaintiff by said or any warranty, induced defendant to purchase the said horses or either of them.

Fourth. That it is not true that all or any of plaintiff's representations as to the soundness or age of said horses were then or otherwise false or untrue and that it is true that one of said horses was at said time of the age of five years and one thereof was of the age of six years, and it is not true that either of said horses was unsound in the respect mentioned in defendant's answer or at all.

Fifth. That plaintiff on the 14th day of December, 1916, gave a written bill of sale of said horses to defendant (the date of the instrument is December 11th—the finding evidently a clerical error), which contained a provision for the payment of the further sum of $20 in case one of said mares had a colt, but it is not true that said provision was false and fraudulent or that any provision of said contract was false or fraudulent or that the insertion of said provision for the payment of said further sum of $20 was unauthorized or was no part of said agreement of sale or was falsely or fraudulently inserted therein, but that it is true that said provision was inserted in said writing in accordance with the agreement and sale and in accordance with the agreement of plaintiff and defendant and without any fraud on the part of plaintiff.

Sixth. That it is not true that as soon as defendant, as claimed by him in his answer, "discovered that said warranty was, as so alleged by him, false in the particulars mentioned in his answer, or in any particulars, or that as soon as defendant had, as so alleged by him, discovered that plaintiff had changed the terms of said agreement in said bill of sale or had thereby attempted to defraud and cheat him out of the additional sum of $20, as so alleged by him, he promptly rescinded the said agreement; that it is not true that said defendant promptly rescinded said agreement; that it is true that defendant did not, at any time, promptly rescind said agreement; and it is not true that defendant on the 20th day of December, 1916, or at any other time, returned said two horses to the place from which he had received them, and that it is not true that he had received said two horses, or either of them from the stables of Mr. Casper Stein" in the city of Stockton, Cal.

Seventh. That it is true defendant caused to be served upon plaintiff the notice dated December 20, 1916, set forth in defendant's answer, which said notice was served upon plaintiff on said date.

As conclusions of law, the court found that plaintiff is entitled to judgment against defendant in the sum of $375, with interest at the legal rate from December 11, 1916, and for costs of suit. Judgment was accordingly entered from which defendant appeals.

[1, 2] No special demurrer was interposed. The complaint alleged the delivery of the horses to have been made on December 11, 1916, the date on which the sale was made, and the law implies that payment should be made on delivery. The demurrer was properly overruled.

A suggestion is made in appellant's brief that the contract came within the statute of frauds, being for a price over $200. The statute was not pleaded in any manner nor was the question raised upon the admission of testimony at any time during the trial. The defendant admitted in his answer that plaintiff sold the horses to him and alleged that a written bill of sale was given by plaintiff to defendant. The contract, in fact, was fully executed.

[3] We have examined the evidence brought up by the record and are entirely satisfied that there is sufficient to support all the findings. Briefly, the transaction was as follows: The defendant is a Japanese farmer somewhat extensively engaged in the farming business in the island country near Stockton. He testified that he had been so engaged for several years and had bought and used many horses for farming purposes. He met the plaintiff in Stockton on December 11, 1916, and from him learned that he had two horses which he would sell; they both went to plaintiff's farm a short distance from Stockton where defendant examined the horses very carefully, and after much bargaining, the sale was effected, as plaintiff testified, upon the following terms: That defendant was to pay $375 for the two horses and that as plaintiff had agreed to pay $20 for the services of a stallion, should one of the mares prove to be with colt, plaintiff insisted that defendant should pay that further sum of $20 if the mare should have a colt, and this the defendant finally agreed to do. Whereupon plaintiff delivered the horses to defendant at the ranch and the parties returned to Stockton where defendant placed the horses in care of the person in charge of the stable mentioned in the answer, with instructions to take care of them for defendant. The parties then went into a nearby store where a clerk wrote out the agreement found in the record and plaintiff testified that it was written at the dictation of the defendant and was as follows:

Stockton, Cal., Dec. 11, 1916.
M. Cohn
Sold to W. Harada
1 Queen 2 mares $375.00
1 John
5 years old to date
If mare has colt the buyer has to pay seller $20.00.
Paid M. Cohn
Dec. 11-1916.

Defendant also at the same time signed a check made out by the same clerk on a Stockton bank in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $375, which plaintiff deposited in his bank the same or following day. Three or four days later he received a postal card from the bank notifying him that payment had been stopped. He immediately hunted up defendant and demanded to know for what reason the payment had been stopped, and was told that it was because of the clause in the bill of sale with regard to the $20 in relation to the prospective colt. Whereupon plaintiff immediately—on December 15th—commenced the action. Five days later defendant served his written notice of rescission alleged in the complaint.

There was no evidence that plaintiff gave a warranty as to the age or soundness of the horses, nor is there evidence that defendant was induced to purchase the horses by reason of any warranty. The burden was on defendant not only to prove the warranty, but that he relied upon it.

The memorandum was written by a clerk in the store to which the parties went because neither plaintiff nor defendant could write or read in the English language except to write his name. The clerk, so far as appears, knew nothing of the terms except as he was told by one of the parties. Plaintiff testified that defendant dictated the terms, but, whether he or plaintiff did it, both were present and heard what was told to the clerk, and the memorandum was handed to defendant. There is no pretense that the clerk inserted anything in the memorandum other than as was dictated to him either by defendant or in his presence and hearing.

[4] Upon the question of rescission we think, under the circumstances shown, the court was justified in finding that defendant "did not promptly rescind the agreement," and "did not return or offer to return said horses to the place where he received them." The right of rescission must be promptly exercised. Civ. Code, § 1691.

[5] Defendant did not return or offer to return the horses to the place where they were delivered to him, which was at plaintiff's ranch. It was not sufficient tender to say to plaintiff, as the notice did:

> "Said horses are now at the stables of Mr. Casper Stein, at No. 47 E. Sonora street, Stockton, Cal., subject to your order."

We can discover no ground for a reversal and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

ALDERSLEY v. McCLOUD et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 16, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 13, 1917.)

1. Words and Phrases—"Moreover."

The word "moreover" means "beyond this" or "besides this."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Moreover.]

2. Trusts 🔑191(1)—Trust Deed—Power of Sale—Disposal of Proceeds.

Where the purpose of a trust deed is the application of income from land to the use of the beneficiary, a power of sale as the trustees "may deem best for the interest of their trust" was sufficient direction for disposal of the proceeds, as prescribed by Civ. Code, § 857, before its amendment.

3. Trusts 🔑191(1)—Trust Deed—Power of Sale.

Where a trust deed gives a power of sale, it necessarily gives power to convey in fee.

4. Trusts 🔑242—Trust Deed—Power of Sale—Surviving Trustees.

Under a trust deed, wherein land was held in trust solely for the benefit of another, conveyance of one of several trustees of any personal interest he might have in the trust estate did not affect the power of surviving trustees to sell for purposes of the trust as far as conveying the land in fee was concerned, where power of sale was given the survivors.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Suit in partition by Lyell K. Aldersley against Julia A. McCloud and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, and George F. Jones, of Oroville, for appellant. Carleton Gray, of Oroville, for respondents.

HART, J. This is a suit in partition, the object of which is to secure a decree partitioning and dividing between the parties hereto, according to their respective interests therein, the three several tracts of land specifically described in the complaint. These several tracts of land are separately described in as many subdivisions of paragraph 3 of the complaint.

The court made and caused to be entered an interlocutory decree whereby it directed the partition between the plaintiff and the defendant Julia A. McCloud of the tract described in subdivision 3 of paragraph 3 of the complaint, and dismissed the action in so far as it relates to the other lands described in the complaint. The decree, so far as the two last mentioned tracts are concerned, is a final judgment, and it is from said judgment or so much of the decree as directs the dismissal of the action in so far as it relates to the lands described in subdivisions 1 and 2 of paragraph 3 of the complaint that this appeal is prosecuted. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone. All the facts, however, are set out in the court's findings.

The history of this case is substantially given and some of the salient facts hereof were presented and considered by the Supreme Court in the recently decided case of In re James Aldersley's Estate, 163 Pac. 206. The appeal in that case arose over objection to an order settling the first and final account of Ellen Williams, the administratrix of the estate of James Aldersley, deceased, and involved, as the present appeal involves, the question of the scope and effect of certain deeds of trust. The facts which it is necessary to consider here are stated by the Supreme Court in the opinion in said case as follows:

> "She [Ellen Williams] died pending probate, and Elbert Aldersley succeeded her as administrator of the said estate, while her daughter, Julia A. McCloud, became her administratrix and legal representative. The case turns upon the validity of certain trust deeds, and the distribution to be made of the moneys received from the sale of the trust property.
> "John Aldersley was the father of four children, all of whom were living at the time of his death. In 1882 he conveyed a certain parcel of land, known as tract No. 1, to three of his children, Ellen Williams, Edwin and William K. Aldersley, in trust for the benefit and use of his son James, who is the decedent in this estate. On June 10, 1889, John Aldersley made a second conveyance of another parcel of land, designated herein as tract No. 2, to the said grantees, also in trust for the benefit and use of said James. On December 4, 1891, John Aldersley died intestate, leaving his four children as heirs; his wife having predeceased him. Thereafter, on February 13, 1892, James Aldersley, who in 1884 had received a patent from the United States government to a certain homestead, designated herein as tract No. 3, conveyed the land to the same grantees on like terms of trust as the other deeds. Thus the two brothers and the sister held the three parcels of land, which were as a matter of fact contiguous tracts, aggregating 440 acres, all in trust for the benefit and use of their brother James. The three conveyances by which this result was accomplished were substantially identical in form, the provisions pertinent to the consideration of the questions raised by this appeal reading as follows:
> "'* * * That said party of the first part, in consideration, * * * does grant, bargain, convey, and confirm unto said parties of the second part or the survivors of them, their heirs and assigns forever: All that certain tract of land situate, lying and being * * * in the county of Butte, state of California. * * *
> "'To have and to hold the above-granted premises together with the appurtenances and every part thereof unto said parties of the second part, their survivors and assigns, forever in fee, upon trust, nevertheless, and to and for the uses, interests, and purposes hereinafter limited, described, and declared, that is to say:
> "'First. To receive the rents, issues, and profits of said premises, and apply the same to and for the use, purpose, support, and maintenance of said James Aldersley for and during the term of his natural life.
> "'Second. After the death of James Aldersley to convey the said premises by deed to said parties of the second part or their survivors or survivor living at the death of said James Aldersley, their heirs and assigns.
> "'Third. In case the said parties of the second part deem it advisable or if it becomes necessary to sell the said before-described premises any time prior to the decease of said James Aldersley, said parties of the second part, or the survivor, shall have full power and right to sell and convey said premises upon such terms and price as they may deem best and for the interest of their trust. * * *'
> "William K. Aldersley died on February 15, 1906, leaving four children, who are the contestants herein. Elbert Aldersley, already mentioned as the administrator of the estate of James Aldersley, is one of these children. Thereafter, in pursuance of the terms of the trusts, Ellen Williams and Edwin Aldersley took charge of the property. * * * On June 26, 1909, the three tracts of land were conveyed to Julia A. McCloud in consideration of $1,400 in cash and her promissory note secured by mortgage for $1,750. It was stated in the deeds from the trustees that the transfer was made because it was deemed 'advisable and necessary for all persons interested in said property to sell all of the said real property.' The conveyances were effected in one transaction by four separate grant, bargain, and sale deeds, each naming Julia A. McCloud as the grantee in fee, to wit: A deed of tracts Nos. 1 and 2 by Edwin Aldersley and Ellen Williams, trustees; a deed of tract No. 3 by Edwin Aldersley and Ellen Williams, trustees; a deed of tracts Nos. 1, 2, and 3 by Edwin Aldersley and Ellen Williams individually; and a deed of tracts Nos. 1, 2, and 3 by James Aldersley individually. After Julia A. McCloud took possession of the property, the trustees and James ceased to live thereon. James died intestate on April 25, 1913."

In addition to the facts above narrated, the following further facts were found by the court in the present case, viz.: That the said William K. Aldersley, on the 15th day of October, 1903, by a deed of gift, conveyed to the plaintiff herein all his right, title and interest in and to all the lands granted in trust to the trustees by John Aldersley; that said deed to the plaintiff was on the 26th day of August, 1914, duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of Butte county; that the plaintiff is one of the children of said William K. Aldersley.

It is conceded by the appellant that the deeds to Julia McCloud passed all the interest in the property owned by James Aldersley, Edwin Aldersley, and Ellen Williams, they having joined in the deeds, and thus personally bound themselves. It is admitted that the plaintiff did not join in these deeds.

It is contended that the trust deeds did not vest in the trustees the fee in the lands which are the subject thereof, but that they conveyed only such estate therein as was necessary for the purposes of the trust, and that, since the trust was to exist only during the life of James Aldersley, title to the property vested in the plaintiff and the defendant as successors in interest to John Aldersley's heirs. Or, to state the position of counsel for the appellant on this proposition in their own language, it is as follows:

> "The only estate that the trustees had was the legal title for the life of James Aldersley. The fee at all times remained in John Aldersley, and after his death in his heirs; the plaintiff having a one-fourth interest in the fee at the time of the deed to Julia A. McCloud. The utmost that can be said as to the effect of this conveyance (the deed to Julia McCloud) would be that the trustees thereby conveyed such interest as they had in the property, and therefore conveyed the title to the property during the equitable life estate of James Aldersley. But the trustees did not at the time or at any time have the fee or any title to the fee in the property, the remainder over, after the death of James Aldersley, had no title thereafter, and therefore had no interest in that title, and could not convey the same."

It is further contended that the provision as to the sale of the property by the trustees is void as a trust to sell "because a trust for purposes of sale" under subdivision 1 of section 857 of the Civil Code must be mandatory, and not discretionary, but that (so the argument further proceeds), even if said provision was otherwise valid, it must fall because it relates to, and is therefore inseparably connected with, the provisions of the second paragraph of the trust deeds (the trust to convey), which is invalid. Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 523, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70; Id., 136 Cal. 79, 36 Pac. 306. It is further argued that the trust to sell is void because "the deeds did not contain any direction for the application or disposal of the proceeds, as required by the language of the Code above quoted (Civ. Code, § 857), unless, indeed, the provision be found in paragraph 2, which is void."

The further point is urged that the power to sell is a mere collateral or naked power, not being coupled with an interest; hence, so it is argued, said power expired with the death of John Aldersley, and that therefore the conveyance by the trustees to Julia A. McCloud was wholly void, the further argument being advanced that, to perpetuate the life of the power beyond the decease of John Aldersley, the interest with which it must be coupled must be one arising by virtue of the trusteeship or created by the deeds of trust themselves; that the interest accruing to the trustees by reason of heirship, having no connection with the trust created by the deeds, cannot have the effect of reviving the power revoked by the death of the trustor.

[1] Taking up first the points made against the validity of the power with which the trustees are invested by the deeds of trust to sell the property, it is conceived that a reply thereto is to be found in the opinion in the case of Estate of James Aldersley, supra. Referring to that provision in the said deeds, the court in that case said:

> "This presents the question whether the attempted sale of the three tracts to Julia A. McCloud passed any interest which James at the time possessed in the property, and, if so, the proportion of the consideration received therefrom which properly belongs to his estate. It is conceded that the trustees had no power of sale other than the power granted under the provisions of the third paragraph. But it is insisted that that provision is void principally because it is inseparable from the provision of the second paragraph. We find no merit in the contention. The deeds expressly provide that such a sale should be made whenever the trustees 'deem it advisable,' or if it becomes necessary. To hold as contended that the third paragraph only authorizes a sale for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of the second paragraph, referring to the distribution of the principal, is to give the language used a strained construction which is neither required by the context of the instruments, nor in harmony with the obvious intention of the trustors. But even if the provision be merely regarded as a power of sale, the validity of the sale cannot be questioned."

It is true that the court, following the use of the above language, declared that it was in that case concerned only with the interest of James Aldersley in the property and the effect of the sale upon said interest, and further said that the fact that James Aldersley gave his personal or individual deed to Julia A. McCloud, "purporting to convey the title to the three tracts of land to her," in itself "is sufficient to remove all doubt that the title which James possessed in the tracts has passed to the grantee." But this language may not be construed to mean (as counsel for the appellant seem to construe it) that the court intended to say that the sale by the trustees under the power to make the same provided in the deeds, while valid as to James, was not valid as against the other heirs of John Aldersley. Indeed, the language of the opinion immediately following that above quoted herein clearly shows that the court did not intend to state therein any such proposition or to convey any such impression. It will be noted that the language is:

> "But even if the provision be merely regarded as a power of sale, the validity of the sale cannot be questioned. Moreover [italics ours], as has been stated, James, for a valuable consideration, personally gave his deed to Julia A. McCloud," etc.

The word "moreover" means "beyond this" or "besides this"; so that the meaning of the opinion, to paraphrase the language, is: That the sale by the trustees was not only valid and conveyed full title to Julia A. McCloud, but that all possible doubt of James' interest in the three tracts having been conveyed to her is wholly removed by the personal deed of James himself, for a valuable consideration, conveying to her whatever interest he possessed in the property described in the trust deeds.

[2] While, as in effect above stated, we think it is clear that the conclusion of the Supreme Court that the sale by the trustees was valid answers all the points made here by the appellant against the validity of the trust to sell and the sale (for it is inconceivable that the sale should be valid and the trust to sell be invalid), there is, nevertheless, one of the points so made to which we may properly give brief specific attention. As seen, the appellant contends that the provision in the deeds authorizing the trustees, under the circumstances specified, to sell the property, is invalid, "because the deeds did not contain any direction for the application or disposal of the proceeds, as required" by section 857 of the Civil Code, as that section read at the time the deeds here were made and before the amendment thereof so that trusts for the purpose of conveying property may legally be created. The language of said section, as it originally read, and which is pertinent to this point, is:

> "Express trusts may be created for any of the following purposes: 1. To sell real property, and apply or dispose of the proceeds in accordance with the instrument creating the trust."

The clause in the deeds empowering the trustees to sell the property provides, as we have seen, that such sale may be made, if the trustees deem it advisable, upon such terms and at such price as they "may deem best for the interest of their trust." The rational, and indeed, it seems to us, the natural, interpretation of that language, viewed in the light of the explicitly explained purpose of the trust, gives to it but one meaning, which is this: That, if found by the trustees to be for the best interest of the beneficiary for whose benefit the trust was created to sell the property, and thus convert the subject-matter of the trust into money, they were to adopt that course and so administer the trust in the changed form as that the beneficiary should receive, not the principal, but whatever income that might be derived therefrom. Thus the provision refers, not to the second paragraph of the deeds, as counsel mantain, but to the first paragraph, which establishes and vests in the beneficiary whatever beneficial or equitable interest he acquired in the lands by virtue of the deeds of trust; and thus the beneficiary would receive, as fully as though the corpus of the trust property remained in the form of land, the issues or profits (the interest) accruing from the investment or the loaning of the money. Thus, it seems to us, a direction for the application of the proceeds of the sale according to the terms of the instrument creating the trust is clearly, and indeed unquestionably, implied. There can be no doubt that a court of equity, testing the meaning of the provision according to the principles which govern that court, would so decree, if the trustees failed or refused to apply whatever the money earned to the "use, support, and maintenance of James Aldersley." Of course, like the land, had the subject of the trust so remained, the principal sum of money, upon the death of James, would have gone to the estate of the trustor, he having died before the death of James, and the trust to convey being void.

[3] To the point first above stated, namely, that the trustees, holding at no time the fee in the property or the remainder over upon the death of James Aldersley, could not, therefore, convey the fee, the answer is that, while it is true that they were not vested with the remainder in fee after the termination of the equitable estate of James, there was, nevertheless, necessarily vested in them, as trustees, such an estate in the lands conveyed as was essential to the accomplishment of the valid purposes of the trust. Hence the right to sell necessarily carried with it the authority to convey the fee. Morffew v. S. F. & S. R. Co., 107 Cal. 587, 595, 40 Pac. 810, 813; Estate of James Aldersley, supra. In the first-mentioned case it is said:

> "The quantity of interest which passes to the trustee in case of an express trust is commensurate with the necessities of his office; the trustee shall have an estate in fee, if that is necessary, to enable him to perform the duties imposed upon him, although it is not in terms given to him by the instrument creating the trust; on this principle a devisee of lands in trust to sell clothes the trustee with the fee, because necessary to the execution of the trust, the rule being compendiously stated that the trustee 'will take an estate adequate to the execution of the trust—no more nor less.'" Perry on Trusts, § 320; Young v. Bradley, 101 U. S. 787, 25 L. Ed. 1044.

Quite plainly, if this proposition were not sound and unimpeachable, the provision for the sale of the property would be meaningless and wholly nugatory, and the full and proper execution of the ultimate purpose of the trust, according to the best interests of the cestui que trust, might be entirely frustrated. What could the trustee sell, if not a full and complete title to the entire estate in the land? But the soundness of the proposition above stated is too obvious to require further notice of it.

might have had as an heir in the estate of John Aldersley.

The deeds to the trustees not only conveyed to them, for the purposes of the trust, the property and vested in them the powers essential to the execution of the trust, but also conveyed the lands to and vested such powers in the remaining trustee or trustees, upon the death of one or more of them. Not only is this true, but paragraph 3 of the deeds, providing for the sale of the property, itself contains a like provision; that is to say, it provides that the power of sale shall be in the trustees named or their survivor. Thus it is clear that the right to sell continued to exist in the surviving trustees, after the death of William K. Aldersley. And obviously his deed to the plaintiff could not have the effect of destroying that right. Of course, the plaintiff, as the successor of his father, William K. Aldersley, is entitled to whatever interest he would legally be entitled to from his father's one-fourth interest in the estate of John Aldersley; but the lands having been sold by the trustees, by virtue of the right thus given them by the trust deeds, prior to the death of James, the deed from William K. to the plaintiff was without force and effect, so far as are concerned said lands.

CURTIN v. BLACK OAK DEVELOPMENT CO. (Civ. 1674.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑527(2)—Record—Oral Decision of Court.
A statement of facts made by the trial judge in rendering his oral decision in a case in which the court made no findings, even though printed in the record, could not be treated as forming part of the record nor used to supply findings or to influence the judgment in any way.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑931(3)—Presumptions—Findings to Support Judgment.
The District Court of Appeal must presume that the trial judge found every fact warranted by the evidence which is necessary to support the judgment.

3. Attorney and Client 🔑166(1)—Actions to Recover Disbursements—Evidence.
In an action by an attorney who acted as defendant's agent in disbursing certain funds in connection with the purchase of land, and who claimed to have made a payment out of his own funds with the knowledge and acquiescence of defendant's president on a claim which he might have paid out of defendant's funds, evidence held sufficient to warrant a finding that defendant's president knew nothing about the payment until suit was brought.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by J. B. Curtin against the Black Oak Development Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. Grayson, of Sonora, for appellant. Oliver B. Wyman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff commenced the action to recover from defendant the sum of $500 alleged to have been "advanced and loaned to defendant by plaintiff for its use and benefit." The cause was tried by the court and defendant had judgment for its costs. Findings of fact were waived by the respective parties. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and has brought up the record of the evidence taken at the trial.

The following facts appeared: On December 6, 1907, the owners of the Black Oak group of mines in Tuolumne county, agreed to sell the same to one S. A. Knapp for $202,500, to be paid before April 6, 1911, and among the conditions of the agreement was one which provided for the payment out of the purchase price of all debts of the owners. On December 5, 1910, Charles E. Knox, now president of defendant corporation, obtained from said owners an extension until April 6, 1913, to pay said purchase price. The Black Oak Development Company was formed with Charles E. Knox as its president. On April 3, 1913, respondent paid into the First National Bank of Sonora the purchase price and a sum additional to pay the assumed interest covering the two years' extension period, the amount paid being $227,500. Appellant was made disbursing agent of these funds.

On August 17, 1906, the owners of the Black Oak group of mines in Tuolumne county executed to Hales & Symons, a corporation, a mortgage on said mines for $10,000, and on the same day Thomas A. Fisher, who, at that time, had two mortgages on the same property, assigned both mortgages to said Hales & Symons as additional security for said loan as he (Fisher) had signed the note to Hales & Symons for the owners of said mines. Hales & Symons afterwards transferred these three mortgages to one G. B. Wilson of Philadelphia; said G. B. Wilson died, and these three mortgages were transferred by his heirs to his son, G. B. Wilson, Jr., and on October 9, 1912, said G. B. Wilson, Jr., transferred these three mortgages to Black Oak Development Company, respondent herein.

Hales & Symons, while it held said three mortgages, employed F. P. Otis, an attorney at law, to bring, and he did bring, suit in the superior court of Tuolumne county to foreclose the same, which suit was still pending during all the period the different assignments of these mortgages were made. In fact, these foreclosure suits were not settled until May, 1914. On March 18, 1913, said F.

P. Otis served a demand on appellant and said bank, claiming $805.70 as attorney's fees for bringing said foreclosure actions. Appellant is an attorney at law and was representing all the parties, including Black Oak Development Company, as its attorney. Charles E. Knox was the president of Black Oak Development Company, and the payment of the $500 here in question was made by appellant, as he alleged in his complaint, as an advance and loan to respondent.

The plaintiff testified that he and Mr. Knox met in the directors' room of the First National Bank of Sonora for the purpose of examining and passing upon the various claims of creditors of the owners of said property; that among others was the claim of Mr. Otis for attorney's fees in the matter of bringing the foreclosure actions above referred to. He testified that he and Mr. Knox discussed the matter and they were both of the opinion that the claim was too much and should be reduced, and witness informed Mr. Knox that he would fight it out with Mr. Otis; that he would do the best he could to get it reduced. He testified that upon completing the business for the day and after Mr. Knox had said to him, "See what you can do; see if you can't get it cut down"—referring to Mr. Otis' claim—they left the directors' room and going out into the front part of the bank met Mr. Otis. The plaintiff had wrapped up his check book which he used to draw on the purchase price fund, and also the papers he had used in the directors' room, preparatory to leaving for Sacramento. Upon meeting Mr. Otis after going out of the directors' room, Mr. Knox standing by but taking no part in the conversation, Mr. Otis again demanded his fee, and thereupon plaintiff stated that it was too much, but said substantially, "Otis, if you will reduce your fee to $500, I will pay it now." Otis agreed to the proposition and plaintiff thereupon drew his check against his personal account for $500, gave it to Mr. Otis, and took his receipt for the same. Plaintiff testified that several times afterwards he called the attention of Mr. Knox to the matter, who promised that it would be adjusted. It seems to be conceded that Mr. Curtin might properly have drawn the check against the funds in the bank for the payment of various creditors of the owners.

Mr. Knox testified that the first time he saw the demand of Mr. Otis for the attorney's fee was when he was served with the complaint in this action, and he further testified that he had never promised to pay or reimburse plaintiff for any attorney's fee paid Mr. Otis on the basis of Otis' written demand and that he had no authority on behalf of the Black Oak Development Company to enter into an agreement with plaintiff to pay Mr. Otis any "claim against the purchase price of the Black Oak Mines," and that he did not know Mr. Otis personally and had no recollection of ever having seen him.

Plaintiff has stated in his brief what is claimed to be a summing up of the evidence by the court in rendering its oral decision in the case in which the court is said to have stated that plaintiff "acted in good faith and did what he thought was for the interest of Black Oak Development Company to do," adding:

> "I do not think, however, the mere request from Mr. Knox to try and get a reduction of the amount claimed by Mr. Otis was an authorization or direction to Mr. Curtin to pay this amount out of his own funds. I am of the opinion that this was a voluntary payment and cannot be recovered back. There was plenty of money in the bank, which was paid over as the purchase price of the mines, and out of which Mr. Otis could have been paid then. The fact that Mr. Curtin was in a hurry to get to Sacramento did not justify him to pay this demand out of his own funds, and I cannot see that he is entitled to recover it back in this action. It was a voluntary payment and defendant declines to pay it, and I think its position is correct and judgment will be entered for defendant."

[1] By the statement of facts purported to have been made by the trial judge, printed in appellant's brief, appellant's testimony as to what occurred in the directors' room and upon meeting Mr. Otis in the bank, seems to have been accepted by the court as true and, had the court made findings to the same effect, we think a conclusion of law might well have been drawn different from that which was reached by the court. But no such or any findings of fact were made, and the record nowhere discloses the view the court took of the evidence. Had the statement printed in appellant's brief found its way into the record, it could not here be treated as forming any part of it; nor can it be used to supply findings or to influence the judgment in any way. People v. Quong Sing, 20 Cal. App. 26, 33, 127 Pac. 1052.

[2, 3] This court must presume that the trial judge found every fact warranted by the evidence which is necessary to support the judgment. Certain facts and circumstances appeared not above shown which had more or less bearing upon the issues. But upon the important facts immediately connected with the payment by plaintiff of the Otis claim and explanatory of the circumstances under which it was made, the evidence is conflicting and the court would have been warranted in finding that Mr. Knox knew nothing about plaintiff's having paid Mr. Otis out of his own funds until this suit was brought. Not only will error never be presumed, but every presumption will be indulged in favor of upholding the judgment. Bliss v. Sneath, 119 Cal. 526, 529, 51 Pac. 848.

We cannot say that there was not sufficient evidence to support every finding necessary to support the judgment.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

IMPERIAL LAND & STOCK CO. v. OSTER.

1. CORPORATIONS 🔑90(3)—ACTION FOR ASSESSMENT ON STOCK—PREMATURITY.

A corporation's action for a delinquent stock assessment was not prematurely brought before the day fixed for the sale of delinquent stock.

2. CORPORATIONS 🔑90(2)—COLLECTION OF DELINQUENT ASSESSMENT ON STOCK—REMEDIES OF COMPANY—STATUTE.

On the day of delinquency in payment of a stock assessment, the stockholder owed the money to the corporation, which had two remedies open to it, one to collect the debt as a debt simply, the other to resort to the more extraordinary proceeding of selling the stock under permission of Civ. Code, § 349, to satisfy the debt.

3. CORPORATIONS 🔑169—COLLECTION OF DELINQUENT ASSESSMENT ON STOCK—SALE—NOTICE.

If a corporation proposed to subject to sale the stock of a stockholder delinquent in paying an assessment, that could only be done by sale after public notice, as the statute requires, and no right to sell could accrue until the sale had been duly advertised and the date of sale arrived.

4. CORPORATIONS 🔑90(2)—SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK—PROMISE TO PAY IN INSTALLMENTS—ACTION.

Had a corporation's complaint against its stockholder alleged that the contract of subscription contained an agreement by the stockholder to pay for the stock in certain installments at specified times, the company could have maintained an action directly upon the promise.

5. CORPORATIONS 🔑89(2)—MATURING LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDER ON CALL FOR SUBSCRIPTION—STATUTES.

Where a corporation, suing its stockholder, alleged no specific agreement whereby the stockholder's obligation to pay calls upon his stock was fixed as to the time thereof in advance, the stockholder's liability was to respond upon calls duly made, and, no provision of the by-laws of the corporation being shown, the directors, in making their calls, were governed by the procedure outlined in Civ. Code, § 331 et seq., and where the form prescribed was strictly followed, notice of the assessment or call being given by publication, and mailing of notice, that was all the notice the stockholder was entitled to in order to mature the debt and fix his liability, and further demand on him before suit was not necessary.

6. CORPORATIONS 🔑89(4)—CALL FOR SUBSCRIPTIONS—EQUALITY WITH OTHER STOCKHOLDERS.

A corporation had the right to call against the stock of only two stockholders such an amount of their subscription as would produce enough money to make their payments equal to the payments already made by other stockholders.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by the Imperial Land & Stock Company, a corporation, against Frank F. Oster. From judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed.

F. A. Leonard and George W. Hellyer, both of San Bernardino, for appellant. Alfred H. McAdoo, Frank C. Sherrer, and Frank F. Oster, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This is an action to recover from defendant the principal sum of $1,600, which in the complaint it was alleged was owing to the plaintiff corporation by reason of an assessment levied or call made against the defendant on account of corporate stock owned by him. The complaint stated the necessary facts as to the subscription for the capital stock having been completed. It was then alleged that on the 12th day of October, 1909, at defendant's request, plaintiff issued to him 100 shares of its stock of the par value of $100 each, on account of which purchase there was then paid the sum of $100. It was then alleged that at the time of the issuance of the stock it was understood and agreed between plaintiff and defendant that the defendant would pay all calls and assessments on the stock to the extent that the par value thereof remained unpaid, which unpaid amount was alleged to be, on the 8th day of November, 1909, the sum of $9,900. It was then alleged that between the 8th day of November, 1909, and the 9th day of December, 1914, defendant had, in response to divers calls made by the corporation, paid installments upon the balance due on the stock, which payments, together with the initial payment made, amounted to the sum of $42.50 per share. It was alleged that on the 9th day of December, 1914, there had been paid on all other stock subscribed, except that issued to defendant and one Adams (the latter having paid $38.50 per share), the sum of $58.50 per share. It was further alleged that on the 9th day of December, 1914, plaintiff was indebted to divers creditors in sums aggregating more than $50,000, and was without means with which to satisfy the claims of creditors, or to pay expenses or to conduct its business; that on the said 9th day of December, at a regular meeting of the board of directors, a resolution was unanimously adopted levying an assessment of $16 per share upon the stock held by the defendant and $20 per share upon the stock held by Adams; that in the resolution it was specified that the assessment should be immediately payable to the secretary, and that the 13th day of January, 1915, was the day fixed by the resolution upon which the assessment should become delinquent, and that in the same resolution the 3d day of February, 1915, was fixed as the date of sale of any stock which might become delinquent thereunder; that the secretary of the plaintiff was by said resolution directed to give notice as provided by law of such assessment and to perform all other proper acts and things necessary to be done. Allegations follow showing that the proper notice of assessment was published; and it was then alleged that on the 13th day of January, 1915, being the day upon which the assessments were to become delinquent, the board of directors adopted a resolution whereby the corporation waived further proceedings for the sale of stock and elected to proceed by action to recover the amount of the assessment so levied. This suit was commenced on January 18, 1915. The defendant filed a demurrer, which was overruled, and later made his answer to the complaint. At the time set for trial, and preliminary thereto, defendant objected to any evidence being offered, and asked that the action be dismissed, assigning several reasons as grounds for the motion. The trial judge sustained the objection, and the action was dismissed, and this appeal, taken by the plaintiff from that judgment, followed. In the judgment the court recites the grounds upon which the dismissal was ordered, which are as follows:

> "(1) That said action as shown affirmatively by the complaint was prematurely brought, in that the complaint was filed on January 18, 1915, while the notice of assessment contained in the complaint recited and contained the statement that defendant's stock would be sold on February 3, 1915, for failure to pay said assessment, and that under the law, and in particular under section 341 of the Civil Code of the state of California, defendant had the right to pay said assessment at any time before February 3, 1915, with the only additional penalty added for delaying until such date of being required also to pay the actual costs of advertising.
> "(2) That it was not alleged in plaintiff's complaint that defendant was given or had any notice of the election by the plaintiff to proceed under section 349 of the Civil Code before the filing and institution of this action.
> "(3) That it was not alleged in plaintiff's complaint that any demand was made on defendant to pay the assessment sued upon, after plaintiff had elected to proceed under section 349 of the Civil Code.
> "(4) That the assessment sued upon was void under the provisions of section 332 of the Civil Code.
> "(5) That the assessment sued upon was void because upon the face of the complaint said assessment affirmatively appeared to be unequal and not uniform and a discrimination against defendant.
> "(6) That said assessment was void under section 333 of the Civil Code.
> "(7) That the election by plaintiff to proceed under section 349 was illegal, irregular, and void in that it affirmatively appeared that plaintiff was not treating defendant with equality and uniformity in that as to defendant there purported to be an election to waive further proceedings to collect the assessment by sale of the stock and to proceed by personal action, while as to the other stockholder against whom assessment was levied there was no such purported or attempted waiver of such further proceedings."

[1] The complaint of the plaintiff, with its amendments, to our minds, stated a good cause of action. The action was not prematurely brought because brought before the day fixed for the sale of delinquent stock. The regularity of the procedure up to and including the resolution declaring an election to be made by the board of directors to waive the sale of stock seems not to be questioned by respondent. His position is, however, that while the board of directors had the right, under section 349, Civil Code, on the day specified for declaring the stock delinquent, to waive further proceedings for the sale of the stock, the right of action to collect the debt did not accrue until the day of the sale had arrived, because, he argues, up to that time he might have paid the assessment and charges and relieved himself of the debt. The infirmity of this position is that the debt had already become a fixed and matured charge against the stockholder.

[2] On the day of delinquency the stockholder owed the money to the corporation. It had two remedies open to it: one to collect the debt as a debt simply; the other to resort to the more extraordinary proceeding of selling the stock under permission of the statute to satisfy that debt. The debt being a matured charge, under the law it was the duty of the defendant to pay it, and it was the privilege of the corporation to sue for it if it was not paid.

[3] If the corporation proposed to subject the stock of the stockholder to a sale—in other words, divest him of his ownership in it—that could only be done by sale after public notice as the statute requires. No right to sell the stock could accrue until the sale had been duly advertised and the date of sale had arrived. The case of San Bernardino I. Co. v. Merrill, 108 Cal. 490, 41 Pac. 487, is cited by respondent. That case goes no further than to hold that at the time the waiver of the right to sell stock is made there must be a live proceeding pending, which, if pursued to its end, would result in a valid sale of the stock. In other words, if the proceeding looking to a sale of the stock is invalid, or if some step of a jurisdictional nature has been neglected, then no right of waiver exists, for the reason that there is nothing to waive. That decision does not hold that suit may not be brought in a proper case before the date fixed for the sale under the assessment.

Up to this point we have referred to the proceeding as one to collect an assessment against the stock of respondent. Actually it was to enforce a call made for unpaid subscription money. The allegations of the complaint were ample to show the contractual obligation on the part of respondent to pay the par value of the stock.

[4] Had the complaint alleged that the contract of subscription contained an agreement of respondent to pay for his stock in certain installments at specified times, we think that an action could have been directly maintained upon the promise. Such is generally the tenor of the decisions and text-books. Cook on Corporations (6th Ed.) § 104 et seq. However, no specific agreement was here alleged by which the obligation of respondent to pay calls upon his stock was fixed as to the time thereof in advance.

[5] Hence his liability was to respond upon calls duly made (San Joaquin L. & W. Co. v. Beecher, 101 Cal. 70, 35 Pac. 349), and as no provision of the by-laws of the corporation is shown which might affect that matter, the directors in making their calls were governed by the procedure outlined in the statute, which is found in section 331, Civil Code, and sections immediately following it (Cook on Corporations [6th Ed.] § 115; Helliwell on Stock and Stockholders, § 280). The form prescribed by the statute was strictly followed. Notice of the assessment or call was given by publication and by mailing of the notice to respondent, and this was all the notice that respondent was entitled to in order to mature the debt and fix his liability. It was not necessary to make further demand on him before bringing suit. See text-book of Mr. Cook mentioned above, at section 120, and cases cited.

[6] Some complaint is made that, because all of the stockholders were not subjected to the call made, the assessment was invalid because unequal. It will be remembered that the call was only for such an amount against the stock of respondent and Adams as would produce enough money to make their payments equal to the payments already made by other stockholders. This the corporation undoubtedly had the right to do, as no inequity would result. It has been held that assessments may be so equalized. Brockway v. Gadsen, etc., Co., 102 Ala. 620, 15 South. 431; Cook on Corporations, above cited, § 114.

In our opinion none of the grounds upon which the dismissal was ordered are tenable.

PILSTRAND v. GREENAMYRE et al.
(Civ. 1738.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS ⚷231—DESTRUCTION OF BUILDING—EFFECT.

A mechanic's lien does not attach to the land after the building's destruction, and probably does not survive as to the land if the building's destruction occurs after filing of the lien.

2. JUDGMENT ⚷28—JOINT JUDGMENTS—VALIDITY.

A joint personal judgment against two defendants in a mechanic's lien case will be entirely reversed where there is no evidence to support it as to one defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Mechanic's lien proceedings by John Pilstrand against Harold H. Greenamyre and George M. Stivers. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

L. N. Peter and L. H. Hughes, both of Quincy, for appellants. M. C. Kerr, of Quincy, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This is an action for a personal judgment against defendant Greenamyre and to foreclose a mechanic's lien for work alleged to have been performed by respondent, Pilstrand, for appellant Greenamyre in or about a building on land of which Greenamyre was in possession under an agreement of sale from appellant Stivers, who is the owner of the land. The lower court rendered a decree in favor of plaintiff, Pilstrand, against both defendants, and this appeal is from the judgment. Since this appeal was perfected, so it is stated by respondent, and not denied by appellant, the building has been totally destroyed by fire, without insurance, and Greenamyre has abandoned all interest in the property and removed therefrom.

It is therefore the claim of respondent that the question before us is moot, and that the appeal should be dismissed. But accepting the fact as stated, the question would then arise whether a mechanic's lien fully perfected by filing the same upon the completion of the building survives the destruction of the building and continues thereafter on the land which was found to be necessary to and for the convenient use and occupation of the building.

[1] There is some apparent conflict in the authorities as to whether the lien attaches to the land at all events. On the one hand, it is held by those jurisdictions adopting the so-called Pennsylvania rule that the lien includes the land only as an incident to the lien on the building, and when the building is destroyed, the lien ceases. On the other hand, it is held that the lien attaches to the land originally, and not alone as an incident to the lien on the building. The difference, however, will be found to arise from a difference in the text of the mechanic's lien laws rather than from any real difference in principle. In California the so-called Pennsylvania rule is followed. It has thus been decided that the destruction of the building prior to its completion destroys the lien, though the claim was subsequently filed against the land. Humboldt Lumber Mill Co. v. Crisp, 146 Cal. 686, 81 Pac. 30, 106 Am. St. Rep. 75, 2 Ann. Cas. 811; Watson v. Alta Investment Co., 12 Cal. App. 560, 108 Pac. 48. Where the building is completed, but destroyed without fault of either party, prior to the filing of any claim, the same conclusion is reached, and the lien is held to suffer the same fate as the building. Kern v. San Francisco Co., 19 Cal. App. 157, 124 Pac. 862. In Chenoweth v. Spencer, 64 Or. 540, 131 Pac. 302, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 678, it appears that land was held under contract of purchase. The vendee contracted for the erection of a building, and work was started. The materialmen filed their liens, but before completion the building was destroyed. Under statutes the same as those in California, it was held that the lien was destroyed. There can be no difference in principle between the above case and the case where, as here, the building is both completed and the claim filed prior to the destruction of the building. Whatever lien exists upon the land does so only because primarily it existed upon the building, for the convenient use and occupation of which the land is included. There can be no doubt that, if no incidential right was given against the land upon which the building rests, but the building was solely liable to the lien, a destruction of the building, even after completion and the filing of the claim, would necessarily work a loss of the lien. There would be nothing left to which the lien could fasten. It can hardly be doubted, then, that the lien ceases to exist upon the land, for the principal carries with it the incident. And it is so held in Gross v. Camp, 4 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 461; Baird v. Otto, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 510; Campbell v. Coolbaugh, 3 Luz. Leg. Reg. (Pa.) 93. In Baird v. Otto the court, after citing cases holding that the lien is destroyed where the building is destroyed before the claim is filed, declares:

> "Nor is the principle any different where the building is destroyed after the lien is filed. * * * The filing of the lien and the proceedings subsequently taken thereon are merely the statutory methods presented for enabling a contractor or builder to enjoy the fruits of his lien which the law gives him. His situation is that by the statute he has a lien upon the 'building,' and the statute incidentally adds as much of the realty as the enjoyment of the building requires, but if the building is gone, there is no longer any of the realty required for the use for that building, and the supplemental right to add any of the realty to the building disappears with the destruction of the building."

However, this question was not before the trial judge, and is not presented by the record before us. We merely suggest the foregoing in view of the possibility of a new trial.

[2] There is sufficient evidence to support a personal judgment against appellant Greenamyre, but no such judgment was rendered; it being, if anything, joint against both defendants. There was no evidence to show the personal liability of Stivers. We cannot, therefore, affirm the judgment in any respect, but must reverse it, and this will carry with it the enforcement of the lien.

NASON et ux. v. FELDHUSEN et al.

(Civ. 1716.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 15, 1917. On Motion for Rehearing, Nov. 15, 1917.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑616(2) — Record — Authentication of Affidavits.

On appeal from an order changing the place of trial, the court will not consider an affidavit setting forth a change of the place of business of a defendant corporation, where such affidavit is filed after the date for hearing is set in the appellate court and is not authenticated as prescribed by Supreme Court rule No. 29 (119 Pac. xiv), providing that in all cases of appeal from the orders of the superior courts the papers and evidence used and taken on the hearing of the motion must be authenticated by incorporating the same in a bill of exceptions, except where another mode is provided by law.

2. Venue 🔑5(4) — Residence of Defendants — Actions in Personam — Cancellation of Contract.

An action, the gist of which is an alleged fraud whereby defendants induced plaintiff to enter into a contract for the purchase of certain corporate stock giving a mortgage for the unpaid balance thereof, praying a rescission of the contract of purchase, an accounting, and an injunction, is one in personam and must be tried in the county wherein the defendants reside, under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, requiring certain actions to be tried in the county in which defendants reside at the commencement of the action.

3. Venue 🔑16½ — Residence of Defendants—Actions in Personam.

Where a local action is joined with a personal or transitory action, the defendants are entitled to have it tried in the county wherein they reside.

On Motion for Rehearing.

4. Appeal and Error 🔑837(9) — Matters Considered.

On appeal from an order changing the place of trial to the county wherein defendants resided, an affidavit setting forth a subsequent change of residence cannot be considered, since the record submitted for review cannot be made in the appellate court.

5. Venue 🔑80—Jurisdiction after Removal—Removal of Defendants.

The jurisdiction of an action by the court of a county to which it has been removed cannot be defeated by the removal of a defendant from such county subsequent to the making of the order.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Norton, Judge.

Action by Winfield R. Nason and wife against Henry Feldhusen and others. From an order changing the place of trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed, and rehearing denied.

L. T. Hatfield, of Sacramento, for appellants. Dunn & Brand, Wm. E. Kleinsorge, and Elliott & Atkinson, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

HART, J. Plaintiffs appeal from an order of the superior court of San Joaquin county, in which court the action was commenced, changing the place of trial to the county of Sacramento. It is the contention of appellants that "the purpose of the action is to bring about the rescission of a contract and secure the cancellation of a note and deed of trust given by plaintiffs, appellants, to Henry Feldhusen and A. M. Mull as trustees for California Guaranty Life & Accident Insurance Company. The real estate involved is situated in the county of San Joaquin. Appellants have at all times resided in the county of San Joaquin, and the contract was entered into there. The position of respondents is that "the gist of the action is fraud. Such an action is a personal or transitory action, and the defendants are entitled to have it tried in the county in which they or some of them reside."

In addition to the defendants above named, 20 individuals, who at different times had been directors of the defendant corporation, the insurance company, were joined as defendants. None of the individual defendants resided in the county of San Joaquin, and the greater portion of them resided in Sacramento county. The defendants, the insurance company and Sacramento Bank, were corporations whose principal place of business was in the county of Sacramento.

It is alleged in the complaint, which was filed in April, 1915, that in the month of February, 1913, and prior thereto, plaintiff Winfield R. Nason was the owner of 109 acres of land in San Joaquin county, against which there was outstanding a deed of trust to secure the payment of an indebtedness of $5,300, owed by him to the San Joaquin Valley Bank; that in the months of February and March, 1913, Perry Gum and E. E. Shook, acting as agents of the insurance company, visited the farm of plaintiffs "and, for the purpose of inducing plaintiff Winfield R. Nason to subscribe to stock therein, represented to him that the corporation had a capital stock of $350,000, substantially all of which had been subscribed for," the par value of the shares of said stock being $1, but that the intrinsic value thereof was $2.50 per share; that within a few days the corporation would apply for a license to begin business as an insurance company; that the condition of sales and subscription was such as to justify the statement that all of the capital stock would be sold within 60 days. It is then alleged that said agents assured said plaintiff:

> "That if he would subscribe for 1,000 shares of said capital stock at $2.50 per share, the dividends on such stock would amount to enough to pay off his indebtedness to the San Joaquin Valley Bank within five years * * * and that if plaintiff would make such subscription for 1,000 shares of stock as aforesaid, the insurance company would loan him a sufficient amount of money to pay off said indebtedness to the San Joaquin Valley Bank, and pay for said 1,000 shares of stock and take a deed of trust upon the property in the sum of $7,500."

It is further alleged that said agents made statements to the effect that certain of the defendants were directors of the insurance company and that each of them was a stockholder to the extent of $10,000; that said plaintiff in March, 1913, subscribed for 1,000 shares of the stock of said insurance corporation at the price of $2.50 per share; that the company loaned him $7,500, of which sum $5,300 was paid to said San Joaquin Valley Bank, the balance being applied to the purchase price of said stock, the loan being represented by a promissory note, the payment of which was secured by a deed of trust in which defendants Feldhusen and Mull were named as trustees. Plaintiff paid interest on said loan to and including the 1st day of April, 1914. It is alleged that said statements of Gum and Shook relative to the status of the insurance company, the amount of subscriptions, etc., were false; that if it had not been for such representations said plaintiff Winfield R. Nason would not have subscribed for said stock.

The complaint then sets forth that in October, 1914, plaintiffs learned that the directors of the insurance company had determined to abandon all attempts to engage in business and to go into liquidation, and that an arrangement had been made with defendant Sacramento Bank by which all assets of the insurance company were delivered to said bank; that the deed of trust referred to was assigned to said bank in December, 1914. Further allegations of fraud are contained in the complaint, and it is therein stated that plaintiffs are unable to ascertain the true state of affairs with respect to the money and other assets of the insurance company, and that no accounting has been made by its officers that is available to plaintiffs. It is then alleged:

> "That unless restrained and enjoined from so doing Sacramento Bank will proceed to cause the trustees under the deed of trust of plaintiffs to sell the property of plaintiffs described in said deed of trust for the purpose of discharging the indebtedness represented therein * * * and that said property will be sold and disposed of."

The prayer of the complaint is that defendants be enjoined from disbursing any of the funds of the insurance company; that Sacramento Bank, J. M. Henderson, Jr., A. M. Mull, and Henry Feldhusen be enjoined from taking any action for the purpose of selling the property of plaintiffs under said trust deed; that said last-named defendants be required to reconvey to plaintiffs said property "absolved from the payment of any portion of said note in excess of $5,300"; that defendants be restrained from taking any action tending to the distribution of the assets of the insurance company, or that plaintiff receive back from the insurance company said sum of $2,200 with interest; that an accounting be rendered by the officers of the insurance company; that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the company's assets, and for general relief.

The court issued an order directing defendants to show cause, on May 3, 1915, why a temporary injunction should not issue as prayed for. On April 27, 1915, the following papers were filed by defendants: (1) Demurrer to the complaint; (2) demand for change of place of trial; (3) affidavit of merits; (4) notice of motion for change of place of trial; (5) notice of motion to strike out portions of the complaint. The order changing the place of trial was entered on June 7, 1915.

On October 2, 1917, the day upon which this action was set for oral argument in this court, counsel for appellants filed what is termed: "Memorandum of Suggestion of Change of Principal Place of Business of California Guaranty Life & Accident Insurance Company," in which it is stated that since December 20, 1916, the principal place of business of said corporation has been in the county of Alameda. Attached thereto is an affidavit setting forth the fact of said change of place of business.

[1] 1. The document last mentioned, even if the fact of the change of the principal place of business of the corporation defendant since the commencement of this action and the making of the order changing the place of trial could in any event properly exert any influence in the determination of the ultimate legal issue submitted by this appeal, cannot be considered by this court, for the reason that the memorandum and the affidavit therein contained are not authenticated as a part of the record in the case, as required by rule 29 of the Supreme Court (119 Pac. xiv). Melde v. Reynolds, 120 Cal. 237, 52 Pac. 491; Herrlich v. McDonald, 80 Cal. 472, 22 Pac. 299; Von Glahn v. Brennan, 81 Cal. 261, 22 Pac. 596; Spreckels v. Spreckels, 114 Cal. 60, 45 Pac. 1022; Skinner v. Horn, 144 Cal. 279, 77 Pac. 904; Manuel v. Flynn, 5 Cal. App. 319, 328, 90 Pac. 463.

[2] 2. Section 392 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that actions for the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination, in any form, of such right or interest, and for injuries to real property, must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial, "as provided in this Code."

Section 393 of said Code provides that other specifically designated actions shall be tried in the county in which the cause, or some part thereof, arose, subject to the like power of the court to change the place of trial.

Section 394, among other things, provides that an action or a proceeding against a county or city, or a city and county, may be commenced and tried in such county, or city and county, unless such action or proceeding is brought by a county, or city and county, in which case it may be tried in any county, or city and county, not a party thereto.

Section 395 reads, in part, as follows:

> "In all other cases, the action must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action, or if it be an action for injury to person or property, or for death from wrongful act, or negligence, in the county where the injury occurs, or the injury causing death occurs, or in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action."

The learned counsel for the appellants contends and in his brief declares:

> "If it is not a case in which parties are authorized to repudiate the transaction on the ground of fraud and failure of consideration, then of course it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, but if it does state facts sufficient to state a cause of action, then in the opinion of counsel for appellants, the action should be tried in the county of San Joaquin, for the reason that the whole basis of the action is to relieve real estate situated in San Joaquin county from a lien that was procured through fraud, and is a direct proceeding to eliminate that lien. If it is a proper case for the cancellation of a lien procured by fraud, we feel justified in asking this court to reverse the order changing the place of trial to the end that it may be tried in the county in which the real estate is located, and where the fraud was perpetrated."

It is very clear to our minds that the learned counsel thus falls into error as to the theory or main object of the action as made by his pleading. It is quite obvious that the main object of the action, under the averments of the complaint, is not to remove a lien procured by alleged fraud upon the real estate referred to. The gist of the action, as it is stated in the complaint, lies in the alleged fraud by which the defendants induced the plaintiff to enter into the contract for the purchase of a certain number of shares of the corporation's stock, and its object is to secure a rescission of that contract. If this be not true, then the complaint states no cause of action at all. It is true that it is alleged that the trust deed to the land referred to was procured by fraud and as a part of the alleged fraudulent transaction, but the effect of the allegations in that particular can go no further than to disclose one of the incidental results flowing from the alleged fraudulently procured contract for the sale and purchase of the stock. The complaint, as suggested, states no cause of action for a rescission of the deed of trust, but, to the contrary, itself discloses by its averments that a rescission or cancellation of that instrument cannot be had; for, conceding that the contract for the sale and purchase of the stock was procured and brought about through fraud, the complaint shows that the plaintiffs are indebted to the corporation in the sum of $5,300, secured by the trust deed mentioned in the complaint, and that said sum was loaned by the corporation to the plaintiffs to enable them to lift a mortgage upon the land held by the San Joaquin Valley Bank as security for a loan in a like sum, that they did so extinguish their obligation and mortgage to the bank with the money so obtained, and that the corporation has not been repaid that money. Whatever might have been the character of the general transaction between the corporation and the plaintiff resulting in the execution of the trust deed—even if characterized to some extent by fraud on the part of the corporation—no court would be authorized to cancel the deed so long as the debt to secure the payment of which said deed was given remained unpaid, there being no allegation or claim that the debt thus secured is not an honest and just one.

As before stated, the only question which may be adjudicated herein, under the averments of the complaint, is whether, because the sale to the plaintiffs of the stock in the corporation was consummated through the misrepresentation and fraud of the latter or its agents, the plaintiffs are entitled to have said contract set aside and thus be entitled to a cancellation of their indebtedness to the corporation in the sum paid by them for the stock. And, assuming that the plaintiffs are entitled, under the averments of their complaint, or in this action, to an accounting to determine the amount due on the indebtedness secured by the trust deed, still the action is no less one in personam. An action for an accounting is an equitable proceeding and is a personal action; so is an action for an injunction, and in this case the averments and prayer for both an accounting and an injunction restraining the trustees from selling the property under the trust deed involve relief merely incidental to the principal object of the action, viz. to declare the sale of the stock void and set it aside on the ground that it was brought about by the fraud of the vendor.

[3] But, even if it were necessary to concede that the object of the action was partly to recover real property or for the determination of a right or interest therein, the right of the defendants herein to have the action tried in the county of their residence cannot, under the averments of the complaint, be gainsaid; for, as a general rule, where a local action is joined with a personal or transitory action, the defendant is entitled to have it tried in the county in which he resides. Le Breton v. Superior Court, 66 Cal. 27, 29, 4 Pac. 777; Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal. 572, 26 Pac. 356. In the latter case, the court says:

> "When, however, the subject-matter of the action is local, and the judgment which is sought is to operate directly upon that subject-matter, it is provided that the action shall be tried in the county where the subject-matter of the action is situated. * * * The plaintiff cannot, by uniting in his complaint matters which form the subject of a personal action with matters which form the subject of a local action, compel the defendant to have both those matters tried in a county other than that in which he resides. It is only when real estate alone is the subject-matter of the action that the provisions of section 392 can be invoked against a defendant who resides in a county different from that in which the land is situated. If, in his complaint, the plaintiff joins with such a cause of action another which is not embraced in its provisions, or if he also seeks a remedy against the defendant upon matters which are not embraced within the provisions of this section, his action becomes one of those 'other cases' provided for in section 395, which the defendant is entitled to have tried in the county of his residence."

As we have shown, and as is clearly so upon the facts as pleaded in the complaint, the judgment herein sought cannot operate upon the land which is the subject of the deed of trust, nor even upon the deed of trust itself. No decree affecting either would come within the scope of the action as made by the complaint.

Our conclusion is that the action is purely transitory and that since at the time of the commencement of the action the defendants resided in Sacramento county, the principal place of business of the corporation being then also in said county, the order appealed from was legally and properly made. It is accordingly affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

On Motion for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The appellants ask for a rehearing of this cause, and in their petition cite the case of Pilstrand v. Greenamyre et al., 168 Pac. 1161, as authority for their position that the affidavit filed in this case while it was pending in this court on appeal, setting forth that the corporation defendant, after the order made by the court below changing the place of trial of this action from San Joaquin to Sacramento county, had changed its principal place of business from Sacramento county to Alameda county, may be considered by this court in determining whether the court below was warranted in ordering a change of the venue of the action. The case named was an action for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien subsisting upon a building which was erected by the appellant Greenamyre upon land of which he held possession under an agreement of sale with the owner. While said case was pending on appeal and undisposed of, the building upon which subsisted the lien therein sought to be foreclosed was destroyed by fire. This fact was called to the attention of this court in the brief of respondent and was not denied by the appellant, and the former insisted that the question before us had become moot and asked for a dismissal of the appeal. The question whether a mechanic's lien, fully perfected upon the completion of the building, survived the destruction of the building and continued thereafter on so much of the land as was found necessary to the convenient use and occupation of the building was discussed in the opinion in that case, but it was entirely obiter and advanced merely as a guide to the court below in the event of another trial of the case. In other words, the fact, if it was a fact, that the building had been destroyed after the cause had been tried and an appeal taken therein was not considered as established, but upon the hypothesis that such was the fact and that it would enter as an issue into the case upon a retrial thereof, we ventured our view of the law as applied to such a situation. We may add that the judgment in that case was reversed because, while there was no evidence disclosed by the record that supported a personal judgment against Greenamyre, a joint personal judgment was nevertheless rendered and entered against both Greenamyre and his codefendant Stivers. So much, then, for the case relied upon by the appellants herein upon the point above suggested. It is obviously no authority supporting the position of appellants here. Nor would it be in our opinion, even if it were true that this court had dismissed the appeal upon satisfactory proof that, for any reason, the question submitted for decision therein had become moot, there being no analogy between such a proceeding and the proposition contended for here.

We may well repeat here the very obvious proposition briefly stated in the original opinion, viz.: That an appellate court, in reviewing an order such as the one from which this appeal is prosecuted, is required to confine itself in the consideration thereof to the evidence, papers, documents, etc., constituting the record upon which the order is predicated and such evidence, papers, and documents, to be properly before the appellate court, for consideration in connection with the review of such order, must be authenticated in the manner prescribed either by the rule laid down by the supreme court or by law. See rule 29, Supreme Court (119 Pac. xiv). The obvious purpose of the authentication so required is to show upon what evidence or papers the court below made its order, and thus enable the reviewing court to determine whether, upon the record as made before it, the court below was legally authorized to make the order complained of.

[4] It is plainly manifest that in no case in which the appellate jurisdiction of the appellate courts of this state is invoked can the record submitted for review be made in said courts, and this would certainly be the result in this case were we required to hold that the affidavit referred to might be considered on this appeal.

[5] But still another answer may be made to the proposition urged by counsel, and that is that jurisdiction of said action by the court of the county to which the cause has been removed cannot be defeated by the removal of one or even all the defendants from the latter county subsequently to the making of such order.

Appellants also insist that we reached an erroneous conclusion on the general proposition involved in the appeal, but we have sufficiently expressed our views thereon in the former opinion and from the views so expressed, and the conclusion following therefrom, we see no reason for receding.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

PRODUCERS' TRANSP. CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 4230.)

1. Eminent Domain 🔑2(1) — Taking Private Property for Public Use.

Neither by Const. art. 12, § 23, providing that every private corporation operating any pipe line within the state for the transportation of crude oil to or for the public is hereby declared to be a public utility subject to such control and regulation by the Railroad Commission as may be provided by the Legislature, nor St. 1913, p. 657, to the same effect, can the state subject private property to a public use or confer authority upon the Railroad Commission to assume control of private pipe lines engaged in the transportation of crude oil; as neither by act of the Legislature nor the declaration of the state Constitution can private property be taken for public use without compensation.

2. Carriers 🔑5—Pipe Lines — Control by Railroad Commission.

In view of St. 1913, p. 657, declaring that every individual or association transporting oil by means of pipe lines "directly or indirectly to or for the public for hire" are declared to be common carriers and subject to the Public Utilities Act (St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 18), and Const. art. 12, § 23, to the same effect, a petitioner incorporated for, and now engaged in, transporting oil for profit, having seized private property alleging that it was necessary for the construction of its pipe line through and by means of which it purposed to serve the public, is subject to the Public Utilities Act, and an order of the Railroad Commission requiring it to show cause why it should not file rates and schedules was warranted.

3. Carriers 🔑5 — Rates — Pipe Lines —Dedication of Private Property for Public Use—Evidence.

That petitioner availed itself of the right of eminent domain in condemning property for the right of way over which it constructed its pipe line must be deemed conclusive evidence of a dedication of the property for public use, since by Code Civ. Proc. § 1238, it could not have secured such right other than in behalf of a public use.

4. Carriers 🔑5 — Common Carriers — Powers of Railroad Commission.

As the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission to make the order requiring petitioner to show cause why the commission should not make an order requiring petitioner to file schedules of rates, etc., depended upon whether petitioner was a common carrier transporting oil by its pipe line, the commission had power to determine the business in which petitioner was engaged.

5. Carriers 🔑18(1)—Railroad Commission —Review.

On writ to review proceedings of Railroad Commission requiring petitioner to show cause why commission should not make an order requiring petitioner to file schedules of its rates as a common carrier, the question presented being as to the power of the commission, objections based upon apprehension of results from further action by the commission were immaterial.

In Bank. Application by the Producers' Transportation Company against the Railroad Commission of the State of California, Max Thelen and others, as members, for a writ of review against said Commission. Order of Railroad Commission affirmed.

Lewis W. Andrews, Thomas O. Toland, A. V. Andrews, and Andrews, Toland & Andrews, all of Los Angeles, and Paul M. Gregg, of San Luis Obispo, for petitioner. Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, Judge pro tem. Upon application by petitioner therefor, a writ of review was issued in the above-entitled proceeding directed to the Railroad Commission, in obedience to which respondent has certified to this court the record of its proceedings and order therein made affecting petitioner and which it challenges as being in excess of the jurisdiction of that tribunal.

In 1913 the Legislature of the state enacted a statute, designated as chapter 327, and found in the Statutes of 1913, at page 657, wherein the Legislature, among other things, declared that:

> "Every private corporation and every individual or association of individuals, * * * (b) owning, operating, managing or controlling any pipe line or any part of any pipe line, plant or equipment for the transportation of crude oil, petroleum or the products thereof, directly or indirectly, to or for the public, for hire, compensation or consideration of any kind, paid or received, directly or indirectly, for such transportation, and which said pipe line, plant or equipment is constructed or maintained upon, along, over or under any public highway, and in favor of whom the right of eminent domain exists, * * * is hereby declared to be a common carrier and subject to the provisions of the act known as the 'Public Utilities Act,' approved December 23, 1911."

On August 11, 1913, the commission, of its own motion, made an order requiring petitioner to appear before the commission at a specified time and place and show cause why the Railroad Commission should not make its order requiring petitioner to file with the commission schedules of its rates and charges for the transportation of crude oil, petroleum and the products thereof, and its rules and regulations in connection with such transportation, and otherwise to comply fully with the provisions of said chapter 327 of the Laws of 1913. In response to this order and citation, petitioner appeared at hearings at which evidence was adduced touching the question as to whether or not it was subject to the Public Utilities Act (St. 1911, Ex. Sess. p. 18). The result of such hearings was a finding to the effect that petitioner was a common carrier and public utility in the transportation of crude oil, petroleum, and the products thereof, by means of pipe lines from the San Joaquin valley oil fields, and, as such, subject to the Public Utilities Act of this state; and thereupon the commission ordered that petitioner file with the commission schedules of its rates and charges for the transportation of crude oil, petroleum, and products thereof by means of pipe lines from the San Joaquin valley oil fields, in the state of California, and its rules and regulations in connection with such transportation.

Petitioner was incorporated under the laws of this state in June, 1909, for the purpose, among other things, of establishing "a general transportation business for the purpose of transporting * * * any of the oils * * * produced * * * by this corporation, or any other person, firm, partnership, association, or corporation, and for conducting the business of * * * carrying oils, petroleum," etc. Its formation was due to the activities of the Independent Oil Producers' Agency, the membership of which at said time consisted of about 100 different and independent producers of oil, and which membership, on August 1, 1913, up to which time no oil producer desiring to avail himself of the privilege had been refused admission to membership, had increased to the number of 175 (and all of whom were dependent upon unsatisfactory means for the transportation of their products to the markets). In order to finance the undertaking, the cost of which was some $3,500,000, furnished by the Union Oil Company, which owns practically all the stock of the Transportation Company, each member of the Independent Oil Producers' Agency was required to sign a contract covering a term of years expiring January 1, 1920, agreeing to deliver to the agency for transportation and sale all of the oil produced by him on specified lands, the covenants of which contract ran with and bound the lands of the producer; and in turn the Independent Oil Producers' Agency, on June 11, 1909, made a contract with the Producers' Transportation Company whereby the latter was given the exclusive right for a period of ten years from that date to transport at specified rates all crude oil controlled by the agency, and a contract similar in terms was required to be executed on the part of each member of the agency to the Transportation Company. On June 24, 1909, the Producers' Agency made a contract with the Union Oil Company constituting the latter the exclusive sales agent for a period of ten years of all the oil controlled by the agency, agreeing to give such agent a stipulated commission for services so performed. The Producers' Transportation Company produces no oil, but is operated solely as a carrier of oil for profit. Its pipe lines extend from the oil fields to Port Harford on the shores of the Pacific Ocean in San Luis Obispo county, in connection with which terminus the Union Oil Company has erected storage facilities, and from which point, by means of oil vessels owned and chartered by said last-named company, it handled the oil, conveying it to market, for which an additional charge is made. In reaching Port Harford the pipe line extends in part over certain highways and streets, and a portion of the right of way over which it is constructed was acquired by the Producers' Transportation Company in proceedings in eminent domain wherein it alleged that it was "engaged in the business of transporting oil by means of pipe lines as a common carrier for hire," which allegation was by the court found to be true, and it was thereupon adjudged that the use of the land sought to be condemned was a public use authorized by law, and that petitioner as a common carrier of oil for hire had the right to condemn the same as a right of way over which to construct its pipe lines.

It thus appears that by its articles of incorporation petitioner declared that its purpose was to construct a pipe line, and by means thereof engage in a general transportation business of oil produced by any person, firm, or association, that, claiming to be an agent of the state in charge of a public use, it seized private property, alleging that it was necessary for use in constructing this pipe line, through and by means of which it proposed to serve the public, and that during all the time since completion thereof it, without discrimination, in accordance with the intention so to do as declared in its articles of incorporation, has, through and by means of said pipe line, transported oil produced "by any person, firm, partnership, association, or corporation" applying for such service. True, it required such applicant to comply with its rules, exactions, and regulations, among which was membership—refused to none, however—in the Producers' Agency, an incident of which was that for the term ending January 1, 1920, they should appoint the agency to act for them in the transportation and sale of their oil.

[1] By the provision referred to only those persons and associations transporting oil by means of pipe lines "directly or indirectly, to or for the public, for hire" are declared to be common carriers and subject to the Public Utilities Act. A like provision is found in section 23, art. 12, of the state Constitution, which provides that:

> "Every private corporation * * * operating * * * any * * * pipe line * * * within this state, for the transportation or conveyance of * * * crude oil, * * * either directly or indirectly, to or for the public, and every common carrier, is hereby declared to be a public utility subject to such control and regulation by the Railroad Commission as may be provided by the Legislature."

Neither by the provision of the act in question nor the provision of the Constitution can the state subject private property to a public use, nor confer authority upon the Railroad Commission to assume control of private pipe lines engaged in the transportation of crude oil. Neither by act of the Legislature nor by declaration of the state Constitution can private property be taken for public use without compensation therefor. Del Mar Water Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, 948.

Where, however, the owner of property voluntarily devotes it to a public use, he in effect grants to the public an interest in such use, and to the extent of the interest so devoted to the public the public may insist upon a voice in the control and regulation thereof.

[2] That petitioner, in the indirect manner stated, voluntarily assumed the duty of and embarked upon the business of a public carrier in transporting oil for hire, in our opinion, admits of no doubt. The conditions imposed, subject to which it transported oil, however burdensome, applied alike to all producers seeking its service; and subject to compliance therewith it carried everybody's oil to market. It is not the ipse dixit of the law, but the fact that petitioner has voluntarily devoted its property to a public use, which justifies the control assumed by the Railroad Commission. The facts bring the case within the principle enunciated in what is known as the Elevator Cases, entitled Brass v. North Dakota, 153 U. S. 391, 14 Sup. Ct. 857, 38 L. Ed. 757, Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 12 Sup. Ct. 468, 36 L. Ed. 247, and Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. Ed. 77, in the latter of which the court, speaking through Chief Justice Waite, says:

> "When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use; but, so long as he maintains the use, he must submit to the control."

The evidence upon which the commission based its action in making the order shows that petitioner by its voluntary act devoted its property, indirectly at least, to the use of the public in transporting oil, and that, conceding its right, in the absence of an irrevocable dedication to discontinue the conduct of such public business, nevertheless until such discontinuance its tolls, rules, and regulations are subject to the control of the commission.

[3] A further and more potent reason, however, for upholding the action of the Railroad Commission is found in the fact that petitioner availed itself of the right of eminent domain in condemning property for the right of way over which it constructed its pipe line. To our minds, this must be deemed conclusive evidence of a dedication of such property to public use, since it could not have exercised such right other than in "behalf of a public use" (section 1238, Code Civ. Proc.) as "an agent of the state or person in charge of such use" (section 1001, Civ. Code). In State ex rel. Turnpike Co. v. American & E. News Co., 43 N. J. Law, 381, it is said:

> "The fact that the Legislature has granted the right to take private property clearly evinces a legislative intent to lay such companies under an obligation to the public to permit the use of their lines by all persons, under reasonable regulations; and in accepting the benefit of this law, the recipient of the same assumes the performance of this duty to the public."

As appears from the record, petitioner asserted and proved that it was a common carrier in the transportation of oil, thereby bringing itself directly within the provisions of the Constitution (section 23, art. 12) hereinbefore referred to. Having thus acquired such right of way by holding itself out as a common carrier and as agent of the state in charge of a public use, without which it could not have seized property vested in private ownership, it should not now be heard in disclaimer of the profession so made and upon the faith of which judgment in its favor condemning the property to the public use of which it was in charge, was rendered.

[4] The contention that the commission had no power to determine the character of the business conducted by petitioner is without merit. While, as said in Holabird v. Railroad Commission, 171 Cal. 691, 154 Pac. 831, "no proceeding is authorized for the mere purpose of determining this question with respect to any person or corporation," nevertheless, under section 60 of the Public Utilities Act, the commission is authorized, "of its own motion, or upon the complaint of any person, to inquire into any act or thing done by any public utility, and to make such order therein as may be necessary to compel such public utility to comply with the law or with the orders or rules of the commission," but it does not authorize a proceeding for the sole purpose of inquiring and determining whether a particular person or corporation is carrying on a public utility or is engaged in a private enterprise. The jurisdiction of the commission to make the order depended upon the existence of certain facts, namely, whether petitioner was engaged in the business of a common carrier in the transportation of oil, and for the purpose of determining its jurisdiction it was vested with power to determine the facts upon the existence of which it was authorized to make the order.

> "Where the jurisdiction of a board depends on the existence of certain facts, the board has jurisdiction to determine whether or not those facts exist." Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury et al., 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35.

In this proceeding we are not concerned with the contracts made between petitioner and the Producers' Agency, upon the faith of which it is claimed the pipe line was constructed. They are not affected by the order made. If such contracts are valid, no legal action had by the commission could impair the obligation thereof; if invalid, the argument based thereon is without force.

[5] Since the question presented is one as to the power of the commission, not as to its policy, as to which it may be said to have plenary power, the numerous objections based upon apprehension of results which may follow future action taken by the commission become immaterial, and hence need not be considered.

The order, in so far as it affects petitioner, is affirmed.

ASSOCIATED PIPE LINE CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

ASSOCIATED OIL CO. v. SAME.

1. Carriers 🔑5 — Common Carriers — Pipe Line Companies — Statutes — Construction.

St. 1913, p. 657, regulating pipe line companies or other instrumentalities, or persons transporting oil, petroleum, or its products, enacted in pursuance of Const. art. 12, § 23, authorizing the Legislature to regulate such business, applies only to persons or other agencies transporting oil or its products to or for the public.

2. Carriers 🔑4—"Common Carrier."

One who offers to carry goods for any person between certain termini, and who is bound to carry for all who tender their goods and the price of carriage, is a "common carrier."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Common Carrier.]

3. Carriers 🔑1—Common Carriers—Pipe Line Companies — Statutes — Construction.

Where pipe line companies, transporting oil, made no irrevocable dedication of property to public use, such as the exercise of the power of eminent domain, in order to make them subject to the regulation of Const. art. 12, § 23, and St. 1913, p. 657, regulating common carriers of oil by pipe line, or otherwise, it must be shown that they voluntarily devoted their facilities to the indiscriminate use of the public for hire, so as to become common carriers.

4. Carriers 🔑4 — Pipe Line Companies — Regulation — Public Carriers—"Common Carriers."

Pipe line companies, owning oil fields and transporting only oil produced therein, or purchased by them from other producers for the operation of their own business, not constituting a monopoly of the transportation, are not common carriers of oil, within Const. art. 12, § 23, or St. 1913, p. 657, regulating common carriers of oil for hire, or otherwise, and need not file schedules of rates with the Railroad Commission.

5. Eminent Domain 🔑2(1) — "Taking" Property Without Compensation—Pipe Line Companies.

Subjecting property of a pipe line company to the use of the public in the common carriage of oil constitutes a "taking" thereof and requires just compensation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Taking.]

6. Carriers 🔑2—Constitutional Law 🔑297 — Eminent Domain 🔑2(1) — Taking Property Without Compensation — Pipe Line Companies—Due Process of Law.

St. 1913, p. 657, § 1, subsec. "d," and section 2, declaring every individual, association, or corporation using, operating, owning, managing, or controlling any oil pipe line a common carrier, is void and unconstitutional, and in violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, as taking private property without compensation, and without due process of law, although tolls for services are allowed, since elements of damage due to the subjecting of the property to public services, not covered by charges for services performed, are not thereby compensated.

In Bank. Two applications for writs of review by the Associated Pipe Line Company, Incorporated, and the Associated Oil Company, Incorporated, to review and annul orders of the State Railroad Commission and its members, requiring the petitioners to file schedules of rates and charges. Orders annulled.

Edmund Tauszky, Henley C. Booth, and Stanley Moore, all of San Francisco, for petitioners. Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, Judge pro tem. These are proceedings in certiorari whereby each of the petitioners seeks the review and annulment of an order made by the Railroad Commission, requiring them to file with said commission schedules of their rates and charges for the transportation of crude oil, petroleum, and the products thereof, by means of pipe lines from the San Joaquin Valley oil fields, in the state of California, and their rules and regulations in connection with such transportation.

The proceeding initiated of its own motion by the commission, under and by virtue of chapter 327 of the laws of California found in Statutes of 1913, p. 657, is entitled:

"In the Matter of the Compliance by Oil Pipe Lines with Provisions of Chapter 327 of the Laws of 1913, Declaring Certain Corporations, Associations and Individuals to be Common Carriers and Public Utilities, and Subject to the Provisions of the Public Utilities Act."

Its declared purpose was an investigation to determine what corporations and associations were subject to the provisions of said act of the Legislature. Pursuant to an order therein made, petitioners and a number of other corporations engaged in the transportation of crude oil and its products by means of pipe lines appeared before the commission at a stated time and place to show cause why each of them should not file with the commission the data and information therein specified, and otherwise comply with the law.

At the hearing had evidence was adduced touching the subject of inquiry, upon which the commission made its findings and order which it is sought herein to have annulled.

Section 23, art. 12, of the Constitution of California, as amended in October, 1911, pursuant to which the act in question was adopted, is as follows:

> "Every private corporation, and every individual or association of individuals, owning, operating, managing, or controlling, any commercial railroad, interurban railroad, street railroad, canal, pipe line, plant, or equipment, or any part of such railroad, canal, pipe line, plant or equipment within this state, for the transportation or conveyance of passengers, or express matter, or freight of any kind, including crude oil, or for the transmission of telephone or telegraph messages, or for the production, generation, transmission, delivery or furnishing of heat, light, water or power, or for the furnishing of storage or wharfage facilities, either directly or indirectly, to or for the public, and every common carrier, is hereby declared to be a public utility subject to such control and regulation by the Railroad Commission as may be provided by the Legislature, and every class of private corporations, individuals, or associations of individuals hereafter declared by the Legislature to be public utilities shall likewise be subject to such control and regulation. The Railroad Commission shall have and exercise such power and jurisdiction to supervise and regulate public utilities, in the state of California, and to fix the rates to be charged for commodities furnished, or services rendered by public utilities, as shall be conferred upon it by the Legislature, and the right of the Legislature to confer powers upon the Railroad Commission respecting public utilities is hereby declared to be plenary and to be unlimited by any provision of this Constitution."

By this provision of the Constitution the people of the state, however novel, if not startling, the proposition may be, have in clear and unmistakable language declared:

> That "every class of private corporations, individuals, or associations of individuals hereafter declared by the Legislature to be public utilities, shall * * * be subject to * * * control and regulation" by the Railroad Commission, as provided by the Legislature, and this without reference to the character of the business, whether it be a bootblack stand, grocery store, or agricultural pursuit conducted in a purely private capacity; and, further, that "the right of the Legislature to confer powers upon the Railroad Commission respecting public utilities, is hereby declared to be plenary and to be unlimited by any provision of this Constitution."

[1] Acting in pursuance of the power so conferred, the Legislature adopted the act referred to as chapter 327, section 3 of which provides that:

> "Any pipe line constructed, acquired, owned, operated, maintained, managed or controlled by any private corporation, or individual or association of individuals, for any of the purposes or under any of the conditions specified in section 1 or section 2 of this act, is hereby declared to be a public utility and subject to the provisions of the Public Utilities Act."

Referring to section 1, divided into four subdivisions, we find that by subdivisions designated (a), (b), and (c) the Legislature declares to be common carriers and subject to the provisions of the Public Utilities Act every private corporation, individual, or association of individuals—

> (a) engaged in transporting crude oil, petroleum or the products thereof through a pipe line, "directly or indirectly, to or for the public, for hire, compensation or consideration of any kind, paid, given, extended or received, directly or indirectly, for such transportation"; (b) any like person or body "in favor of whom the right of eminent domain exists," engaged in such transportation to or for the public for hire, through a pipe line "constructed or maintained upon, along, over or under any public highway"; (c) any corporation, individual or association of individuals transporting crude oil, petroleum or the products thereof, to or for the public, for hire "or otherwise," by means of a pipe line "constructed, operated or maintained across, upon, along, over or under the right of way of any railroad corporation or other common carrier required by law to transport crude oil, petroleum or products thereof, as a common carrier."

Restated, subdivision (a) of section 1 embraces only those engaged in the business of transporting oil as common carriers. Subdivision (b) is the same as subdivision (a), except that the act in its operation is restricted to those in whom the power of eminent domain exists (though not exercised), and whose pipe lines are constructed over public highways. Subdivision (c), retaining the provision that the transportation be for the public for hire, adds after the word "hire" the words "or otherwise," and restricts the operation of the provision to pipe lines constructed along the rights of way of common carriers required to transport oil. It thus appears that subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) of section 1 apply solely and alone to those who, by means of pipe lines, are engaged in the transportation of crude oil and its products to or for the public.

As bringing the petitioners within the provisions of these subdivisions, the commission found as a fact that in the transportation of crude oil and its products by means of pipe lines from the San Joaquin Valley petitioners were common carriers thereof, or, in the language of the statute, they were engaged in transporting such articles "to or for the public for hire." In our opinion, there is no evidence to support this finding as to either of the petitioners.

> One who "holds himself out as such to the world; that he undertakes generally and for all persons indifferently to carry goods and deliver them for hire; and that his public profession of his employment be such that, if he refuse, without some just ground, to carry goods for any one, in the course of his employment and for a reasonable and customary price, he will be liable to an action."

It is one who offers to carry goods for any person between certain termini and who is bound to carry for all who tender their goods and the price of carriage.

[3] Whether the business conducted by petitioners was that of a common carrier as thus defined was a question of fact, since it may not be said that the intention of the Legislature in enacting subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) of section 1 of the act was to subject to public use pipe lines engaged in the business of transporting oil other than for the public. Indeed, such legislation, if attempted, would have been futile, since under the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, and to take or devote private property to public use without compensation is such deprivation. The record discloses no action on the part of either petitioner which constitutes an irrevocable dedication of its property to a public use, such as the exercise of the sovereign power of the state in eminent domain. Wyman on Public Service Corporations, § 214; State ex rel. Turnpike Co. v. Am. & E. News Co., 43 N. J. Law, 381. Hence, in order to bring petitioners within the purview of the provisions under consideration, it must have been made to appear that they had voluntarily devoted their transportation facilities to the indiscriminate use of the public for hire, thus constituting them common carriers.

As to the Associated Pipe Line Company, the evidence shows that it was incorporated in August, 1907, "for the acquisition, construction, leasing, owning, maintenance, and operation, but not as a common carrier, of pipe lines for transportation of oil within the state of California, together with necessary pumping stations thereunder." At the time in question the Southern Pacific Company was, through a subsidiary company known as the Kern Oil & Trading Company having charge of its oil bureau, engaged in developing oil lands owned by it in Kern county, the production from which was intended for its own use, and, as a means of delivering the oil so produced to points along its line of railroad, it joined with the Associated Oil Company in the construction of two pipe lines, the aggregate daily carrying capacity of which, in 1913, was 38,000 barrels. The cost of construction represented by the capital stock of the Associated Pipe Line Company was equally divided between the Associated Oil Company and the Kern Oil & Trading Company, and under their agreement, no charge being made for the transportation of oil other than the actual cost of operation and maintenance of the pipe line, each was entitled to one-half the carrying capacity of said lines, one of which was known as the Rifle line, being 281 miles in length, and the other, known as the Hot line, 138 miles in length. At all the times since the construction of these pipe lines the Kern Oil & Trading Company has devoted its one-half of the carrying capacity of said lines solely and alone to the transportation of oil produced by it and delivered to its proprietary company, the Southern Pacific Company, for the sole use of the latter. In 1913 such use amounted to 19,000 barrels per day, which was one-half of the full carrying capacity. The other interest in the capacity of said pipe lines so owned by the Associated Oil Company has never at any time since the construction thereof been devoted to the carrying of oil or products other than those either produced by the Associated Oil Company or purchased in the oil field by it in its business of producing, buying, and selling oil, both in crude and refined forms. In 1913 its daily production of oil amounted to 16,500 barrels, and at the same time it was purchasing about 30,000 barrels per day, which, as found by the commission, amounted to about 22 per cent. of the entire production of the state. It thus appears that one half of all the oil transported through these pipe lines was produced by the Kern Oil & Trading Company, so owned by the Southern Pacific Company, for the use of the latter, and the other half so transported was either produced or bought by the Associated Oil Company, by whom it was transported and delivered to itself at the termini of said pipe lines.

With reference to the other petitioner, Associated Oil Company: As stated, it had a daily production of 16,500 barrels and acquired by purchase 30,000 barrels per day, making a total of 46,500 barrels; hence, its one-half the capacity of the Associated Pipe Line Company being only 19,000 barrels per day, left an amount for transportation by other means of 27,500 barrels. For the purpose of such transportation, it, in addition to ownership in the Associated Pipe Line Company, owns a pipe line running from the oil fields to Gaviota, and one from the Coalinga field to Monterey, the capacity of each of which is some 15,000 barrels per day. At no time since the construction thereof has the Associated Oil Company transported any oil through either of these pipe lines, save and except such as it produced, together with that so purchased in the field and transported for delivery to itself at the termini of said pipe lines, where it was sold to consumers in its crude or refined form, or reshipped to other points for sale to consumers. The only efficient means of transporting oil from the San Joaquin Valley oil fields, which in July, 1913, as found by the commission, amounted to some 6,500,000 barrels, was by means of pipe lines of the petitioners and those of a number of other companies engaged in the transportation of oil, all of which product, except that produced by the Kern Oil & Trading Company and Associated Oil Company, together with the 30,000 barrels per day purchased by said last-named company, was transported through and by means of such other independent pipe lines in which petitioners had no interest.

[4] We are unable to perceive anything in the facts established which does not compel the conclusion that petitioners were engaged in a purely private business of transporting oil through these pipe lines. Respondent lays great stress upon a decision of the United States Supreme Court entitled U. S. v. Ohio Oil Co., 234 U. S. 548, 34 Sup. Ct. 956, 58 L. Ed. 1459. To our minds, there are many features of this case which clearly distinguish it from that at bar. In the Ohio Oil Company Case it appears that the Standard Oil Company had acquired control of all pipe lines to which the oil fields east of California were tributary, thus giving it a monopoly of the means of transportation; that a part of the pipe lines constituting the system were in fact common carriers. Having thus made itself master of the fields without the necessity of owning them or producing any oil itself, it, through its subordinates, refused to carry oil unless the same was sold to it, or to its subsidiaries and through them to it, on terms dictated by itself. It was there held that since, subject to such condition of sale to it, the company carried everybody's oil to market, the act of Congress declaring the pipe lines so operated to be common carriers was not a taking of the property for the use of the public, since upon the facts found such pipe lines had been by the owners thereof devoted to public use. In the case at bar a large part of the oil transported through the pipe lines by the Associated Oil Company is produced by it. The amount of 30,000 barrels per day purchased bears a comparatively small proportion to that produced in the oil fields tributary to its lines. The fact of such limited purchase, in competition with a number of other oil pipe line companies to which said oil field is tributary, cannot, under the opinion in the Ohio Oil Company Case, however interpreted, be deemed to constitute it a common carrier, or engaged in transporting oil for the public. Indeed, the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of U. S. v. Uncle Sam Oil Co., found in the same book (page 561), is authority for holding the contrary view. The fact that "the business is such that the public needs the use in the same, and that the conduct of the same is a matter of consequence," as found by the commission, is immaterial to the question. In one of the so-called elevator cases, that of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. Ed. 77, it is said:

> "When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created."

But so long as he uses his property for private use, and in the absence of devoting it to public use, the public has no interest therein which entitles it to a voice in its control. Other cases to the same effect are Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 12 Sup. Ct. 468, 36 L. Ed. 247; Weems Steamboat Co. v. Peoples' Co., 214 U. S. 345, 29 Sup. Ct. 661, 53 L. Ed. 1024, 16 Ann. Cas. 1222; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. U. S., 148 U. S. 336, 13 Sup. Ct. 622, 37 L. Ed. 463, and Del Mar v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, 948. Indeed, our attention is directed to no authority in this state or elsewhere holding otherwise.

Subbdivision (d) of section 1 embraces every one—

> "owning, using, operating, managing or controlling, directly or indirectly, or participating in the ownership, use, operation, management or control, directly or indirectly, under lease, contract of purchase, agreement to buy and sell, or other contractual or tacit agreement or arrangement of any kind or character whatsoever, of any pipe line, or pipe lines, or any part of any pipe line, or pipe lines, plant or equipment, or pipe line system, or any part of any pipe line system, for the transportation of crude oil, petroleum or the products thereof, of and from, or of, or from any oil field or place of production within the state of California, to any distributing, refining, or marketing center or reshipping point therefor within said state, whereby, or under, or through which, directly or indirectly, such corporation, or any corporation or association of corporations, or individual or association of individuals secures, or is enabled to secure, or attempts to secure, or tends to secure, the control of, or monopoly of the purchasing of, or the control of, or monopoly of the transportation of such crude oil, petroleum or the products thereof."

As bringing petitioners within this provision of the act, the commission found that "the purpose of chapter 327 of the Laws of 1913 is to terminate and prevent a monopoly in the oil pipe line business," and found as a fact that the Associated Oil Company and Associated Pipe Line Company, together with three other companies named as engaged in like business, "have secured the control and monopoly of the transportation of crude oil, petroleum, and the products thereof from the San Joaquin Valley oil fields," and that, while section 5 of the act excepts from the provisions thereof companies, individuals, and associations the nature and extent of whose business is not of public interest or consequence, "the five companies (among which were petitioners) serving the San Joaquin Valley fields cannot be regarded as coming within the exception," and further found as a fact that the nature and extent of the business of said five companies, including petitioners, "is such that the public needs no use in the same, and the conduct of the same is not a matter of public consequence."

The finding as to the control and monopoly secured by petitioners is attacked upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence to support the same. The evidence touching the subject is most meager and unsatisfactory. In effect it shows that five companies, including petitioners, operating pipe lines in transporting oil, a part of which was produced by each of them, were also buyers of crude oil in the fields from the independent producers thereof, who, since none of said companies transported oil other than that produced by themselves or such as they acquired by purchase, had no efficient means of shipping their oil to market, and hence contracted to sell the same to some one of those companies at prices agreed upon; that there was no agreement, tacit or otherwise, shown to exist between the companies as to the price which they should pay in contracting for the purchase of oil; that during most of the time the production of oil was largely in excess of the demand therefor, and little, if any, difference was paid by the companies in contracting for the purchase of oil; hence convenience and economy in delivery of the oil both as to the purchaser and buyer might well be deemed a controlling factor in making such contracts. While the position of petitioners and owners of the other pipe lines gave them, as found by the commission, an advantage over the independent producers in transporting their product, thus affording an opportunity enabling them to enter into an unlawful combination in restraint of trade, our attention is directed to no evidence which in the slightest degree tends to establish such fact.

[5, 6] However this may be, and conceding the evidence ample to support the finding, such fact cannot warrant the taking of private property for public use without compensation for which no provision is made or contemplated. True, the exaction of tolls for actual service will be allowed, but there are elements of damage due to the subjection of the property to the public service not covered by charges for service performed for which no compensation is made. That subjecting petitioners' property to the use of the public as common carriers constitutes a taking of the same, admits of no controversy.

> "Whenever a law deprives the owner of the beneficial use and free enjoyment of his property, or imposes restraints upon such use and enjoyment that materially affect its value, without legal process or compensation, it deprives him of his property within the meaning of the Constitution. * * * It is not necessary, in order to render a statute obnoxious to the restraints of the Constitution, that it must in terms or in effect authorize the actual physical taking of the property or the thing itself, so long as it affects its free use and enjoyment, or the power of disposition at the will of the owner." Forster v. Scott, 136 N. Y. 577, 32 N. E. 976, 18 L. R. A. 543; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 148 U. S. 312, 13 Sup. Ct. 622, 37 L. Ed. 463.

Under the Public Utilities Act the Railroad Commission, as an instrumentality of the state, is authorized to supervise and regulate every public utility in the state, with power to fix tolls and charges exacted for the service performed; but it has no power to declare what shall constitute a public utility. But this, argues respondent, is a function of the Legislature. Not so. The Legislature possesses no such power. It cannot by its edict make that a public utility which in fact is not, and take private property for public use by its fiat that the property is being devoted to a public use. If under the broad language used in section 23, art. 12, of the Constitution that "every class of private corporations, individuals or associations of individuals hereafter declared by the Legislature to be public utilities shall * * * be subject to * * * control and regulation" of the Railroad Commission, the Legislature can by its mere fiat, without notice or opportunity to be heard, and in the absence of any provision for compensating the owner thereof for damage, subject petitioners' pipe lines to the demands of the public because the private use thereof tends to create a monopoly or enables the owner thereof to secure a monopoly, it can with equal propriety declare a grocer or dry goods store employing more than a specified number of clerks to be a public utility, or, without such or any qualifications, declare that all pipe lines used in transporting oil shall be common carriers of oil. Indeed, as to corporations, this is precisely what it has attempted to do by section 2 of the act, which provides that every corporation owning a pipe line, through and by means of which it transports oil is declared to be a common carrier and subject to the provisions of the Public Utilities Act; the only limitation thereon being, as provided in section 5, that it shall not apply where the nature and extent of the business is such that the public needs no use in the same. That such provisions constitute a taking of private property by the state for public use, without due process of law, which is prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, must be conceded. Mr. Lewis, in his work on Eminent Domain (3d Ed.) § 11, says:

> "A law which authorizes the taking of private property without compensation * * * cannot be considered as due process of law in a free government." Chicago, etc., R. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 17 Sup. Ct. 581, 41 L. Ed. 979.

1. The evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that petitioners in operating their pipe lines in transporting oil, came within the provisions of subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) of section 1 of the act.

2. Subdivision (d) of section 1 and section 2 of the act are, except perhaps as to corporations acquiring such pipe lines after the passage thereof, unconstitutional and in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, in that they contemplate the taking of private property in the absence of any provision made for compensating the owners, and without due process of law.

Our conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider other grounds upon which petitioners attack the action of the Railroad Commission.

The orders, in so far as they affect petitioners, are annulled.

SAVINGS UNION BANK & TRUST CO. v. CROWLEY. (S. F. 7297.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS 🔑450—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by an executor against the testator's widow involving a dispute as to the ownership of dividends on corporate stock, evidence held sufficient to support findings that the husband pledged the stock to the wife to secure the payment of his notes to her, that the certificates of stock were delivered to and retained by her, and that the notes had not been paid.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑931(1) — PRESUMPTIONS—FINDINGS.

The presumption of payment of the notes arising from long lapse of time could not avail against the court's finding of nonpayment based upon the payee's testimony that no part of the debt had been paid.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS 🔑431(2) — LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑167(1) — WITNESSES 🔑133—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES—NATURE OF ACTION.

An action by a stockholder's executor to recover dividends, in which the stockholder's widow was substituted as defendant and set up a claim to the dividends under a pledge of the stock to her to secure the payment of notes, was not an action on the notes nor a claim against the estate, and the widow's rights were exactly the same as if she were suing the corporation, and hence the running of limitations or the nonpresentation of the notes as a claim against the estate were not defenses, and the widow was not incompetent as a witness, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, providing that parties or assignors of parties or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted cannot be witnesses against an executor or administrator upon a claim or demand against the estate as to any matter of fact occurring before the death of the decedent.

4. CORPORATIONS 🔑123(8)—PLEDGE OF STOCK—EXTENT OF LIEN—DIVIDENDS.

Under Civ. Code, § 2989, providing that the increase of property pledged is pledged with the property, a pledge of corporate stock carries with it a pledge of the dividends.

5. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑167(1)—OPERATION AND EFFECT — EFFECT ON LIEN OF PLEDGEE.

Where defendant lawfully acquired possession of certificates of stock as pledgee during the existence of the obligation secured, and was still in possession of them, her lien remained in full force, and she could not be divested of it without a prior satisfaction of the debt, notwithstanding the running of limitations against the secured debt.

6. CORPORATIONS 🔑123(10) — RIGHTS OF PLEDGEES OF STOCK—COLLECTION OF DIVIDENDS.

A lawful pledgee of corporate stock could collect the dividends from the corporation and apply them in satisfaction of the secured debt.

7. WITNESSES 🔑59—HUSBAND AND WIFE—ACTIONS BETWEEN WIFE AND HUSBAND'S EXECUTOR.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 1, provides that a husband cannot be examined for or against his wife without her consent, nor a wife for or against her husband without his consent, nor can either without the consent of the other be examined as to any communication during the marriage, but that this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other. Civ. Code, § 158, provides that either husband or wife may enter into any engagements or transactions with the other or with any other person respecting property which either might if unmarried. Held, that a wife, in an action between her and her husband's executor involving the ownership of dividends on stock which she claimed was pledged to her to secure the payment of notes, could testify to the declarations of her husband concerning the delivery of the notes and certificates of stock to her, as the action was such an action or proceeding as is excepted by section 1881.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Savings Union Bank & Trust Company, as executor of Timothy Jay Crowley, deceased, against the Pleasant Valley Farming Company, in which Katherine S. Crowley was substituted as defendant. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 30 Cal. App. 144, 157 Pac. 516; 30 Cal. App. 535, 159 Pac. 194.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, and Wm. H. Chapman, all of San Francisco, for appellant. O'Gara & De Martini and Bert Schlesinger, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial.

Timothy Jay Crowley died January, 1913. At the time of his death he was the owner of 106 shares of the capital stock of the Pleasant Valley Farming Company, represented by certificates numbered 3 and 8. In March and May, 1913, dividends were declared on the Crowley stock amounting to $11,978. In June, 1913, plaintiff commenced this action against the Pleasant Valley Farming Company for the dividends, on behalf of the estate. By stipulation, the farming company was released from all liability, upon its deposit of the money in a bank selected by the trial judge, and the defendant, Katherine S. Crowley, widow of the deceased, was substituted and permitted to file her answer setting out her claim to the dividends. Her answer alleged, and the court found it to be the fact, that the deceased was at his death indebted to the defendant in the sum of $7,500 and interest, evidenced by four promissory notes properly executed and delivered to the defendant; that no part of the principal or interest of the notes had ever been paid, and that these notes were secured by the two certificates of stock above mentioned. It was accordingly held that these certificates in the possession of the defendant constituted a valid pledge of the stock in question, and entitled her to collect her debt out of the dividends deposited by the Pleasant Valley Farming Company, the surplus to go to the plaintiff.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings that the deceased ever delivered the certificates of stock to the respondent in pledge, or that such certificates were ever pledged to secure the payment of the notes in question, or that respondent retained possession of the certificates in pledge or otherwise, or that the notes themselves had not been fully paid long prior to the declaration of the dividends in suit. Practically the only evidence touching these particulars is the testimony of the respondent, Mrs. Crowley, and the notes and certificates themselves. Mrs. Crowley stated that all four notes, though bearing different dates, were delivered to her by her husband at the same time, in 1907, as evidence of his indebtedness to her, and that together with the notes he delivered to her the two certificates of stock, which he told her would secure the notes. Upon three of the notes was the statement, in the handwriting of Crowley, that they were secured by stock of the Pleasant Valley Farming Company, or the Pleasant Valley Stock Farm. The body and signature of the notes were shown to be in Crowley's handwriting. The certificates bore the blank indorsement of the deceased. Upon the face of the certificates was the provision that they were transferable upon the books of the company by indorsement and delivery. Mrs. Crowley also testified that when she received the notes and certificates she wrapped all of them into a single package and placed them in a safe deposit box rented by her husband, to which she had access, and which she used for her personal belongings. The package was found to be intact upon the death of Crowley, and was identified by respondent as the one she had placed in the deposit box. Upon the question of payment, respondent stated that no part of the principal or interest had ever been demanded or paid. Appellant's proof of joint savings accounts between Mrs. Crowley and her husband, and the testimony of D. J. Murphy and his wife, are not sufficient to show that the notes had been paid. Neither can the presumption of payment arising from long lapse of time, contended for by appellant, avail against the finding of the court based upon the evidence above set out. It is the only direct evidence upon the subject and is clearly sufficient to justify the findings.

[3-6] A number of points are made by appellant in its brief, several of which can be treated together. Appellant claims that respondent's answer is, in fact, a complaint on the promissory notes to which the following defenses are available: (1) The notes are barred by the statute of limitations; (2) the debt having lapsed, the lien upon the stock and dividends is extinct; (3) the action being upon a claim against the estate, the answer is fatally defective in not showing a prior presentation of the claim to the executor; (4) under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure (section 1880, subd. 3), the respondent could not testify to the transaction. A sufficient answer to all of these contentions is that the action is not upon a claim against the estate, that is, the respondent is not suing upon the notes in question; the action is really one in which the appellant is seeking to secure a return of the pledged dividends without paying the debts which the dividends secure. Respondent's rights are exactly the same as if she were suing the Pleasant Valley Farming Company; appellant must show that the respondent has no right to collect the dividends from the farming company. The law generally, and in this state, is that a pledge of stock carries with it a pledge of the dividends. Civ. Code, § 2989; McAulay v. Moody, 128 Cal. 202, 208, 60 Pac. 778; Jones on Pledges and Collateral Securities, § 398.

Furthermore, the respondent having lawfully acquired possession of the certificates as pledgee during the existence of the obligation, and being still in possession of them when the action of appellant was filed, her lien remained in full force, and she could not be divested of it without a prior satisfaction of the debt. This principle has been laid down in earlier adjudications of this court, and is by analogy to the rule that the mortgagee in possession cannot be disturbed even though the statute has run upon the obligation, until the debt is first satisfied. Bridge v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 167 Cal. 774, 141 Pac. 375; Puckhaber v. Henry, 152 Cal. 419, 93 Pac. 114, 125 Am. St. Rep. 75, 14 Ann. Cas. 844; Cushing v. Building Ass'n, 165 Cal. 731, 737, 134 Pac. 324; Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 99 Cal. 57, 69, 33 Pac. 786; Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal. 437, 26 Pac. 203, 13 L. R. A. 137, 22 Am. St. Rep. 314. The respondent being the lawful pledgee of the stock, she could, as such pledgee, collect the dividends from the farming company and apply them in satisfaction of the notes. Since we are not here concerned with an action upon the notes nor a claim upon the estate, the running of the statute of limitations and the extinction of the right of action upon the notes are immaterial; no claim against the estate need have been presented (In re Galland, 92 Cal. 293, 28 Pac. 287), and the limitation on the right of respondent to testify to the transaction, under section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure, was inapplicable. Myers v. Reinstein, 67 Cal. 89;[1] Booth v. Pendola, 88 Cal. 36, 43, 23 Pac. 200, 25 Pac. 1101; Poulson v. Stanley, 122 Cal. 655, 55 Pac. 605, 68 Am. St. Rep. 73.

[7] The remaining point made by appellant is that the court erred in permitting respondent to testify to declarations of her husband concerning the delivery of the notes and certificates of stock to her, on the ground that by the law of this state neither spouse can, without the consent of the other, testify as to any communications made by one to the other during marriage, citing section 1881, subd. 1, Code of Civil Procedure.

Respondent contends that no decision in this jurisdiction has extended the restriction beyond confidential communications, and by reason of the freedom of contract between husband and wife either should be allowed to testify freely to business communications. Section 1881 declares that the rule there stated, excluding testimony by one spouse of declarations by the other made during marriage, "does not apply to a civil action, or proceeding by one against the other." The Civil Code (section 158) provides that "either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might if unmarried." The protection of the right to contract with each other respecting their separate property requires that each should be allowed to testify concerning such contracts, in case of an action between them thereon. This is such an action or proceeding within the meaning of section 1881, and the prohibition therein does not apply. Under that section, the wife can testify to communications made to her by her husband constituting the contract between them, or affecting her rights thereunder. Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 669, 42 Pac. 303, was not a case of that character, and what is there said has no application here.

Judgment and order affirmed.

GEORGE v. TRINITY CHURCH et al.

NEGLIGENCE 🔑55—INJURY TO SUBCONTRACTOR'S SERVANT—LIABILITY OF CONTRACTOR.

For injury to servant of subcontractor from giving way, through weakening of supports, of a scaffolding built for subcontractor by contractor at a time and under circumstances when the subcontractor was by the contract bound to construct it, the contractor is not liable; he not having been bound to keep it in repair or to inspect it against weakening of supports.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Clarence Eugene George against Trinity Church and another. From judgment for plaintiff against defendant Magnus Johnson, and from an order denying motion for new trial, said Johnson appeals. Reversed.

Richards & Carrier, of Santa Barbara, and George H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for appellant. G. H. Gould, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Action for damages against two defendants. Each appeared separately. Judgment was entered in favor of defendant Trinity Church after its motion for nonsuit was granted. Johnson, the other defendant, made a similar motion, which was denied. Against him the jury rendered a verdict in the sum of $5,000, and judgment for that sum with costs was entered. Johnson appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff was injured by reason of the breaking of a scaffolding upon which he was at work in a new building erected for Trinity Church. He was an employé of the subcontractors, Smith & Stalhuth, engaged in doing the stonework required in the construction of the building.

Trinity Church employed Magnus Johnson to superintend the erection of its new building in accordance with certain plans and specifications. In the written contract between the church and Johnson it was provided that the latter should give the same attention to the building as would be given by a person constructing it under contract, so far as direction and superintendence were concerned, except that he should not be required to pay for labor or for material used in the construction of the building save a mixer, a buzz saw, and scaffolding planks, which he was to furnish.

In the contract for the cement, stone, and concrete work Trinity Church was designated as "owner," Johnson as "contractor," and Smith & Stalhuth as "subcontractor." This agreement provided, among other things, that the subcontractor should set up any scaffolding that might be specially required for his work. In the specifications accompanying the earlier contract by which Johnson agreed to supervise the building it was set forth that the carpenter was to "set up all scaffolding and staging that may be required for the erection of the building." Johnson was to hire all workmen; was to have control of the work subject to the supervision of the architects; and was to pay the men weekly, receiving reimbursement from the church at the beginning of the following week upon presentation of his payroll. The church was to pay for all materials used in the work at least monthly, and it was set forth in the agreement that "subcontractors shall be paid by the party of the first part [the church] upon certificate of the architects." Johnson's compensation was to be a fixed sum if the building should be erected for the estimated cost, but his compensation was to be increased or diminished in a manner provided in the writing, according to the completion of the building for less or more than the estimate.

It appears without conflict or question that plaintiff was an employé of the subcontractor. Indeed, he so testified himself, saying that he was hired and paid by Mr. Smith, of Smith & Stalhuth. He was a mason engaged in "pointing" the stone—the last stage in the completion of the work. A "ledger" of the scaffold upon which he was standing gave way, causing his fall and consequent injury.

It was charged in the complaint that the defendants after the erection of the platform (which later gave way under plaintiff's weight) had, with gross negligence, removed the wooden supports necessary to sustain the "ledgers" or transverse pieces of wood which were nailed to uprights of the staging and upon which the boards of the platform rested. Appellant insists that, although the scaffolding was erected originally by the carpenter in his employ, it was then suitable for all purposes; that it was constructed for the stone masons and at their special instance; that there is no evidence that he or any one in his service weakened the platform by removing the supports of the ledgers; and that, if they were removed (and there is evidence to indicate such fact), the removal came at a time when the duty of inspection and safe maintenance rested, not upon him, but upon the subcontractor. We think this position is well taken.

Respondent points to evidence of the removal of another scaffolding in an adjoining aisle. It is argued that the long ledgers of the other scaffolding which had been nailed to the uprights of the one at which the accident occurred probably afforded some support to the platform, and that this being removed by appellant's workmen weakened the structure. Therefore it is argued that the overt act of appellant was the occasion of the injury. Respondent also cites the statement of Mr. Jacobs, one of the men in charge of the carpenters, to the effect that:

> "If they had nailed that ledger after they cut it off, as it ought to have been, you [respondent] would have been all right."

Appellant, on the other hand, calls attention to the testimony of certain of plaintiff's witnesses that the "ribbons" or supports nailed under the "ledgers" were so near to the stone columns as to interfere with washing and pointing said columns, and we are asked to infer that these "ribbons" were removed by those whom they thus inconvenienced. But there is no evidence to justify a conclusion that the weakening of the platform was done by servants of either respondent or appellant. Hackett, who was employed by the subcontractor, testified that the scaffold was erected by the carpenter for the use of the masons and at his special request. He also said that it had supported the weights of workmen and materials far in excess of the strain upon it at the time of the collapse. Thus we have uncontradicted testimony of the suitability of the scaffold when built. True, it was not constructed by Smith & Stalhuth's men, but it was built for the subcontractor at a time and under circumstances when, under the contract, said subcontractor was bound to set up any scaffolding specially required for the work. Neither Trinity Church nor Johnson was bound to keep the platform in repair nor to inspect it vigilantly from time to time to see that its supports were not weakened. Cotter v. Lindgren, 106 Cal. 602–606, 39 Pac. 950, 46 Am. St. Rep. 255. This is a case in which the general contractor (even if we treat Johnson as one in view of the peculiar terms of his contract of employment) may not be held responsible for injuries caused by the fault of a subcontractor. A subcontractor bears the same relation to the contractor that the latter does to his employer, and the rule governing each status is the same. Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469, 68 Am. Dec. 345; Barton v. McDonald, 81 Cal. 265, 22 Pac. 855; O'Hale v. Sacramento, 48 Cal. 212; Stewart v. California Improvement Co., 131 Cal. 125, 63 Pac. 177, 724, 52 L. R. A. 205; Lauthan v. Hewes, 138 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 1065; Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 78 Pac. 337; Fay v. German General Benevolent Society, 163 Cal. 118, 124 Pac. 844.

There is nothing in Fountain v. Willard-Slater Co., 172 Cal. 129, 155 Pac. 630, which conflicts with our conclusions in this case. In that case the general contractor not only erected, but maintained, a temporary staircase for the use of all persons employed in the building. It was held that a servant of a subcontractor might recover for injuries from the general contractor. The facts of the two cases are very different, and the two decisions not at all in conflict.

The judgment and order are reversed.

In re HINKEL'S ESTATE.

HINKEL v. HINKEL et al. (S. F. 8317.)

1. Executors and Administrators 🔑314(3) — Distribution — Contest of Will — Effect.

The fact that a will is still open to contest at suit of a minor or nonresident does not necessarily preclude distribution where the other heirs have made an agreement for distribution under which a sufficient amount will be retained by one heir to pay the claim of the contestant should he succeed.

2. Executors and Administrators 🔑314(3) —Distribution—When Decreed—"Little Indebted."

Whether an estate is little indebted under Code Civ. Proc. § 1661, providing for partial distribution where the estate is but little indebted, is to be determined, not by the amount of the debts, but by their relation to the value of the estate, and an estate is little indebted when its amount over and above debts is sufficient to allow the distribution to be made without danger to the rights of creditors.

3. Executors and Administrators 🔑314(3) —Inventories—Estoppel.

Where certain heirs made an agreement for distribution, and subsequent thereto one heir was appointed executrix, she could not either as executrix or as an individual assert that the property inventoried by her was not a part of the estate for the purpose of partial distribution either as against the other heirs or creditors.

4. Executors and Administrators ⟹314(3)—Distribution—Agreement—Estoppel.

Where several heirs agreed to an early distribution on a stipulated basis, and further agreed to give aid to prevent the overthrowing of the will, their petitioning for distribution immediately held not to depend on the admission of the will to probate, and they were not estopped to ask distribution by their agreement.

5. Executors and Administrators ⟹299—Distribution—Bonds—Time.

Under specific provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1661, where the time for filing claims had expired when a decree for distribution was made, it was unnecessary to require the distributee to give a bond.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Proceedings in the matter of the estate of William Hinkel, deceased, wherein John Hinkel and another petitioned for partial distribution, and from the decrees granting such petitions, Elizabeth Hinkel, as executrix, appeals. Affirmed.

John C. Quinlan, of San Francisco, for appellant. A. L. Weil, A. Caminetti, Jr., Stafford & Stafford, and W. P. Caubu, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Elizabeth Hinkel, as executrix of the last will of William Hinkel, deceased, appeals from two decrees of partial distribution made in favor of John Hinkel and Edgar W. Hinkel, respectively.

On November 4, 1914, William Hinkel's will was admitted to probate, and Elizabeth Hinkel and Oliver L. Jones were appointed executrix and executor. The will bequeathed to each of seven nephews and nieces, children of the decedent's brother Charles, $3,000; to a niece and nephew, children of a sister, $3,000 each; to the widow, Elizabeth Hinkel (who prosecutes this appeal as executrix), the decedent bequeathed $100,000, in lieu of her community interest. The other provisions of the will are not material here.

A proceeding for revocation of probate was instituted by John Hinkel, a brother of William Hinkel, and two sisters of said decedent. In June, 1915, after a trial of the contest, probate of the will was revoked. On July 2, 1915, the three contestants, together with eight of the nieces and nephews named in the will as legatees in the sum of $3,000 each, entered into a written compromise agreement with Elizabeth Hinkel and Oliver L. Jones. The instrument provided, in effect that the said contestants and legatees (parties of the second part in said writing) transfer all of their rights and interests in the estate to Elizabeth Hinkel and Oliver L. Jones (designated as parties of the first part); that Elizabeth Hinkel and Oliver L. Jones agree to pay to John Hinkel $6,000, to the two sisters $5,000 each, and to the nephews and nieces joining in the agreement $3,000 each. The amounts so agreed to be paid aggregate $40,000. "All said sums," it is provided, "shall be paid to the parties as above indicated, whether said will shall be sustained or revoked by order of court, as soon as distribution can be had in the estate of William Hinkel, deceased, and out of the first moneys distributed therefrom." Elizabeth Hinkel and Oliver L. Jones grant to said parties the right to compel distribution to John Hinkel, as trustee for such other parties, of the sums to be paid out of the share or legacy to which Elizabeth Hinkel and Jones may be entitled, either as heirs at law of William Hinkel, deceased, or as beneficiaries under his will. The parties of the first part assign to John Hinkel, as security for the performance of the agreement, all of their interest in the estate. It is also provided that, if any property claimed to belong to the estate shall be determined to be the separate property of Elizabeth Hinkel, such separate property is also transferred to John Hinkel as security for the performance of the agreement. The parties of the second part agree to co-operate in good faith with the parties of the first part in sustaining the validity of the paper filed as the last will and testament of William Hinkel, deceased, "and to that end will, upon request of the parties of the first part, participate in and join in a petition to the court to vacate the judgment and grant a new trial in the proceedings for the revocation of probate of said will." On March 27, 1916, Elizabeth Hinkel, as party of the first part, entered into an agreement with O. B. Martin, guardian of the person and estate of Edgar W. Hinkel, as party of the second part. This agreement, after reciting the admission to probate of the will, the institution of the proceeding for revocation of probate, the judgment revoking the probate, and the consent of the contestants to the granting of a motion for new trial, declares that the party of the second part transfers to the party of the first part all his right, title, and interest in the estate of William Hinkel. Elizabeth Hinkel agrees to pay to Edgar W. Hinkel the sum of $4,250; "that said sum of $4,250 shall be paid to said party of the second part whether said will shall be sustained or revoked by order of said court, as soon as distribution can be had in the estate of William Hinkel, deceased, and out of the first moneys distributed therefrom, after the payment of the moneys agreed to be paid to John Hinkel as trustee under the agreement dated July 2, 1915." The party of the second part consents to the dismissal of the will contest, and agrees to co-operate in good faith with the party of the first part in sustaining the validity of the paper filed as the last will of William Hinkel, deceased, and to that end agrees, on request of the party of the first part, to participate and join in a petition to grant a new trial in the matter of the revocation of probate. It is further agreed that the party of the second part may apply to the court for an order or decree distributing to him the sum of $4,250.

After the making of these agreements a new trial was, by consent of the parties, granted in the proceeding to revoke probate, the contest was dismissed, and Elizabeth Hinkel and Oliver L. Jones were reappointed executrix and executor. John Hinkel petitioned for the partial distribution to him of the $40,000 which, under the first agreement, he was to receive as trustee for the various parties to the compromise, and O. B. Martin, as guardian of Edgar W. Hinkel, filed a like petition for the distribution of $4,250 to him.

Both petitions were granted, and Elizabeth Hinkel, as executrix of the will, appeals from the decrees thus made.

Jones did not join in the appeal. It is contended by one of the respondents that, in the absence of proof of the conditions defined in section 1355 of the Code of Civil Procedure, one of two executors cannot alone take an appeal from an order affecting both in their representative character. We do not find it necessary to pass on this point, as we have reached the conclusion that the decrees appealed from should be affirmed on the merits.

[1] One of the points made by the appellant is that a contest of the will had been instituted by Robert Hinkel, a minor, and that this contest was still pending when the decrees of partial distribution were made. But the fact that a will is still open to contest at the suit of a minor or a nonresident does not necessarily preclude a distribution. Estate of Pritchett, 52 Cal. 94. The agreements provide that the amounts therein specified shall be paid whether the will be sustained or overthrown. In either event the interest of the contracting parties will be sufficient to permit such amounts to be paid without impairing the ability of Robert Hinkel to receive his share, if he should be successful in his contest.

[2] The condition of the estate, as shown by the record, was not such as to preclude a partial distribution. The appraised value of the estate was over $290,000, and it appeared that there had been an increase of $25,000 over the value as fixed by the appraisement. Suits and claims presented against the estate up to the time of the filing of the petitions aggregated about $71,000. While the time for presenting claims had not expired when the petitions were filed, it had run out when the decrees of distribution were made. Section 1661 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for a partial distribution where "the estate is but little indebted." Whether an estate is little indebted is to be determined, not by the amount of the debts, viewed absolutely, but by their relation to the value of the estate. In re Crocker, 105 Cal. 368, 38 Pac. 954. An estate is little indebted when the amount of the estate over and above the debts, is sufficient to allow the distribution to be made without danger to the rights of creditors.

[3] The inventory contains the statement that the executors are unable to state whether the property "is community or separate property of Elizabeth Hinkel, or partly community and partly separate property of Elizabeth Hinkel." Any question in this regard is one which concerns Elizabeth Hinkel in her individual right, rather than as executrix. As an individual she would be in no position to contest the distribution, since, by the compromise agreement, she transferred any part of the estate that might be her separate property as security for the performance of the agreement. Furthermore, both agreements plainly contemplated that the sums agreed to be paid were to be distributed out of the estate of William Hinkel. Under these conditions Elizabeth Hinkel cannot now assert, either as executrix or as an individual, that the property inventoried by her and her coexecutor was not a part of the estate for the purpose of this partial distribution. On like considerations, she would be estopped, as against creditors who might be affected by the distribution, to claim, as her separate property, the funds necessary to the payment of their demands.

[4] The fact that in both contracts the parties contracting with Mrs. Hinkel and Jones agreed that they would co-operate in sustaining the will affords no answer to a demand by them for distribution. There is no claim that the evidence shows any past failure on the part of any of them, and the continuance of such co-operation, up to the completion of the final settlement of the estate, is not made a condition precedent to their right to receive the money. On the contrary, each agreement declares plainly that the moneys agreed to be paid were to be distributed as soon as distribution could be had. Nor was it a condition to the right to receive the money by order of distribution that the will should be upheld. It is true that a party interested in an estate may by agreement estop himself from asking for a partial distribution. Estate of Glenn, 153 Cal. 77, 94 Pac. 230; Estate of Colton, 164 Cal. 1, 127 Pac. 643. But the agreements in this case, looking as they did to the earliest possible distribution, irrespective of the final outcome of the efforts to have the will admitted to probate, furnish no support for a claim of estoppel against the respondents here.

[5] In the order making distribution to Edgar W. Hinkel the court did not require the distributee to give a bond. As already stated, the time for filing claims had expired when the decree was made, and under the provision of section 1661 of the Code of Civil Procedure the court was therefore authorized to dispense with the bond.

The agreement with Edgar W. Hinkel provided, as we have above stated, that the sum to be paid thereunder should be paid only after the payment of the moneys agreed to be paid to John Hinkel as trustee. But the court found that such trustee, for whose benefit and protection this clause was obviously inserted, had expressly waived any objection to the granting of distribution to Edgar W. Hinkel, and had consented thereto. There is, therefore, no substantial ground of objection to the two distributions being ordered at the same time.

The decrees appealed from are affirmed.

SPIERS v. SPIERS et al. (S. F. 7282.)

NEW TRIAL 🔑108(2)—GROUNDS—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to quiet title to lands, where the judgment, locating a section corner, was supported by unsatisfactory evidence, a new trial should have been granted, on discovery of an assistant to the original surveyor, whose affidavit identified a certain mound of stones as the corner, and the further discovery of the mound of stones, whose existence was not known at the time of the trial.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by Joshua Spiers against Elizabeth Spiers and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Judgment vacated, and order reversed.

H. B. Churchill, of Lakeport, and Charles Stewart and J. E. Pemberton, both of San Francisco, for appellants. C. M. Crawford, of Lakeport, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The complaint stated a cause of action to quiet title to a parcel of land described as lot 2, of section 5, township 11 north, range 7 west, in Lake county. The defendants are the owners of lot 1, adjoining lot 2 on the east. The only point in dispute is the location of the division line between the two parcels. The position of this line is controlled by the location of the northeast corner of section 5, which is also the northeast corner of lot 1. It does not appear that the corner at the intersection of the division line of the lots with the north line of section 5 was fixed and monumented by the government survey. The quarter section corner, being the northwest corner of lot 2, was fixed, and the monument still remains. The position of the division line is to be fixed by ascertaining the location of the northeast corner of the section, and dividing the distance between that and the quarter section corner. The parties differ solely with respect to the location of the said northeast corner of the section, it being also the northwest corner of section 4.

The plaintiff derives title to lot No. 2 from the United States under a recent entry as a homestead claim. The defendants deraign title from the United States to lot 1, through Charles C. Copsey, who entered upon and obtained title thereto about the year 1877. Near the division line are situated certain mineral springs, known as Copsey's Springs. Aside from these springs, the land is of little value, and the controversy arises from the claim of the plaintiff that the easterly line of lot 2 is only 8 feet west of the main spring of said Copsey's Springs, and that several of the springs are included in lot 2; whereas, the contention of the defendants is that said line is some 200 feet westerly of said springs.

The court found that the monument set for the northeast corner of section 5 had been obliterated, so that its location could not be ascertained, and that the location thereof must be determined by what is known as the proportional method. The surveyors of the plaintiff testified that they found the corner monument at the northwest corner of lot 2, being the quarter section corner on the north side of section 5, and then proceeded easterly on the section lines of sections 5 and 4, and were unable to discover or locate any government monuments of the section or quarter section corners, until they reached the northeast corner of section 4; that thereupon they concluded that the common corner of sections 4 and 5 was to be treated as a "lost corner" and its location fixed by the proportional method. Accordingly they divided the distance between the known monuments into six equal parts, and located the section corner by measuring off four of these parts to the east, and two to the west, between the section corner and the quarter section corner of section 5. The court found in accordance with this survey and gave judgment accordingly. The effect was to fix the division line as above stated, 8 feet west of the main Copsey Spring.

We have concluded that the court erred in refusing to grant the motion for a new trial for newly discovered evidence. This renders it unnecessary to consider the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court, except so far as its weakness may tend to explain our conclusion as to the necessity of a new trial. The field notes of the government survey state that the monument was set at the northeast corner of section 5 "on top of ridge, bearing south 30 degrees east, and north 30 degrees west." The court fixed this corner in a depression easterly of the ridge and not on top thereof. The field notes state that at a point 2 chains east of said corner the "trail from Copsey's Springs to Lower Lake bears north and south." The plaintiff's surveyors were unable to find this trail. The testimony in behalf of the defendants tended to show that it was discoverable, and that by that mark the corner fixed by the court is too far to the east. Defendant's witnesses testified that they found a mound of stones near the top of the ridge, but a little farther west than they expected to find it, which they accepted as the section corner. The survey of sections 4 and 5 was made in 1876. The government survey of the sections immediately north, lying in township 12, was made in 1883 and 1884. The field notes of that survey state that the monument set for the northeast corner of section 5, by the previous survey, was discovered. There was an offset of 12 chains between the section corners of township 12 and those of township 11, in which this land is situated. The field notes of township 12 state that the section corner between sections 32 and 33, on the township line, was 12.05 chains west of the said monument for the northeast corner of section 5, and that the surveyor found the post set in said monument and destroyed that part of the mark thereon relating to township 12. There was evidence to the effect that the monument set for the corner between sections 32 and 33 was found, and that it was situated 12 chains west of the mound of stones which defendants claim to be the northeast corner of section 5. There was also testimony that Copsey, who was in possession of lot 1 for many years under his government title, had claimed that his northeast corner was on top of the ridge aforesaid, and that the western line of lot 1 was on the hillside west of the springs, and several hundred feet away.

Copsey's Springs were discovered by C. C. Copsey prior to the government survey in 1876, and at that time he was in possession thereof and was conducting a health resort thereon. Shortly after that survey was approved he made entry thereon and secured a patent for lot 1, and thereafter, evidently believing that it included all of the springs aforesaid, he continued to occupy and use the place as before, and erected buildings and other improvements thereon. As he was occupying the springs when the government survey was made, and took them up for entry very shortly afterwards, when the corners and marks of the survey must have been visible and well known, and as his main purpose was to secure possession of the springs, it is improbable that he should have been mistaken in the location of the springs with reference to the boundary lines. His conduct is strong evidence against the finding of the court. These circumstances sufficiently show that the location of the corner as fixed by the court was at all events not the location thereof as fixed by the original government survey. The discovery of any additional evidence tending to fix the location "on top of ridge," as stated in the field notes, would be strong reason for directing a new trial.

It is not clear that either the court below or the surveyors for the plaintiff correctly understood the rule with respect to the application of the proportional method of locating lost corners. In Weaver v. Howatt, 161 Cal. 84, 118 Pac. 522, the court said:

> "The trial court must ascertain, as near as may be, where this monument was set by the government surveyor. If the exact spot cannot be found, it must, if possible, decide from the data appearing in evidence its approximate position, and the proportional method is to be used only when no other reasonable method is possible, and it must be so used that it does not contradict or conflict with the official data that are not impeached, and which, when not impeached, confine the actual position within certain limits. The application of the proportional method must, in that case, be also confined to the same limits."

And further:

> "It is for the trial court, upon all the evidence, to fix the place at a point where it will best accord with the natural objects described in the field notes as being about it, and found to exist on the ground, and which is least inconsistent with the distances mentioned in the notes and plat."

This doctrine was affirmed in Weaver v. Howatt, 171 Cal. 302, 152 Pac. 925, being a second appeal upon the same case after an intervening trial. It is doubtful whether or not, in view of this rule, the court could in any event relocate the corner otherwise than "on top of ridge" referred to in the field notes. The newly discovered evidence would tend at least to locate it much nearer to that point.

The affidavits in support of the motion for a new trial show that the only surviving member of the crew of assistants of the government surveyor for the survey of 1876, was one William Blann, who resided in Woodland, in Yolo county. The map and field notes of the survey, a copy of which was introduced in evidence at the trial, did not give the names of the assistants. After the trial the fact that Blann was one of them, and that he was living in Yolo county, was discovered. He was taken to the premises, and made affidavit that the mound of stones claimed by the defendants to be the true location of the corner in dispute is the same mound of stones which he assisted to set for that corner in making the survey of 1876. There was no evidence given at the trial by any witness who claimed to have seen this mound at or near the time of the making of the survey. By counter affidavits it was shown that Blann had resided at Lower Lake, near the premises in question, for many years prior to 1897, and that he then removed to Woodland, Yolo county, where he has ever since resided, and that the record of the government survey, showing his name as one of the assistants, was in the land office at San Francisco. It may be conceded that, so far as Blann's evidence is concerned, the court below may in its discretion have properly refused a new trial, on the ground that due diligence was not exercised in endeavoring to find it before the trial. Nevertheless it tends to throw doubt upon the accuracy of the court's finding.

But the affidavits of defendants further show that after the trial the defendant Hoberg and others made a careful search of all of the north line of section 4, and that at a point some 43 chains easterly from the northeast corner of section 4 they found a mound of stones with a decayed square stake lying therein marked on its north side with the characters "¼ S"; that it showed great age, and that the south side was so weatherbeaten that nothing could be discovered thereon; that the mound was covered and hidden by a low, thick holly berry bush, which had apparently grown over and around it after it had been made. The field notes of the survey state that the surveyor set a post in a mound of stones at said quarter section corner, marked on the north and south sides, respectively, with the aforesaid characters. This evidence is not contradicted by counter affidavits. It is almost conclusive evidence of the location of the quarter section corner on the north line of section 4. The fact that the plaintiff's surveyors, three in number, searched this line and were unable to find this corner, that the defendants' surveyor had also searched the line before the trial, and failed to find it, and that it was so concealed by the bush as above mentioned, sufficiently absolves the defendants from the charge of lack of diligence in failing to discover it before the trial. Its position has an important bearing on the proportional method of location. If it be admitted that the evidence of Blann should be disregarded, and that the monument claimed by the defendants to be the northeast corner of section 5 must also be disregarded, and the corner treated as a lost corner, then, in applying the proportional method, this newly found quarter section corner must be taken as the eastern limit of uncertainty, and the space between that quarter section corner and the quarter section corner on the north line of section 5, is the distance which is to be divided into four parts. According to the affidavits, if this is done, and the section corner located accordingly, the corner of section 5 would be fixed some 200 feet westerly of the location thereof as established by the court, and the division line in dispute would be a corresponding distance westerly of the springs in question, thus saving to the defendants the property which they and their predecessors in interest had for so many years in good faith enjoyed and claimed. While this court seldom interferes with the discretion of the trial court in denying a motion for a new trial for newly discovered evidence, yet, in view of the peculiar nature of the question involved, we believe this to be one of the exceptional cases in which the action of the court below in refusing a new trial should be overruled.

The judgment is vacated, and the order denying a new trial is reversed.

BOGGESS et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 8349.)

MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑375(2)—COMPENSATION FOR INJURIES—"ARISING OUT OF AND IN COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT."

An employé returning from a place where he had gone on his own affairs had reached a point from which he intended taking a stage to his employer's mine, when he met the employer's superintendent, who asked him to assist in loading goods into auto trucks, telling him that the employer would pay him for his time, and as a matter of convenience offering to let him ride on the truck instead of taking the stage. While on the trip to the mine, he sustained an injury. Held, that the accident did not happen in the course of the employment, or arise out of the employment, as his going to the mine on the truck instead of by stage was no part of his service.

In Bank. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Jack Fenner to obtain compensation for personal injuries, opposed by R. A. Boggess, employer, and the Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation, Limited, insurer. Compensation was awarded, and the employer and the insurer apply for a writ of review against the Industrial Accident Commission and Jack Fenner. Award annulled.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents. S. S. McCahill, of San Francisco, for applicant.

SHAW, J. The Industrial Accident Commission made an award in favor of Jack Fenner to compensate him for injuries which he suffered from an accident which he claims arose out of his employment and happened in the course thereof. The petitioners ask that the said award be annulled, on the ground that the finding of the commission that the accident happened in the course of employment and arose out of it, is not sustained by any evidence.

Fenner was a miner employed to work as such in a quicksilver mine owned by Boggess, known as the Abbott Mine, situated near

Wilbur Springs, some 30 miles from the town of Williams, on the Southern Pacific railroad. A few days before the accident he was given leave of absence to go to Sacramento on his own affairs, and he was to return and resume work when his business was concluded. After transacting his business there he returned to Williams, intending to take the stage from Williams, to Wilbur Springs. At Williams he met Luther Johnson, who was the bookkeeper for Boggess, and who acted as superintendent of the mine in the absence of Boggess. Johnson had come to Williams with two auto trucks for the purpose of taking goods therein from Williams to the mine. Fenner told Johnson that he intended to go to Wilbur Springs on the stage. Thereupon Johnson told him that he wanted to load the trucks and return to the mine that day, and suggested that Fenner assist in the loading, saying that they could get them loaded in time for Fenner to go to the mine in the truck, instead of taking the stage to Wilbur Springs, and that Boggess would pay him for the time occupied in loading the trucks. Fenner assented to this and proceeded to assist in loading the trucks. Thereupon Johnson started with the trucks for the mine and Fenner accompanied him. Somewhere on the road, while Fenner was riding on the truck driven by Johnson, the accident happened whereby he received the injury for which the compensation was awarded. While on the journey from Williams to the mine he was engaged in no service whatever for Boggess. His duties as a miner did not require him to assist in loading trucks at Williams, but it was understood at the time he was employed as a miner that he was to do any work which he was directed to do, and it occasionally happened that miners were detailed to do work of this character outside. All these facts are established by the evidence without conflict.

It is apparent that the accident did not happen in the course of the employment, and that it did not arise out of the employment. Fenner was on leave to go from the mine to Sacramento on business of his own, and he was to return to the mine as soon as his business was concluded. There was no evidence showing or tending to show that the employment at Williams provided not only that he was to help unload the truck, but also that he was then, as a part of his service, to travel on the truck to the mine. On the contrary, his employment by Johnson to load the truck was temporary only and for the sole purpose of getting the truck loaded. His going to the mine on the truck, instead of by stage, was arranged merely as a matter of convenience to him. It was no part of his service. He was still in the process of returning to the mine in the pursuance of the arrangement by which he had left it temporarily. He has no more right under the law to claim compensation from Boggess for the injury which happened to him on the journey to the mine on the truck than he would have had if he had been riding on the stage as he first intended.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that the commission was not justified in making any award against Boggess.

The award is annulled.

CASUALTY CO. OF AMERICA v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

1. Master and Servant 🔑371—Workmen's Compensation Act—Liability.

An employer cannot be required to pay compensation, unless the accident arises out of and in the course of the employment.

2. Master and Servant 🔑405(4) — Workmen's Compensation Act—Injuries "Arising Out of and" in Course of Employment—Evidence.

Evidence held insufficient to show that the accident for which compensation was sought arose out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased workman.

In Bank. Application by Anna I. Anderson for Workmen's Compensation, opposed by the National Ice & Cold Storage Company, employer, and the Casualty Company of America, insurer. Certiorari by the insurer to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of applicant. Award annulled.

D. Hadsell, of San Francisco, Joe G. Sweet, of Berkeley, and E. A. Ingalls, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding in certiorari to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of Anna I. Anderson, widow of John A. Anderson, on the theory that the death of the latter was the result of injury received by him in the course of and arising out of his employment by the National Ice & Cold Storage Company, a corporation, the petitioner, being the insurance carrier of said company. The award is assailed on the ground that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the commission that the injury arose out of and happened in the course of his employment.

Anderson was fatally injured during the evening of July 22, 1916, while on duty on the employment premises as an employé of the ice and cold storage company, by falling from one of the upper floors of the company's building down the elevator shaft of a small platform elevator, used by employés, to the basement. The commission found that:

> "Said employé being about to use an elevator on the employer's premises, stepped into the elevator shaft and fell to the bottom of the shaft, the elevator having been moved the moment before, by another employé, unknown to said employé Anderson."

The elevator was operated by the employé having occasion to use it, and could be brought to any particular floor by one on that floor by means of the rope by which it was operated, unless held in place or locked by a device thereon.

The evidence we think, shows without substantial conflict that the employé who moved the elevator just before the accident, one Brigham, was on the top floor of the building, which he called the third floor, and that he was moving it up to that floor from some lower floor at which Anderson had just left it for some purpose, and was there attempting to use it again, when he fell. In other words, Anderson was not on the top floor when he attempted to use the elevator, but was on some lower floor. The evidence of Brigham, whose work was wholly on the top floor, was clear and positive to the effect that while there he had occasion to go to the first floor and went to the elevator shaft, rang the bell to warn others of his intended use of the elevator, and pulled the rope to bring the elevator up to that floor. He saw no sign of the presence of deceased at the time. We read the finding of the commission that the deceased "stepped into the elevator shaft and fell to the bottom of the shaft, the elevator having been moved the moment before by another employé" as evidencing their conclusion that deceased stepped into the shaft below the elevator, owing to the same having been just moved up the shaft by Brigham. In other words, they concluded that deceased was not then on the top floor. The only possible doubt as to this being the fact arises from the evidence as to a declaration made by the deceased to his wife the day after the injury, and one to his brother-in-law within three or four days after the injury. The latter testified that he asked deceased how the accident occurred and he said:

> "I was on the third floor and took the elevator to come down. I stepped down below the third floor, and just as I was stepping on the elevator again, some one pulled the rope and I fell and lost my balance."

The wife testified that he said to her "that he was on the third floor and as he took the elevator to go down, he stepped down between the elevator and the third floor, and just as he stepped down some one pulled the rope and he lost his balance and fell." What he meant by the "third floor" does not clearly appear, and the declarations are very uncertain and vague as to just how the accident occurred. In any event, as before stated, we think the finding of the commission substantially disposes of any theory that deceased was attempting to get on the elevator at the top floor, and is in accord with the clear and positive testimony of Brigham that deceased was then on a floor below the top floor, and about to take the elevator therefrom. We have discussed this matter at some length because we consider it a vital factor in the case.

The deceased was employed as a "dump tender" or "ice puller"; his duty being to handle ice for storage and shipment on the ground floor. The ice was manufactured above and sent to this ground floor by an elevator, where it was taken in charge by deceased and others in that department. Deceased had no expressly assigned duty which would take him to any other floor of the plant. However, both deceased and others working in the same line did occasionally go to the top floor for the purpose of ascertaining there from the person in charge whether any more ice was to be sent down, and if so, how much. We may assume for the purposes of this decision that if deceased was on such an errand at the time of the accident, and was then taking the elevator at the top floor to return to the ground floor, it might be held that he was acting in the course of his employment and that the accident arose out of his employment. But, as we have seen, it must be held that he was not taking the elevator at the top floor, and there is not a scintilla of evidence to indicate that he was on any such errand. The accident occurred during the evening of Saturday, July 22, 1916, an hour or so before the end of decedent's shift. Decedent had taken off his working garb and had on his street clothes at the time. The object of his leaving the ground floor and going to an upper floor is not indicated by any of the testimony. There is not a suggestion that any duty of his employment then called him from the ground floor, except in so far as it is suggested that he might have gone to the top floor to ascertain if any more ice was to be sent down. But even this cannot account for his presence on a lower floor and his attempt to take the elevator therefrom. Brigham testified that shortly before the accident, from the top floor he saw deceased take the elevator and come up and get off at a lower floor, and go out of his sight. This floor he said was not one of the ice floors, but the floor on which was "the cold storage room," "where they store produce or anything that they had in storage." It is not pretended that any duty of his employment called decedent to that floor, or that he had any right to be there. Brigham substantially testified that decedent did not come to the top floor at all on this occasion.

[1] An employer cannot be held liable under our compensation act unless the accident arises out of and in the course of the employment, and of course it devolves on a claimant to establish this fact by evidence from which such a conclusion is fairly inferable. As is stated by learned counsel for respondent:

"It is not always an easy matter to define the ambit of the employment and to draw a strict line about the duties, both expressly assigned and also the activities expected and permitted, incidental to assigned duties."

[2] But here, in view of the admitted facts, considered in connection with what we deem established by the record as to the situation of deceased at the time of the accident, there appears no warrant for holding that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment. It happened during the hour when deceased was obligated to be on duty, and also on the premises of the employer, but the record negatives any inference that decedent, in leaving and going away from the floor where it was his business to be, was engaged on any mission having any connection, direct or indirect, with the service for which he was employed.

The award of the Industrial Accident Commission is annulled.

In re HARKNESS' ESTATE. (S. F. 8093.)

1. TAXATION ⟹900(3) — INHERITANCE TAX — ASSESSMENT—SETTING ASIDE ORDER—SHOWING AND DISCRETION.

Even if, instead of being limited to motion for new trial as for newly discovered evidence, the state's representative can, as for mistake in not discovering and presenting declarations of deceased bearing on his residence, move, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to set aside order fixing inheritance tax, on the basis of deceased having died a resident of another state, still the showing to be made on such a motion, and the discretion of the trial court in passing on it, are the same as on a motion for new trial for newly discovered evidence.

2. TAXATION ⟹900(3) — INHERITANCE TAX — ASSESSMENT — SETTING ASIDE ORDER — DISCRETION—RESIDENCE OF DECEASED.

There was no abuse of discretion in holding, by denial of motion to set aside order fixing inheritance tax, on the basis of deceased being a nonresident, that newly discovered declarations of deceased that he was a resident of the state, taken in connection with the facts already produced, would not change the result reached, that he died a resident of Kentucky, where for more than 20 years he had maintained a home, never closed, with four or five servants, a string of horses, and several automobiles; his declarations being made after he had closed up his house in California, and his filing of income tax return in San Francisco being while he was detained by illness at his daughter's home, so that there was no longer time to file it elsewhere.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Benito County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Lamon V. Harkness, deceased. From an adverse order, the State Controller appeals. Affirmed.

Robert A. Waring, Inheritance Tax Atty., of Sacramento, and Edwin H. Pennock, of Los Angeles, for appellant. McCutchen, Olney & Willard, of San Francisco (Murray, Prentice & Howland, of New York City, of counsel), for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This appeal is taken by John S. Chambers, as controller of the state of California, from an order refusing to vacate a prior order fixing the inheritance tax in the above entitled matter.

Lamon V. Harkness died intestate on January 17, 1915, at the home of his daughter, Myrtle H. Macomber, in San Benito county in this state. Mrs. Macomber petitioned the superior court of said county for letters of administration on the ground that the decedent died in San Benito county, leaving estate therein and elsewhere in California and being a nonresident of said state. Upon the hearing of the petition counsel for the controller appeared and questioned the witnesses, including the petitioner and her husband, on the subject of the residence of decedent. The court found the residence of decedent to be in Kentucky, and on June 29, 1915, letters of administration were issued to Myrtle H. Macomber. On September 28, 1915, the matter of fixing the inheritance tax due on the estate of the decedent came on for hearing before the inheritance tax appraiser of the county, and Mr. and Mrs. Macomber were again examined by appellant's counsel as to the residence of the decedent. Thereafter an inheritance tax report was prepared in the office of counsel for appellant, containing the finding that the decedent was a resident of Kentucky at the time of his death. This report was duly filed with the court December 14, 1915. On December 28, 1915, the court made its order confirming said report and fixing the inheritance tax due out of the estate at $123,787.74 upon upwards of $2,000,000 of real and personal property in this state. On June 22, 1916, the controller gave notice to the administratrix of a motion to vacate the order on the ground that it had been taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect, for the reason that he had failed to discover and present to the court, either before or at the time the order was made, certain declarations made by the decedent to the effect that he was a resident of this state. Affidavits in support of the motion were filed the same day. The motion came up for hearing and argument, and on August 28, 1916, the court made its order denying the motion. From this order the controller appeals.

The facts from which the last residence or domicile of the decedent must be determined are not in dispute. Lamon V. Harkness was a widower, and a retired business man of considerable means. For upwards of 20 years he had been building up a very pretentious home near Donerail, Ky. There he also maintained an extensive stock farm, where he bred horses as his hobby. Only about two years in all were spent away from Kentucky, and these were taken up with traveling and visiting his daughter in California, his son in New York, and daughter in Pittsburgh, Pa. He also owned a home in New York City and another on Long Island. But the former was kept boarded up, and he had never spent a night in the latter. The decedent first came to California about 1900, stopping at a hotel in Pasadena. Thereafter, Mr. and Mrs. Macomber having established themselves in Pasadena, the decedent visited them there and bought a house adjoining theirs, in order to give it to his daughter, who, however, never accepted it, because of the expense of upkeep. But she did furnish it with her own furniture and installed her own servants. The decedent made several trips to this house, the last in 1906, but never staying more than about three months in any one year. He would bring with him only a small trunk and a hand bag, and never brought any servants. When the decedent left Pasadena in 1906, he never again returned to it, and the home was boarded up and put in the hands of agents for sale by Mr. Macomber, for the reason that decedent said he was never going there again. At about this time the Macombers bought a ranch in San Benito county, and decedent visited them there for a week. In 1913 he came again to stay for the holidays, but was taken sick and forced to remain several months. The last visit to California was made the following year, at the urgent request of his daughter and his physician, who recommended the change for decedent's health. It was on this visit, while staying at the home of his daughter, that decedent died. He owned a piece of mountain land adjoining the Macomber ranch, which land he had bought to keep off poachers and to give to his son-in-law. At the time of his death he also owned other pieces of property in Pasadena and stock in the Standard Oil Company of California. Besides considerable real and personal property in Kentucky, the decedent had a great deal of property in New York and elsewhere. From these facts the lower court concluded that the residence of decedent at the time of his death was in Kentucky.

The declarations relied upon by the controller to prove an intent to reside in California appear in certain affidavits and baggage declarations of the decedent. In 1910 and in 1912 the decedent was assessed in New York on personal property. On each occasion he made an affidavit in Kentucky stating that he was temporarily sojourning in Donerail, Ky., and was a resident of Los Angeles county, Cal. In 1911 and 1912, upon arriving from Europe, the decedent, in declaring his baggage, stated that he resided in Los Angeles county, Cal. The controller also relies upon the fact that, while decedent was visiting his daughter in 1914, he filed his federal income tax return in San Francisco, and that such return contains the printed instruction that it is to be filed in the district in which the person filing it resides. These various declarations were not discovered by appellant until after the order fixing the inheritance tax had been made. His contention is that they are an expression of decedent's intention to reside in California, and therefore throw sufficient doubt upon the correctness of the original order to warrant a new investigation of the facts.

The administratrix has interposed several objections to a consideration of the merits of the order of the lower court. They are: (1) That the order fixing the inheritance tax is a probate order, and no appeal is provided in section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, from an order refusing to vacate the original order; (2) that appellant is bound by the adjudication of nonresidence in the order granting letters of administration; (3) that no notice of motion to vacate was served on the heirs, who were not represented at the hearing of the motion; (4) and that, in any event, no showing was made of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, but at most only one of newly discovered evidence as ground for a new trial.

[1] Whether or not the remedy in case of newly discovered evidence, where the party has been represented at the trial, is restricted to a motion for a new trial, or also comprehends proceedings under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, has not as yet been decided in this state. See McKinley v. Tuttle, 34 Cal. 235. But none of the objections raised by respondent need be passed upon at this time, for the reason that it does not appear upon a review of the facts that the trial court in denying the motion abused its discretion. Assuming, for the purposes of this case only, that appellant was not restricted to a motion for a new trial, but could also properly proceed under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, still the showing to be made on the motion and the discretion of the trial court in passing upon it must be the same as in a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. It is well settled that on a motion of that character there must be a reasonable probability that upon a retrial the newly discovered evidence will change the result, and that "the question as to the effect of the newly discovered evidence upon the case is, from its nature, peculiarly one that is addressed to the discretion of the trial court," and, "unless the appellate court can plainly see that this discretion has been abused, that the showing made was of such a character as to make it manifest that the case would or should result differently on a new trial, in view of the newly discovered evidence, the order of the trial court refusing a new trial will not be disturbed." People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 78 Pac. 235. See, also, Estate of Emerson, 170 Cal. 81, 148 Pac. 523; People v. Oxnam, 170 Cal. 211, 149 Pac. 165; Atkinson v. Western Dev. Syndicate, 170 Cal. 511, 150 Pac. 363; Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 91.

[2] In the case at bar anything that might have been construed as an act of residence in Los Angeles county on the part of decedent had ceased in 1906, and the only facts pointing to residence in San Benito county were the purchase of the mountain land referred to and occasional visits with his daughter. There were no indications whatever, no showing that the decedent looked upon any part of California as his home, from which an intent to reside here could be gathered. In fact, it does appear that he disliked California and had to be urged to even visit here. In Kentucky, however, he did maintain an actual home, where he was cared for by his servants and surrounded by his friends and all the things he had enjoyed for over 20 years. This home place was never closed, and there were always four or five servants in attendance, a string of horses in the stables, and seven or eight automobiles in the garage.

To rebut the strong presumption of intention to reside in Kentucky arising from these facts, appellant relies upon the declarations above outlined. That they are some evidence of intent goes without saying. But they are by no means conclusive, and must be considered along with the circumstances under which they were made and other facts appearing in evidence. Jacobs, Law of Domicile, § 463. Even written declarations must give way if inconsistent with actual conduct. Holt v. Hendee, 248 Ill. 288, 93 N. E. 749, 21 Ann. Cas. 202; In re Morgan's Estate, 95 Misc. Rep. 451, 159 N. Y. Supp. 105. Here the decedent's statements that he resided in Los Angeles county were made years after he had closed up his house there, and during that period decedent had not spent even a day in that county. The filing of the income tax return in San Francisco appears to have occurred while decedent was detained at his daughter's home by illness, so that there was no longer time to file it elsewhere. In this state of the evidence it cannot be said that the trial court abused its discretion in holding that the newly discovered declarations, taken in connection with the facts already produced, would not change the result reached that the decedent died a resident of Kentucky.

This determination of the case makes it unnecessary to consider other points raised by appellant.

Order affirmed.

GIANNINI v. CAMPODONICO. (S. F. 7235.)

1. NEGLIGENCE 🔑33(1)—PRIVATE BUILDINGS—DUTY AS TO TRESPASSERS AND LICENSEES.

As against a trespasser or mere licensee, the owner of property owes no duty to keep the premises in safe condition; the only duty being to abstain from willful or wanton injury.

2. NEGLIGENCE 🔑32(1)—PRIVATE BUILDING—DUTY AS TO INVITEE.

To one who has been expressly or impliedly invited upon the premises the duty exists to exercise due care not to injure him or permit the premises to be in such condition that injury results.

3. NEGLIGENCE 🔑32(2)—PRIVATE STABLE—INJURY TO CHILDREN—INVITATION OF EMPLOYÉ.

The cleaning of defendant's private stable being a duty easily performed by his stableman, the stableman's request of a boy 14 years old to clean the stable was unauthorized, and could impose no additional duty upon defendant.

4. NEGLIGENCE 🔑32(2)—PRIVATE STABLE—INVITEE—EVIDENCE.

The cleaning of defendant's private stable being a duty easily performed by his stableman, the stableman's promise to pay a 14 year old boy to clean the stable could not make the boy an invitee, rendering defendant liable for injuries from a defective door, and prior services could not raise such relation, especially where not brought home to defendant.

5. NEGLIGENCE 🔑39—PLACES ATTRACTIVE TO CHILDREN—PRIVATE STABLE—"ATTRACTIVE NUISANCE."

A private stable is not an "attractive nuisance," merely because boys like to congregate in and around it.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Attractive Nuisance.]

6. NEGLIGENCE 🔑39—PLACES ATTRACTIVE TO CHILDREN—PRIVATE STABLE.

Where a minor 14 years of age was present in defendant's private stable by request of the stableman, the "turntable cases" doctrine could not be invoked; it being essential that the minor should have been attracted to the premises by a childlike curiosity.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Marcel E. Cerf, Judge.

Action by Gerald Giannini, a minor, by Esther Giannini, his guardian ad litem, against Henry Campodonico. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Fred L. Dreher, of San Francisco, for appellant. Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Plaintiff, through his guardian ad litem, brought this action to recover for personal injuries sustained while in a private stable of the defendant, and alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial.

The evidence produced on behalf of the respondent shows that the plaintiff, Gerald Giannini, was 14 years old and resided across the street from the stable owned by the defendant, who employed a colored stableman to take care of the horses and wagons and keep the stable in order. On the morning of the accident respondent saw the stableman leaving in a buggy and at that time the stableman requested the boy to clean the stable during his absence and promised to pay him a nickel upon his return. A small door, which was a part of a large sliding door, was left open for the boy. Subsequently the respondent and two other boys entered the stable, and while respondent was on the premises the large sliding door fell, breaking respondent's leg and inflicting other injuries. It appears that a large number of boys frequently congregated about the stable, and at times went into the stable while the stableman was there, but at no other time did any of the boys enter while the stableman was away. Upon several occasions respondent performed errands for the stableman at the latter's request and received some sort of remuneration. It also appears that at times the stableman and the defendant himself would drive the boys away from the stable. The door which fell down had previously been out of order, and the stableman had attempted to remedy the defect. At the close of the trial in the lower court, respondent, with leave of the court, amended his complaint to allege that the stable was attractive to children, presumably to bring the case within the rule of the "turntable cases."

[1, 2] Upon behalf of defendant evidence was produced to show that the stableman had not requested respondent to clean the stable and had not left the small door open for him, but that in fact respondent upon this occasion was a trespasser. The stableman also testified that he had never employed respondent to do any work about the stable, and defendant himself stated that whenever he saw any of the boys around the stable he drove them away. But, disregarding the testimony advanced by defendant, and looking only to the case as presented by the respondent, no ground for holding the defendant liable appears. It is well settled that as against a trespasser or mere licensee the owner of property owes no duty to keep the premises in safe condition. The only duty is to abstain from willful or wanton injury. In other respects one who thus enters upon the premises does so at his own risk and subject to all the ordinary risks which attach to such premises. Means v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 Pac. 1001, 1 Ann. Cas. 206; Kennedy v. Chase, 119 Cal. 637, 52 Pac. 33, 63 Am. St. Rep. 153; Schmidt v. Bauer, 80 Cal. 565, 22 Pac. 256, 5 L. R. A. 580. It is only in the case of one who has been expressly or impliedly invited upon the premises that the duty exists to exercise due care not to injure him or permit the premises to be in such condition that injury results. 29 Cyc. 453.

[3] The first question is whether the request of the stableman in this case is such an invitation as to render the respondent an invitee. Without regard to defendant's testimony that he forbade the stableman to permit any one else to do the work about the stable, the facts themselves show that the duties of the stableman were of such a menial character that the position could not have carried with it the implied right to delegate the work or hire others to assist in the same. See Curry v. Addoms, 166 App. Div. 433, 151 N. Y. Supp. 1017; Formall v. Standard Oil Co., 127 Mich. 496, 86 N. W. 946. In fact, the duties were such that the stableman could very easily perform them without aid. It must therefore be held that the request to do the work was unauthorized, and could not impose any additional liability upon the defendant. The case last cited is one particularly applicable upon its facts, and there a like conclusion was reached. See, also, Nofsinger v. Goldman, 122 Cal. 609, 616, 55 Pac. 425; Clark v. A. T. & S. F. R. Co., 164 Cal. 363, 128 Pac. 1032.

[4] Respondent seeks to bring this case within the rule announced in several decisions in other states, where it is held that one who at the unauthorized request of an employé performs a service in which the former or his employer is also interested, as a shipper's teamster putting a freight car in place, that person occupies a middle position between a licensee and a servant and can hold the owner of the car for any injuries received. See Thompson on Negligence, § 4986. But there seems to be only one case, Cleveland Terminal Ry. v. Marsh, 63 Ohio St. 236, 58 N. E. 821, 52 L. R. A. 142, where the mere payment for the service raises a sufficient interest in the work performed to bring the person within the above-mentioned rule. Without expressing any opinion upon the propriety of this rule in other cases, we cannot see how the mere payment by the unauthorized employé can change the relation of the employer to the third party from one of nonliability to one of liability. There are numerous cases which hold that a bystander, who performs a service at the request of an employé who has no authority to make the request, is as to the employer a mere volunteer, to whom the employer owes no duty to safeguard from negligence. McDaniel v. Highland Ave. R. Co., 90 Ala. 64, 8 South. 41; Ga., etc., Ry. Co. v. Propst, 83 Ala. 518, 3 South. 764; Flower v. Penna. R. Co., 69 Pa. 210, 8 Am. Rep. 251. For the employé to pay the bystander for the work done can upon no basis of reasoning create a liability where none existed before. In the case at bar, therefore, the stableman's promise to pay respondent to clean the stable could not make the latter an invitee. Neither can prior services raise such a relation, especially where it is not pretended that they were brought home in any way to the defendant. The fact that respondent is a minor does not give him any greater rights under the circumstances. "That might excuse him from concurring negligence, but cannot supply the place of negligence on the part of the company, or confer an authority on one who has none. It may excite our sympathy, but cannot create rights or duties which have no other foundation." Flower v. Penna. R. Co., supra.

[5] The only remaining question is whether the stable constitutes an "attractive nuisance" within the doctrine of the "turntable cases." That doctrine was adopted in this state in the case of Barrett v. Southern Pacific Co., 91 Cal. 296, 27 Pac. 666, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, and is usually applied to instances where the owner of land has erected upon it dangerous machinery, the consequences of meddling with which are not supposed to be fully comprehended by infant minds. In Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 47 Pac. 113, 598, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106, the rule was characterized as exceptional and "not to be carried beyond the class of cases to which it has been applied." This court, in Cahill v. Stone Co., 153 Cal. 571, 96 Pac. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094, applied the rule to a heavily loaded push car which the defendant had allowed to stand upon tracks in a thickly populated district, where small children were known to play upon this car, which had not been made fast, and, being upon a down grade, was used to ride upon by children, in the process of which one of them was injured. But the court in that case expressly rested the decision upon the ground that the car, situated as it was, was dangerous machinery peculiarly attractive to children, who might be injured in riding upon it, though not comprehending the danger involved. We have not such a case here. If a stable is an attractive nuisance merely because boys like to congregate in and around it, then any place where boys like to play comes within the same category, yet it is clear that such is not the law. Peters v. Bowman, supra; Loftus v. Dehail, 133 Cal. 214, 65 Pac. 379.

[6] Moreover, it is an essential ingredient of a cause of action to which the "turntable cases" doctrine applies that the minor should have been attracted to the premises by a childish curiosity and desire to play thereon. Union Stockyard, etc., Co. v. Butler, 92 Ill. App. 166. In this case the reason for respondent's presence in the stable was the request of the stableman, and there is no pretense that upon this occasion the attraction of the stable had any influence whatever upon his visit there.

The result reached renders unnecessary any consideration of alleged errors urged by appellant.

For the reasons above given, the judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

HENSHAW et al. v. FOSTER et al., Board of Sup'rs of San Diego County, et al.

1. Waters and Water Courses ⚷182 — Municipal Water District — Interference with Powers of Cities.

St. 1911, p. 1290, as amended by St. 1911, (Ex. Sess.) § 92, providing that the people of one or more municipalities in any county, with or without incorporated territory in the county, may organize a municipal water district, by proceedings therein provided, does not contravene Const. art. 11, § 19, empowering any municipality to establish and operate public works for supplying its inhabitants with water and authorizing it to furnish such service to inhabitants and people outside its boundaries, provided that it shall not furnish service to the inhabitants of any other municipality supplying the same service to such inhabitants without the consent of such other municipality.

2. Constitutional Law ⚷63(1)—Taxation ⚷38—Waters and Water Courses ⚷182—Municipal Water Districts—Delegation of Taxing Power.

St. 1911, p. 1290, as amended by St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 92, authorizing the people of several municipalities in a county to organize a municipal water district, and delegating to the district's board of directors its corporate authority, power to tax with reference to its affairs, does not contravene Const. art. 11, §§ 12, 13, denying power to the Legislature to tax counties, cities, or other municipalities for county, city, or other municipal purposes, or to delegate power to any one else to control or supervise any county, city, or municipal affairs, but authorizing it to, by general law, vest in the corporate authorities thereof power to tax for such purposes.

3. Constitutional Law ⚷283 — Waters and Water Courses ⚷182—Due Process —Formation of Municipal Water District.

St. 1911 p. 1290, as amended by St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 92, authorizing the people of several municipalities of a county to organize a municipal water district, the directors of which may tax for its purposes, does deprive a citizen of property without due process, because no inhabitant of the proposed district has opportunity, save by his vote, of declaring his unwillingness to come within its limits and under the authority of its officers, the board of supervisors, if the proper number of names are attached to the petition for formation of the district being required to call the election.

MELVIN, J. Respondents, who are owners of land in the county of San Diego, brought this action to enjoin the board of supervisors of that county from calling an election for the purpose of determining whether or not a district to be known as the San Diego municipal water district should be incorporated under the provisions of an act entitled "An Act to provide for the incorporation and organization and management of municipal water districts, and to provide for the acquisition or construction by said districts of waterworks, and for the acquisition of all property necessary therefor, and also to provide for the distribution and sale of water by said districts," approved May 1, 1911, together with the amendment thereto approved December 24, 1911, and the further amendment thereto approved May 29, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 921). A petition signed by the requisite number of qualified electors within the territory proposed as that of the contemplated district had been duly filed. The real property of the taxpaying plaintiffs is within this territory. The district, as outlined in the petition, includes lands not now within any municipality, as well as the territory of three incorporated cities, San Diego, East San Diego, and La Mesa, and that of one irrigation district known as La Mesa, Lemon Grove, and Spring Valley irrigation district. The plaintiffs alleged in their pleading that by the calling and holding of the election certain of their constitutional rights would be violated. To their complaint a demurrer was interposed and was overruled by the court. The supervisors and county clerk refusing to plead further, judgment was accordingly entered. By it the plaintiffs were given the injunctive relief for which they had prayed. From said judgment this appeal is taken.

[1] Respondents set forth in their complaint and here contend that the act of the Legislature under which the petitioning electors proposed to organize the district was in violation of section 19 of article 11 of the Constitution of California. That section provides that:

> "Any municipal corporation may establish and operate public works for supplying its inhabitants with light, water, power, heat, transportation, telephone service or other means of communication. * * * A municipal corporation may furnish such services to inhabitants outside its boundaries; provided that it shall not furnish any service to the inhabitants of any other municipality owning or operating works supplying the same service to such inhabitants, without the consent of such other municipality, expressed by ordinance."

It is their contention that since the three cities mentioned above (each being vested with the power of furnishing its inhabitants with water) are included within the limits of the proposed district, there would be necessarily an intolerable clash of authority between the governing bodies of these municipalities and the trustees of the water district, if it should be established. In support of this contention they rely principally upon the declarations of this court in the opinion in Matter of the Petition of the Sanitary Board of the East Fruitvale Sanitary District, 158 Cal. 453, 111 Pac. 368. In that proceeding the court was considering the effect of the annexation of the territory of a sanitary district to a city, and it was held that the minor municipal corporation was merged in the major one and lost its identity. The language of the court upon which respondents place the greatest emphasis is as follows:

> "It is a well-settled doctrine that 'there cannot be at the same time, within the same territory, two distinct municipal corporations exercising the same powers, jurisdiction and privileges' 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (4th Ed.) § 184; King v. Pasmore, 3 Term R. 199, 243; Bloomfield v. Glen Ridge, 54 N. J. Eq. 276, 283 (33 Atl. 925). Accordingly, it is generally held that where one municipal corporation is annexed to another the annexing city takes over the functions of the annexed municipality, and the latter by virtue of the annexation is extinguished, and its property, powers, and duties are vested in the corporation of which it has become a part. 28 Cyc. 217; Mt. Pleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 514, 528 [25 L. Ed. 699]; Adams v. Minneapolis, 20 Minn. 484 (Gil. 438); People v. Supervisors, 94 N. Y. 263; Stroud v. Stevens Point, 37 Wis. 367; Schriber v. Langlade, 66 Wis. 616, 29 N. W. 547, 554. If this be true where one of two municipal corporations having co-extensive powers is annexed to another, the same result must follow a fortiori where a public corporation having powers more limited than those of a municipal corporation is annexed to a city which possesses all of the powers of the corporation which has been annexed to it and others in addition."

This declaration is by no means decisive of the problem presented by the appeal now before us. Indeed, it is of little value, for it is not, as is the complaint herein, based upon constitutional grounds at all. In the next paragraph of the opinion the following language is used:

> "These rules do not rest upon any theory of constitutional limitation. In the absence of any constitutional restriction, the Legislature has absolute power over the organization, the dissolution, the extent, the powers, and the liabilities of municipal and other public corporations established as agencies of the state for purposes of local government. In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106, 28 Pac. 275, 675 [14 L. R. A. 755]. What shall be the effect of the enlargement or diminution of the boundaries of such corporations, or of the consolidation of two into one, or of the annexation of the territory of one into another, is a question to be answered by a determination of the legislative intent. The cases above cited declare the result of such action under laws which do not show affirmatively an intent to continue the existence of two separate public corporations within the same territorial limits."

In the statute before us the legislative intent is declared in plain language. The second section of the original act is as follows:

> "The people of any county or portion of a county, whether such portion includes unincorporated territory or not, in the state of California, may organize a municipal water district under the provisions of this act by proceeding as herein provided." Stats. 1911, p. 1290.

The corresponding section of the amending act approved December 24, 1911, is as follows:

> "The people of any city and county, or of one or more municipal corporations in any county with or without unincorporated territory in such county, in the state of California, may organize a municipal water district under the provisions of this act by proceeding as herein provided." Extra Sessions, Stats. 1911, p. 92.

In the case of Pixley v. Saunders, 168 Cal. 152, 141 Pac. 815, it was held that the inclusion of a part of a sanitary district within a subsequently incorporated town neither destroyed the autonomy of the district nor relieved the land within both municipalities from taxation by the properly constituted authorities of the district. While concededly both corporations had jurisdiction of matters of sanitation, it was held in that case that the Legislature may provide for the formation of districts for the sanitation of territories which might not be adequately reached by means available to the purely local jurisdiction of municipal corporations already existing within them. In that case the act under review did not as clearly as does this statute, provide that any district formed thereunder might include other municipalities, but it did provide for the formation of a district in any part of the state and in one of the sections relating to dissolution of sanitary districts reference was made to "any incorporated city or town that may be in occupation of a considerable portion of the territory of the district." Reasoning from these expressions this court concluded that it might "be fairly inferred that the Legislature intended that sanitary districts might embrace both incorporated and unincorporated territory." In the case at bar the reason for a like conclusion with reference to municipal water districts is much stronger because in the statute providing for their creation and operation we discover the legislative design of permitting the formation of districts for the convenient and economical development of a water supply within an area physically appropriate for such purpose without unduly restricting the powers of the inhabitants and their privileges by reason of the existence of smaller political entities situated within the larger tract and possessing powers somewhat similar to those secured for the corporation embracing the larger territory. The purpose is beneficent. By the law and under its sanctions the people of one or more municipalities with the adjacent territory may unite for the joint benefit of all forming a municipal corporation through which they may accomplish that which it would be impossible for any one of the constituent municipal or suburban units to perform. Unless grave constitutional reasons impel this court to the contrary, such an act will be upheld. In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296–310, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106. We do not discover that section 19 of article 11 contains any constitutional inhibition upon such legislation.

[2] We will next examine the contention of respondents that the statute in question is contrary to the provisions of the twelfth and thirteenth sections of article 11. Those sections are as follows:

> "Sec. 12. The Legislature shall have no power to impose taxes upon counties, cities, towns or other public or municipal corporations, or upon the inhabitants or property thereof, for county, city, town, or other municipal purposes, but may, by general laws, vest in the corporate authorities thereof the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes.
> "Sec. 13. The Legislature shall not delegate to any special commission, private corporation, company, association or individual any power to make, control, appropriate, supervise or in any way interfere with any county, city, town or municipal improvement, money, property, or effects, whether held in trust or otherwise, or to levy taxes or assessments or perform any municipal function whatever, except that the Legislature shall have power to provide for the supervision, regulation and conduct, in such manner as it may determine, of the affairs of irrigation districts, reclamation districts or drainage districts, organized or existing under any law of this state."

Respondents take the position that the act in question violates the above-quoted sections 12 and 13, because "it delegates to some one other than the corporate authorities the power to assess and collect taxes for city and municipal purposes." This argument, like the other objection discussed herein, is based in part upon the supposed exclusive authority conferred by section 19 of article 11 upon cities. But, as we have seen, that article applies not merely to cities and towns but to all municipal corporations, and power to acquire and sell water may be given to municipalities larger in territory and including within themselves cities and towns or similar corporations. This is done in the statute before us not in opposition to section 12, but by general provisions which vest in the corporate authorities of the district the power to assess and collect special taxes for the purposes contemplated. The corporate authority of such a district is the board of directors, and to that board is delegated the taxing power not in relation to matters of a purely local character in the included city or cities, but having reference to the affairs of the larger municipality, embracing within it the others of lesser areas. In this view of the statute there is no violation of section 13 because the Legislature does not delegate to the directors control or supervision of any of the purely local affairs of the cities, but by general law enables the inhabitants of a district including cities to form a district and to elect their own taxing board to raise the necessary funds for district purposes. As the court declared in the opinion in the Madera Irrigation District proceeding, the liability to the district of the inhabitants of an included town is similar to that of the same inhabitants for their proportion of the indebtedness of the county within which they reside.

[3] The statute is also attacked in the complaint as being contrary to the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States and those of section 13 of article 1 of the Constitution of California. It is argued that since no inhabitant of the proposed district has an opportunity, save by his vote, of declaring his unwillingness to come within its limits and under the authority of its officers, and since the board of supervisors, if the proper number of names are attached to the petition for the formation of the district, must call the election, the result may be to deprive the citizen of property without any opportunity of being heard. Appellants concede that there is no provision for a hearing before a tribunal clothed with authority to act on the matter of the extent of the district and the exclusion of lands therefrom. The statute requires publication of notice containing the text of the petition, the boundaries of the proposed district, and the date when the petition will be presented to the supervisors. But it is provided that:

> "When such petition is presented the board of supervisors shall give notice of an election to be held in said proposed water district for the purpose of determining whether or not the same shall be incorporated."

Respondents assert that there is no provision for a hearing of the property owner's objections at any time, and Brookes v. City of Oakland, 160 Cal. 423, 117 Pac. 433, is cited as authority for declaring the act unconstitutional. That was a case in which this court was considering a statute giving to a city council power to create sewer districts within the city whenever, in the judgment of the council, such course should seem proper. Such a proceeding was one directly affecting private property. An important distinction is to be observed between a proceeding which has for its purpose the making of a local public improvement and one for the creation of a district having extensive powers. As Mr. Justice Shaw said in delivering the opinion in Wilcox v. Engebretsen, 160 Cal. 288–293, 116 Pac. 750, 752:

> "Another distinction is to be made between the proceedings of a board or council acting in pursuance of some delegated legislative authority in creating or extending a political subdivision of the state, as a county or a city, a proceeding which does not directly affect private property, and proceedings to open, grade, regrade, or improve a street, which do directly charge or affect private property. People v. Ontario, 148 Cal. 632, 634, 84 Pac. 205; People v. Loyalton, 147 Cal. 779, 82 Pac. 620; Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 412; In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 323, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106, 14 L. R. A. 755, 28 Pac. 272, 675. The creation of a city and the annexation of territory thereto are matters delegated to the Legislature, acting by means of general laws, by which some board or council is invested with authority in that behalf. If the statute provides that such proceeding may be begun by the filing of a petition with the particular board or council having the authority, the fact that such body acts upon a petition which does not appear bad upon its face, and proceeds thereon according to law, is usually held to be conclusive of the sufficiency of the petition against any collateral attack."

It has been held that where no discretionary power is vested in any legislative body with regard to the boundaries of a territory proposed for annexation to a city, the act is not for that reason unconstitutional (People v. Town of Ontario, 148 Cal. 627, 84 Pac. 205); that in the formation of a town the finding of the supervisors that the petition is regularly signed by inhabitants of the proposed territory is conclusive (People v. Town of Loyalton, 147 Cal. 774, 82 Pac. 620); that a taxpayer may not restrain collection of a tax assessed against his land as a part of a levee district regularly formed after petition to the supervisors (Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 406); and that the organization of an irrigation district under the "Wright Act" does not violate the constitutional provision regarding "due process" (In re Madera Irrigation District, supra). Respondents insist that we are here dealing with a matter directly affecting private property. They call attention to the fact that in Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369, the Supreme Court of the United States declared the necessity for a hearing "at some time to those interested upon the question of fact whether or not the land of any owner which was intended to be included would be benefited by the irrigation proposed," and that the Wright Act was upheld upon the express declaration of the court that an appropriate hearing before the board of supervisors is in that act provided. Notwithstanding any expressions in the Fallbrook Irrigation Case, we are committed to the reasoning of the Madera District Case, which was followed in People v. Ontario long after the decision in the other case had been made. In the opinion in the Madera District Case the irrigation district was treated as a public corporation to be invested with certain political duties to be exercised in behalf of the state. That a water district such as the one sought to be established in San Diego county is also such a corporation may not be doubted under the authority of that decision. The statute in its scope is even broader than the Wright Irrigation Act, and is quite as complex in its details as is that law. To classify a district created under its sanction with a sewer district such as that described in the Brookes Case would be to disregard the distinction pointed out in Wilcox v. Engebretsen. The following quotation from In re Madera Irrigation District, supra, seems to us to be conclusive upon the matter of the constitutionality of the statute:

> "The constitutionality of the act in question is further assailed upon the ground that it makes no provision for a hearing from the owners of the land prior to the organization of the district. But the steps provided for the organization of the district are only for the creation of a public corporation to be invested with certain political duties which it is to exercise in behalf of the state. (Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 406.) It has never been held that the inhabitants of a district are entitled to notice and hearing upon a proposition to submit such question to a popular vote. In the absence of constitutional restriction, it would be competent for the Legislature to create such public corporation, even against the will of the inhabitants. It has as much power to create the district in accordance with the will of the majority of such inhabitants. It must be observed that such proceeding does not affect the property of any one within the district, and that he is not by virtue thereof deprived of any property. Such result does not arise until after delinquency on his part in the payment of an assessment that may be levied upon his property, and before that time he has opportunity to be heard as to the correctness of the valuation which is placed upon his property, and made the basis of his assessment. He does not, it is true, have any opportunity to be heard, otherwise than by his vote in determining the amount of bonds to be issued, or the rate of assessment with which they are to be paid; but in this particular he is in the same condition as is the inhabitant of any municipal organization which incurs a bonded indebtedness, or levies a tax for its payment. His property is not taken from him without due process of law, if he is allowed a hearing at any time before the lien of the assessment thereon becomes final. (People v. Smith, 21 N. Y. 595; Gilmore v. Hentig, 33 Kan. 170 [5 Pac. 781]; Hagar v. Rec. Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701 [4 Sup. Ct. 663, 28 L. Ed. 569]; Davies v. Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 46 [24 Pac. 771])."

Respondents also attack the petition and question the validity of the proceedings based thereon because of the inclusion within the boundaries of the proposed district of La Mesa, Lemon Grove, and Spring Valley irrigation district. This contention is sufficiently answered by the discussion of their objections based upon the fact that cities were also to be included within the boundaries of the district.

The demurrer to the complaint was erroneously overruled. Therefore the judgment is reversed, with instruction to the superior court to sustain the said demurrer.

TERRY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 14, 1917.)

MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑86 — INJURIES TO SERVANT — RECOVERY — INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

In the absence of evidence as to the exact work in which the employé was engaged when injured, whether intrastate or interstate, the employer's liability is not governed by the federal Employers' Liability Act (Act April 22, 1908, c. 149, 35 Stat. 65 [U. S. Comp. St. 1916, §§ 8657-8665]).

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by J. V. Terry against the Southern Pacific Company. There was judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, and defendants appealed, and the judgment was affirmed whereupon defendants applied for a hearing in the Supreme Court. Application denied.

The following is the opinion of James, J., in the District Court of Appeal, concurred in by Conrey, P. J., and Works, Judge pro tem.:

An appeal was taken herein from the judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff and from an order denying to the defendant a new trial. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained while he was employed by the defendant corporation. He charged in his complaint that the defendant was negligent in failing to place guards and lights about a "transfer pit" into which plaintiff fell while at work during the nighttime. Defendant admitted the employment of the plaintiff. That the plaintiff suffered the injuries complained of was denied in the answer. It was alleged affirmatively that the plaintiff failed to use ordinary care, and was himself guilty of negligence by which his alleged injuries were produced. It was then alleged in defense that plaintiff's own negligence, contributing to produce his injuries, "was not slight in comparison with gross negligence, if any, of this defendant, and that if this defendant was guilty of any negligence whatever in the premises, the said plaintiff was guilty of equal negligence at least, directly and proximately causing and contributing to said accident." There followed in the answer a further special plea that the accident was caused through a risk incident to the business in which the plaintiff was employed, which risk was one which was assumed by the plaintiff. The jury assessed damages in plaintiff's favor in the sum of $3,500.

Plaintiff testified that he was working at the time he suffered the injuries complained of as night foreman of boilermakers in the yards of the defendant corporation in Los Angeles; that in passing between the boiler shop and machine shop, across or about a transfer table used for the purpose of distributing locomotives in the shops, he slipped and fell into the pit which was at the sides of the transfer table; that there was no other way of crossing the pit except in the manner then used by him. He further testified that several men had fallen into the pit before and that he (the plaintiff) had at different times called attention of his superior to the conditions, and had urged that there be some lights provided in order that accidents might be avoided. He did not testify that there was any promise to erect lights. On cross-examination he was asked particularly to describe the general conditions of the place as they were at the time of the accident. In response to questions he testified that there were engines lined up all about the shop and pit—passenger engines and freight engines. He said: "Any engine that was supposed to be repaired. All engines under repair were moved by this transfer pit and transfer track engines not in operation, all engines under repair were transferred back and forth over the pit." This question was then asked: "Those included passenger engines used outside of Los Angeles and outside of this state?" There was an objection that the question asked for immaterial matter, which objection being overruled, the witness answered: "I will answer any engine brought in the shop to be repaired, no matter where it came from, was transferred back and forth; whether they were local or through passenger."

The defendant called as a witness Patrick Sheedy, its superintendent of motive power.

This witness was asked particularly as to the kind of repair work which was done at the shops where the plaintiff was employed; the purpose of the defendant being to show that the business there transacted was all connected with interstate commerce. This line of testimony was objected to, and the court at one point suggested that it might be admitted by agreement and they might "check up" on the law later. Sheedy described the character of work done at the railroad shops. He first said that it was interstate business entirely, unless some outside party wanted work done, which was often the case; that the transfer table was used for the purpose of transferring engines used on interstate trains to the repair shops. While he gave it as his conclusion that the business of the shops was all connected with interstate traffic, on cross-examination he said: "Interstate commerce is traffic between two states. As to in what sense this table can be traffic between two states, it handles equipment used for that purpose. They can be run over it. It stays where it is all the time, and does not go with the train into another state. We use it on all equipment of the company. We have divisions that don't go into another state, and going to Sacramento is not in another state. If we run a train to Sacramento and got broken equipment we would use that table on that engine. We use it on the San Francisco line engines." The other testimony introduced had to do particularly with the question of the character of the injuries suffered by the plaintiff, which testimony tended to create a conflict in the evidence. As to that matter no question is here presented, for it is conceded that the verdict of the jury upon that subject is conclusive.

The chief propositions upon which appellant relies for a reversal depend altogether upon whether under the issues made in the case the rules governing the right of recovery are those attending the application of the federal Employers' Liability Act, or those prescribed by the statutes of this state. There is no dispute, and the proposition seems to be conceded, that a state court may take jurisdiction of an action for damages under the federal Employers' Liability Act, as well as an action under the state law. The alleged injuries suffered by the plaintiff were caused on the 14th day of June, 1913, at which time the statute of this state denied to a defendant a defense based upon any alleged assumption of risk by its employé, and also provided that the contributory negligence of an employé "shall not bar a recovery therein where his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross, in comparison, but the damages may be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employé. * * *" Stats. of 1911, p. 796. It is admitted that under the federal statute the doctrine of assumption of risk was available to its fullest extent in defense of an action by an employé against his employer. Appellant offered instructions, which were refused by the court, first to advise the jury that the work in which the respondent was engaged at the time he suffered his alleged injuries was service relating to interstate commerce; second, that the risk of the injuries suffered was assumed by respondent as an incident to his contract of employment. Respondent's answer to the offered instructions is: First, that no issue was raised as to the work being interstate work; second, that the defense of assumption of risk was insufficiently pleaded. If respondent's first proposition is to be sustained, then the second needs no discussion. As we have before suggested, there was no question made but that the state court had jurisdiction of the action whether it was governed by the provisions of the federal act or those of this state. This being true, it has been held, and we think with the best of reasons, that if a defendant engaged both in interstate and intrastate commerce, when sued in a state court, desires to invoke the federal statute for its protection, such option may be exercised by specially pleading that matter; that in the absence of such a pleading it will be presumed that the work performed by the plaintiff was intrastate and not interstate. "Nor do we think there was error in striking the evidence tending to show that plaintiff was at the time he received the injury engaged in interstate commerce. The fact that he was so engaged had not been alleged in the petition nor asserted in the answer, so that whether he was so engaged was not in issue. As argued, it is not necessary to plead the statutes of the United States; but, to invoke their benefit, facts rendering these applicable should be pleaded. All essential under the state law was proof that the injury was received because of the negligence of the company in the use or operation of its railway within the state, for until the contrary was made to appear it will be presumed to have been engaged in intrastate commerce. The evidence was rightly excluded." Bradbury v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 149 Iowa, 51, 128 N. W. 1, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 684. There being no plea offered in this case that the work the employé was engaged in was interstate commerce, defendant was not entitled to introduce evidence supporting such an issue.

The evidence was not received without objection so as to entitle appellant to argue that a mutually assumed issue is sustainable without pleading. Assuming that the plea of assumption of risk was a good plea in so far as it presented ultimate facts on such an issue, this plea could not be made to take the place of the necessary pleading of the matter last referred to. The evidence which it is claimed was admitted as showing that the risk was assumed, and also that an issue was assumed as to that matter, was evidence all competent to be shown for the purpose of measuring the conduct of the respondent at the time he suffered his injuries in the determination of the question as to whether he alone was then at fault. His familiarity with the premises and knowledge of the dangerous conditions surrounding them were all facts pertinent to be considered by the jury in passing upon the question as to whose negligence caused the injuries, wholly aside from any consideration of the plea of assumption of risk. If we were to lay aside our conclusions as just announced and concede that the issue of assumed risk was properly before the jury, it is apparent from the record that there was no testimony whatsoever tending to show what particular work plaintiff was employed in at the time—whether interstate or intrastate. The testimony went to the character of the business being done at the shops, and that testimony showed that such business was of a mixed kind—that both interstate and intrastate repair work and some "outside work" was there performed. We do not understand it to be the law that merely because the greater amount of business which a carrier is doing at the time happens to be interstate, its liability is determined accordingly under the federal statute; but the test rather is what particular work is the employé then engaged in, as referable to the two classes, interstate or intrastate? This court gave some consideration to that question in Smith v. Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California, 26 Cal. App. 560, 147 Pac. 600, and we cite Zikos v. Oregon R. & Navigation Co. (C. C.) 179 Fed. 893; Howard v. Illinois Central R. R. Co., 207 U. S. 461, 28 Sup. Ct. 41, 52 L. Ed. 297; Southern Pacific Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 782, 151 Pac. 277, L. R. A. 1916E, 916. The latter decision is cited by appellant as being in full accord with its view of the law, but a careful reading of it, in connection with Zikos v. Oregon, etc., Navigation Co., supra, leads us apart from rather than toward an agreement with that contention. It will have been noted that the appellant, in addition to its plea of assumption of risk, which was inapplicable under the state law, did very fully plead the defense under the state statute of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff and as to the character or quantity of that negligence as compared with any negligence of the defendant. It is evident that the pleader intended fully to avail himself of the defenses under the state statute. That the attempt to establish matters not available under the California law as it existed at the time failed by reason of the imperfections pointed out we are fully convinced.

Henry T. Gage, W. I. Foley, and W. I. Gilbert, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District is denied.

We deem it proper to say that we base our denial upon the last ground stated in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, viz., that it is apparent from the record "that there was no testimony whatsoever tending to show what particular work plaintiff was employed in at the time—whether interstate or intrastate." We are in entire accord with what is said by the District Court of Appeal on this point.

We are not to be taken as intimating any opinion as to what the situation would have been if, notwithstanding the absence of any issue as to the character of the work made by the pleadings, there had nevertheless been evidence tending to show that the plaintiff, at the time of the accident, was engaged in interstate commerce work.

BIENFIELD v. VAN NESS. (S. F. 7573.)

1. Pleading 🔑205(5)—General Demurrer—Uncertainty.

An allegation that a demand for the amount of an assessment for street improvement was made upon defendant or his agents, if defective, is only uncertain, and is not reached upon general demurrer.

2. Municipal Corporations 🔑567(2) — Street Improvements — Enforcement — Pleading.

In an action to foreclose a lien for street assessment, an allegation that the board of public works "duly and regularly" fixed a day when it would take final action on said resolution passed on March 25, 1914, and that on April 15, 1914, the board "duly and regularly" made its report recommending the doing of the work sufficiently showed that 20 days elapsed between the resolution and the report, especially in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 456, providing that it is not necessary to state facts conferring jurisdiction on a board, but that it is sufficient to allege that a determination of a board has been "duly given or made," and the pleading showed a compliance with an ordinance requiring that the board of public works, after preparing the specifications for an improvement, shall pass a resolution of its intention to recommend to the supervisors the making of the improvements, and in said resolution shall fix a day when the board shall determine whether or not it will recommend the work, which day shall be not less than 20 days after the passage thereof.

3. Municipal Corporations 🔑567(2) — Street Improvements — Enforcement — Pleading.

Where improvements were to be curbs and sidewalks, an allegation that notices were posted along the line of improvement on each quarter block was a sufficient statement that they were posted in front of the quarter blocks.

4. Municipal Corporations 🔑567(2) — Street Improvements — Enforcement — Pleading.

Where notice of street improvements, required to be posted at the place of proposed improvements, were alleged to have been given, allegations omitting to state that the notice contained the matter required by ordinance as to time and manner of making objections, was cured by a further allegation that later the board "duly and regularly made an assessment," under Code Civ. Proc. § 456, providing that statement that a judgment or determination of a board or court was "duly given and made," is sufficient.

5. Municipal Corporations 🔑568(3) — Street Improvements — Assessments — Demand—Proof.

An affidavit that demand had been made on an owner or his agent, for payment of a street assessment, sufficiently showed a demand, where there was no evidence that no demand had been made; demand on an agent being good.

6. Municipal Corporations 🔑533—Street Improvements—Assessments—Demands.

Where an ordinance required a return to state the "nature" and "character" of a demand for payment of an assessment for street improvements, and provided that, if neither the owner nor his agent can be found, demand may be made on the lot, a return is sufficient, without specifying whether demand was made on the agent or the owner, the requirement as to the nature and character of the demand referring to the question whether the demand is personal, that is, upon the owner or his agent, or constructive, that is, by outcry upon the premises.

7. Municipal Corporations 🔑542—Street Improvements — List of Unpaid Assessments—Error in Name.

Where the list of assessments remaining unpaid, given in a subsequent part of the return, gives the name of a lot owner as "F. C. V." instead of "T. C. V.," and the original return shows the letter "F" was first written and the letter "T" written over it, the error was clerical and immaterial.

8. Municipal Corporations 🔑519(2) — Street Improvements — Delinquent Assessments—Authentication—Lien of Contractor.

That a copy of a list of unpaid assessments for street improvements recorded in the assessment book was not authenticated by the signature of the secretary of the board of public works, did not invalidate the contractor's lien on the lots, where the original return was authenticated.

9. Municipal Corporations 🔑320—Street Improvements — Formalities — Powers of Supervisors.

Under San Francisco Charter (St. 1911, p. 1691) art. 6, c. 2, § 33, authorizing the board of supervisors to provide a procedure for the improvement of streets, an ordinance not requiring formalities as to assessments, warrants, diagram, or affidavit of demand on nonpayment, or other formalities, could be adopted, subsequent to notices necessary to acquire jurisdiction, and hence a provision that no proceeding shall be held invalid for disregard of such formalities was authorized; the effect being that the provisions concerning the form of affidavits and demands and nonpayment of the assessment or warrant are only directory.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by D. L. Bienfield against T. C. Van Ness, Jr., to foreclose a lien for a street assessment. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Chapman and R. M. F. Soto, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Jesse A. Mueller, of San Francisco, for respondent. Fabius T. Finch, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, foreclosing a lien upon the defendant's property for a street assessment for the improvement of the crossing of Beach and Taylor streets in San Francisco.

The assessment was not made under any of the statutes of this state relating to such matters, but upon the procedure provided by Ordinance No. 2439 (New Series) of the city and county of San Francisco, approved September 4, 1913. This ordinance was adopted under and by virtue of the power given to the board of supervisors of San Francisco, by section 33, chapter 2, of article 6, of the San Francisco charter. Stats. 1911, p. 1691. This section authorizes the board of supervisors to adopt an ordinance providing a method of procedure for the improvement of streets within the city, and for the assessment of the expenses thereof upon private property. Mardis v. McCarthy, 162 Cal. 98, 121 Pac. 389; Hayne v. San Francisco, 162 Pac. 625. The ordinance in question is similar to the Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730), and in its main features not unlike the so-called Vrooman Act.

The appellant claims that the complaint is defective in several particulars, and that the evidence does not sustain the conclusion that the assessment upon which the foreclosure is based was legal and valid.

[1] 1. The complaint alleges that the demand for the amount of the assessment was made "upon said T. C. Van Ness, Jr., or his agents." The claim is that this averment is in the disjunctive, and that it does not appear whether the demand was made upon Van Ness or upon his agents. The demurrer was general. There was no demurrer for uncertainty. If this is a defect, it amounts to an uncertainty only, and cannot be reached upon general demurrer.

[2] 2. The ordinance requires that the board of public works, after preparing the specifications, shall pass a resolution of its intention to recommend to the supervisors the making of the improvements, and in said resolution shall fix a day when the board shall determine whether or not it will recommend the work, which day shall be not less than 20 days after the passage thereof. Appellant insists that the complaint does not sufficiently show a compliance with this provision. It alleges that the board of public works "duly and regularly" fixed a day when it would take final action on said resolution; that this was done on March 25, 1914; that on April 15, 1914, the board "duly and regularly" made its report to the supervisors recommending the doing of the work. This shows that final action upon the resolution was taken on April 15, 1914, one day more than 20 days after March 25, 1914, the date of the adoption of the resolution of intention. Furthermore, the allegation that the action of the board was "duly and regularly" taken is a sufficient statement of the fact that the board had previously taken all the steps necessary to give it the authority to take such action. Code Civ. Proc. § 456. The objection is therefore not well taken.

[3] 3. The work to be done was the construction of curbs, sidewalks, and other improvements connected therewith in the street, at the crossing aforesaid. The allegation that the notices of street work were posted along the line of the improvement contemplated, and on each quarter block, is a sufficient statement that the notices were posted in front of the quarter block. Being on each quarter block and along the line of the improvement which is situated in the street, they must of necessity be in front of the blocks.

[4] 4. The complaint alleged that said notices were so posted, each "being headed 'Notice of Improvement,' in letters of not less than one inch in length, and in legible character, stating the fact of the passage of said resolution, its date, and, briefly, the work and improvement proposed, and referring to said resolution of intention for further particulars." The ordinance provides that such "notices shall also state that all objections to the proposed improvement must be filed, in writing, with the secretary of the board before the day fixed in the said resolution of intention for action thereon by said board," and that the notice shall indicate said day. It is objected that the complaint is insufficient because it does not state that the notices contained these requirements. It is to be observed that it does not state that the notices did not contain the above matter required by the ordinance. All these proceedings were required to be complete before the making of the assessment. The complaint, further on alleges that on September 24, 1914, the board of public works "duly and regularly made an assessment to cover the sum due for the said work so performed and specified in said contract," referring to the contract and work upon and for which the assessment was made. In virtue of the provisions of section 456 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we must hold that this is a sufficient allegation that all the steps preceding the making of the assessment, necessary to authorize the board to make it, had been taken in the manner provided by law. This cures the aforesaid defect, if it be one.

[5] 5. It is claimed that the evidence does not show that any legal demand for payment was ever made. The affidavit showing demand and nonpayment, constituting the return to the assessment, was introduced in evidence. It shows that on October 14, 1914, the plaintiff "called upon the following persons assessed, or their agents, and demanded payment of the amount assessed to each, respectively," and thereupon named among the persons the following: "Lot No. 9, T. C. Van Ness, Jr., 275 feet, $327.94." The objection is that this does not show whether the demand was upon Van Ness or upon his agents. We cannot perceive how the defendant could be in any wise prejudiced thereby. There was no showing at the trial, and it is not contended in the briefs, that the demand was not in fact made, or that he would or could have done anything in a different manner than he did if the demand was upon himself instead of upon his agents, or that he suffered any injury or prejudice whatever by reason of any defect in the manner of making the demand. A demand either upon himself or upon his agents would be a good demand. Under these circumstances the objection will not be entertained. The mere fact that the evidence shows that it was made on one or the other, but is not certain as to the particular one, furnishes no ground for reversal.

[6] It is objected further that the return showing a demand stated in the disjunctive as aforesaid, is not in the form required, and that this invalidates the plaintiff's claim of lien. The ordinance provides that the return to the warrant shall state "the nature, character and date of the demand." The words "called upon the following persons assessed or their agents," respectively, were followed by a list of all the lot owners. It is further provided that if neither the owner nor his agent can be conveniently found, demand may be made upon the lot. The requirement as to the nature and character of the demand refers to the question whether the demand is personal, that is, upon the owner or his agent, or constructive, that is, by outcry upon the premises. Upon this theory the return is sufficient in this respect without specifying the particular instances in which the demand was upon the owner and which upon the agent.

[7] 6. The further objection is made that the list of assessments remaining unpaid, given in a subsequent part of the return, gives the name of the owner of lot No. 9, as F. C. Van Ness, Jr., instead of T. C. Van Ness, Jr. The original return shows that the letter "F" at this place was first written, and that the letter "T" was written over it. The error was purely clerical and is too trifling to deserve notice.

[8] 7. It appears that in recording the return in the assessment book the copy therein written was not authenticated by the signature of the secretary of the board of public works. In decisions concerning the requirement for the recording of returns of this character in proceedings under the statutes such as the Vrooman Act and the act of 1911, which are similar to the ordinance in question, it has been decided that the omission of the authentication to the return, as recorded in the assessment book, is not fatal to the validity of the lien of the contractor, if in fact the return itself is properly authenticated. In this case the return to the assessment was complete and perfect in itself, and it was all duly entered in the assessment book. The failure of the secretary to attach to the record his signature thereto, does not render the lien invalid or prejudice the holder of the warrant. S. F. v. Certain Real Property, 50 Cal. 188; Gillis v. Cleveland, 87 Cal. 219, 25 Pac. 351.

[9] 8. Finally, the objections to the formal sufficiency of the assessment and return, or affidavit of demand and nonpayment, are all disposed of by the following provision of the ordinance:

> "No assessment, warrant, diagram or affidavit of demand and nonpayment after the issue of the same, and no proceedings prior to the assessment, shall be held invalid by any court for any error, informality or other defect in the same, where the resolution of intention of the board of public works to recommend to the supervisors the ordering of the improvement has been actually published and posted and the notices of improvement posted as in this ordinance provided."

It would have been within the power of the supervisors to have adopted an ordinance which did not require the formalities above referred to in the proceedings subsequent to the giving of the notices necessary to acquire jurisdiction of the proceeding.

> "It must be equally competent to provide, in the law itself, that a disregard of its provisions as to any of these intermediate proceedings shall not be fatal to the validity of the assessment, or that after a given stage in the matter has been reached all inquiry as to such proceedings shall be cut off, and they shall be conclusively presumed to have been performed in the manner required by law." Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 362, 80 Pac. 85.

The effect of the above curative clause of the ordinance is to make the other provisions of the ordinance respecting the form of the affidavit of demand and nonpayment of the assessment or warrant directory only, and to prevent a failure to observe the same from having the effect of invalidating the lien upon the property.

These comprise all the objections made to the judgment appealed from. None of them being fatal thereto, the appeal is ineffectual.

The judgment is affirmed.

TOWER v. HUMBOLDT TRANSIT CO.

1. STREET RAILROADS ⚿93(½)—INJURIES ON TRACK—LIABILITY.

Where plaintiff, a girl subject to fainting fits, fainted on a street railway's track, so that she was run over by a car, the railway was not liable to her unless its failure to avoid striking her was due in some way to want of ordinary care on the part of the railway or its servants.

2. NEGLIGENCE ⚿121(1)—PRESUMPTION.

Negligence is not presumed, and the party asserting it must prove its existence by a preponderance of the evidence.

3. STREET RAILROADS ⚿112(2) — INJURIES ON TRACK—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur has no just or proper application to the case of a collision between a street car and a pedestrian on the street. The presumption of negligence arises only where the occurrence is such as ordinarily does not happen without negligence on the part of the party charged, as in the case of explosion of a boiler, etc.

4. STREET RAILROADS ⚿85(1)—USE OF STREET BY CAR AND OTHER VEHICLES OR PERSONS—SUPERIOR RIGHT.

As between street cars and other vehicles or persons on the public streets, neither party has a superior right, and neither is bound to exercise a higher degree of care than the other.

5. TRIAL ⚿252(9)—INSTRUCTION—MISLEADING CHARACTER.

In an action against a street railroad for injuries to a girl on its track, the instruction that it was a rule of law that, when the thing which causes an action is shown to be under the management and control of defendant, and the accident is such as ordinarily does not happen if those in control use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation, that the accident arose from lack of ordinary care, was misleading, as inapplicable to the facts, in that it could not be said that in the ordinary course of things a street car does not run into a person on the street if it is properly operated.

6. STREET RAILROADS 🔑118(1)—INJURIES ON TRACK—INSTRUCTION.

In such action such instruction so framed that the jury must have understood that plaintiff was not bound to prove negligence on the part of the street railway, in that it told the jury that such negligence was presumed if plaintiff showed she was rightfully on the track, and was run over and injured by a street car managed and controlled by the street railway, was erroneous.

7. TRIAL 🔑296(7)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE OF ERROR.

The effect of such instruction was not cured by other parts of the charge, where on several occasions, in instructing at the railway's request that plaintiff must establish negligence by a preponderance of the evidence, the court qualified by restating the substance of the instruction.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑843(3)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTION IN FAVOR OF TRIAL COURT.

Evidence which is a part of the main case will presumably be introduced in proper sequence on second trial.

9. STREET RAILROADS 🔑113(1)—WITNESSES 🔑268(1)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—INJURIES ON TRACK—EVIDENCE.

In a young girl's action for injuries against a street railway, where the railway contended that plaintiff attempted to bring the injuries on herself, the court should have been liberal in allowing it to cross-examine her more or less with respect to her movements and actions during the several hours following her departure from her home on the day of the accident before the accident itself, and to prove her conduct during such period by other witnesses; such evidence being relevant as bearing on plaintiff's state of mind.

10. EVIDENCE 🔑472(7)—OPINION.

In such action plaintiff's father should not have been permitted, over proper objections, to testify he had seen certain letters written by plaintiff, and then, without producing the letters, or accounting for their absence, to state his conclusion that they evidenced a given state of mind in the writer; for, had the letters been produced, that question was for the jury rather than the witness.

11. TRIAL 🔑228(3)—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court should state rules of law in general terms, rather than elaborate matters of evidence so as to come perilously close to, if not over, the line separating a charge of law from an instruction on the facts.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; George D. Murray, Judge.

Action by Gwynedde A. Tower against the Humboldt Transit Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying its motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Coonan & Kehoe, of Eureka, for appellant. Pierce H. Ryan, of Eureka, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries. At the time of the occurrences in controversy the plaintiff was a minor of the age of about 16 years. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in her favor. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The defendant owns and operates a system of electric cars in the city of Eureka. The claim of the plaintiff was that on January 12, 1913, she was run over by one of defendant's cars, sustaining injuries which required the amputation of her right arm and her right leg. The complaint was in four counts. Each of the four alleged that plaintiff was lawfully upon the track of the defendant. The first count alleged in general terms that plaintiff was injured through the careless and negligent manner in which the car was operated. The second ascribed the injuries to the negligent failure of the motorman to lower or "trip" the fender with which the car was equipped. The third counted on the failure to provide the car with sufficient brakes or other appliances for stopping the car. The fourth set up the negligence of the motorman in failing to keep a lookout for persons on the track, and thereby failing to discover the presence of the plaintiff on such track.

The defendant denied all of the allegations of negligence, denied that plaintiff was ever run over by defendant's car, and alleged that plaintiff's injuries were caused by her own negligence, and that of her parents.

A brief statement of the outstanding features of the case is necessary to an understanding of the points urged for reversal. The defendant operates a single-track road along E street, which at the place with which we are concerned is an outlying and little frequented thoroughfare, with a rough surface, more or less overgrown with grass and weeds. E street runs north and south, and is intersected by Harris, Grotto, and Henderson streets, the last named being the most northerly of the three. The accident occurred between Grotto and Henderson streets. Between Harris and Grotto streets the defendant maintains a diamond switch or turnout for the passage of its cars. There is a sidewalk on the westerly side of E street. The incidents in controversy took place about 6 o'clock on the evening of January 12, 1913. The sun had already set, and it was dark, or between dusk and dark. There had been some rain or fog during the day, and the roadway on E street was muddy. Shortly before the accident one of the defendant's cars had come southerly on E street. At the switch it met and passed car No. 11, which was going northerly, and which, as plaintiff claims, inflicted the injuries complained of. The case sought to be established by the plaintiff was, in effect, this: She had for a considerable time been subject to occasional, but sudden, attacks of fainting or unconsciousness, lasting from 10 to 30 minutes. She testified that on the evening in question she was walking along the sidewalk on E street, when she observed a cat on the other side of the street. Her interest was, for some reason, attracted, and she crossed the street to approach the cat. As she started to return to the sidewalk, she saw the south-bound car coming, and, after waiting for it to pass, was proceeding on her way across the track, when she fainted. She remained unconscious until she felt something strike her leg and arm repeatedly and with great force. Witnesses who were on the passing car heard screams. The car was stopped, and several men, including the motorman and the conductor, walked back a short distance and found the plaintiff lying by the side of the track with her right arm and right leg crushed and mangled.

The plaintiff produced no witnesses who had seen her lying on the track. The motorman who was operating the car testified that he had kept a lookout ahead, and had seen no person or object on or between the rails. His story was that, as he approached the place where plaintiff was found, he saw to the left of the track, and a couple of feet from it, some dark object which he took to be a buggy or automobile robe. He then began to slow down the car. Just as he was about to pass the object, he noticed a movement, and thought that the dark mass might be the body of some person. He then brought the car to a standstill. There was considerable testimony pro and con regarding the condition of the brakes. The defendant also offered evidence that plaintiff had made verbal and written statements which could fairly be interpreted as admissions that plaintiff had intentionally brought the injuries upon herself. The plaintiff, in rebuttal, sought to weaken or destroy the effect of these declarations by testimony tending to show that she was not in a normal condition of mind when she made the statements.

It is not necessary to go beyond this incomplete summary of the evidence, or to attempt any discussion of the persuasive force of the showing on either side. For present purposes, it is enough to say that a careful reading of the record produces a very substantial doubt concerning the true state of facts. It is beyond question that there was ample evidence upon which the jury might have found that there was no proof of negligence on the part of defendant's employés contributing to the injuries complained of by the plaintiff. We are not intimating that the evidence was not sufficient to support a verdict in plaintiff's favor. The point is, merely, that the real merits of the case, as disclosed by the evidence, are at the least so doubtful as to require careful consideration of substantial errors which may have had an important influence in leading the jury to the verdict which it found. In other words, the case is not one in which grave error can be disregarded under the provision of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

[1] The essential point in controversy was whether the defendant had negligently run its car upon and over the plaintiff when she was lying unconscious on the track in the path of the approaching car. Her alleged position on the track and her condition at the time were in dispute. But even if it be said that her position was as claimed by her, it was still necessary, before liability could be imposed on the defendant, to show that the failure to avoid striking her was due to some want of ordinary care on the part of the defendant or its servants.

> "It is a rule of law in this state that, when the thing which causes an accident is shown to be under the management and control of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management and control use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of any explanation by the defendant that the accident arose from want of ordinary care. * * *
> "In further explanation of this rule of law, applying it only to the first cause of action, you are instructed that, if the plaintiff has proved by a preponderance of evidence that at the time and place mentioned in the complaint she was lawfully on the track of the defendant's street railroad, that while thereon she was run over by a street car passing along said track, and was injured thereby as alleged in the complaint, and that the said car was managed, operated, and controlled entirely by the defendant, then the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, and from such circumstances, if they have been proved, the law presumes that the defendant was negligent, and the burden is then cast upon the defendant to show that it was not negligent or careless or reckless in the operation of said car."

[3-5] By this instruction the court sought to define and apply to this case the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. The rule is well known, and has often been recognized by this court. Bush v. Barnett, 96 Cal. 202, 31 Pac. 2; Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146; O'Connor v. Mennie, 169 Cal. 217, 146 Pac. 674, and cases cited. It has, however, no just or proper application to the case of a collision between a street car and a pedestrian on the street. The presumption of negligence arises only where the occurrence is such as ordinarily does not happen without negligence on the part of the party charged, as, for example, in the case of the explosion of a boiler (Posey v. Scoville [C. C.] 10 Fed. 140), or of a powder mill (Judson v. Giant Powder Co., supra), or the fall of a workman's tool from a building upon a person on the street (Dixon v. Pluns, 98 Cal. 384, 33 Pac. 268, 20 L. R. A. 698, 35 Am. St. Rep. 180). It is true that in the first part of the instruction complained of the court incorporates this condition. But the difficulty is that there is, in a case like this, no foundation in fact for assuming or finding the existence of the condition. As between street cars and other vehicles or persons on the public streets, neither has a superior right, and neither is bound to exercise a higher degree of care than the other. It cannot be said that "in the ordinary course of things" a street car does not run into a person on the street if the street car is properly operated. On the contrary, the mishap is quite as likely to be due to the fault of the person struck, or of some third person, or to some unforeseen and unpreventable cause, as to the negligence of those operating the car. At best, the instruction was inapplicable, and therefore misleading.

[6] But, beyond this, the court, when it undertook to amplify the rule and apply it specifically to the facts of the particular case, framed its declaration in such form that the jury must have understood that the plaintiff was not bound to prove negligence on the part of the defendant. It told the jury that such negligence was presumed if plaintiff showed: (1) That she was lawfully on the track; (2) that she was run over and injured by a street car; and (3) that said car was managed and controlled by the defendant. That she had a lawful right to be on the track, in the path of an approaching car, was not questioned. In fact, the court specifically instructed the jury that plaintiff was entitled, equally with the defendant, to go upon or across the street wherever she pleased, and that defendant had no superior right in the space between the tracks, except the part where its cars actually were. Nor was it disputed that the cars running on the track were under the control and management of the defendant company. All, then, that the plaintiff was by this instruction required to show was that she was run over and injured by one of the defendant's cars. In effect, the instruction made mere proof of the accident or injury suffice to impose on the defendant responsibility for such injury. This is not the law. 36 Cyc. 1582; H. S. S. R. Co. v. Hildreth, 72 Ark. 572, 82 S. W. 245; Boyd v. Boston E. R. Co., 224 Mass. 199, 112 N. E. 607.

We have in a number of cases held that a presumption of negligence arises where a passenger on the car of a common carrier receives injury from the operation of the car. Bush v. Barnett, supra; McCurrie v. S. P. Co., 122 Cal. 558, 55 Pac. 324; Osgood v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 137 Cal. 280, 70 Pac. 169, 92 Am. St. Rep. 171; Housel v. Pac. El. Ry. Co., 167 Cal. 245, 139 Pac. 73, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1105, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 665. The rule is, in such cases, rested upon the high degree of care required of a carrier toward its passengers, and the defendant's greater ability to show the causes of the accident. But even in actions by passengers the rule that negligence is presumed from the fact of injury is not universal. Wyatt v. Pac. El. Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 170, 103 Pac. 892. At any rate, the reasons justifying the rule in such cases do not exist here.

[7] It cannot be said that this was an isolated instruction, or that its effect was cured by other parts of the charge. On several occasions, in instructing the jury, at defendant's request, that the plaintiff must establish negligence by a preponderance of the evidence, the court was careful to add, as a qualification, a restatement of the very matter we have been discussing.

The expression of our views regarding the nature of the evidence makes it unnecessary to say anything further to show the prejudicial character of the instructions in this regard.

[8] There are many other assignments of error, but we do not think it necessary to discuss them in detail. Most of them relate to points which will probably not be presented on a second trial. There are, for example, many objections to the offering of evidence by way of rebuttal instead of on the case in chief. Any evidence so offered which was a part of the main case will, presumably, be introduced in proper sequence. So, too, there is no reason to anticipate a recurrence of an alleged attempt by the plaintiff to impeach her own witness. We need not, therefore, inquire whether the course pursued was proper. Certain questions are raised with reference to the pleadings. In so far as they have importance, we may assume that the court below will, before another trial, grant leave to both parties to make proper amendments, and to thus obviate unnecessary obstacles to an examination of the merits. We do not express any opinion regarding the sufficiency of the evidence to establish certain contentions of the respondent, since the testimony on another trial may not be identical with that which has already been given.

[9] One or two suggestions may be made for the guidance of the court and the parties in trying the case anew. In view of the defendant's contentions regarding the plaintiff's conduct in connection with the accident, we think the court should have been more liberal in allowing the defendant to cross-examine her with respect to her movements and actions during the several hours following her departure from her home on the day of the accident and prior to the occurrence of the accident itself. For like reasons, the defendant should have been allowed to prove her conduct during this period by other witnesses. Evidence on this line was relevant as bearing upon plaintiff's state of mind, and consequently upon the probability of her having attempted to bring the injuries upon herself.

[10] It need, perhaps, hardly be said that plaintiff's father should not have been permitted, over proper objections, to testify that he had seen certain letters written by the plaintiff, and then, without producing the letters or accounting for their absence, to state his conclusion that they evidenced a given state of mind on the part of the writer. Even if the letters themselves had been produced, it was for the jury, rather than the witness, to draw such conclusion.

[11] Plaintiff's instruction 27 should not have been given in the form in which it was proposed. As it reads, it is open to the objection that it is argumentative and goes too elaborately into the particular facts relied on by the plaintiff. It is better for the court to state rules of law in general terms, rather than to so elaborate matters of evidence as to come perilously close to, if not over, the line which separates a charge of law from an instruction on the facts.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

SHEAN et al. v. WEEKS et al. (S. F. 7593.)

1. Landlord and Tenant 🔑134(5)—Covenants—"General Confectioner."

Evidence held insufficient to show that the term "general confectioner" had by general usage acquired the meaning of including the restaurant business, so that the starting of a restaurant by another was not a breach of a covenant not to rent a part of a building to sell "merchandise of the same character."

2. Customs and Usages 🔑15(1)—Construction of Words—Usage.

The ordinary meaning of words used in a business cannot be changed, except by proof of general usage by those engaged in the particular trade, or by proof that the parties to a contract used it in the special sense contended for.

3. Injunction 🔑62(2) — Landlord and Tenant—Covenants — Restrictions on Business.

Where a landlord covenanted not to rent another part of his building to any business selling candy, ice cream, light lunches, soda water, or other things sold in the business of general confectionists, injunction will not be granted to enjoin the installing of a restaurant where the "light lunch" feature was not relied on for the injunction; the injunction being desired to enjoin the operation of the restaurant altogether.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; M. T. Farmer, Judge.

Action by L. F. Shean and J. L. Taylor to enjoin A. J. Weeks, Albert M. Vail, Henry R. Vail, and Grace McLeod from operating a restaurant. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Thomas H. Laine and Lawrence M. Phillips, both of San Francisco, and Dixon L. Phillips, of Hanford, for appellants. Elliott Johnson and R. W. Palmer, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiffs appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants. The record is presented in typewriting, as provided in section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The action was begun on March 6, 1915, to enjoin the breach by the defendants of a covenant of a lease executed by the defendant Weeks to the plaintiffs, on September 1, 1914, the defendants other than Weeks being the lessees of Weeks under a subsequent lease.

The lease to the plaintiffs was for a portion of the ground floor of the building formerly known as Berkeley Inn, and included a space fronting 37 feet on Telegraph avenue, and 136 feet on Bancroft way. The covenant which it is alleged was broken is as follows:

> "It is understood that the lessees are at present carrying on in the store space fronting on Telegraph avenue the business of general confectionists and are engaged in the manufacture and sale of candy, ice cream, light lunches, soda water, etc., and the lessor agrees that he will not during the term of this lease, carry on, or conduct, or permit to be carried on or conducted, under any lease or letting, upon any portion of the premises owned by him at said corner of Bancroft way and Telegraph avenue, any business which shall involve the selling or handling or manufacturing of merchandise of the same character as that sold or handled or manufactured by the lessees, their assigns or subtenants, in the course of their business as general confectionists."

On December 16, 1914, Weeks leased to the defendants Elbert M. Vail and Henry R. Vail all of the premises referred to in the aforesaid covenant, except the part thereof previously leased as aforesaid to the plaintiffs. Thereafter said lessees and the defendant McLeod established a restaurant and a cafeteria on parts of the premises so leased to them by Weeks.

The complaint alleges:

> That "a large and important part of plaintiffs' business so conducted consists of the serving of hot and cold lunches, meals and food, to the public, to be eaten at tables provided by plaintiff on the premises, and also to be carried away in bulk by the purchasers thereof; that such lunches, meals, and food are served by plaintiffs in said establishment on the demised premises continuously from 8 o'clock a. m. until midnight each day;" and that the said Vail and others, lessees of Weeks, are carrying on in another part of the premises "a restaurant, café, cafeteria, eating house, and lunch room, in which lunches, meals, or food are served to the patrons thereof at tables therein provided, or are carried away in bulk by said patrons."

The room in which the said defendants carried on said business was in a portion of the premises owned by Weeks, referred to in the aforesaid covenant. It is claimed by the plaintiffs that the business so carried on by Vail and others is of the same character as the business of plaintiffs as "general confectionists," and that it conflicts therewith, and takes from the plaintiffs a large and valuable portion of their custom.

The court found:

> "That there is no substantial conflict in the business allowed to be carried on by the defendant Weeks on the premises described in the complaint, to wit, the hotel and restaurant business, and the cafeteria business, with the business being carried on by plaintiffs, namely, the general confectionery business."

The appellants contend that this finding is contrary to the evidence. The daily menu of the plaintiffs' establishment included such articles as Eastern oysters, roast sirloin of beef, braised lamb, chicken pie, meat roll, veal fricassee, chipped beef in cream, home-made corn beef hash, and Boston baked beans. It is not denied that these dishes are usually served only in restaurants and hotels. The plaintiffs say that the words "candy, ice cream, light lunches, soda water, etc.," in the covenant "were merely intended as a brief description of the general confectionery business to be carried on by the lessees, and the true method of determining the rights of the parties is to arrive at the ordinary business significance of the term 'general confectioner,' as understood by men engaged in the same business." This necessarily involves the proposition that the term "general confectionist" used in the covenant has, by the general usage of the trade, acquired a meaning broad enough to include the business of serving such articles of food as those above mentioned, in connection with other lighter foods contained in the plaintiffs' daily bill of fare.

[1] The evidence does not establish this proposition. One witness testified that he was manager of an establishment in Oakland which he called a confectionery and refused to call a restaurant, but at which, in addition to confections, there were served many kinds of substantial foods similar to those served by the plaintiffs as above mentioned, and embracing many of the dishes usually served in ordinary restaurants. He further testified that at the present time this kind of business was ordinarily handled by such establishments as his own, that lately almost every confectioner was doing it, and that it was customary for general confectioners such as himself to handle what is "called the light lunch feature of the business," and to sell hot lunches in the middle of the day, and salads at all hours. There was no other evidence given in support of the plaintiffs' theory. This testimony does not establish the fact that the term "general confectioner" had by general trade usage acquired a meaning broad enough to include the carrying on of a restaurant such as that conducted by himself or by the plaintiffs. It tends to show that many confectioners were extending their business so as to include a restaurant as a part thereof, but it does not prove that they spoke of that branch as a confectionery. On the other hand, there was testimony to the effect that in 12 confectioneries carried on in Berkeley, Oakland, and San Francisco nothing more substantial in the way of eatables was served to customers than sandwiches and salads, except in one, which added hot beans to the menu. The evidence indicates that these 12 comprised the greater part of the principal confectioners in the three cities named. This testimony would justify the conclusion that it was not the general usage of the trade to carry on a restaurant in connection with the confectionery, although it was done by many persons engaged in that business, and it tends to disprove the claim that the term "general confectioner" had acquired the meaning upon which the plaintiffs insist.

[2] The ordinary meaning of words cannot be changed, except by proof of general usage by those engaged in the particular trade, or by proof that the parties to the contract used it in the special sense contended for. The evidence falls far short of these requirements.

[3] From all the evidence we think the court was warranted in holding that the covenant did not authorize an injunction against the carrying on of a restaurant or cafeteria in other parts of the building, and that the finding is correct so far as that point is involved. Plaintiffs' counsel do not claim relief for any other breach. They put their case, as the complaint indicates, wholly on the theory that the covenant gave them the exclusive right to carry on a restaurant in the building, and restricted the use of the other parts thereof to other purposes. No point is made upon the proposition that the restaurant and cafeteria serve "light lunches" contrary to the express terms of the covenant. The plaintiff Shean testified that it was not the light lunch feature that the plaintiffs objected to, but that what they wished to prevent was the selling of meals in the rival places. We may therefore assume that the violation of the "light lunch" restriction was not urged in the court below as ground for the injunction sought, and that the breach for that part of the covenant was not considered by the plaintiffs as of substantial importance, but, for the purposes of the case, was waived by them.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the other points urged in the brief of the appellants. If the business carried on by the defendants did not substantially conflict, in the manner complained of, with that for which the plaintiffs' premises were leased to them, as embraced in the covenant aforesaid, plaintiffs are not entitled to an injunction.

In re MATTHEWS' ESTATE.

MATTHEWS et al. v. LEONARD.

1. WILLS 🔑202—ESTATES CREATED—CONSTRUCTION—DEATH OF PRIMARY LEGATEE.

Where testatrix bequeathed money to a daughter, who predeceased her, and after the daughter's decease made a codicil reaffirming the will without mentioning such bequest, Civ. Code, § 1310, providing that, when any estate is devised to one who dies before the testator leaving lineal descendants, they shall take the estate, did not have the effect of passing the legacy to the son and sole heir of the deceased legatee, since such statute relates to the time of the death of the testatrix, and not to the time of the death of the original legatee, and hence the republication was not in effect the making of a legacy to the son so as to preclude him from claiming as a pretermitted heir under section 1307.

2. WILLS 🔑10—CAPACITY TO TAKE.

Since under Civ. Code, § 1275, a testamentary disposition may be made only to any person capable by law of taking, a gift by will to one who is dead at the date of the making of the will is void.

Shaw and Sloss, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Proceedings in the estate of Marie A. Matthews, deceased. From a decree for partial distribution in favor of Howard Leonard, Lee R. Matthews and Grace Leore Payne appeal. Affirmed.

E. J. Fleming, B. F. Woodard, and Fred L. Hamblin, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. H. T. Morrow and William L. Kuehn, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Appeal from a decree of partial distribution.

[1] Marie A. Matthews died testate. On the 6th of May, 1902, she had made a will by which, among other provisions regarding her property, she had bequeathed $10 to her daughter, Mary Louise Leonard, the mother of Howard Leonard, respondent herein. Mrs. Leonard died in 1907 and in the following year her mother made a codicil by which she referred to and ratified and confirmed her will of May 6, 1902, in every respect save so far as any part of it was inconsistent with the codicil. No reference was made in the codicil to the death of Mary Louise Leonard, daughter of the testatrix, but by that instrument the amount given to Lee R. Matthews, a son of Marie A. Matthews, was increased. Respondent contends that the republication of the will by the execution of the codicil after the death of Mary Louise Leonard without mention of her son, Howard Leonard, makes him now a pretermitted heir, and the probate court so held. Appellants, on the other hand, are of the opinion that Howard Leonard is entitled to take under the will by right of representation only the amount of the legacy intended originally for his mother. They say that immediately upon the death of his mother, respondent became the real legatee under the will; that section 1310 of the Civil Code then became incorporated in and was a part of the will; and that the subsequent republication of the will by the execution of a codicil merely confirmed the position of respondent as the representative of his mother under the will. The principal fault with this reasoning is that section 1310 of the Civil Code relates to the time of the death of the testatrix, and not to the time of the decease of the original legatee. It is a statute of distribution, and has reference to the conditions existing at the time of the death of the maker of the will if the provisions of that instrument remain unchanged. The death of his mother did not have the effect of erasing her name from the testament and writing in that of Howard Leonard in its place, because, of course, he could take the legacy intended for his mother in any case only in the event of his surviving his grandmother.

It seems clear, therefore, that when the will was republished by the execution of the codicil, the legacy to Mrs. Leonard was void, as being an attempted gift by will to a dead person, and that the failure to mention Howard Leonard in the republication made him a pretermitted heir. Section 1307, Civ. Code. That the making and publishing of the codicil amounts to a republication of the will as amended by the codicil has been held many times. The rule is thus stated in 40 Cyc. 1216, 1217:

> "The general doctrine is well settled that a codicil executed with the formalities required by statute for the execution of wills operates as a republication of a will, so far as it is not altered or revoked by the codicil, if the intention of the testator is not thereby defeated; and the two are to be regarded as but one instrument, speaking from the date of the codicil."

Our own Civil Code by section 1287 announces the same rule. In Payne v. Payne, 18 Cal. 303, it is held that the republication of the will is tantamount to the making of that will de novo and that the new will so made speaks as of the date of republication. The same rule is declared in varying, but unmistakable, language in such cases as In re Ladd, 94 Cal. 670, 30 Pac. 99; Estate of Hayne, 165 Cal. 568, 133 Pac. 277, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 926; Estate of Cutting, 172 Cal. 191, 155 Pac. 1002. True, it is subject to the exception that the intention of the testator or testatrix must be preserved, if possible (40 Cyc. 1221), and courts have in many instances refrained from applying the rule regarding republication by codicil with all the severity that would attend the interpretation of a new will by which all previous wills had been set aside. Estate of McCauley, 138 Cal. 432, 71 Pac. 512, is an excellent example of the application of the exception.

In that case it was held that, where valid bequests to charity had been made by the terms of the will, they were not nullified by a republication due to a codicil having no special reference to the said bequests, such republication occurring within 30 days of the death of the testatrix, notwithstanding the fact that under section 1313 of the Civil Code an original bequest in trust for charitable uses fails if the donor dies within 30 days of the execution of the testament. But in that case, as the learned commissioner very clearly demonstrated in the discussion of the law applicable to the facts appearing in the record, there was no doubt that the testatrix intended her bequests first made in the will to stand unaffected by the codicil. In the case at bar we cannot say that Mrs. Matthews' intentions had not changed. They must have changed, because the daughter to whom she had intended to leave a legacy of $10 had died. Either she intended the legacy to go to her grandson as the representative of his mother, or she forgot him, or, believing that the bequest had lapsed by reason of Mrs. Leonard's death, she wished to die intestate as to her grandson. In the McCauley Case there had been no change in conditions between the time of the valid bequests to charity and the execution of the codicil. Since by section 1292 of the Civil Code a will may only be revoked by express language, and since by the codicil Mrs. McCauley did not revoke, but reaffirmed, the valid bequests made in the earlier will, they were held good as against the limiting statute. If without express revocation of her original will Mrs. McCauley had made a new will embodying all that the former testament had contained regarding the bequests to charity with other provisions equivalent to those which she chose instead to put in the codicil, the two wills would have been admitted to probate and construed together (section 1296, Civ. Code), and the bequests to charity would, of course, have been held valid. Therefore it was very properly decided in the construction of the McCauley will that the testatrix might do by codicil that which she might have done by a valid will supplemental in character to one previously made.

But in this case the testatrix has omitted expressly to provide for Howard Leonard, the issue of her daughter, either in the original will or the codicil, and it does not appear from either that the omission was intentional. The fact that by force of section 1310, Civil Code, he might take his mother's legacy, if the codicil had not been executed, does not answer the requirement of section 1307, Civil Code, which, according to our interpretation, contemplates express provision by the testatrix for such issue, unless it be made to appear by the will that the omission was intentional. It is true that all the requirements of section 1307 were satisfied as to the original will, for at that time there was no issue of any deceased child, the mother of Howard Leonard being alive. There was provision for her, and the statute was satisfied as to her. In re Barter, 86 Cal. 444, 25 Pac. 15. There was then no obligation to provide for her issue. But the situation had entirely changed when the codicil was made. Howard Leonard had then become the issue of a deceased child. In so far as the requirements of section 1307, Civil Code, are concerned, the situation must be determined as of the date of the codicil. Estate of Hayne, supra. If Mrs. Matthews, after the death of her daughter, had made a new will either mentioning or omitting reference to Mrs. Leonard, such a will would not include Howard Leonard, and he would be a pretermitted heir. We see no escape from the conclusion that her republication of the will amounted to an attempt to bequeath property to a deceased person, and that it must be viewed exactly as if a new will had been executed.

[2] Appellant concedes that a legacy to a deceased child leaving issue is void. It was so held in effect by this court in Ex parte Ross, 140 Cal. 282, 73 Pac. 976, although it is to be remembered that section 1310 of the Civil Code as it then existed had no reference to bequests, and could not, therefore, in any view of the law be applicable to the facts of that case. It has since been amended to include bequests within its purview. Nevertheless the reasoning of the opinion in that case supports the conclusion that an attempt to bestow property by will upon one who has died prior to the making of the will is of no force, and renders the will to that extent void. "A gift by will to one who is dead at the date of the making of the will is void." 40 Cyc. 1052. "A testamentary disposition may be made to any person capable by law of taking the property so disposed of" (section 1275, Civ. Code), and of course a dead man or woman may not take property.

In Lindsay v. Pleasants, 39 N. C. 320, the court was considering a will by which a testator had bequeathed property in equal shares to his wife and nine children, but at the time of the making of the will three of the children had died, and this fact was known to the testator. It was held that the children of the deceased children could not take by force of an act providing that, when any person shall bequeath or devise to his child or children, and such child or children shall have died in the lifetime of the testator, the said legacy or devise shall take effect and vest a title to the property described and mentioned in the issue of such child or children—a provision very similar to section 1310 of our Civil Code in its present form. The court said:

> "The case before us is not within the definition of a lapsed legacy or devise, and therefore it is not aided by the above statute. The Legislature never thought of a case like this, and has not provided for it. It is a devise and bequest to no one in esse, or that can ever come in esse. It is a void devise and bequest ab initio of three-tenths of the residuum of the slaves and land and other property, directed to be turned into money, and divided among the widow and the aforenamed children."

A similar situation was considered in the case of Doe on the Demise of Hearn v. Roe, Casual Ejector, and Cannon, Tenant in Possession, 4 Houst. (Del.) 20, 15 Am. Rep. 701, and it was held that a devise to a deceased person was a void, and not a lapsed, devise. Other authorities supporting this rule are Billingsley v. Tongue, 9 Md. 575; Twitty & Churchill v. Martin, 90 N. C. 643; Scales v. Scales, 59 N. C. 172. In Stennett v. Hall, 74 Iowa, 279, 37 N. W. 332, it appeared that counsel on both sides admitted or at least did not deny that a bequest to one who had died before the execution of the will was void. The invalidity of that clause being virtually conceded, the court did not feel called upon to consider the question of its validity. However, the judgment was affirmed, and the case is authority for the rule stated.

We conclude, therefore, that the execution of the codicil republished the will as of the date of said codicil; that, so republished, it gave a legacy to a person then dead; that such legacy was void; that respondent was not mentioned in the republication of the will; and that therefore he takes, not under section 1310, Civil Code, as representing his deceased mother, but under section 1307 of the same Code as a pretermitted heir.

The decree from which the appeal is taken is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

SHAW, J. I dissent. The case of the respondent rests upon the rule that the republication of a will by a codicil, whether express or implied, carries forward the language and effect of the original will to the date of the codicil, so that its effect will depend upon the conditions existing at that time, and upon the further proposition that a testamentary provision for a person who is dead at the time it is made is void. These propositions are well established, but I do not think they determine the case.

The respondent contends that the rule that the reaffirmation of a will by a codicil carries forward its effect to the date of the codicil is rigid and unvarying. This is not the effect of the authorities. The rule had its origin in England at a time when, under the ecclesiastical law, property acquired after the execution of a will, and before the death of the testator, did not pass by the will, and the principal effect of the rule was to make the general dispositions of the will include all property acquired up to the date of the codicil. All the text-writers remark that since the act of parliament providing that a will shall speak at the death of the testator, and, so far as its terms are sufficient therefor, disposes of all property held by the testator at his death, this rule has been of less importance, and is much less frequently invoked.

The two propositions, that the execution of a codicil does not revive in favor of the children of the legatee a legacy which had lapsed by the death of the legatee after the making of the will and before the execution of the codicil, and that the codicil does not renew a legacy which, in the interval, had been adeemed or satisfied by the testator, are as well established as the rule carrying forward the language of the will to the date of the codicil. The principle on which these two propositions rest, especially that relating to ademption, is that the mere republication of a will by means of a codicil does not always change the legal effect of the will as it exists at the time the codicil is executed. If events occurring after its execution have removed one of the objects of the will, or canceled some of its provisions, and thereby changed its legal effect, the subsequent execution of the codicil does not, in the absence of express words, change the situation. If a legacy has lapsed, it remains lapsed; if it has been adeemed, it remains satisfied and extinguished. In the latter case, if the rule that the codicil carries forward the language of the will to the date of the codicil were applied, the effect would be to renew the legacy as given by the original will. But, as above stated, the contrary is held, and the legal effect of the will, coupled with the subsequent ademption, remains unaffected by the codicil. 1 Jarman on Wills, *158; Powys v. Mansfield, 3 My. & Cr. 376, 40 Eng. Rep. 971.

If we apply the same principle to the present case, we will find that it upholds the present will as it was before the codicil was made, with respect to the legacy to the daughter of the testatrix, who was the mother of the respondent. The legatee being a daughter, and the respondent being her surviving child, the legacy had not lapsed. See Civ. Code, § 1310. The rule that a lapsed legacy is not revived is therefore not even technically applicable. By force of section 1310 this legacy had not lapsed, but had been merely transferred at the death of the legatee, to her surviving child. It was operative as a provision in his favor at the time the codicil was executed. Consequently the will then made a valid disposition in favor of that child. The testatrix must be presumed to have known the law and to have made the codicil with that knowledge. She knew of the death of her daughter. Therefore at the time she made the codicil she must be presumed to have known that her pre-existing will made a valid provision for this child, and must likewise be presumed to have reaffirmed it with knowledge of its effect in that particular, and to have intended thereby to continue that provision in existence.

Section 1307 of the Civil Code, relating to pretermitted heirs, applies only where a testator "omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child." Here, as we have seen, there was a provision in the will, as reaffirmed, for the child, Howard Leonard, a provision which the testatrix is presumed to have had in mind in making the codicil. There was no omission to provide for him and consequently no basis for the claim that he is a pretermitted heir.

All of these rules are but applications of the paramount rule that the courts will always, if possible, ascertain the intent of the testator, and will carry out that intent so far as it is lawful. A republication of the will at a later date implies that the testator intended it to be operative as of that date, so far as its language would make it so, and so far as the law permitted; therefore the courts so hold. If a legacy was adeemed, a subsequent republication would not, of itself, carry any implication of an intent to give it again to the same person. Nothing but express words would do that. Hence the courts hold that such adeemed legacy is not renewed by a codicil. So, by like reasoning, where a legacy is given to a relation who afterward dies, leaving a surviving child to whom the legacy would pass by force of the law, a subsequent republication raises no inference of an intent to revoke the provision thus remaining operative, and accordingly the courts should infer an intent to leave it in force. DIXON et al. v. BARTLETT. (S. F. 7567.)

1. Limitation of Actions 🔑148(4) — New Promises to Pay—Foreign Notes.

A promise to pay a note made in another state merely extends the time for suing on the note, and does not create a new cause of action, or change the obligation to other than a foreign note, barred in two years by Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1.

2. Limitation of Actions 🔑148(4) — New Promise—Admission of Liability.

A letter to partners stating: "As to what I owe you, F., * * * you will be paid. As for Jack, there are some things between us that need adjusting. It was my impression that the notes did not run out for another year"—was sufficient to support a finding that there was a new promise to pay.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑907(2)—Appeal on Judgment Roll—Presumptions—Evidence.

In an appeal on the judgment roll alone, it is conclusively presumed that the evidence supports the findings.

4. Limitation of Actions 🔑142 — New Promise—Promise to One Partner.

A promise made to one partner to pay a partnership debt inures to the benefit of all the partners, and all may sue thereon.

5. Limitation of Actions 🔑179(3) — New Promise—After Time Expired—Pleading.

An allegation that "on March 9, 1912," in "a writing signed by the defendant, in consideration of the foregoing facts, he acknowledged said indebtedness and promised to pay the same" is sufficient as pleading the legal effect of a new promise after limitations has expired, as a contract may be pleaded as to its legal effect, as well as in hæc verba.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Frank W. Dixon and John F. Stebbins, copartners as Dixon & Stebbins, against Harry J. Bartlett. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Peck, Bunker & Cole, of San Francisco, for appellant. L. P. Forestell, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone. The complaint alleges that the defendant, in the state of Nevada, executed to the plaintiffs as copartners, a note of the following tenor:

> "Round Mountain, Nevada, 12/9—'08. One day after date I promise to pay Dixon & Stebbins, or order, $2,806.00 (twenty-eight hundred and six dollars), for value received, with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month until paid. Henry J. Bartlett" —and that thereafter, on March 9, 1912, and on September 23, 1909, in San Francisco, Cal., "in a writing signed by said defendant, in consideration of the foregoing facts, he acknowledged said indebtedness and promised to pay the same," but that he has not paid the same or any part thereof. The answer alleged that the action was barred by the two-year statute of limitations. Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1.

Finding V is in part as follows:

> "That on or about the 9th day of March, 1912, and on September 23, 1909, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, in writings signed by the defendant, Henry J. Bartlett, he acknowledged the indebtedness evidenced by said promissory note and promised to pay the same. * * * The letters above mentioned are as follows, to wit."

The finding then sets out a copy of the two letters referred to—one dated March 9, 1912; the other, September 23, 1909.

[1] It is unnecessary to state the contents of the letter of September 23, 1909. The note fell due on December 10, 1908, and, being executed in the state of Nevada, the statute of limitations would bar an action thereon at the expiration of two years thereafter. Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1. This letter was written from San Francisco and was signed within the two years. Where a new promise is made before the action on the original debt is barred, the debtor—

"does not make himself liable a second time for the same debt, and the old promise is not merged in the new; he merely continues his original liability for a longer term. In other words, he merely waives so much of the period of limitations as has run in his favor." S. P. Co. v. Prosser, 122 Cal. 417, 52 Pac. 836, 55 Pac. 147.

It starts anew the period of limitation. The action must, in that event, be upon the original obligation and not upon the new promise. McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 180, 95 Am. Dec. 170.

[2] This promise, therefore, if it be such, merely fixed September 23, 1909, as the beginning anew of the period of limitation applicable to the previous note. That note was executed in Nevada, and the subsequent promise, made before it was outlawed, did not convert it into a contract executed in California. It remained a note executed out of the state, as before, and consequently the period of limitation applying to it was the two-year limitation applying to the original note. The action was begun more than two years after the date of this promise. The result is that, whether the period of limitation be computed from the maturity of the note or from the date of the promise in 1909, the action was barred before the complaint was filed. The judgment, therefore, if upheld, must be deemed to be based upon the new promise contained in the letter of March 9, 1912. This letter was addressed to Dixon. The greater part of it is devoted to subjects not connected with any indebtedness. After referring to the fact that he had failed in some enterprises which he had previously had on hand, but was working on other prospects, he wrote the paragraph containing the new promise. It reads as follows:

> "As to what I owe you, Frank, you need never worry; every dollar due you will be paid. As to Jack, there are some things between us that need adjusting and a settlement. It was my impression that the notes did not run out for another year."

The letter was signed by the defendant. There is nothing in it to indicate who was referred to as Jack; but, as the other letter set forth in the findings addressed the plaintiff Stebbins as "Jack," it may be assumed that the reference was to Stebbins.

[3, 4] The question is whether this is a promise to pay the partnership debt owing by the defendant to the two plaintiffs. In considering an appeal on the judgment roll alone, it is conclusively presumed that the evidence supports the findings. The finding here is that by this letter the defendant promised to pay the note in question. If by the aid of any reasonably conceivable extrinsic evidence, the language of this promise to pay could have been shown to refer to the partnership note, and the reference to the settlement between the writer thereof and "Jack" to refer to another note or transaction, then the new promise is established. If it refers to the partnership note, it is an express promise to pay the same, although made to one of the partners alone. A promise made to one partner to pay a partnership debt inures to the benefit of all the partners, and all may sue thereon. Bates on Partnership, §§ 437, 1019.

The letter begins with the phrase, "Yours of the 22d received." This shows that it was a reply to a letter previously received by Bartlett from Dixon, the contents of which are not before us. It is conceivable that Dixon's letter, or some other evidence, made the meaning of the defendant's letter plain to the effect above indicated. The statement in the paragraph quoted, that it was Bartlett's impression that the "notes" did not run out for another year, lends force to the idea that Dixon had referred to some other note due to Stebbins alone, to which the phrase quoted regarding a settlement with "Jack" related. This inference is somewhat strengthened by the contents of the letter of 1909, written to Stebbins, which refers to transactions between them in which it does not appear that Dixon had any interest. In the absence of the evidence we must presume that there was extrinsic evidence so explaining the meaning of the Bartlett letter as to make the promise to pay refer to the partnership note.

The case of White v. Williams, 1 Wilm. W. & H. Q. B. Reps. 52, was similar to the case at bar. There the two plaintiffs sued as partners on a partnership demand. The debtor had written a letter to White alone, saying "that he would call in a few days and pay White's account." It was not shown that White alone had any account to which the letter could refer. The court held that the letter was "sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations," but granted a new trial because there was no evidence of the amount of the debt. Upon the record before us we must conclude that the findings are sufficient to support the judgment.

[5] It is further contended that the complaint is founded on the note, and not on the new promise, as is required when the new promise is made after the period of limitation has expired. A contract may be pleaded according to its legal effect, as well as in hæc verba. The allegation that "on March 9, 1912," in "a writing signed by said defendant, in consideration of the foregoing facts, he acknowledged said indebtedness and promised to pay the same," is sufficient as a pleading of the new promise of the defendant according to its legal effect. Porter v. Elam, 25 Cal. 292, 85 Am. Dec. 132. We find no error in the record.

HAMILTON v. BAKER-HANSEN MFG. CO.

1. ATTACHMENT 🔑107 — AFFIDAVIT—STATEMENT OF AMOUNT OF INDEBTEDNESS.

An affidavit for attachment, stating that, "in addition to certain claims for damages for breach of contract hereinafter referred to," defendant is indebted to plaintiff in the said action for $375, etc., sufficiently stated the amount of defendant's indebtedness, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 538; the inclusion of the quoted words being merely surplusage, not rendering the amount of the indebtedness uncertain.

2. ATTACHMENT 🔑248—MOTION TO DISSOLVE —QUESTIONS CONSIDERED.

A motion to dissolve an attachment cannot be turned into a demurrer to the complaint.

3. ATTACHMENT 🔑248—MOTION TO DISSOLVE —QUESTIONS CONSIDERED.

On motion to dissolve an attachment for failure of the affidavit to state a basis therefor, the only question is whether the cause of action which is stated or attempted to be stated is one upon which attachment will issue.

4. ATTACHMENT 🔑8 — CLAIM AUTHORIZING ATTACHMENT—LIQUIDATED SUM.

As plaintiff who sued for breach of contract upon which he advanced money and received nothing could recover as damages money so paid, the sum was certain and liquidated upon which attachment properly issued.

5. ATTACHMENT 🔑14—NATURE OF CLAIM—PORTION OF AMOUNT SUED FOR.

That plaintiff has in his complaint demanded other sums than the liquidated amount attached is immaterial, as the indebtedness set up in the affidavit of attachment need not include all the damages claimed in the complaint.

6. ATTACHMENT 🔑103 — AFFIDAVIT — SUFFICIENCY—NATURE OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

The statement in the affidavit of attachment that the money was due upon an implied contract, when in fact it was due upon an express contract, did not make the affidavit defective, as it need not appear in the affidavit whether the contract is express or implied, so long as it is a contract for the direct payment of money, and if that is stated, any further recital is only surplusage, and may be disregarded.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by E. B. Hamilton against the Baker-Hansen Manufacturing Company. From an order refusing to dissolve an attachment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clayberg & Whitmore and H. L. Clayberg, all of San Francisco, for appellant. P. J. O'Dea and Louis Horwitz, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment. The complaint shows the action to be one for damages for breach of a written contract between the parties for the conveyance of certain patent rights and delivery of two automobile starters by defendant to plaintiff. It is alleged that defendant has entirely failed to perform the contract or any part thereof. As damages the plaintiff claims $375 as having been advanced to the defendant on account of the contract, and other sums for salaries paid, obligations incurred and profits which she would otherwise have made. The affidavit for attachment states:

> "That in addition to certain claims for damages for breach of contract hereinafter referred to, defendant in said action is indebted to her in the sum of three hundred and seventy-five ($375.00) dollars * * * upon an implied contract for the direct payment of money, to wit: A written contract, * * * and the plaintiff has paid the defendant under such contract three hundred and seventy-five dollars on account of the consideration of said contract, and the defendant has breached such contract and has not performed the same in whole or in any part, and the plaintiff is entitled to the repayment of said sum. * * *"

[1] The first ground of defendant's motion to dissolve the attachment is that the affidavit does not state the amount of defendant's indebtedness, as required by section 538, Code of Civil Procedure, because of the inclusion in the affidavit of the words, "in addition to certain claims for damages for breach of contract hereinafter referred to." It is claimed that this renders the amount of the indebtedness uncertain. The contention is without merit. The affidavit itself shows very clearly that the sum for which the attachment is sought is $375. The intimation that the plaintiff is also claiming additional damages, for which no attachment is asked, is mere surplusage, and in no way throws any doubt upon the amount for which the attachment is requested. See Bank of California v. Boyd, 86 Cal. 386, 388, 25 Pac. 20.

[2-6] The second ground of the motion is that the affidavit discloses no basis for attachment "in that it alleges that $375 is due on an implied contract, while the complaint is based on an express contract and the action is for a reformation of said contract and damages for the breach thereof." A motion to dissolve an attachment cannot be turned into a demurrer to the complaint. Kohler v. Agassiz, 99 Cal. 9, 33 Pac. 741; Hale Bros. v. Milliken, 142 Cal. 134, 75 Pac. 653. The only question is whether the cause of action which is stated or attempted to be stated is one upon which an attachment will issue. Here the complaint sets out a breach of an express contract. One of the items of damage is the $375 paid to the defendant, which is sought to be recovered, by reason of a failure of consideration. A plaintiff who sues for breach of a contract upon which he has advanced money and received nothing in return may recover as damages the money so paid. This sum is certain and liquidated; as to it an attachment will therefore issue. Santa Clara, etc., Fuel Co. v. Tuck, 53 Cal. 304. It is immaterial that plaintiff has also demanded in the complaint other sums, which are not liquidated, and to which she may or may not be entitled. The indebtedness set up in the affidavit need not include all the damages claimed in the complaint. There may be an attachment for a portion only. Waples on Attachment and Garnishment, § 80; Dwyer v. Testard, 65 Tex. 432. The statement in the affidavit that the money is due upon an implied contract when in fact it is due upon an express contract does not make the affidavit defective. It need not appear in the affidavit whether the contract is express or implied (Flagg v. Dare, 107 Cal. 482, 40 Pac. 804), so long as it is a contract for the direct payment of money. If that is stated, any further recital is only surplusage, and may be disregarded. Spear v. King, 6 Smedes & M. (14 Miss.) 276; Cope v. U. M. M. & P. Co., 1 Mont. 53. Since the $375 constituted an attachable claim, and the affidavit itself was not defective, it follows that the motion to dissolve was properly denied.

Order affirmed.

PETERSON v. TITLE GUARANTY & SURETY CO. (Civ. 2023.)

Limitation of Actions 🔑34(3)—Fraudulent Acknowledgment.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1, requiring an action upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture, to be brought within three years after its accrual, an action for damages sustained through reliance on a false certificate of acknowledgment of defendant notary was barred in three years from the date of the acknowledgment, regardless of time of discovery of falsity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by P. E. Peterson, administrator, etc., against the Title Guaranty & Surety Company. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco (Gus L. Baraty, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. N. E. Wretman and C. L. Witten, both of San José, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this action the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant, as surety upon the official bond of a notary public, damages sustained by plaintiff's intestate through his reliance upon a false certificate of acknowledgment issued by said notary. The defendant, both by demurrer to the complaint and by answer, pleaded section 338, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring an action upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture, to be brought within three years of its accrual—it appearing upon the face of the complaint that the present action was commenced some five years after the making and issuing of the false acknowledgment. The trial court took the view that this section and subdivision of the Code was not applicable to an action upon the official bond of a notary, but the Supreme Court in a very recent case (Norton v. Title Guaranty & Surety Co., 168 Pac. 16), following other cases decided in this jurisdiction in which actions upon official bonds were involved, held, in an action brought upon this identical bond, that this provision of the statute of limitations was to be given application in this class of cases.

It follows that the trial court erred in overruling the demurrer of the plaintiff. Upon the authority of Norton v. Title Guaranty & Surety Co., supra, the judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. BRENNAN. (Cr. 563.)

1. Robbery 🔑24(1) — Evidence — Sufficiency.

Evidence held sufficient to show the commission of the crime of robbery, and that the accused was the active participant therein.

2. Criminal Law 🔑959—New Trial—Continuance—Discretion of Court.

The matter of allowing a continuance of proceedings for new trial, for obtaining affidavits as to newly discovered evidence, rests in the discretion of the trial judge.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

James Brennan was convicted of robbery, and his motion for new trial was denied, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. S. Maloney, of San Bernardino, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. The appeal in this case was taken from a judgment of imprisonment and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The appellant was accused by the information of the district attorney of the county of San Bernardino of the crime of robbery, alleged to have been committed on the 26th day of May, 1917. Two points only are made upon this appeal as furnishing reasons why the judgment and order should be reversed. We find no merit in either contention.

[1] 1. It is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to establish the fact that the crime of robbery had been committed as alleged. Our attention is directed to the testimony given by the complaining witness. This witness testified that on the 26th day of May, 1917, he had been drinking at saloons in the town of Needles and was standing in front of one of these saloons when he was accosted by some person who said to him, "A couple of parties want to see you back behind." He had seen this appellant in company with two other persons during the day, and had several times displayed money in their presence. In response to the request, he went to the rear of the saloon where, he says, this appellant jumped upon his back, grabbed him around the neck and choked him, saying, "Give me what you got; come on and keep still;" that he tried to throw the man off, but was unsuccessful. He testified that he had at the time money in a pocketbook; also a $10 bill and $7 or $8 in silver, also a watch, razor, and pocket knife. When asked what became of that property, he said, "Well, these men I think took it, because when I came to why I didn't have none of it." He further testified that the taking of the property was without his consent, and that he did not give it to the men, but that when he "came to" he found himself lying in the back end of the building. Then, he testified, as he sat up the three men came back and said, "You have got more money, damn you, give it up," and that they kicked him and broke two ribs. Without quoting from the testimony further, it must at once appear that there was ample evidence showing not only that the crime of robbery was committed, but that the appellant here was an active participant therein.

[2] 2. Defendant at the time he presented his motion for a new trial asked for a continuance of one week of that matter in order that he might go from San Bernardino to Needles to obtain affidavits as to alleged newly discovered evidence. The matter of allowing a continuance was one which rested in the discretion of the trial judge, and from an examination of the representations made orally by counsel requesting the continuance, we cannot perceive that this discretion was in any wise abused.

SHERWOOD et al. v. AHART. (Civ. 1714.)

1. DEDICATION 🔑20(3) — HIGHWAYS—LONG-CONTINUED ADVERSE USE.
Dedication of a road as a highway is implied from its long continuous use with full knowledge of the landowners interested without permission asked or given, and without objection from any one for a period beyond that required by law to bar right of action.

2. DEDICATION 🔑44—FROM USE—HIGHWAYS—EVIDENCE.
Evidence of use of road as highway held sufficient to support a finding of dedication to public.

3. HIGHWAYS 🔑155—OBSTRUCTION—ACTION TO ENJOIN—PARTIES.
One suffering special injury in the use of his property from obstruction of a highway may maintain an action to enjoin the public nuisance.

4. EVIDENCE 🔑213(1) — ADMISSIONS — COMPROMISE.
Conduct of plaintiffs in seeking, for purpose of avoiding trouble and litigation, amicably to settle with defendant the difficulty of his obstruction of a highway, and in requesting of him a written grant of right of way, will not be considered an admission that they had no right over the road.

5. HIGHWAYS 🔑160(2) — ACTION FOR OBSTRUCTING—PARTIES.
The wife of one obstructing a highway need not be joined in action to enjoin the obstruction merely because she is a co-owner with him of the adjoining premises.

6. JURY 🔑14(12)—RIGHT TO JURY—INJUNCTION.
Action to enjoin obstruction of highway being one in equity, defendant is not entitled to a jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by Edward G. Sherwood and others against George S. Ahart. From adverse judgment and order, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. F. Bray, of Placerville, and H. C. Jerrett, for appellant. Abe Darlington, of Placerville, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The action was to enjoin defendant from interfering with the free use and occupation of a certain highway by plaintiffs, and from interfering with or preventing plaintiffs or either of them from entering upon any portion of said way and repairing the same. The theory upon which the action was tried is that said way constitutes a public highway, and that said plaintiffs were especially damaged by reason of the interference on the part of the defendant with the use and enjoyment of the same on the part of the former. There is, however, no allegation in the complaint that said way constitutes a public highway, it being designated as a "wagon road, commonly known as Brewer's road," and it was alleged:

> "That plaintiffs have traveled said wagon road known as Brewer's road for more than ten years last past, and are the owners and in possession and occupation of a right of way over said northeast quarter of section 35 along and over the course of said Brewer's road, and are entitled to travel and pass over the same at any and all times, and it is necessary for them and each of them to travel the said road in order to reach the said city of Placerville."

It is thus to be seen that plaintiffs presented, by their complaint, the issue as to their ownership merely of a right of way, but, as before stated, the case was tried without objection upon the theory that said wagon road constituted a public highway and had been used as such for many years, and the court so found, as the following finding discloses:

> "That said road known as Brewer's road has been used and traveled by the general public as a public highway continuously since the year 1860."

[1] And it must be said that abundant evidence is found in the record to support said finding. The manner in which it became a public highway was through a dedication by the owner and acceptance by the public. Such dedication is implied from the long and continuous use of the said road with full knowledge of the landowners interested, without asking or receiving any permission, and without objection from any one for a period of time beyond that required by law to bar the right of action. Under the authorities, it must be held that such long-continued use without objection, and with the acquiescence of the owners, raised the implication of dedication for such public purpose. Schwerdtle v. County of Placer, 108 Cal. 589, 41 Pac. 448; Hartley v. Vermillion, 141 Cal. 339, 74 Pac. 987; Leverone v. Weakley, 155 Cal. 395, 101 Pac. 304. We may add that in addition to such use of said road there are other circumstances disclosed by the evidence indicating an intention of the owner to so dedicate said land. One of these circumstances is found in the fact that the road was fenced on both sides throughout its entire length on the land of the defendant, forming a lane through his land. The exact date when the road was thus fenced does not appear. There is, however, direct testimony that it was built by one James Dean, who was then the owner of the land in controversy, now owned by appellant, and it appears from the testimony of other witnesses that said Dean died in the year 1893. The conclusion therefore follows that it has thus been fenced on both sides of the land of defendant since the said year 1893. This fencing of the road would appear to constitute a clear and explicit intention of dedication to the public.

[2] Recurring now to the use of said road as a public highway, the following testimony of certain witnesses for the plaintiffs can leave no room for controversy: E. G. Sherwood testified that he had traveled the road for 16 years, and that it had been "used right along by the general public as a public highway." Mrs. L. Church testified that she had traveled it since 1874. E. E. Twitchell testified that it "has been traveled by the general public as a public highway for the last 35 years." N. Heuer testified that it has been traveled by the general public since 1879. Eugene Phelps knew a portion of the road 29 years ago, and said that it was traveled by the general public. W. S. Dean, a son of J. M. Dean, who patented the land now owned by Ahart, testified that he had known the road as long as he could recollect, and that it had been traveled by all sorts of vehicles, and that "we never attempted to stop anybody; as far as we knew, every one had a right to travel there." Henry Schneider testified:

> "I have known the road called Brewer's road, which passes through the land of Sherwood and Ahart to the Buck's Bar road, for over 54 years. During all that time it has been traveled by the general public as a public highway."

Mrs. Carrie Dean, a witness for the defendant, a former owner of the land now owned by him, testified:

> "We permitted people to pass over that road; we never obstructed anybody's passing. Later on my husband fenced the lane that goes through there now. I never objected to people passing through there; never had any occasion to. I did not have any bother only with cattle; people traveled it as they saw fit."

The defendant himself testified:

> "I never forbid any one going through there. There is very little travel there. Whoever wanted to go through passed along without saying anything."

It must be apparent that the foregoing is amply sufficient to support a finding of a dedication of said way to the public use.

[3] It is equally clear from the evidence, which we need not set out, that the plaintiffs were damaged by the acts of defendant in obstructing said way in a manner different in degree from that of the public generally, and therefore were they authorized to maintain the present action. In the Leverone Case, supra, it is held, the learned Chief Justice rendering the opinion of the court, that:

> "One who suffers special injury in the matter of the comfortable use and enjoyment of his property may maintain an action to enjoin a public nuisance, consisting of the obstruction to a public highway, and recover the damages caused him thereby."

[4] It is true that plaintiffs sought amicably to settle the difficulty with defendant, and that they made a request of him for a written grant of said right of way, but we are satisfied that the lower court was justified in finding that this conduct of plaintiffs was inspired by the desire to avoid trouble and litigation, and was not intended, and should not be construed, as a recognition of any right on the part of defendant to question the use of said road as a public highway, nor should it be construed as an admission on the part of plaintiffs that they had no right over said road.

It follows from the foregoing that the plaintiffs had the right to enter upon said highway and make the necessary repairs. 37 Cyc. 204; Smith v. San Luis Obispo, 95 Cal. 463, 30 Pac. 591.

[5] We can see no merit in the contention that the wife of defendant should have been joined as a party because she is a co-owner of the premises. It does not appear that she interfered at all with the use and occupation of the road, and hence plaintiffs had no cause to complain against her.

[6] Neither was there any error on the part of the court in denying defendant's request for a jury to try the cause. This is not an action at law, but one in equity, and therefore as to this question the rule laid down in Meek v. De Latour, 2 Cal. App. 261, 83 Pac. 300, and Loftus v. Fischer, 113 Cal. 286, 45 Pac. 328, applies.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

LEWIN v. HANFORD et al. (Civ. 2133.)

1. Corporations ⟹116—Sale of Stock—Executed Contract—Liability.

A contract whereby plaintiff agreed to sell and a corporation agreed to buy certain stock at a named price, payable on a certain date, was an executed contract, and where plaintiff tendered the stock, the corporation became instantly liable for the price, and not merely for the difference between the price and the value.

2. Guaranty ⟹40—Contract—Validity.

Where defendants guaranteed a corporation's executed contract to buy stock from plaintiff at a price named payable on a certain date, on breach by the corporation it became liable for the price named, and the contract of guaranty did not violate Civ. Code, § 2809; limiting liability of guarantor to amount recoverable from principal.

3. Guaranty ⟹78—Defenses—No Damage.

Where defendants guaranteed purchase by corporation of stock from plaintiff, who tendered the stock, it was no defense, in action on the guaranty, that the stock was worth more than the agreed price, so that plaintiff suffered no damage.

4. Guaranty ⟹16(2) — Consideration — Sufficiency.

Where a contract guaranteeing performance of another was made simultaneously therewith, no other consideration need exist, by specific provision of Civ. Code, § 2792.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by Leon Lewin against R. G. Hanford and William S. Tevis. Judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings, and defendants appeal on the judgment roll. Affirmed.

R. P. Henshall, of San Francisco, for appellants. Wise & O'Connor, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll alone from a judgment on the pleadings in favor of plaintiff. Defendant's demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and after he filed an amended answer, plaintiff moved for and obtained judgment on the pleadings.

The two points made upon this appeal are that the complaint does not state a cause of action, and that the amended answer states a defense. Therefore it is contended a motion for judgment on the pleadings could not be granted.

The complaint alleged an agreement between plaintiff and Hanford Investment Company, a corporation, executed on November 12, 1913, by which the plaintiff agreed to sell and the Hanford Investment Company agreed to buy the following personal property, to wit: 30 bonds of the Union Water Company, 30 debentures of the United Properties Company, 180 shares of the preferred and 180 shares of the common stock of the United Properties Company, for the sum of $27,000 payable on the 12th day of November, 1914, with interest thereon from the 12th day of November, 1913.

The complaint further alleged that simultaneously with the execution of said agreement and as a part thereof plaintiff and defendants entered into an agreement in writing (setting it forth in hæc verba) which was to the effect that defendants guaranteed that the Hanford Investment Company would well and truly purchase and take the said personal property on or before November 12, 1914, and that, if the Hanford Investment Company failed to make the payment on or before that date, the defendants jointly and severally promised to pay said amount upon demand, with interest from November 12, 1913, and upon payment the property should become the property of the defendants; that the securities which were the subject-matter of the contract had been tendered to the Hanford Investment Company; that it had refused to accept or pay for them; that demand was made upon defendants to pay, and they had refused. Upon these allegations the complaint prayed judgment in the sum of $27,000, and interest.

[1] Appellants argue that the complaint counts upon the breach of an executory contract to buy personal property; that in such case the damage is the difference between the agreed price and its value; and that, as there is no allegation in the complaint respecting the value of the property, no damage is shown, and therefore the complaint fails to state a cause of action. Appellants' conclusion is correct if the major premise is correct. But we are unable to find any grounds for the contention that the complaint constitutes an action for damages for breach of an executory contract.

[2] The theory of the complaint is sound, and is as follows: That both the principal contract and the contract of guaranty were fully executed; that when delivery of the property which was the subject-matter of the sale was tendered to Hanford Investment Company, title to the same at once became vested in it, and upon its refusal to pay the plaintiff elected to consider the stock as sold (Cuthill v. Peabody, 19 Cal. App. 304, 125 Pac. 926); and that the contingency having arisen upon which the defendants' obligation was based, and demand having been made upon the defendants to pay the sum agreed upon, they were liable for that sum.

The complaint counts upon a contract of guaranty. The defendants themselves admit that they are guarantors. They have promised to pay $27,000, based on a certain contingency, which is admitted to have occurred, and there is nothing in this promise which violates the provisions of section 2809 of the Civil Code, in which the liability of a guarantor is limited in amount to that which could be recovered from the principal. As the principal contract was executed, Hanford Investment Company, as principal, was liable for its full purchase price of $27,000, and that is the sum which the defendants in their contract of guaranty obligated themselves to pay.

[3] The amended answer does not state a defense. The defendants do not deny the execution of the written instrument, nor do they contend that the statements there contained are untrue or were obtained by fraud or misrepresentation, and the fact alleged in the answer that the value of the securities agreed to be purchased was in excess of the sum of $27,000, and that therefore the plaintiff had suffered no damage is no defense to an action against the defendants on their contract of guaranty, which contract became operative at the time the principal contract became executed.

[4] The claim of appellants that the agreement between respondent and themselves is without consideration is equally untenable. The guaranty was entered into simultaneously with the execution of the original agreement and as a part thereof, and in such case no other consideration need exist. Civ. Code, § 2792.

Judgment affirmed.

MARKS v. REISSINGER. (Civ. 1722.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1002 — REVIEW — CONCLUSIVENESS OF VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for wrongful death, the evidence was conflicting as to whether defendant without cause or justification struck deceased on the head with a piece of rubber hose, and whether the blows so delivered caused the death of deceased, and there was real and substantial evidence to support a verdict for plaintiff, the verdict could not be disturbed, though the only witness who testified that defendant struck deceased on the head with the hose was plaintiff's brother, and though a number of other alleged eyewitnesses gave testimony which, if accepted and believed, would have completely destroyed the evidentiary force and value of his testimony.

2. ASSAULT AND BATTERY 🔑26 — ACTIONS — BURDEN OF PROOF—SELF-DEFENSE.

Where, in an action for death from an assault, the answer set up as a defense that defendant struck deceased in necessary self-defense, or to protect himself against threatened personal injury on the part of deceased, the burden rested upon him to establish such defense.

3. DEATH 🔑11 — RIGHT OF ACTION FOR DEATH—CREATION OF NEW ACTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, giving the heirs or personal representatives of a deceased person a right of action for his death wrongfully produced through the act of another, the right of action is a new action separate and distinct from deceased's right in his lifetime to sue for the injury causing the death, and the heirs or personal representatives do not merely succeed to his right of action.

4. DEATH 🔑21 — RIGHT OF ACTION FOR DEATH—DEFENSES.

An action for death is not barred by deceased's failure in his lifetime to bring an action for the injuries causing the death.

5. DEATH 🔑39 — ACTIONS FOR CAUSING DEATH—LIMITATIONS.

As an action for death is a new action distinct from the right of action which deceased had in his lifetime, the limitation of one year under Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, relative to actions for injuries or death, does not run until the death.

6. EVIDENCE 🔑236(1)—DECLARATIONS BY DECEDENT—PRIVITY.

As a right of action for death arose independently of deceased's right of action in his lifetime for the injury inflicted, and could not be destroyed by any compromise or release by deceased, his declarations as to the circumstances of the injury were not admissible to defeat the action under Code Civ. Proc. § 1853, making the declarations of a deceased person against his pecuniary interest, or that of his successor in interest, admissible, as deceased never had any interest in the action for his death or the subject-matter thereof, and his heirs or representatives are not his successors in interest.

7. EVIDENCE 🔑126(2) — RES GESTÆ — STATEMENTS OF INJURED PERSON.

In an action for death due to an assault, a statement of deceased a few days after the assault that defendant did not strike him on the head was not admissible as a part of the res gestæ.

8. EVIDENCE 🔑471(2) — FACTS OR CONCLUSIONS—PARTICIPATION IN QUARREL.

In an action for death due to an assault in the course of a squabble at defendant's brewery and saloon, where defendant testified that when he attempted to stop a fight between third persons, deceased told him to let them have it out, or he would get defendant, and that he would have stopped the fight if it had not been for deceased, this last statement that he would have stopped the fight except for deceased involved, by insinuation, his opinion and conclusion that deceased was taking a hand in the trouble or encouraging it, and was properly excluded.

9. ASSAULT AND BATTERY 🔑31—ACTIONS FOR ASSAULT—EVIDENCE.

Defendant's testimony in answer to a question as to why he kept in his saloon a piece of rubber hose with which he struck deceased, that he was "out there" and had no protection, and thought he had a right to protect his place, was properly stricken out, though it might have been allowed to stand without jeopardizing plaintiff's rights, where it was admitted that the hose was in the saloon, and was used by defendant, and there was no claim that he was anticipating trouble with deceased and his companions, or had it for the purpose of meeting such trouble, as the fact that he kept the hose to protect himself, or was without protection, would not justify him in taking the law into his own hands, or in wrongfully assaulting deceased.

10. EVIDENCE 🔑472(4) — OPINION EVIDENCE —MATTERS FOR DETERMINATION OF JURY.

In an action for death due to an assault with a piece of rubber hose, a question asked defendant as to whether he used any more force than he felt necessary to cause deceased to cease attacking him was objectionable in form; it being for the jury to say whether the force used was greater than was necessary to stop deceased from further prosecuting his attack upon defendant.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1058(2)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

The exclusion of such question, if error, was not prejudicial, where the general trend of defendant's testimony was that he acted in self-defense, and used no more force in repelling the attack than was absolutely requisite for his own protection and safety.

12. WITNESSES 🔑240(4) — EXAMINATION — LEADING QUESTIONS.

The exclusion of questions asked defendant as to whether he hit deceased or attempted to strike him until deceased first swung at him, and whether he or deceased made the first hostile demonstration, was technically justified, on the ground that the questions were leading in form, and suggestive of the desired answers.

13. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1058(2)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for death due to an assault, the exclusion of questions asked defendant as to whether he hit deceased, or attempted to strike him before deceased swung at him, and whether he or deceased made the first hostile demonstration, was not error, where, in another part of his examination, he was asked whether he used the hose with which he struck deceased before deceased swung at him, and answered in the negative.

14. WITNESSES 🔑37(4) — KNOWLEDGE OF FACTS—REPUTATION OF PARTY.

In an action for death due to an assault, testimony that the general reputation of deceased for peace and quietude was bad was properly excluded, where the testimony of the witnesses on cross-examination showed that they based their statement as to his general reputation entirely on their own observations of his personal conduct on particular occasions, and not on what the community generally had said of him, as testimony concerning a party's general reputation should not be based upon specific acts within the personal observation of the witness.

Where, in an action for death due to an assault, defendant contended that he acted in self-defense, an instruction that there was no legal presumption that a bodily injury, if any, was justifiable, and that the justification therefor, if any, must be proved by the one asserting it, was properly given, as it simply meant that when justification was set up as a defense, the burden was on defendant to prove the defense.

16. DEATH 🔑17 — LIABILITY FOR DEATH — CONCURRING CAUSES.

Where, after deceased was assaulted by defendant, he was taken down with pneumonia, if he would not have died but for the development of cerebral meningitis from the injury to his head and brain inflicted by defendant, then such meningitis was at least a concurring cause of his death, and defendant was liable, even though the pneumonia concurred therewith in proximately causing the death.

17. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1033(5)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRORS FAVORABLE TO APPELLANT.

An instruction that if, after the assault and prior to his death, deceased contracted pneumonia, and the cerebral meningitis due to the injury proximately concurred with the pneumonia in causing his death, and if his death would not have occurred at the time it did from the pneumonia alone, then plaintiff was entitled to recover, was not prejudicial to defendant, where there was ample evidence from which the jury could have found that deceased had practically recovered from the pneumonia, and that his death was directly and solely due to cerebral meningitis, caused by the injuries wrongfully inflicted upon him by defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Eva Marks, administrator of Harry Marks, deceased, against M. Reissinger. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant. Jeremiah F. Sullivan, Theo. J. Roche, and E. I. Barry, all of San Francisco, and J. E. Ebert, of Marysville, for respondent.

HART, J. The action was brought by plaintiff as administratrix of the estate of her husband, on behalf of herself and her three minor children, to recover damages for the death of her husband alleged to have been caused by blows wrongfully inflicted upon him by defendant. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $10,000, and judgment was entered accordingly. The appeal is by defendant from said judgment and from an order denying him a new trial.

Briefly, the facts of the case may be stated as follows: Harry Marks, the deceased, was the owner of a number of work horses with which he engaged, in the summer months, in the business of logging in Plumas and Sierra counties, and in the winter months in plowing for different parties in Yuba and Butte counties. In March, 1912, he was engaged in plowing some land about 6½ miles from Marysville, and had spent the night of March 12th with his family in Marysville. On the morning of the 13th of March, George W. Hughes, a brother of Mrs. Marks, who was employed by Harry Marks, drove into Marysville with a four-horse team for the purpose of securing supplies for the men and teams. He was accompanied by a man named Frank Robinson and another named Petrie. Late in the afternoon these three men, accompanied by Marks and a man named Craig, started to drive back to the place where they were working. Some of the party had been drinking during the day, and Hughes testified that Robinson and Craig were "pretty drunk," and that Marks and Petrie were sober. When the party arrived at the saloon and brewery owned and conducted by the defendant, Robinson, desiring another drink, alighted from the wagon and started towards the saloon. He became engaged in a controversy with Herman Fehr, an employé at the brewery, which soon became a scuffle. Marks remarked that he was "going in to get Mr. Robinson," and went to where the two men were. Shortly afterward Hughes followed him, and he testified that Robinson and Fehr were scuffling, and that Marks was standing by looking on. He said that Fehr had Robinson down on the floor, and the latter "hollered 'Enough!' and Mr. Marks stepped over and said, 'Humpy, Frank says he has got enough,' and just then a man hit Harry three times over the head with a billy and kind of staggered him down, and a fellow named 'Red' Quinlan hit Harry, and knocked him clean down, and he got up, and the fight kind of stopped, and the fellow that hit him with the billy run into the building, into the saloon, I judge. * * * Mr. Marks was struck with a billy on the left side of his head." The man who struck the deceased with the "billy," which was shown by the evidence to be a piece of rubber hose, was the defendant.

Dr. J. H. Barr attended deceased from the 14th of March, 1912, until his death, which occurred on the 1st day of May following. He testified that Marks complained of pains on the left side of his head. After his death he performed an autopsy upon the body. He testified:

> "An incision was made, removing the scalp, and on the removal of the scalp on the left side of the head, * * * located about half way between the top of the head and the median line, was a blood extravasation below the periosteum. * * * We found the membrane thickened and congested and adhered to the brain. * * * We found the brain lacerated and infiltrated with pus. * * * I would say trauma was the cause of the conditions I observed and found in the head of Harry Marks on this occasion. By 'trauma' I mean violence. * * * A blow of any kind could inflict that; a fall could also inflict it; but the individual would have to fall with his head downward to inflict it in that place."

Dr. Barr stated that the cause of the death of Marks "was injury to the skull—I will get it properly worded—injury to the head; laceration of the brain on the left side." He said that the injury was to the left of the median line and on the left side of the head. Dr. David Powell, who assisted Dr. Barr in the autopsy, corroborated the latter as to the conditions in the head and brain and the cause of Marks' death.

The first assignment of error is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury.

1. While we deem it unnecessary to recite herein in detail the testimony of the various witnesses, we may, nevertheless, properly refer to some of the testimony in a general way for the purpose of showing that there is a sharp conflict in the evidence upon the material points in the case, and that, therefore, the verdict of the jury must stand. In the first place, it may be remarked that it is to be conceded that the testimony of the witnesses for the defendant that were present at the time of the trouble and claimed to have witnessed it tended to show that a general row, started by the man Robinson, above referred to, was in progress in the brewery, and that the deceased was mixed up in it; that the defendant ordered the men to cease making a disturbance in his place; that the defendant procured a piece of hose and again stepped up to the fighting men and ordered them to stop fighting; that the deceased made some remark to the defendant, and also made a demonstration as though he intended to assault him, whereupon the defendant struck the deceased with the said piece of hose several times on the shoulder, not with sufficient force, however, to knock him down or to the floor; that thereafter the deceased went on the outside, picked up a heavy stick, and threatened to "settle" with the defendant; that thereupon one Quinlan, with his fist, struck Marks twice—once in the mouth or side of the neck, and once in the nose. The defendant testified that he had in the saloon a piece of hose about 2½ inches in diameter, which he kept there for the purpose of "protecting himself." He admitted striking the deceased with the hose, but denied that thus he struck him on the head. There was further testimony (given by Dr. Barr) that, after the deceased was injured at the brewery, he was taken down with pneumonia, from which Dr. Barr declared he had entirely recovered; serious symtoms from the effects of the blows upon his head having shortly thereafter manifested themselves. Dr. Kaufman, for the defendant, testified that he was present and witnessed the autoptical examination of the deceased by Drs. Barr and Powell, and declared it to be his opinion that Marks' death was not the result of any injury to his head or brain, but was directly caused by pneumonia.

[1, 2] Thus it will be noted that, as stated, there is a pronounced conflict in the evidence upon the two important questions of fact in the case, viz.: (1) Whether the defendant, without cause or not in necessary self-defense, struck the deceased on the head with the piece of hose; (2) whether the cause of Marks' death was from the effect of the blows so delivered by the defendant. It is true that but one witness (Hughes) testified that the blows delivered by the defendant were upon the head of the deceased when the latter was doing no more than attempting to stop the fight or scuffle going on between Fehr and Robinson, and that, prior to being so struck, the deceased had made no hostile or threatening movement or demonstration toward the defendant. The defendant's witness, Hardy, it might be well to explain in this connection, admitted that he told the attorneys for the defense and Mrs. Marks, the plaintiff, in the office of said attorneys, prior to the trial, that he saw the defendant strike the deceased on the head with the hose; but he further declared that he then made that statement because he had been asked by the plaintiff's attorneys to call at their office, and that he desired to see precisely what they (the attorneys) wanted him for or wanted him to say when giving his testimony. He positively and thus repeatedly declared, though, that said attorneys at no time asked him to testify to anything concerning the case which was not true. But, throwing out of the case any consideration of Hardy's testimony or any suggestion that the jury might have believed that he told the plaintiff's attorneys the truth when he said to them that the defendant struck the deceased on the head with the hose, and still there stands unimpeached in the record Hughes' testimony which, if believable, is amply sufficient to sustain the verdict. His testimony is not upon its face improbable. The fact that he is a brother of the plaintiff obviously does not make it so. It might have entered into the question of his interest in the case in behalf of the plaintiff, and thus his credibility and the weight of his testimony affected, but this was for the jury to resolve. The latter having evidently, and, indeed, presumptively, believed his testimony as to the circumstances of the assault, as well as the testimony of Drs. Barr and Powell as to the cause of Marks' death, it is manifestly not for a court of review to say, in view of the character of said testimony or the face value thereof, that the conclusion arrived at by the jury was not justified, notwithstanding that the record discloses that a number of other persons, claiming to have witnessed the assault, gave testimony which, if accepted and believed by the jury, would certainly have had the effect of completely destroying its evidentiary force and value. There is, as seen, real and substantial evidence in the record on the material point in the case to support the verdict, and this is all that is required to foreclose interference with the verdict on the ground that it was not justified by the proofs. Driscoll v. Cable Railway Co., 97 Cal. 533, 562, and 567, 32 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203; Clopton v. Clopton, 162 Cal. 31, 121 Pac. 720; Lummer v. Unruh, 25 Cal. App. 102, 142 Pac. 914; Hecker v. Morley, 170 Cal. 88, 148 Pac. 516; Clark v. Tulare Dredging Co., 14 Cal. App. 414, 429, 112 Pac. 564. It may be added that, since the answer of the defendant set up, as a defense to the action, the fact that the defendant struck the deceased as in necessary self-defense or to protect himself against threatened personal injury on the part of the deceased, the burden rested upon the defendant to establish that defense (Brooks v. Haslam, 65 Cal. 421, 4 Pac. 399; Chapell v. Schmidt, 104 Cal. 511, 38 Pac. 892), and the jury were the exclusive judges of whether this burden was sustained.

The other assignments of error involve the rulings of the court upon the evidence, certain instructions embraced in the court's charge and the ruling disallowing the demurrer on the ground that the action was barred by the terms of subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The latter proposition, although the last assignment of error discussed in the briefs, may first be appropriately considered, since it goes to the question whether the plaintiff's action was lost by lapse of time. Moreover, the principle to be considered and applied in the determination of the question whether the action was brought after it was barred under the statute has direct relation to and will govern in the decision of the point, advanced by the defendant, that the court erred in refusing to permit a certain declaration of the deceased as to the assault to go before the jury.

[3] 2. The contention is that the time for the commencement of this action began to run from the time the deceased received the injuries which, it is alleged, caused his death, and that, when this action was instituted, more than one year had elapsed since the injuries were received; section 340, subdivision 3, providing, among other things, that an action for injury to or for the death of one caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another must be brought within one year from the time of such injury or death. The theory involved in the demurrer on the special ground necessarily is that the right of action which the plaintiff is here claiming is precisely the same or identical action which accrued to the deceased by reason of the injury suffered by him from the alleged wrongful act of the defendant. The theory is plainly erroneous. The right of the deceased to maintain, in his lifetime, an action for the damage, if any, sustained by him at the hands of the defendant, and the right of the heirs or personal representatives of the deceased, after the latter's death as the result of such injury, to maintain an action for the death of Marks so caused, are two entirely different rights. Obviously, the right of the deceased to maintain an action for damages for the injuries received necessarily expired with his death. "Actio personalis moritur cum persona." And but for the law giving to the heirs or representatives of the deceased the right to sue for such damages as they may have sustained by reason of the death of Marks through the alleged wrongful act of the defendant, the latter (Marks having died before bringing any action) would be wholly immune from any action or the consequences thereof of a civil nature. Our law (section 377, Code Civ. Proc.), giving the heirs or personal representatives of a deceased person a right of action for his death, wrongfully produced through the act of another, was not known to the common law. It is purely a statutory right—a right with which, very clearly, the person for whose death the action may be maintained could possibly have no concern. It ought not to be necessary to say that the right does not, and in the very nature of things could not, under any possible view, exist during or in the lifetime of the person wrongfully injured, for the very fact of his death from wrongful violence at the hands of another itself or alone creates or establishes the foundation for the exercise of the right to sue for any damages suffered by his heirs, etc., for his death so caused. To hold, as the learned counsel maintains, that the right of action after death is only the succession in the heirs or personal representatives of the right as it existed in and belonged to the deceased before his death would be to hold that the right of action in the heirs lies solely in the damages suffered by the deceased by reason of the injuries received. This would involve a most unreasonable view of section 377. As stated the damage for which the heirs or personal representatives of a deceased whose death has been caused by the wrongful act of another may maintain the action authorized by said section lies necessarily in the fact of such death. What damage, in law, could a person himself suffer by reason of his own death caused by the tortious act of another? Obviously, no damage whatever. But the language of the section mentioned is itself plain and simple enough to show that the intention of the Legislature, in enacting it, was to give to the surviving heirs of the deceased who may themselves be damaged by his death in a wrongful manner the right to sue for compensation for the damage so sustained. The section reads:

> "When the death of a person, not being a minor, is caused by the wrongful act of another, his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death," etc.

[4] Nor does the fact, if it be a fact, that the deceased did not bring an action in his lifetime for the damages occasioned to him by the injuries inflicted upon him bar the right of the heirs or personal representatives of the deceased to exercise and prosecute their right of action under section 377.

The above views accord with the authorities. We quote the following from Tiffany on Death by Wrongful Act, § 23:

> "It is manifest that the act did not repeal, or create an exception to, the rule of 'actio personalis moritur cum persona' by providing for the survival of the action which the party injured might have maintained, for, though the action can be maintained only when the death is caused under such circumstances as would have entitled the party injured to maintain an action, it is not maintainable for the recovery of the damages resulting from the personal injury to him, and hence, by survival, to his estate, but is maintainable only for the recovery of damages for the pecuniary loss resulting from the death to the surviving members of his family. As Coleridge, J., said in one of the first cases that arose under the act: 'This act does not transfer the right of action to his representative, but gives to his representative a totally new right of action, on different principles.' It must be admitted that expressions occur in some of the opinions to the effect that the statute gives a substituted, and not a new, right of action, but, having regard to the provisions of the act in respect to the persons who are entitled to the benefit of the action and the measure of damages, such a position is entirely untenable. Said Lord Blackburn, in Seward v. The Vera Cruz: 'A totally new action is given against the person who would have been responsible to the deceased if the deceased had lived—an action which * * * is new in its species, new in its quality, new in its principle, in every way new, and which can only be brought if there is any person answering the description of the widow, parent, or child, who, under such circumstances, suffers pecuniary loss.'"

The Supreme Court, in Munro v. Dredging & Rec. Co., 84 Cal. 515, 524, 24 Pac. 303, 305 (18 Am. St. Rep. 248), said, referring to what was said in the English case of Blake v. Midland Ry. Co., 18 Q. B. 93:

> "We agree with what is said in the opinion above quoted that the action given by the statute (section 377, supra) is a new action, and not the transfer to the representative of the right of action which the deceased person would have had if he had survived the injury"—citing a number of English and American cases.

See, also, Lange v. Schoettler, 115 Cal, 388, 390, 47 Pac. 139; Burk v. Arcata & Mad River R. R. Co., 125 Cal. 364, 366, 367, 57 Pac. 1065 73 Am. St. Rep. 52; Gregory v. S. P. Co., (C. C.) 157 Fed. 113; Webster v. Norwegian Mining Co., 137 Cal. 399, 70 Pac. 276, 92 Am. St. Rep. 181; Western & A. R. Co. v. Bass, 104 Ga. 390, 30 S. E. 874; Causey v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co., 166 N. C. 5, 81 S. E. 917, L. R. A. 1915E, 1185, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 707.

[5] From the foregoing considerations it follows, of course, that the time for bringing an action of this character begins to run from the time of the death of the injured person, and not, as counsel for the defendant contends, from the time that the injury causing his death was inflicted upon him. The deceased died on the 1st day of May, 1912, and this action was commenced on the 23d day of April, 1913. The action was therefore brought within the statutory time, and the demurrer upon the ground that it was barred by the section named was properly overruled.

[6, 7] 3. As stated, the next assignment of error involves a question closely akin to the proposition above discussed. It came about thus: The witness Mandry, for the defendant, was asked by the latter's counsel about an alleged conversation the witness had with the deceased, a few days after he received the beating by the defendant, to which question an objection was made by the plaintiff and sustained by the court. Thereupon counsel for the defendant stated that he desired to prove by the witness that in the conversation referred to Marks declared that the defendant did not strike him on the head. Objection to the proposed testimony was interposed by the plaintiff on the usual or ordinary grounds, and, furthermore, that it was hearsay, and the objection sustained. We think the ruling was correct.

As above shown, the right of action asserted here by the plaintiff was not a right of action of the deceased. It arose independently of any consideration of the deceased's right to maintain and prosecute an action in his lifetime for any damages he might have suffered because of the injury inflicted upon him by the defendant. The right of his heirs or representatives to maintain this action for his death and to support the same by evidence could not be destroyed by any compromise or agreement of release he might have made with the defendant while his right of action existed. Or, as the Supreme Court has recently said, referring to the action created by section 377—we quote the syllabus:

> "The right of action thereby created is a new right of action with a different measure of damage from that which accrued to the injured person as the result of the defendant's wrongdoing, and a compromise agreement and release of the wrongdoer made by the injured person before his death is not a defense thereto." Earley v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co. (Sup.) 167 Pac. 513.

By parity of reasoning, the declaration of the deceased after he received the injuries and before his death, that he was not struck and injured by the defendant, cannot be used for the purpose of defeating the heirs or representatives of the deceased in an action which is theirs and never his. The declaration was not admissible under the rule allowing declarations of a deceased person against his pecuniary interest or that of his successor in interest (Code Civ. Proc. § 1853), for, as has been shown, he never had any interest in the present action or the subject-matter thereof, nor are his heirs or representatives, in an action of this character, his successors in interest. Nor was it admissible as part of the res gestæ. The whole theory upon which such declarations are excluded in a case of this character is, as above suggested, that the legal rights of the heirs or representatives of a deceased person seeking to recover for his death resulting from the wrongful act of another, while growing out of the injury causing the death, are independent of that fact and cannot be defeated or affected by anything the deceased can say or do. This proposition is clearly explained in the cases, among which we cite the following: Hedge v. Williams, 131 Cal. 455, 63 Pac. 721, 64 Pac. 106, 82 Am. St. Rep. 366; Pennsylvania Co. v. Long, 94 Ind. 250, 252; City of Bradford v. Downs, 126 Pa. 622, 17 Atl. 884; Louisville, etc., Ry. Co. v. Berry, 2 Ind. App. 427, 28 N. E. 714.

[8] 4. The next assignment involves an attack upon the action of the court in striking out a portion of an answer to a certain question put to the defendant by his counsel. The defendant, after explaining that, when Fehr and Robinson were scuffling on the floor, he attempted to stop the fight, and said to the belligerents that he did not "want any trouble here," was asked by his attorney: "What did Marks do or say then?" to which he replied: "He said, 'You Dutch s——n of a b——h, if you don't let them have it out I will get you,' and I would have stopped it there if it had not been for Marks." The court, on motion, struck out the following portion of the answer: "I would have stopped it there if it had not been for Marks." The ruling is not erroneous. The portion of the answer stricken out involved the mere opinion and conclusion of the witness, and its vice was in its insinuation, without explaining or describing his acts or conduct so that the jury could have determined that question, that Marks was taking a hand in the trouble or encouraging it.

[9] 5. Again, it is said that the court erred to the prejudice of the defendant's rights in the trial by striking out the following explanation by the defendant of his reason for keeping in his saloon the piece of hose with which he struck the deceased: "I am out there, and I have no one's protection whatever, and I thought I had a right to protect my place there." Although we think the ruling was proper, the statement stricken out might have been allowed to stand without jeopardizing the rights of the plaintiff or contributing to the advantage of the defendant. The hose was in his saloon, and he admitted using it on the deceased, and, manifestly, the fact that he kept it there to protect himself or that he was without protection except such as he might himself personally invoke when necessary could have no tendency to excuse his act in striking Marks. There was no claim in this case that he was anticipating trouble with Marks and his companions on the day of the difficulty or at any other time, and that he had procured the piece of hose for the special purpose of meeting such trouble or of assaulting Marks. The statement that he was without protection (presumably police protection) was clearly irrelevant and immaterial. That fact would not, of course, justify him in taking the law into his own hands or in wrongfully assaulting another.

[10, 11] 6. As seen, the defendant testified that he did not use the hose on the deceased until the latter "had swung at him." He was then asked: "And when you did use it, did you use any more force than you felt necessary there to cause him to cease attacking you?" We think the form of the question is objectionable, yet, if he had been asked the question whether or not he believed, from all appearances, that he had used no more force than was necessary to cause the deceased to cease attacking him, the question might have been proper, in which case, after all, it would have been for the jury to say whether the force used by the defendant was greater than was necessary to stop the deceased from further prosecuting his attack upon the former. But, in any event, even if the ruling involved error, we cannot say that it was prejudicial, since the general trend of the defendant's testimony was that he acted in self-defense, and used no more force in repelling the attack of the deceased than was absolutely requisite for his own protection and safety.

[12, 13] 7. The following questions to the defendant by his attorney were objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and leading, and the objection sustained: "Did you hit him or attempt to strike him until he first swung at you?" "Who made the first hostile demonstration there, Marks or you?" To the latter question the additional objection was made that it called for the conclusion of the witness. Undoubtedly the objections that the questions were leading in form and suggestive of the answer desired were well taken, and the exclusion of answers upon that ground, though a highly technical ground, was legally justified. Even though the court could properly enough have allowed the questions to be answered and should have done so, yet it is to be said that the record shows that the defendant received the benefit of the testimony which they would probably have elicited; for, in another part of his examination, he was asked if he used the hose before Marks "swung at you," and he answered, and the answer was allowed to remain in the record: "No, sir; no, sir." This was the equivalent of saying that the deceased made a hostile or threatening demonstration toward him before he used the hose; and it was, furthermore, the equivalent of saying that he did not "hit him [Marks] or attempt to strike him until he [Marks] first swung" at the defendant. And there can be no doubt that the jury so understood the answer to that question.

[14] 8. Several witnesses were introduced by the defense to testify that the general reputation of the deceased for peace and quiet was bad. While some of these witnesses, after considerable questioning and repeated explicit explanations by the court of what was meant by the term, "general reputation," as it is understood in law, were made to say, on direct examination, that they were acquainted with the general reputation of the deceased for the traits mentioned, and declared it to be bad, on cross-examination it was developed that they had based their statement that his general reputation was bad in the respect mentioned entirely on their own observations of his personal conduct on occasions when the decedent was under the influence of intoxicating liquor and not on what the community generally had said of him. The court, upon motion, struck from the record all such testimony, and technically the court thus made no mistake. It is well understood, of course, that the purpose of testimony of the general reputation of a person in the community in which he resides and is known for certain traits is to prove that his character is good or bad, as the case may be. Proof of character in that manner involves an exception to the rule against hearsay evidence. It is not an uncommon circumstance that such testimony may itself have the effect of turning the scale on a vitally important question of fact involved in the issue to be decided. Hence the rule as to the mode of presenting such testimony or of proving character should, with substantial strictness, be observed, and to this end testimony of specific instances of misconduct, where bad character is sought to be shown, should no more be allowed than testimony of particular instances of commendable conduct, where good character is attempted to be established. In other words, testimony addressed to the question of the general reputation of a person as to certain traits of character should, as the law requires, be based upon and the result of the knowledge of the witness of such general reputation, and not upon specific acts tending to show a good or bad character which have come under the personal observation of the witness.

[15-17] 9. Relative to the complaint that the court erred in some of the instructions embodied in its charge to the jury, counsel for the defendant, in his brief, says:

> "Under this heading [Errors Claimed in Connection with the Giving of Instructions], we will group certain assignments of error which we deem it our duty to present and concerning which we make no waiver, as we believe they should be passed upon by the court, but in the discussion of which we can't indulge the same earnestness of conviction attempted to be asserted in thus far presenting this case."

Thus it plainly appears that counsel himself is not seriously of the opinion that the instructions to which he refers contain erroneous statements of legal principles, or that the principles so stated are not pertinent to the issues as made by the pleadings and developed by the evidence. There are, however, three instructions in the group mentioned in the above-quoted statement. One of these is to the effect "that there is no legal presumption that a bodily injury, if any, is justifiable; and the justification therefor, if any, must be proven by him who asserts it." We think the instruction, as applied to this case, states a legally sound principle. It simply means that, in a case of this character, where justification for the injury inflicted is set up as a defense, the burden is upon the defendant to prove the defense. This is as we understand the law and have elsewhere in this opinion so declared. The learned counsel says that he has no fault to find with the second instruction included within the group, and certainly we have none. It is therefore unnecessary to make further reference to it. The third and last instruction embraced within the group, it is insisted, is not only erroneous, but was prejudicial in its effect upon the defendant's substantial rights. It reads:

> "If you believe from the evidence that on the 13th day of March, 1912, the defendant, M. Reissinger, without cause or provocation, wrongfully and negligently struck Harry Marks on the head with a piece of hose, and if you further believe from the evidence that as the result thereof said Harry Marks suffered from cerebral meningitis, and if you further believe from the evidence that after said 13th day of March, 1912, and prior to his death said Harry Marks contracted pneumonia, and that said cerebral meningitis proximately concurred with said pneumonia in causing his death, and that said death would not have occurred at said time from pneumonia alone, then I charge you that under such circumstances if such shall have been shown by the evidence the plaintiff in this case is entitled to recover, and your verdict must be in her favor and against the defendant."

It is the portion of the instruction in italics to which the defendant objects. We perceive nothing wrong in the instruction. If the deceased would not have died when he did but for the cerebral meningitis caused by the injuries inflicted by the defendant, then certainly the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, notwithstanding that pneumonia might have concurred with such meningitis in proximately causing death. We do not understand the law to be that, to hold a party for his tortious act whereby he produces damage to or the death of another, such act must be the sole proximate cause of the injury or the death resulting therefrom. If such a rule were sound, then, where the distinct acts of two different parties had concurred proximately to cause injury to or the death of another, neither would be liable. In this case, as we have seen, the deceased was taken down with pneumonia, a dangerous malady, after he had been injured by the defendant. Now, if the evidence was such as to warrant the conclusion that the deceased would not have died when he did if it had not been for the development of cerebral meningitis from the injury to his head and brain inflicted by the defendant, then it follows that such meningitis was at least a concurring proximate cause of his death, and for this the defendant is liable. The instruction complained of clearly enough states the principle as we understand and have explained it. But, in any view, the instruction could not have prejudiced the defendant, since it assumes that pneumonia was a concurring proximate cause of death, whereas there is ample evidence from which the jury could have found, with seeming justness, that the deceased had practically recovered from pneumonia, and that his death was directly and solely due to cerebral meningitis caused by the injuries wrongfully inflicted upon him by the defendant.

We conclude that we would not be justified from anything presented in the record before us in disturbing the result reached in the court below, and, accordingly, the judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

SILBERSTEIN v. KITRICK et al.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY 🔑117 — CONTRACTOR'S BOND—RELEASE OF SURETY.

Under Civ. Code, § 2836, providing a surety cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract; section 2844, declaring him to have all the rights of a guarantor; section 2840, providing that he is exonerated in like manner with a guarantor to the extent that he is prejudiced by any act of the creditor which would naturally prove injurious to the remedies of the surety or inconsistent with his rights, or which lessens his security; and section 2819, providing that a guarantor is exonerated, except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal in respect thereto in any way impaired or suspended—a building contractor's surety is discharged by the owner not complying with his duty under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184 (which statute must be read into the contract), when "stop notices" are given, to protect the surety, by withholding payment of unpaid installments; failing in which he was guilty of an act "which would naturally prove injurious to the remedies of the surety or inconsistent with his rights," and this though the persons filing the "stop notices" recovered judgment against the owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by H. Silberstein against R. S. Kitrick and another. From adverse judgment and order, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles J. Heggerty, of San Francisco, and W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant. A. F. Jones and George F. Jones, both of Oroville, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action is to recover from defendants the sum of $10,000 on a bond given by them for that amount as sureties of the Burnight-Kennedy Company, a corporation, which had entered into a contract with plaintiff to erect a building in the city of Chico. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and defendants had findings and judgment in their favor. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The contract price for the building was $41,500, to be paid by progressive payments, as follows:

> "First. The sum of two thousand ($2,000) dollars when all excavation is completed and the walls are up ready to receive first or street floor joists.
> "Second. The sum of twenty-nine thousand one hundred ($29,100) dollars from time to time as the work progresses, from the date of the first payment until the completion of the building; said sum of $29,100 to be paid in the sums of $2,000 each, when labor and material have been performed and placed in the building, exceeding said several sums by 25 per cent. Each payment shall be a stop or rest, and the next payment of $2,000 to be made when an additional amount of labor and material has been performed and furnished 25 per cent. in excess of the payment to be made. After thirteen payments of $2,000 have been made and upon the final completion and delivery of the building the sum of $31,000 shall be made, and the balance and last payment of the contract price, to wit, the sum of $10,400, shall be made thirty-six (36) days after the completion and delivery of the building."

By appropriate averments in their answer, defendants sought to have corrected an obvious ambiguity or mistake in the latter part of clause "Second," which provided for a completion payment of $31,000, so as to read $3,100, and the court, on sufficient evidence, found that it was the intention of the parties that this payment should be $3,100. Thus construed, payments should have been made as follows:

First payment	$ 2,000
13 $2,000 payments	26,000
Completion payment	3,100
36 days after completion payment	10,400

The first payment of $2,000 was made on May 22, 1909, and at various times each month thereafter 13 payments of $2,000 each were made, the last, or thirteenth, of date January 8, 1910. On January 22, 1910, there was a further payment made of $2,000 which defendants claim was a premature payment and unauthorized. On March 16, 1910, the company quit work and ceased furnishing materials, leaving the building unfinished, and plaintiff took possession and completed the work on April 14, 1910, at a cost to him of $885.31 for labor and material, and on April 15, 1910, he filed notice of completion in the county recorder's office.

As the work progressed, the architect named in the contract issued and delivered to the company certificates upon account of materials used and labor performed, and plaintiff paid to the company on said certificates up to and including the payment of January 22, 1910, the total sum of $30,000. The contract provided, among other things, as pointed out by appellant, that in each case of payment under the contract, a certificate was to be "obtained and signed by the said A. J. Bryan, architect"; that "should any dispute arise respecting the meaning of the drawings or specifications, the same shall be decided by A. J. Bryan, architect, and his decision shall be final, but should any dispute arise respecting the value of the extra work or works omitted" the dispute was to be arbitrated; that "all payments shall be made upon the certificates of the architect, and this contract is completed and the work is finished in accordance with the original plans and such modifications or alterations as may be made therein. The owner is to make payments promptly and upon the certificate of the architect." No other powers of the architect appear at all pertinent to any issue here, so far as we can discover. The bond made reference to the contract, and among the provisions of the bond relating to the obligation of the sureties were the following:

> "Now, therefore, if the said Burnight-Kennedy Company shall pay for all materials and supplies furnished for the performance of the work so contracted to be done and pay for all labor done and to be done of every kind and to complete and finish said building within the time named and according to the plans and specifications, then this obligation shall be void, otherwise the sureties herein will pay the same to the amount specified in said bond. It is further stipulated in a portion of this bond that the said Burnight-Kennedy Company shall complete and turn over to the said H. Silberstein said building free and clear of all claims, liens or demands of any person, contractor, subcontractor, materialmen, laborers, etc., and in the event of the failure to do so, then the sureties on this bond are held as herein specified."

The court found that the payment of $2,000 made January 22, 1910, was a premature payment, "and should not, under the terms of the contract entered into between H. Silberstein, and Burnight-Kennedy Company, have been made until the final completion and delivery of the building to plaintiff and the acceptance of said building by him; that said payment was made without the knowledge or consent of the defendants, R. S. Kitrick and Harry Jacoby, or either of them." The court also found that certain corporations and partnerships served notice under section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "which notices were in proper form, to withhold the amounts named in said notices from the payments due under said contract, or to thereafter become due to said Burnight-Kennedy Company." These claims aggregated $7,573.70, as follows:

Diamond Match Company, notice served September 15, 1909	$5,617 10
Wygant & Collins, notice served December 26, 1909	1,751 20
Chico Con. Co., notice served January 4, 1910	205 40

The court found that without the knowledge or consent of defendants, plaintiff paid to the company "large sums of money which, under the laws of the state of California, it was his duty to withhold," namely, after September 15, 1909, on which date the Diamond Match Company served its notice, plaintiff paid to the contracting company $14,000, as appears above. After the date of the Wygant & Collins notice, the sum of $4,000 was paid by plaintiff to the company, and a like amount was paid after the notice of the Chico Construction Company was served. The court found:

> "That the plaintiff failed to withhold any sums of money coming due after the services of any of said notices, except the sum of $1,100, the balance of the completion payment, and the sum of $10,400, the 35-day payment, neither of which sums were due under the terms of said contract until the final completion of said building."

As conclusions of law, the court found that "defendants and each of them are discharged from all responsibility and liability as sureties," and that they are entitled to a dismissal of the action, and to recover their costs herein.

Defendants interposed two defenses to the action: First, that the completion payment of $2,000, January 22, 1910, was premature, the building not then having been completed, and, as such payment released defendants from liability on their bond. Second, that the failure of plaintiff to withhold sufficient money to pay the claims above set forth, after receiving notices to withhold under section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, worked defendants' release from liability. The contention of appellant as to the payment of January 22, 1910, is that it was not a premature payment under the construction given the contract by the architect, which was that the contract called for 14 payments of $2,000 each as the work progressed besides the first payment, making 15 payments before coming to the completion payment of $3,100 (or as erroneously stated in the contract, $31,000). In other words, that he was authorized to give certificates for $29,100, plus the first payment of $2,000, making $31,100, and that in giving certificates for $30,000 he was acting in accordance with his construction of the contract.

Witness Burnight one of the company's officers, testified that the last payment to be made upon completion of the building was to be $3,100, to which the 14 $2,000 payments and the $10,400 reserved for 36 days being added would make the contract price of $41,500. Appellant contends that the contract was susceptible of two different constructions by reason of its ambiguity, and that whether or not the architect properly construed the contract, he was made sole arbiter, and having given his certificate, it is conclusive, and respondent cannot now attack it. We do not think that the power given the architect was broad enought to authorize him to misconstrue the contract and conclude the sureties by such misconstruction. The ambiguity, if any, was caused, no doubt, by the mistake in making the final completion payment $31,000 instead of $3,100, but it seems clear enough that but 13 payments of $2,000, in addition to the first payment of $2,000, were to be made which was the extent of the progressive payments authorized by the contract, and that the court was justified in holding the payment of January 22, 1910, to have been prematurely made. We do not think that the payments made upon the architect's certificate were so far conclusive as to have justified plaintiff in entirely disregarding the withhold notices. On the contrary, we think he made such payments at his peril. However this may be, there is no dispute but that payments were made to the contractor, as shown above, after notices had been served on the owner to withhold payment under section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure and in plain violation of its provisions. It is true that the lien claimants brought action and recovered judgment against the plaintiff herein (Diamond Match Co. v. Silberstein, 165 Cal. 282, 131 Pac. 874), and as we are told, this judgment has been satisfied. As claimed by appellant, his duty to the creditors was thus fully discharged, but does it follow, as seems to be further claimed, that the sureties were not relieved?

A surety cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract (Civ. Code, § 2836); he has all the rights of a guarantor (Id. § 2844), and is exonerated in like manner with a guarantor to the extent to which he is prejudiced by any act of the creditor which would naturally prove injurious to the remedies of the surety or inconsistent with his rights, or which lessens his security (Id. § 2840). A guarantor is exonerated, except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal in respect thereto, in any way impaired or suspended. Id. § 2819.

County of Glenn v. Jones, 146 Cal. 518, 80 Pac. 695, was an action against the contractor, Jones, and his sureties. Jones had contracted to furnish the necessary materials and erect a high school building for the sum of $5,580, to be paid as follows: $1,860 when Jones shall have delivered all the material for said building on the building site; $1,860 when the roof is on: and the balance, $1,860, on full completion and acceptance of the building. He delivered a portion of the building materials, and upon application and without the sureties' consent was paid by the board of supervisors the first payment of $1,860. He pocketed the money, abandoned the contract, and left the materials unpaid for. The question presented was: Did the premature payment made by plaintiff release the sureties? Of the duty of the creditor, the court said:

> "The contract of suretyship imports entire good faith and confidence between the parties as to the whole transaction. The creditor is bound to observe good faith with the surety. He must withhold nothing, conceal nothing, release nothing, which will possibly benefit the surety. He must not do any act injurious to the surety or inconsistent with his rights. He must not omit to do any act required by the surety which duty enjoins him to do, if such omission injures the surety. The liability of a surety is not to be extended * * * beyond the terms of his contract. To the extent and in the manner, and under the circumstances pointed out in his obligation, he is bound, and no further. He has a right to stand on its very terms."

Speaking of the contract the court said:

> "In this case the sureties agreed and guaranteed that Jones would place all the materials on the building site, on condition that he was to receive no money until he had done so; they did not agree that if paid in advance he would place such materials on the site. By the payment, the hope of reward for further performance was lost, the temptation to act dishonestly was increased."

The sureties were held to have been exonerated.

Keissig v. Allspaugh, 91 Cal. 231, 27 Pac. 655, 13 L. R. A. 418, was also an action against the contractor and a surety on his bond. At the completion of the building there were certain liens upon it notwithstanding which the owner paid the completion payment and the contractor failed to discharge the liens. The owner was compelled to pay these lien claims, and he brought the action to recover from the principal and surety. In holding that the surety was discharged, the court said:

> "The judgment cannot be sustained upon the facts. The appellant, Lundeen, was a surety, and as money sufficient to satisfy all of the liens mentioned in the complaint was, or ought to have been, in the hands of the plaintiff at the time of his settlement with the contractors, he should have so applied it, instead of paying it to the contractors. This balance was to be retained in his hands as an additional security against liens upon the building, and, in equity, he held the same also for the benefit of the sureties. It was a special fund to which they had a right to look for their indemnity, and in view of which it must be supposed that they assumed the obligation of sureties, as the original contract is referred to in the bond as the inducement or consideration for its execution, and the plaintiff was not authorized to surrender it without their knowledge or consent; and having done so, the appellant was discharged. Bragg v. Shain, 49 Cal. 131; Taylor v. Jeter, 23 Mo. 244."

In speaking of the failure of the plaintiff to retain this balance or apply it to the satisfaction of the obligation for which the appellant was surety, the court said:

> "The neglect to resort to a fund already in his hands for his own protection in the very matter for which the defendant was a surety, and which fund was therefore charged with a trust in favor of appellant, and its surrender without his consent, constitutes a defense to this action."

It is true that in this case was involved the final payment of 25 per cent. of the contract price which, by the terms of the contract, was to be reserved. The contract in the present case also reserved a 25 per cent. final payment, and it is silent as to the duty of plaintiff where so-called "stop notices" are filed under section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But the statute defines the duty of the owner where such notices are given and the owner is charged with knowledge of the statute. It was clearly his duty to protect the sureties by withholding payment of unpaid installments, failing in which he was guilty of an act "which would naturally prove injurious to the remedies of the surety or inconsistent with his rights." For the sureties' protection, the statute must be read into the contract and be deemed to operate as fully as the written provision in the contract respecting the final payment. In the Diamond Match Company Case, supra, the court said of section 1184:

> "It is the clear duty of the owner under service of such a notice to withhold from the moneys due, or from the first moneys that may become due, a sum sufficient to protect him against the demand of the notice. If he does not do this he becomes justly liable under later notices to withhold which may be served upon him."

As to the nature and effect of such a notice, a full discussion will be found in the cases cited in the Diamond Match Company Case. See, also, Sweeney, Executrix, v. Board of Trustees, 165 Pac. 42.

Respondents point out what appears from the record, that had appellant complied with the law as laid down in the Diamond Match Company Case and with the strict terms of his contract, he would have had at the completion of the contract to pay lienholders and materialmen who had given withhold notices the sum of $21,073.70. The total judgment given against him in said case was $19,025.81, leaving in his hands a balance of $2,047.89, out of which there remained only to be paid $885.31, the cost of completing the building. He now seeks to recoup the loss occasioned by his failure to observe his duty towards respondents as sureties. We think they were by his acts entirely exonerated from all liability under their bond.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

NAVE v. NAVE. (Civ. 1717.)

1. DIVORCE 🔑252—DIVISION OF PROPERTY.

Where the community property of a husband and wife consisted of a homestead valued at about $1,500, but mortgaged for $500, the house, tools, furniture, and one cow, and barely 40 acres were cleared for cultivation, and the wife, who did not enjoy vigorous health, was awarded the custody of one minor child by a decree for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, she should have been awarded the entire property, instead of merely one-half, under Civ. Code, § 146, providing that, if the decree be rendered on certain grounds, including extreme cruelty, the community property shall be assigned to the parties in such proportion as the court from the facts and the conditions of the parties may deem just, but that, if the decree be rendered on any other ground, the community property shall be equally divided; this seeming to infer that where the divorce is granted for extreme cruelty more than one-half must be decreed to the innocent spouse.

2. DIVORCE 🔑298(1)—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN —DISCRETION.

Under Civ. Code, § 138, providing that in actions for divorce the court may make such order for the custody of minor children as may seem necessary or proper, where, though the wife was granted a divorce for extreme cruelty, the evidence was conflicting and there was much to show that the husband was not as bad a man as the complaint indicated, it was not an abuse of discretion to award the husband the custody of a boy three years old; the wife being given the custody of a girl one year old, and the decree reserving control over the children.

3. DIVORCE 🔑306—AWARD FOR SUPPORT OF CHILDREN.

Where the homestead set apart to the wife on a divorce for extreme cruelty consisted of 160 acres of which barely 40 were cleared for cultivation and the property was heavily mortgaged, and the wife, who was given the custody of a child one year old, had no separate property of any substantial value, the husband should be required to pay a reasonable amount monthly, at least to aid in supporting, caring for, and educating such child.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Suit by Zelma H. Nave against William C. Nave. From a judgment for plaintiff for insufficient relief, she appeals. Reversed in part, with directions, and affirmed in part.

J. T. Sharp, of Alturas, for appellant. Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Plaintiff was granted a divorce without alimony from defendant on the ground of extreme cruelty. The judgment divides the community property, consisting of a homestead valued at about $1,500, but mortgaged for $500, the house and tools, furniture, and one cow, equally between the parties, and awarded the custody of Samuel Oliver Nave, aged three, to defendant, and Rose May Nave, aged one, to plaintiff. The plaintiff appeals from that part of the judgment refusing alimony and awarding half of the community property and the custody of the boy to defendant.

[1] The law regarding the disposition of community property on divorce is that:

> "If the decree be rendered on the grounds of adultery, or extreme cruelty, the community property shall be assigned to the respective parties in such proportions as the court, from all the facts of the case, and the condition of the parties, may deem just." But "if the decree be rendered on any other ground than that of adultery or extreme cruelty the community property shall be equally divided between the parties." Section 146, Civ. Code.

And in section 148 it is declared that the disposition is subject to revision on appeal in all particulars, "including those which are stated to be in the discretion of the court."

> "Where the divorce is granted on the ground of adultery or extreme cruelty, section 146 of the Civil Code leaves the disposition of the community property, in the first instance, to the discretion of the trial court, with, perhaps, the qualification, inferred from the reading of the entire section, that, as a general rule, more than one-half of such property must be decreed to the innocent spouse in such a case." Gorman v. Gorman, 134 Cal. 378, 66 Pac. 313; Knapp v. Knapp, 23 Cal. App. 10, 136 Pac. 719.

In the Gorman Case seven-twelfths of the property was awarded to the innocent husband. In Knapp v. Knapp, where the wife was awarded considerably more than half the community, the judgment was affirmed. On the other hand, in those cases of extreme cruelty where the trial court had divided the community property equally, the upper court has modified the decree. Thus in Eslinger v. Eslinger, 47 Cal. 62, and Brown v. Brown, 60 Cal. 579, the court changed the decree of the lower court and awarded the innocent party three-fourths of the community. It thus appears that, unless there be some very good reason to the contrary, the general rule is to be followed. It does not appear in the Eslinger or Brown Case that the party to whom the larger share was awarded had to provide for any children; nevertheless, the award was made. But in Strozynski v. Strozynski, 97 Cal. 189, 31 Pac. 1130, where a minor child, aged 15, was awarded to the innocent wife, the decree of the lower court, dividing the community property of the clear value of over $2,000 equally, was modified on appeal and all said property was awarded to her. We think that we have here a case even stronger in its facts than Strozynski v. Strozynski. The homestead here consists of 160 acres, but of these barely 40 were cleared for cultivation. The property is heavily mortgaged. The plaintiff must care for her one year old girl as well as provide for herself. Plaintiff does not appear to enjoy vigorous health. Under these circumstances, we feel constrained to award all the community property to the plaintiff.

[2] With respect to the custody of the children, the Code has not provided us with such explicit rules in regard to discretion as in the case of community property. As a result, the rule in respect to the children has been declared as follows:

> "It is manifest that the Legislature, by the foregoing enactment (Civ. Code, § 138), intended to confide to the trial courts, in the disposition of the minor children of the parties to divorce actions, a very extensive discretion, with a view to the conservation of the highest and best interests of such minors, and the conclusion arrived at by such courts in such cases will not be set aside unless the record discloses a clear abuse of that discretion." Simmons v. Simmons, 22 Cal. App. 448, 134 Pac. 791; Van Horn v. Van Horn, 5 Cal. App. 719, 91 Pac. 260; Dickerson v. Dickerson, 108 Cal. 351, 41 Pac. 475.

And this rule is adhered to, though at the same time it is declared that:

> "Naturally and presumptively the mother is entitled to the custody and care of minor children of tender years." Luck v. Luck, 92 Cal. 653. 28 Pac. 787.

Of course, the predominating factor in these considerations is the welfare and interest of the child. In the present case we cannot say that the interests of Samuel Oliver Nave would be better served by changing the decree of the lower court and awarding him to his mother. Though the trial court found "that defendant had been guilty of extreme cruelty toward plaintiff, as set forth in the complaint of plaintiff filed in this action," there was considerable conflict in the evidence; there being much to show that defendant was not as bad a man as the complaint indicated. In this connection, it is further to be noticed that the trial court has reserved a control over the children; the awards being made "pending the future order of the court." If the occasion should demand it, therefore, the court can speedily transfer the custody of the boy to his mother. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that there has been a clear abuse of discretion by the trial court.

[3] As to the question of alimony, the case is not without difficulty. The plaintiff, having been granted a divorce on the ground of cruelty and accorded the custody of a minor child, would naturally and ordinarily be entitled to some allowance for her support and that of the child. This would, of course, be affected by the consideration of the financial condition of the respective parties and their earning capacity. As to the present case, considering what is revealed by the record concerning each party, we should have no hesitation in saying that the defendant should be required to pay at least a sufficient sum to support the younger child, unless the wife has considerable separate property. However, as to this there is no finding by the court. Plaintiff alleged in the complaint that she was in indigent circumstances, but this was denied in the answer, and it seems to have been overlooked by the trial judge. The evidence does, however, show that she had a little separate property, apparently of trifling value. As to the homestead herein set apart to her, the situation is similar to that in Strozynski v. Strozynski, wherein it is said:

> "The house and lot constitute but an humble home for the plaintiff and her minor daughter, and it cannot be presumed that the household furniture was more than was necessary for their use. Allowing them all these, they are still left, so far as appears, to earn their support."

Under such circumstances, we think a reasonable amount should be required of defendant monthly, at least to aid the plaintiff in meeting the responsibility cast upon her by the custody, care, and education of the child.

We therefore think that the portion of the judgment awarding plaintiff one-half of the community property should be reversed, with direction to the court below to award to her the whole thereof, that the portion of the judgment decreeing that she is entitled to no alimony be reversed, with direction to the court to retry the issue as to the financial condition of the parties and their earning capacity, and that the judgment in other respects be affirmed, appellant to recover her costs on appeal.

It is so ordered.

SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 2364.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 18, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 17, 1917.)

1. Master and Servant ⚷373—Workmen's Compensation—"Arising Out of and in Course of Employment."

A road construction foreman, who was struck by a workman whom he discharged for insubordination and refusal to obey instructions, received the injury "arising out of and in the course of his employment," since it occurred while he was engaged in doing work within the scope of his employment, and at a time and place when and where it was his duty to perform it; and it arose out of his employment because it followed as a natural incident of the work occasioned by the nature of the employment and performance of the duty which it imposed upon him as such foreman.

2. Master and Servant ⚷373 — Workmen's Compensation—Character of Employé.

In such case the character of the employé, whether peaceable or quarrelsome, is immaterial.

Application by Homer C. Gragg for workman's compensation, opposed by the County of San Bernardino, employer. To review an award by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of applicant, the employer brings certiorari. Affirmed.

Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, T. W. Duckworth, and John L. Campbell, all of San Bernardino, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, and Daley & Byrne, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Homer C. Gragg for an injury sustained while in the employ of petitioner.

The sole contention of petitioner, as presented in its brief, is that "the injury did not arise out of the employment and was not incidental thereto." In our opinion, the facts are identical with those involved in Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury et al., 170 Cal. 686, 151 Pac. 398, wherein a like award was affirmed.

As appears from the record, Gragg was foreman of a gang of some 18 or 20 men employed by the county of San Bernardino, who, under his direction, were engaged in the construction of a concrete road. He was authorized and empowered in his discretion to discharge any of the men from the work for insubordination, neglect, or refusal to perform the same in the manner directed by him. Among the employés at the time in question was one Carl Hansen, engaged in spreading concrete upon the roadway. The foreman called Hansen's attention to the fact that he was not spreading the concrete properly, and, taking the shovel, showed him how he wanted it done. Hansen resented this, saying, "To hell with you; I know how to do this," in response to which Gragg said, "If you feel that way about it, you are fired right now; I will put a man in your place;" and thereupon he called another employé whom he substituted for Hansen. Gragg proceeded with other duties and Hansen, following him, demanded his pay, to which Gragg replied, "I cannot pay you; you will have to go up and see the timekeeper; he makes up the time." Hansen was told where to find the timekeeper, whose location was about a mile distant. Gragg again walked away, followed by Hansen, who came up behind and struck him a blow with his fist, knocking him down, and causing the injury for which he applied for compensation.

[1] The only difference between the case of Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury (known as the Rudder Case) and this is that in the former the foreman was the aggressor, while in the case at bar Hansen was the aggressor, making an unprovoked attack upon Gragg for no cause other than the fact that he had been justly discharged from the work for refusing to perform it in the manner directed. Petitioner claims that in the Rudder Case the question as to whether the injury arose out of the employment was not presented or considered. In this contention counsel is in error. The court in its opinion said:

> "The main contentions of the petition are that there is no evidence to show * * * that the injuries happened while Rudder was performing a service incidental to and in the course of his employment."

The statute provides for an award of compensation for injuries sustained by employés, "arising out of and in the course of the employment"; and the language of the Supreme Court quoted was used in the sense and meaning of the statute. That the applicant's injury was sustained in the course of his employment conclusively appears from the fact that it occurred while he was engaged in doing work within the scope of his employment, and at a time and place when and where it was his duty to perform it; and it arose out of his employment because it followed as a natural incident of the work occasioned by the nature of the employment and performance of the duty which it imposed upon him as such foreman. McNichol's Case, 215 Mass. 497, 102 N. E. 697, L. R. A. 1916A, 306; Bryant v. Fissell, 84 N. J. Law, 72, 86 Atl. 458.

> "It [the accident] need not have been foreseen or expected, but after the event it must appar to have had its origin in a risk connected with the employment and to have flowed from that source as a rational consequence." Kimbol v. Industrial Accident Commission, 173 Cal. 351, 160 Pac. 150, L. R. A. 1917B, 595; Reithel's Case, 222 Mass. 163, 109 N. E. 951, L. R. A. 1916A, 304.

The circumstances are such as to leave no doubt that the risk of such unwarranted attack was one connected with the employment and directly traceable to the conditions under which the duty was performed.

[2] The character of the employé, whether peaceable or quarrelsome, is immaterial to the question. A docile mule has been known to kick his attendant, and we assume that, had applicant in the performance of his duties, and while passing a team of mules engaged upon the work, been kicked by one of them, no question would arise as to his right to recover for injury thereby inflicted. In our opinion, there is no distinction between the facts presented in the Rudder Case and those here involved.

The order making the award is affirmed.

CORDES v. HARDING et al. (Civ. 2086.)

STIPULATIONS ⚷14(12) — CONSTRUCTION—BREACH.

Where two attachment plaintiffs against same defendant made stipulation providing that all recoveries in either of said suits shall be ratably apportioned between said plaintiffs, according to the respective amounts of their claims or according to the respective amounts of the judgments rendered and entered in said suits should judgments be recovered or entered, and one secured judgment and filed transcript so as to become a redemptioner, and the other, having secured judgment, failed to file it, and a third judgment creditor purchased the first judgment, there being no duty on the second judgment creditor to docket his judgment, his failure to do so was not such a breach of the stipulation as to destroy his right to share in the amount paid for the first judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by W. F. Cordes against R. T. Harding and Henry E. Monroe, copartners, doing business as Harding & Monroe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal on the judgment roll. Affirmed.

Robert H. Borland, of San Francisco, for appellants. Henry Ach and Joseph Kirk, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll. This case was before this court before on an appeal from the order of the trial court granting defendant's motion for a nonsuit. 27 Cal. App. 474, 150 Pac. 650. The effect of the former decision of this court was to establish the sufficiency of the complaint, and to construe the meaning of the word "avails" to include moneys obtained from the sale of the Lindemann judgment.

Briefly, the facts are these: On the 9th day of May, 1910, defendants Harding & Monroe, through their assignee Lindemann, brought suit against the California Consolidated Mines Company for $10,193.25 for legal services, and procured an attachment upon the company's property. At this time certain creditors of the defendant Mines Company assigned their claims to W. F. Cordes, who brought an action against the Mines Company and caused an attachment to be levied on June 20, 1910, on the same property of the company which had been previously attached in the suit brought by Lindemann. A stipulation was thereupon made, entitled in the court and causes of Lindemann and Cordes against the Mines Company by the attorneys for the respective plaintiffs in each case, providing in part:

> "That all recoveries or avails effected in either of said suits under or by virtue of the attachments which have been issued therein and levied upon the property of the California Consolidated Mines Company, a corporation, in the county of Amador, state of California, shall be ratably apportioned between said plaintiffs, according to the respective amounts of their claims or according to the respective amounts of the judgments rendered and entered in said suits should judgments be recovered or entered."

Lindemann subsequently obtained a judgment for $8,883.10, but did not levy execution. Prior to December 1, 1911, Lindemann recorded a transcript of this judgment in Amador county, in which county the property was situated. On November 23, 1910, plaintiff Cordes in his suit against the Mines Company obtained a judgment for $2,371.16, but no transcript of this judgment was filed until after December 22, 1911. Prior to May 12, 1910, and prior to the attachment of either Lindemann or Cordes, the Chichizola Estate Company recovered a judgment in Amador county against the Mines Company for the sum of $10,000. Under this judgment, on December 10, 1910, the mining properties under attachment were sold on execution to the plaintiff in that action. December 15, 1911, the Chichizola Estate Company sold and assigned this judgment to one Magee. On December 22, 1911, defendants in this action told Magee that they proposed to redeem. After negotiations, Magee bought the Lindemann judgment, paying therefor $7,000. The plaintiff here, claiming that this money received by defendants was avails effected by the Lindemann attachment, brought this action for his proportion thereof, pursuant to the terms of the stipulation. Prior to the expiration of the period of redemption under the Chichizola sale, defendants in this action, for plaintiff Lindemann, who had become a redemptioner by having filed a transcript of her judgment in Amador county, served upon the purchaser at that sale a demand for a statement of the rents and profits under the provisions of section 707, Code of Civil Procedure, thereby obtaining for plaintiff Lindemann an extension of the time to redeem. The sale of the Lindemann judgment to Magee was made before this extension of time had expired.

Appellants contend that the Cordes attachment, owing to the failure of Cordes to file the transcript of his judgment in time to become a redemptioner from the Chichizola execution sale, had become worthless, that Cordes had failed to comply with the implied agreement of the stipulation that he should do everything necessary to keep alive his attachment, and consequently, for this alleged breach on his part, that Lindemann was no longer bound by the stipulation. Looking at the stipulation itself, it is impossible to say that there was any implied agreement that plaintiff should docket his judgment in the county where the property was situated so as to acquire a lien on the property of the judgment debtor in that county. Appellants' argument rests upon the speculative theory that if plaintiff had put himself in the position of a redemptioner qualified to redeem from the Chichizola sale, Magee would have paid him something for his judgment. But upon the other hand, Magee might not have purchased plaintiff's judgment at all. There is no evidence or finding to the effect that he would have done so. It might well have been that plaintiff, by refraining from making his judgment a lien on the property of the judgment debtor, thereby facilitated the sale of the Lindemann judgment; that while Magee was willing to buy the Lindemann judgment, he might have been unwilling to redeem when he found the property more heavily incumbered.

Since there was no duty on the part of plaintiff, express or implied, to docket the judgment, and as the record discloses no request or demand from the respondents that plaintiff advantage their position by docketing that judgment, we cannot say that plaintiff's failure to do so was a breach on his part of the contract.

Judgment affirmed.

Master and Servant 🔑417(5)—Workmen's Compensation Act—Writ of Review to Vacate Award.

On petition for writ of review to vacate and annul an award of compensation to an employé of a manufacturing establishment which carried with petitioner a policy of insurance covering its industrial liability, where the record shows that the commission's finding is sustained by the law and evidence adduced at the hearing, the award will be affirmed, and the writ dismissed.

D. Hadsell, of San Francisco, Joe G. Sweet, of Berkeley, and E. A. Ingalls, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Petition for writ of review.

This is a petition for a writ of review for the purpose of having vacated and annulled an award of compensation to an employé of a manufacturing establishment, which carried with the petitioner a policy of insurance covering its industrial liability. It is contended that the evidence does not support the conclusion reached by the Industrial Accident Commission that said employé's disability arises from an accident received during the course of his employment, but arises from a cause entirely independent of such employment. But from a review of the record we think the finding of the commission is well sustained by the law and the evidence adduced at the hearing.

The award is therefore affirmed, and the writ dismissed.

MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑375(1)—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—SCOPE OF EMPLOYMENT —NIGHT WATCHMAN.

Assuming that it was within the scope of the night watchman's employment to see that the doors of the premises were properly secured, his resort to a circular saw for the purpose of making a board of suitable length to barricade a door was beyond the scope of his employment, and an award of the Industrial Accident Commission for injuries sustained while using such saw was unwarranted.

Proceedings for compensation before the Industrial Accident Commission. Compensation awarded, and Brusster, Jr., and others petition for writ of review. Award annulled.

Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond and Barry Colding, all of San Francisco, for petitioners. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Petition for writ of review.

The applicant, being a night watchman in the employ of the petitioners, received an injury while using a circular saw on the premises of his employers, the use of said saw being occasioned by the desire of said watchman to procure a board of suitable length to barricade an outer door of the premises which he was employed to watch, the lock on said door being defective. He was awarded compensation by the Industrial Accident Commission, and a writ of review is here sought for the purpose of annulling said award upon the ground that there is no evidence to sustain it.

Assuming that it was within the scope of the applicant's employment to see that the doors of the premises were properly secured by locking, nevertheless we are of the opinion that his resort to the use of a circular saw for the purpose of making a board that would answer the purpose of extending across the door was entirely beyond the scope of his employment, and not in the contemplation of his employers, and was not a resort to reasonable means for the purpose of securing the end intended by him at that time. If we are correct in this conclusion, the award cannot stand; and it is therefore ordered that it be, and it is hereby, annulled.

PER CURIAM. Petition for writ of mandate directed to respondent commanding it to dismiss a certain action pending before it because of the alleged failure to file a good and sufficient bond under the provisions of section 1036 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

We are satisfied that the court below was empowered, under the provisions of section 1054 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to extend the time in which the bond in question might be filed; and we think, upon the authority of Sciutti v. Pac. Coal Co., 30 Utah, 462, 85 Pac. 1011, 8 Ann. Cas. 942, and the case of Kissler v. Budge, 24 Idaho, 246, 133 Pac. 125, the court was within the law when it refused to dismiss the cause after a good and sufficient bond had been filed.

For that reason the writ is dismissed.

Petition of Thannhauser & Co. for writ of prohibition directed to Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco. Writ denied.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Lent & Humphrey, of San Francisco (Joseph H. Mayer and George D. Perry, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It is conceded that the same question is involved in this application as in Hertz v. Superior Court (No. 2283) 169 Pac. 258, decided by this court on October 22, 1917, wherein a writ of mandate was denied.

Upon the authority of that case, the writ in the present case is dismissed.

ALMOND CITY LAND & DEVELOPMENT CO. v. PATTERSON. (Civ. 2242.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑314(1) — RIGHTS OF VENDOR—ACTION FOR INSTALLMENT OF PRICE — SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

In an action for the recovery of an intermediate installment payment due on a contract for the sale of realty by plaintiff to defendant, the complaint setting forth in full the contract and showing that the sum of $6,000 and interest was due on it prior to the commencement of the action, and that the same was unpaid, was sufficient to constitute a cause of action, though not alleging tender of a deed by plaintiff to defendant.

2. PLEADING 🔑345(1) — JUDGMENT ON PLEADINGS—INSUFFICIENCY OF ANSWER.

Where, after the trial court had properly granted plaintiff's motion to strike out portions of the answer, no sufficient averments remained amounting to a denial of plaintiff's cause of action, or a defense thereto, the court properly granted plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by the Almond City Land & Development Company against Mary Hughes Patterson. From an order granting plaintiff's motion to strike portions of defendant's answer, and from judgment on the pleadings for plaintiff rendered after its motion to strike out had been granted, and on its motion for such judgment, defendant appeals. Order and judgment affirmed.

J. Monroe Latimer, of San Francisco, for appellant. H. S. Derby, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order granting the plaintiff's motion to strike out certain portions of the defendant's answer, and also from the judgment on the pleadings rendered and entered after said motion to strike out had been granted and upon plaintiff's motion for such judgment.

[1] The action was for the recovery of an installment payment of $6,000, with interest, alleged to be due upon a certain contract for the sale of real estate by the plaintiff to the defendant. Two points are presented upon the appeal: First, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. We find no merit in this contention. The complaint sets forth in full the contract upon which the action was predicated, and shows that the sum of $6,000 and interest was due upon that contract prior to the commencement of this action and that the same was unpaid. The appellant contends that the complaint should also have alleged the tender of a deed on the part of the plaintiff to the defendant covering the premises in question, as a prerequisite to the institution of this action; but in view of the fact that this action was brought for the recovery of an intermediate payment due upon said contract, upon which a further and final payment was still to become due before the defendant was entitled to a conveyance of the premises, and that the contract had not been rescinded, but, on the contrary, the plaintiff chose to stand upon its terms, and to bring this action for the recovery of an intermediate payment due and overdue thereon, no averment of tender of a conveyance of the premises to the defendant prior to the commencement of the action, to which she was not as yet entitled, was required.

[2] The second contention of the appellant is that the answer presented sufficient defenses to the action to defeat a motion for judgment on the pleadings; but our examination of the record discloses that after the trial court had granted the plaintiff's motion to strike out portions of said answer—which order, we think, was not erroneous—no sufficient averments remained amounting to a denial of the plaintiff's cause of action or a defense thereto. This being so, the order of the court granting the motion for judgment on the pleading was not erroneous.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

WOLF v. MULCREVY. (Civ. 2287.)

1. CLERKS OF COURTS 🔑66—CLERK OF SUPERIOR COURT—POWER TO DETERMINE IDENTITY OF PETITIONS FOR PROBATE.

The clerk of the superior court is not invested with power to determine whether or not two petitions for the probate of the estate of a decedent are identically the same.

2. CLERKS OF COURTS 🔑71 — PETITION FOR PROBATE—RIGHT OF PETITIONER—FILING, NUMBERING, AND INDEXING BY CLERK.

The only right which petitioner for probate of the estate of a decedent has is to have his petition filed in the superior court, and, if the clerk fails to file it properly, petitioner has his remedy in the superior court by an application there to have his paper filed, numbered, and indexed by the clerk as it ought to be; so that no injury comes to him because his petition is filed and numbered with a similar pending petition.

3. EVIDENCE 🔑82—SUPERIOR COURT — PRESUMPTION AS TO PROPER ACTION.

The presumption is that the superior court will do what the law demands in relation to compelling its clerk properly to file, number, and index a petition for probate of a decedent's estate.

4. COURTS 🔑207(4)—RIGHT TO WRIT — ADEQUATE REMEDY IN SUPERIOR COURT.

If petitioner in the superior court for probate of the estate of a decedent is entitled to a writ of mandate prayed by him in the appellate court to compel the clerk of the superior court to file, number, and index his petition separately from a similar petition, such remedy may be plainly, speedily, and adequately had in the superior court on proper application and showing made there, so that petitioner is not entitled to writ of mandate from the appellate court.

Application for writ of mandate by Arturo Wolf against Harry I. Mulcrevy. Writ denied.

Dozier & Dozier and Theodore A. Bell, all of San Francisco, for petitioner. Edgar D. Peixotto, Leon Samuels, and J. R. Pringle, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Application for writ of mandate directing the respondent to file, number, and index a petition for the probate of the estate of Tobe Funkenstein, deceased, separately from a similar petition in the matter of the same estate theretofore filed and pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, of which respondent is clerk.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion that the clerk of the court is not invested with power to determine whether or not these two petitions for the probate of the estate of Funkenstein are identically the same, but, even if he were, we are strongly impressed with the contention made by the respondent that the only right which the petitioner has is to have his petition filed, and if the clerk fails to file it properly, the petitioner then has his remedy in the superior court by an application there to have his paper filed, numbered, and indexed by the clerk as it ought to be.

[3] In short, no injury comes to him because his petition is filed and numbered with a similar pending petition, and the presumption is that the superior court will do what the law demands in the premises. It is conceded that the writ of mandate is issued by this court as a matter of discretion, and not as of right, and in the present case there does not appear to be any injury suffered by the petitioner because of the action of the clerk.

[4] Moreover, we are af the opinion that, if the petitioner is entitled to the remedy prayed for, it may be plainly, speedily, and adequately had in the court below upon proper application and showing made there.

For these reasons, the writ is denied.

35 Cal. App. 31

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. STATE INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al.

MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑375(1)—COMPENSATION FOR INJURIES—PUBLIC OFFICERS—"EMPLOYÉ."

There was no relation of employer and employé existing between a city and a judge of an election board at a municipal election while taking the election returns to the city hall, and the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) did not cover an injury sustained by him, as he was performing a public duty, and the city had no control over his actions, and no right or power to provide means to secure his safety, and, moreover, a contract of employment is deemed an essential element in defining the term "employé."

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Thomas Meehan to obtain compensation for personal injuries, opposed by the City of Los Angeles, alleged employer. Compensation was awarded, and the city petitions for writ of review. Award annulled.

Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., and W. D. Spalding and Wm. P. Mealey, Deputy City Attys., all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission allowing compensation to Thomas Meehan, who was a claimant against the city of Los Angeles, alleging that he had been injured while in the employ of that municipality. Meehan acted as judge of an election board at a municipal election held in the city of Los Angeles on the 6th day of June, 1916. After the ballots were counted by the board, Meehan, using his own automobile, took the election returns and was proceeding to the city hall, where he proposed to deliver them to the proper officer. While so engaged his automobile was struck by another motorcar, and by reason of the impact Meehan was thrown from his seat and injured. It was upon this state of facts, related briefly as above, that the commission made its award for compensation.

It is the contention of the city of Los Angeles, appearing here as petitioner: (1) That Meehan was not its employé within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act; (2) that if it is determined that the relation of employer and employé existed at the time of the injury suffered, the employment was both casual, and not in the usual course of the trade and business of the municipality, which latter case is excepted from those in which compensation is provided to be awarded by the act. We agree with the petitioner in its conclusion that the relation of employer and employé did not exist between the claimant and the municipality. Meehan at the time he suffered his injury was performing a public duty which may be imposed upon any citizen—the obligation exists without contract. The provisions of the law are too familiar to require citation here. In determining the nature and extent of the duties of an election officer, the law alone must be looked to. There is no power of direction given to or left in the city regarding the performance of such duties. In other words, the so-called "employer" in such a case has no control over the actions of the election officer. It has no right or power to provide means to secure the safety of the officer which it may require him to take advantage of, and therefore is without the right to safeguard its interests. Had the city, acting in its own interests, proposed to furnish an entirely safe means of transportation to the election officer in order to enable him to transport the election returns from the polling place to the city hall, it was without power to compel him to use such means. The officer had the right to choose the most dangerous and hazardous means affording such transportation, and the city, if it is held that the relation of employer and employé existed, would be without the power to reduce the possibility of damage accruing by reason of a claim for compensation for injuries which might result. There was here no "contract" of employment, which is deemed an essential element in defining the term "employé" under our decisions. Claremont Country Club v. Industrial Accident Commission, 163 Pac. 209; Mono County v. Industrial Accident Commission, 167 Pac. 377. In the latter case it was held that a sheriff of a county injured in the performance of his duties could not recover compensation under the employers' liability act. In the case last cited the decision in Sibley v. State, 89 Conn. 682, 96 Atl. 161, L. R. A. 1916C, 1087, is approved. In that case the court referred to the contention that there was shown a contract between the state and its officer (a sheriff) to pay salary compensation, and that, where such contract existed, the full relation of employer and employé resulted under the Compensation Act there being considered. The court there said:

> "But it is urged in behalf of the claimant that the statute attaching a salary to the office of sheriff raises an obligation or duty on the part of the state to pay it, and that if it refuses to pay the law will give the sheriff an action quasi ex contractu upon the obligation, and that the officer was thus under a quasi contract of service with the state. If for the argument's sake this were to be conceded, it would not advance the claimant's cause. A quasi contract is no contract. * * * The term quasi contract describes a situation where there is an obligation or duty arising by law upon which the same remedy is given as would be given if the obligation or duty arose out of contract. The term itself implies that the obligation or duty is not a contractual one."

Mono County v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, contains a discussion as to the effect of certain amendments made to the act in 1915 and the prior legislative history, all of which is pertinent to the argument here advanced on behalf of respondents, and is adverse to the contentions here made by the latter.

For the reasons stated, we think that the award cannot be sustained, and it is therefore annulled.

WESTERN INDEMNITY CO., Inc., et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

1. Master and Servant 🔑398—Workmen's Compensation Act—Attorney in Fact—Application—Unauthenticated Letter.

An authenticated letter written by the Austrian father of a son killed in service in America, to a third person not a relative, as attorney in fact, purporting to authorize the third person to apply under the Workmen's Compensation Act for adjustment of claim, constituted no legal authority for the third person's action in filing application.

2. Master and Servant 🔑405(5) — Workmen's Compensation Act—Finding That Deceased Contributed to Father's Support—Evidence.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 313, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1102, § 28), § 77, subd. "a," providing that hearsay or testimony not competent to be admitted in a trial court may be received by the Industrial Accident Commission, its effect being restricted to statements written or oral of a person who is dead, or who cannot be found, which relate directly to the injury in question, there is no warrant for a finding that deceased contributed to his father's support by sending money to him in Austria, the sole basis of which is testimony by deceased's depositary that deceased had requested an advancement of money, saying it was intended for such purpose.

3. Master and Servant 🔑398—Workmen's Compensation Act—Jurisdiction of Industrial Accident Commission—Application.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 22, providing that jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission is obtained upon filing of an application in writing by a party interested, stating the nature of the controversy, or concerning any liability arising out of or incident thereto, where no application was at any time made by one unrelated to deceased servant for reimbursement for funeral expenses paid by him in the burial of deceased, the commission had no jurisdiction to make an allowance therefor on the ground that it appeared that such third person, a stranger to the record, had made such disbursements.

Proceedings by William Pavlovic for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the death of his son, Nick Pavlovic, opposed by John B. Glick, employer, and the Western Indemnity Company, Incorporated, insurer. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and to review its order the insurer and employer bring certiorari. Order annulled.

See, also, 163 Pac. 60.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission whereby an award of compensation was made to William Pavlovic as a dependent of his son Nick Pavlovic, who died from injuries sustained by an accident while in the employ of John R. Glick who held an insurance policy issued by the Western Indemnity Company covering such liability.

[1] It appears from the record that William Pavlovic has at all times lived in Austria; that the accident wherein his son, who was a common laborer, sustained the injuries as a result of which he died on September 5, 1915, occurred on September 2, 1915. The application for adjustment of the claim was filed on August 17, 1916, by Stephen Pavlovic, as attorney in fact of William Pavlovic to whom he bore no relation. Authority for such action had and taken by Stephen Pavlovic was an unauthenticated letter received by him from William Pavlovic, which letter was not written or signed by the latter, but for him by another. In our opinion, this unauthenticated letter written by the father, purporting to authorize Stephen Pavlovic to act in the matter, constituted no legal authority for the action taken by Stephen Pavlovic in filing the application. After the filing of the same and the partial hearing of the matter, Stephen Pavlovic received and presented what purported to be a power of attorney, signed by William Pavlovic, authorizing him to initiate the proceeding. Waiving the question as to whether or not such purported power of attorney would cure the irregularity, there is nothing in the record indicating that such document was acknowledged or its execution proved in a manner which could be deemed a sufficient authentication thereof.

[2] While petitioners insist that no party in interest filed the application, as required by section 22 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, their chief contention is that there was no legal evidence of any kind or nature showing that William Pavlovic was a dependent of his son Nick Pavlovic at the time of his death. The evidence shows that deceased was 22 years old; that he had been in this country about four years; that for the purpose of providing means to procure his transportation from Austria to the United States, his father advanced him the sum of $130, and which he repaid. There is an entire absence of legal evidence tending to show that during said four years of his life spent in the United States he contributed anything whatsoever to the support of his father, William Pavlovic, or sent him any money other than the $130 in repayment of the loan made. The order made is based solely upon hearsay testimony of Stephen Pavlovic, who filed the application, which is to the effect that deceased deposited his money with him, which in fact is untrue, since it was deposited with his wife, and that he from time to time, at the request of deceased, advanced money to him upon the statement of deceased that he wanted to send money home, and he supposed he did so. But other than what was told him, he knew nothing about it. While section 77, subdivision "a", of the act provides that "hearsay or testimony not competent to be admitted in a trial in court" may be received, its purpose and effect are restricted to "statements, written or oral, of a person who is dead, or who cannot after diligent search be found," and which "relate directly to the injury in question." There is nothing in this provision which by any interpretation could warrant a finding that deceased contributed to his father's support by sending him money, the sole basis of which is testimony to the effect that deceased had requested from his depositary an advancement of money, saying that it was intended for such purpose. Conceding the relation of father and son, and that the former was in indigent circumstances, nevertheless there is no evidence whatsoever which tends in the remotest degree to show any recognition of his needs on the part of the son, or that he ever contributed anything whatever to his support.

[3] By its order the commission made an allowance of $100 to Stephen Pavlovic for funeral expenses paid by him in the burial of deceased. Section 22 of the act provides that jurisdiction of the commission is obtained upon the filing therewith of an application in writing by a party interested, stating the nature of the controversy, or concerning any liability arising out of or incident thereto. No application was at any time made by Stephen Pavlovic for reimbursement for such expenditure, and in the absence thereof the commission had no jurisdiction to make an allowance to him upon the sole ground that in the course of the proceedings it appeared that he, a stranger to the record, had made such disbursement.

The order is annulled.

GORTER v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 2226.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 22, 1917.)

Petition by one Gorter for a writ of review, directed against the Industrial Accident Commission and others, to review an award made by the commission. Writ dismissed, and award affirmed.

H. Clyde Harms and Randolph V. Whiting, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Petition for writ of review. It is contended by petitioner that the applicant in whose favor an award was made by the Industrial Accident Commission was not in his employ, but was working independently, although under an arrangement with petitioner by which the latter furnished him with the necessary tools and appliances for performing his work and received 40 per cent. of the amounts earned by the applicant. The respondent Industrial Accident Commission concluded from the evidence on the whole that the relation of employer and employé existed, and thereupon made its award. We are satisfied that the evidence sustains this conclusion, and for that reason the writ is dismissed, and the award affirmed.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑405(5) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION PROCEEDINGS — EVIDENCE—DEPENDENCY.

In a workmen's compensation proceeding, where it appeared that the employé's wife was living separate from him, and had neither received nor sought any support from him for years, and was suing him for a divorce without claiming alimony, a finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that she was not in fact dependent on him was supported by the evidence.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑388—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION PROCEEDING—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION.

Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) § 19, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1087, § 7, provides that a wife shall be conclusively presumed wholly dependent upon a husband with whom she was living at the time of his death or who was legally liable at such time for her support; that a child under 18 shall be conclusively presumed dependent upon the parent; that, if there is more than one person wholly dependent upon a deceased employé, the death benefit shall be divided equally among them, unless otherwise ordered by the commission; and that death benefits shall be paid to such one or more of the dependents as may be determined by the commission, and the commission may apportion such benefits among the dependents in such manner as may be in proportion to their respective needs and just and equitable. Held that, assuming that a wife living apart from the employé was conclusively presumed dependent upon him for support, still, where there were children also dependent on him, the commission had power to award the compensation in proportion to their respective needs and in such manner as might be just and equitable, even to the total exclusion of the wife.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑417(7)—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION PROCEEDING—REVIEW —QUESTIONS OF FACT.

The question of what disposition of compensation for the death of an employé is in proportion to the respective needs of the dependents and just and equitable is one of fact, the determination of which is committed to the Industrial Accident Commission, and in its determination the commission is necessarily vested with a large discretion, and no court should interfere with such determination unless it clearly appears that the conclusion of the commission is without substantial support in the record.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑388—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION PROCEEDING — RIGHT TO COMPENSATION.

Where the wife of a deceased employé was living apart from him, and had not received or sought support from him for years, and was suing him for divorce without asking for alimony, the Industrial Accident Commission's conclusion that it would be just and equitable and in proportion to the respective needs of the dependents to award the whole compensation for the employé's death to his two minor children, one of whom was between two and three years of age, and the other less than a year old, was warranted.

In Bank. Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act to obtain compensation for the death of Clarence H. Perry. Compensation was awarded to certain other parties to the exclusion of Gertrude E. Perry, and she and the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, insurer, apply for a writ of review. Affirmed.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls and F. Harrison Smitton, all of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. One Clarence H. Perry was killed on November 10, 1916, under such circumstances as to entitle his dependents to a death benefit from his employer under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act. Petitioner Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company was the insurance carrier of the employer. The amount of death benefit was fixed by the commission at $3,050. No question is raised as to the correctness of the award, in so far as the amount is concerned. By its decision the commission awarded all of the same to the two minor children of deceased to the exclusion of petitioner Gertrude E. Perry, who was his wife, and it is claimed the award was in excess of the powers of the commission, and that the wife should be awarded a portion of the death benefit.

The commission, while finding that Gertrude E, Perry was the lawful wife of the deceased, further found that in November, 1913, he "separated from" her, and thereafter did not contribute to her support, that she had instituted proceedings for divorce, with the result that in October, 1916, an interlocutory decree in divorce was granted her, without any award of alimony, and "that it is in accordance with the respective needs of the dependents of said deceased employé, and is just and equitable, that the entire death benefit be apportioned and paid to the" two minor children.

The material facts, as shown by the record, may be briefly stated. Deceased had been married to Gertrude E. Perry some three years, when, in November, 1913, he left her. There is no issue of said marriage. He never thereafter contributed to her support, and she has ever since been entirely dependent on her parents for support. On December 4, 1913, deceased commenced to live with another woman as his wife, and so continued to the time of his death. The two minor children, both girls, are the issue of this union, one being between two and three years of age, and the other less than a year. Deceased supported this woman and his two children to the time of his death, and they were wholly dependent on him for support. He left a policy of insurance in the sum of $1,000 payable to the mother of the children, and apparently nothing else. In the year 1916 the wife commenced her action for a divorce on the ground of desertion, not asking for any alimony. She testified that her reason for not seeking alimony was that she thought he was unable to pay any, and that "it would be embarrassing to his family" for her to ask for it. She obtained an interlocutory decree in October, 1916, a few weeks before her husband's death. She was at first disposed to relinquish in favor of these children all claim to any part of the award that might be made by the commission on account of the death of her husband, and signed a written waiver and relinquishment in their favor. Acting on such waiver, the commission in the first instance awarded the whole sum to the minors. She subsequently changed her mind in this regard, and, a rehearing having been granted by the commission, she pressed her claim for a portion of the death benefit before that body, with the result already stated. Her claim being disallowed, she seeks relief here. The insurance carrier joins with her, but in no way disputes its liability for the amount of the award.

[1] No question is raised as to the two minor children being conclusively presumed to be wholly dependent for support upon the deceased employé by virtue of the provisions of section 19a(3) of the act, as apparently they were also wholly dependent in fact. The surviving wife claims that the same conclusive presumption obtains as to her by virtue of section 19a(1), which declares such presumption in favor of "a wife upon a husband with whom she was living at the time of his death, or for whose support such husband was legally liable at the time of his death" (her claim being based upon the portion we have italicized), and she also claims that the evidence shows that she was so wholly dependent in fact. As to the latter claim the commission found against her, and in view of the showing that she had received nothing from him in years, apparently had not sought and was not relying upon receiving anything from him, and was pressing her claim for a divorce from him without any provision for support, it cannot be held that this finding was without sufficient support in the evidence. Solely for the purposes of this decision we shall assume that she comes within the provisions of section 19a (1), hereinbefore quoted, and that by virtue of this law she must be conclusively presumed to have been wholly dependent for support upon deceased at the time of his death. If we so assume, the result is that we have three persons who must be held to have been wholly dependent upon him for support, the surviving wife and the two minor children.

[2-4] The act provides in section 19d(2):

> "If there is more than one such person wholly dependent for support upon a deceased employee, the death benefit shall be divided equally among them, unless otherwise ordered by the commission." (The italics are ours.)

The same provision, viz. "unless otherwise ordered by the commission," is to be found in other sections relative to the distribution of the death benefit. By section 19e it is provided as follows:

> "The death benefits shall be paid to such one or more of the dependents of the deceased, or to a trustee * * * for the benefit of the person or persons entitled, as may be determined by the commission, and the commission may, anything in this act contained to the contrary notwithstanding, apportion such benefits among the dependents in proportion to their respective needs and as may be just and equitable, and may order payment to a dependent subsequent in right, or not otherwise entitled, upon good cause being shown therefor."

This provision amply authorizes the commission to award the death benefit among the dependents in such manner as may be in proportion to their respective needs, and just and equitable, even to the total exclusion of one or more of them. It was upon this provision that the action of the commission was based in the case at bar, as is shown by the finding already set forth. The question what disposition in any particular case is in proportion to the respective needs of the dependents and just and equitable is, of course, one of fact, the determination of which is committed to the commission, and in its determination the commission is necessarily invested with a large discretion. Certainly no court should interfere with the determination of the commission in such a matter unless it is clearly made to appear that the conclusion is without substantial support in the record. In the case at bar we are of the opinion that, in view of the facts shown by the record, it cannot fairly be held that there is not sufficient support for the conclusion of the commission.

Our view on this point renders unnecessary discussion on any other point.

The award of the commission is affirmed.

TERRY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

COURTS ⚿397 — ERROR TO STATE COURT — RIGHT TO ALLOW.

Where a cause was appealed to the Supreme Court, which transferred it to a District Court of Appeal, and, after hearing, the Supreme Court refused to vacate the decision of the District Court of Appeal and hear the case, the District Court of Appeal was the highest court in which a final judgment could be rendered, within the United States statutes, and it, and not the Supreme Court, has authority to allow a writ of error from the United States Supreme Court.

In Chambers of the Chief Justice.

Action by J. M. Terry against the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. Judgment affirmed by the District Court of Appeal. Application by the defendant for a writ of error from the United States Supreme Court to this court. Application denied.

See, also, 169 Pac. 86.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for plaintiff. Henry T. Gage and William I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for defendant.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an application by the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, for allowance of a writ of error from the United States Supreme Court to this court.

The appeal originally taken to this court was by express authorization of the provisions of the Constitution of this state transferred to the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, and has ever since remained within the jurisdiction of that court. Decision thereon was rendered by that court, affirming the judgment of the trial court, on July 18, 1917, and that decision has become final. Subsequently thereto, in accord with certain provisions of our Constitution, this court was asked to vacate the decision of the District Court of Appeal and order the cause transferred to this court for hearing and determination, and this application was denied; the court refusing to again assume jurisdiction of the cause.

In view of certain decisions of the United States Supreme Court, I am of the opinion that, under the circumstances, within the meaning of the provisions of the United States statutes governing the question, the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District must be held to be the highest court in which a final judgment could be rendered in this cause (see Western Union Tel. Co. v. Crovo, 220 U. S. 364, 366, 31 Sup. Ct. 399, 55 L. Ed. 498; Norfolk Turnpike Co. v. Virginia, 225 U. S. 269, 32 Sup. Ct. 828, 56 L. Ed. 1082; Mulcrevy v. City and County of San Francisco, 231 U. S. 669, 34 Sup. Ct. 260, 58 L. Ed. 425; Second National Bank, etc., v. First National Bank, etc., 242 U. S. 600, 37 Sup. 236, 61 L. Ed. 518), that a writ of error would therefore lie to that court only, and that I have no authority to allow the writ.

The application for a writ of error is denied.

CONNELY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (L. A. 5471.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE 🔑43(3)—JURISDICTION — ACTIONS FOR POSSESSION OF PROPERTY.

Under Const. art. 6, § 11, providing inferior courts shall not trench upon courts of record, and Code Civ. Proc. § 112, subd. 3, providing that justice's courts have jurisdiction in actions to recover the possession of personal property, if its value does not exceed $300, such court has jurisdiction where the property is valued at $290 and damages for unlawful detention are $100.

In Bank. Certiorari by Sallie Connely to review an order made in the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles, State of California, by John M. Yorke, Judge thereof, dismissing an action appealed from justice's court. Order annulled by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District. Rehearing denied.

Petitioner in this proceeding sought a writ of certiorari to review an order made in the superior court, which order purported to accomplish the dismissal of an action theretofore brought into the superior court by appeal from the justice's court. The writ was issued and return duly made. It appears that the petitioner commenced her action in the justice's court in September, 1916. The action was one of claim and delivery, and it was alleged that the value of the property was $290 and that the plaintiff had been damaged by the unlawful detention thereof in the sum of $100. The relief demanded was for the possession of the property, or, in case possession could not be had, then for its value in the sum stated, together with the amount of damages alleged. Answer was filed and the case duly set for trial in the justice's court and notice given to the defendants. Defendants failed to appear at the trial, and after hearing evidence the justice entered judgment in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. Defendants thereupon appealed the case to the superior court, where, after certain proceedings, the court made the following order: "In this cause heretofore submitted on April 3, 1917, it is ordered that the action be and the same is hereby dismissed for want of jurisdiction." It is this order that petitioner seeks to have annulled.

The main question presented is as to whether the justice's court had jurisdiction of an action for the recovery of personal property of the alleged value of $290 where the additional sum of $100 damages was claimed. The civil jurisdiction of the justice's court, as defined in section 112, Code of Civil Procedure, includes: "3. In actions to recover the possession of personal property, if the value of such property does not amount to three hundred dollars." Counsel for respondent argues that, as section 11, article 6, of the Constitution of this state provides that the powers of inferior courts "shall not in any case trench upon the jurisdiction of the several courts of record," section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure, defining the jurisdiction of the justice's court, must be held to include only actions in which the total demand does not amount to $300. But we may inquire: If the justice's court did not have jurisdiction of this action, what court did? The constitutional provision defining the jurisdiction of superior courts (section 5, art. 6) gives jurisdiction to such courts where personal property is in litigation, where "the value of the property in controversy amounts to three hundred dollars." In an action of claim and delivery the recovery of the property itself is the main demand—damages are incidental. In the case of Astell v. Phillippi, 55 Cal. 265, our Supreme Court said: "It would seem, in like manner, that, when the standard of jurisdiction is 'the value of the property,' the recovery of which is the main object of the proceeding, the incidental damages for the detention are not limited." Respondent argues that this decision was rendered under a different state of the law; that the Constitution of 1849 was then in force, which did not contain provisions simiıar to that in section 11, article 6, referred to above.

As a matter of fact, the Constitution of 1849 did contain, in the amendments ratified in 1862, the same provision in almost the identical terms. The case of Astell v. Phillippi is in point. But, even though it did appear that the demand was for an amount in excess of the jurisdiction of the justice's court, still, where the appeal was regularly taken and the case was brought into the superior court, the latter court had jurisdiction to determine the appeal on its merits. De Jarnett v. Marquez, 132 Cal. 702, 64 Pac. 1090, cited in Riverside Heights Water Co. v. Riverside Trust Co. et al., 148 Cal. 457, 83 Pac. 1003. We do not mean to decide that a party properly objecting to the jurisdiction of a justice's court may not have that objection reviewed and passed upon on appeal; but the record here discloses no objection as having been made in either court. Apparently, judging from the face of the return, the action of the court was taken of its own motion. However, for the reasons stated, we are satisfied that the justice's court had jurisdiction of the action, in that the value of the property involved did not amount to $300.

The order of the superior court is annulled; petitioner to have her costs.

George P. Cook, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Hugh E. Macbeth, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a hearing in this court, after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, is denied. As we read the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, the conclusion of the court is based wholly upon the proposition that the justice's court had jurisdiction of the action, in that the value of the property involved did not amount to $300, and we are entirely in accord with what is said by the District Court of Appeal on this question.

In denying the hearing, we are not to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the other question discussed in the opinion.

RICHMOND v. JULIAN CONSOL. MINING CO. (L. A. 4067.)

1. Appeal and Error ⟹616(2)—Record on Appeal—Authentication.

Where the record is prepared under the alternative method provided by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a–953c, all that may be authenticated by the clerk is the judgment roll, together with notice of appeal, and in the absence of a certificate of the trial judge copies of certain notices of motion to dismiss for want of diligence in prosecution and affidavits and orders with reference thereto cannot be considered.

2. Appeal and Error ⟹907(1)—Regularity of Proceedings in Lower Court—Presumption.

Code Civ. Proc. § 583, requiring dismissal of action where no trial is had within five years after filing of answer, excepts from its provisions cases in which the parties have extended the time by written stipulation. Held that, although the trial took place more than five years after filing of answer, it would be presumed on appeal that there was a stipulation justifying trial court in proceeding where there was nothing in the record to indicate that a stipulation extending time was or was not filed; every presumption being in favor of the regularity of the proceedings in the court below.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by G. B. Richmond against the Julian Consolidated Mining Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for appellant. W. W. Butler, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant on two promissory notes made by defendant to plaintiff's assignor. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The record on appeal was prepared under the alternative method. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a–953c. It is certified by the clerk alone.

[1] The appellant's first contention is that the action should have been dismissed, on its motion, for want of diligence in prosecution. The transcript contains copies of certain notices of motion, affidavits, and orders bearing on this matter. But it is settled by our decisions that, where a record is made up under the alternative method, all that may be authenticated by the clerk is the judgment roll, together with the notice of appeal. In the absence of a certificate of the trial judge, other papers are not a part of the record on appeal, and they cannot be considered. Totten v. Barlow, 165 Cal. 378, 132 Pac. 749; Bush v. Allen, 172 Cal. 102, 155 Pac. 456.

[2] From recitals in the findings and the judgment, it appears that the trial took place something more than five years after the filing of defendant's answer. The appellant claims that this lapse of time made it mandatory on the court to dismiss the action on its own motion. The last clause of section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, on which this claim is founded, excepts from its operation those cases in which the parties have extended the time by written stipulation. Error must be affirmatively shown; it is not presumed. On the contrary, every presumption is in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of the court below. There being nothing in the record to indicate that a stipulation extending time was, or was not, made, we must assume, in support of the action of the court in entering judgment, that it had before it such a stipulation as would justify it in proceeding.

Apart from this, it is not suggested that any error appears on the face of the judgment roll.

PEOPLE v. WONG HING. (Cr. 2102.)

1. Homicide ⇨250 — Murder — Evidence — Sufficiency.

Evidence held to sustain conviction of murder.

2. Criminal Law ⇨703 — Trial — Conduct of Attorneys.

In prosecution of a Chinese for murder, after statement in opening argument that the state expected to show that a highbinders' war or Chinese tong was begun on the day of the murder, in the absence of showing of bad faith or that the statement was made without intention of trying to support it, there was no misconduct by failure to produce such evidence.

3. Criminal Law ⇨1170½(5) — Appeal — Harmless Error—Cross-Examination.

In prosecution of a Chinese for murder, though it was improper to ask accused how long he had belonged to a tong or society of highbinders when on objection he was then asked how long he had belonged to the tong, the error was harmless, especially where no request was made that the jury be admonished to disregard the question.

4. Homicide ⇨174(6)—Evidence—Admissibility.

In prosecution of a Chinese for murder, it was not error to admit evidence as to the meaning of Chinese characters appearing on a badge found in his possession when arrested.

5. Criminal Law ⇨651(1)—Viewing Premises—Discretion of Court.

Under Pen. Code, § 1119, providing that when in the opinion of the court it is proper the jury may view the premises, the matter of viewing the premises is entirely within the discretion of the court.

6. Homicide ⇨305 — Instructions — Accessories.

Where the evidence justified conviction on theory either that defendant shot deceased or was present, aiding, and abetting in the shooting, it was proper to instruct that in either case he was guilty as a principal, since Pen. Code, § 1127, makes it the duty of the court to charge the jury as to all matters of law necessary for their information.

7. Criminal Law ⇨800(2)—Instructions—Commonplace Words.

In prosecution for murder, where the court instructed on accessories, it was not error to fail to define the term "aiding and abetting," which are commonplace words, especially in the absence of a request for such definition.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Wong Hing was convicted of murder, and, from such judgment and order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Hoff Cook, R. Porter Ashe, Albert Waldstein, and T. M. O'Connor, all of San Francisco (Harold C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. U. S. Webb, John H. Riordan, C. M. Fickert, Fred L. Berry, and Jas. F. Brennan, all of San Francisco, for the People.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge Pro Tem. The grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco returned an indictment charging defendant with the crime of murdering a fellow countryman known as Nung Yu. Upon trial he was convicted of murder in the first degree, followed by judgment of the court sentencing him to execution as provided by law. From this judgment and an order of court denying his motion for a new trial defendant appeals.

The alleged errors upon which he bases his claim for a reversal are: First, insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; second, misconduct of the district attorney; third, rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting testimony; and, fourth, erroneous instructions given the jury.

[1] As to the first assignment of error, it appears that at the time of the killing, about 1:30 p. m. on March 5, 1917, the deceased, Nung Yu, was engaged in conducting an undertaking business in San Francisco, at 750 Pacific street, adjoining which on the west was a vacant lot, through which deceased had access from the front entrance of his storeroom to a house in the rear thereof occupied by him and his family as a residence. Thomas J. Wright, a witness called on behalf of the prosecution, in substance testified: That shortly before the commission of the crime he was with Nung Yu, in the latter's store, when defendant, accompanied by another Chinaman, leaving a third outside, entered and, in English, asked who was the proprietor of the place, to which deceased replied, "I am the proprietor." That "Yu seemed to be getting a little nervous." That about the same time some shooting occurred on Stockton street, when Yu ran out of his place, going through the vacant lot towards his residence. "He walked back through the vacant lot. It is something over 120 feet or more, and as he turned to walk through the vacant lot he started back, and at that time they commenced opening fire." That he saw defendant shoot deceased about four times in the back. That deceased fell and, raising his hand up, said: "I don't belong to any society." That after the shooting defendant ran through the vacant lot, throwing the gun down, and went out through that lot over to Broadway, where he was captured by an officer and brought back. In reply to the question, "How many men were shooting at the deceased in that vacant lot?" witness said:

> "I only saw that man doing the shooting. There were three men, three Chinamen, but two was around him. But I seen that young man who pumped him in the back four times. He was the one that asked was he the proprietor; he was the one that made the finishing touch."

Both upon his direct and cross examination the witness admitted that, due to the occurrence, he was somewhat excited, but is positive that defendant was the Chinaman who came into Yu's store and inquired for the proprietor, and that some ten minutes later he saw the same man, with another Chinaman, both of whom were engaged in the shooting of Yu. On cross-examination the witness said:

> "It is a pretty hard matter for me to say that he is the one that made the fatal blow, but I say he was engaged in the shooting."

Other testimony of this witness is to the effect that, after deceased was down, defendant stood within eight or ten feet of him and fired four or five shots into his body.

The wife of deceased also witnessed the shooting and testified: That the defendant fired one shot when her husband, who was in the vacant lot, fell down and, partially rising, said: "I belong to no tong. My name is Nung Yu." That defendant fired more shots and then ran past her doorway. That as to the identity of defendant, she was positive that he was the man who did the shooting.

Another eyewitness, Louis Bergamaschi, testified: That while in his saloon, some 200 feet distant but in plain view of the place where the shooting occurred, he heard some shots and, looking out through the rear window, saw deceased lying on the ground, surrounded by three Chinamen, two of whom started to run away and the other, said by the witness to be defendant, fired three shots at deceased, threw the gun away, and then ran through an alley past his saloon to Broadway street, upon which the saloon fronted. That witness ran to the front door of his saloon and saw the three Chinamen separate, the defendant crossing Broadway, where Officer Collins, whose attention was attracted by the witness blowing a police whistle, arrested him. In response to the question, "Was it this Chinaman" (defendant)? the witness said:

> "Yes, it was this fellow. I didn't know him before, but I see him when he was coming, and I paid attention right where he was going, and Mr. Collins he brought him back. * * * I didn't lose him with my eyes; I saw him all the time."

Further testifying, the witness said:

> "I could not prove that he is the man that done the shooting, but he was one of the men in the bunch. * * * I know he is one of the men of the three, but I dont know if he was the man that was shooting."

Upon arresting defendant, Officer Collins, taking him by the arm, conducted him to where Nung Yu was lying, when defendant said, "I didn't do it." In applying the handcuffs, witness noticed a powder mark on defendant's right hand, and asked defendant, "How did you get this?" to which defendant replied: "You done; you done it." Again defendant said: "You did it; you did it." The bullets which caused the death of deceased were of 32-caliber size, and a 32-caliber pistol containing six shells, five of which were empty, and its condition evidencing its recent discharge, was, a few minutes after the tragedy, found some 25 feet from where Yu fell when he was shot. Afterwards Officer Richards went to the room occupied by defendant and discovered a box of 32-caliber cartridges, such as were used in said gun, from which six shells were missing. This room was occupied, besides defendant, by two other Chinamen, one of whom testified that the cartridges and a 32-caliber pistol had been left with him by a cousin who had gone to China, and he had removed six cartridges from the box to load the pistol. Defendant explained his presence in the vicinity upon the theory that he was hunting a carpenter shop located near there, the name and address of the proprietor of which he had in his possession when arrested. The testimony of the eyewitnesses, differing somewhat as to minor details, which under the circumstances was most natural, together with incriminating circumstances, the explanation of which failed to satisfy the jury, clearly justified the conclusion that, if the defendant did not fire the shots himself, he, nevertheless, was a party to the commission of the crime and aided and abetted therein. Indeed, upon the evidence it is difficult to see how the jury could have arrived at any verdict other than the one rendered.

[2] An assignment of misconduct of the district attorney is predicated upon the fact that in his opening statement to the jury he said:

> "We expect to show that on the afternoon of the 5th day of March, 1917, about 1:20, a so-called highbinders' war or Chinese tong was begun in this city."

There is evidence, though slight, from which an inference might be drawn that the killing of Yu was the result of a tong feud. Conceding, however, that no evidence was offered in support of the statement so made to the jury, there is nothing in the record tending to show that it was made in bad faith or without intention of trying to support it by evidence. In the absence of such showing, it cannot be said the district attorney was guilty of misconduct because he failed to produce such evidence. People v. Gleason, 127 Cal. 323, 59 Pac. 592; People v. Searcey, 121 Cal. 1, 53 Pac. 359, 41 L. R. A. 157.

[3] It appearing from defendant's testimony that he was a member of the Bing Kong Tong, he was, on cross-examination, asked, "Now, how long have you belonged to this Bing Kong Tong or society of highbinders, as it is commonly known?" to which defendant interposed an objection upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevent, and immaterial. Without waiting for a ruling of the court thereon, the attorney for the prosecution, impliedly conceding the impropriety thereof, recast the question and asked, "How long have you belonged to that Tong?" No evidence had been offered that the Bing Kong Tong, of which defendant was a member, was a society of highbinders; and hence the question containing the implication was highly improper and should not have been put to the witness. Nevertheless, we are unable to perceive, under the circumstances, how defendant could in any event have been prejudiced thereby. Moreover, no request was made by defendant's attorney that the trial court admonish the jury to disregard the question, in the absence of which, where such admonition may cure the error, it has been held this court will not consider the same. People v. Metzler, 21 Cal. App. 80, 130 Pac. 1192; People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 154, 65 Pac. 295; People v. Bradbury, 151 Cal. 675, 91 Pac. 497.

[4] Neither was it prejudicial error to receive evidence as to the meaning of Chinese characters appearing on a badge found in defendant's possession when arrested. As translated these characters were, "Congratulations on the dedication," and then in English, "B. K. T. of San Francisco, California," followed in Chinese by, "San Francisco Bing Kong Tong Representative, Wong Yak Shu." Defendant's possession of the badge with these characters is accounted for in the fact, as shown by him, that he had, as a delegate from the San Francisco society, recently represented it at a meeting of the Seattle branch in the dedication of a new building.

While the shots fatal to defendant were fired from a 32-caliber revolver, it appears also that a 38-caliber revolver, found at the place where the shooting occurred, was used by one of the persons engaged in attacking Yu, one shot from which took effect in his thigh, and concerning which witness Davis stated it contained five empty shells and one loaded. The revolver, however, as appears from the record, was not offered in evidence, but, at the request of the prosecution, merely marked as an exhibit. Hence there is no ground for appellant's contention that the court erred in admitting this revolver in evidence, since it was not so admitted.

[5] Error is also predicated upon a ruling of the court refusing to make an order granting defendant's request that the jury be permitted to view the premises where the offense was committed. Section 1119 of the Penal Code provides:

> "When, in the opinion of the court, it is proper that the jury should view the place in which the offense is charged to have been committed, or in which any other material fact occurred, it may order the jury to be conducted in a body * * * to the place. * * * "

Under this provision the making of such order is a matter committed solely to the discretion of the court, and it is difficult to conceive of a case in which the facts would justify a reversal for an abuse of such discretion. People v. Maupins, 30 Cal. App. 393, 158 Pac. 502; People v. Howard, 28 Cal. App. 180, 151 Pac. 754. In People v. Fitzpatrick, 80 Cal. 538, 22 Pac. 215, it is said:

> "Sending a jury out to view premises, even when clearly within section 1119 of the Penal Code, is a hazardous proceeding, and frequently leads to difficulties; and it would be well for trial courts not to make use of the power therein given except in cases which seem to imperatively call for it."

In the case at bar a plat, correctly delineating the premises and objects surrounding the scene where the offense was committed, was used by the witnesses in giving their testimony, and there is nothing in the record which in the slightest degree discloses any abuse of discretion on the part of the court in making the order complained of.

[6, 7] Appellant challenged the giving to the jury of an instruction as follows:

> "It is the law, gentlemen, that all persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense or aid and abet in its commission, or, not being present, have advised and encouraged its commission, are principals in any crime so committed. So that in the case before you, if you are satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant here directly committed the crime charged, or aided and abetted in its commission, or, not being present, advised and encouraged its commission, you will be justified in finding him guilty as a principal."

The attack thereon made is that appellant, conceding the correctness of the instruction as an abstract proposition of law, insists it is inapplicable to the facts established and theory upon which the case was tried. By the provisions of section 1127, Penal Code, it is made the duty of the court to charge the jury as to all matters of law necessary for their information. Reference to the résumé of the evidence hereinbefore made discloses two theories either of which, if found correct, justified the verdict rendered. That deceased was attacked by three men, one of whom was defendant, clearly appears, and, according to the positive testimony of the wife of deceased, he fired the fatal shots. But concede that her testimony, notwithstanding its support, was deemed insufficient proof of the fact, other testimony that of Wright and Bergamaschi, if believed, together with incriminating circumstances established, constituted proof inconsistent with any theory other than that he was there present aiding and abetting in the commission of the crime. The character of the evidence and reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom were such that the jury in arriving at its verdict might have adopted either of the two theories: (1) That defendant fired the fatal shots; or (2) that, while not guilty of so doing, he was present aiding and abetting in the acts which deprived Nung Yu of his life. Hence in charging the jury it was proper for the court to instruct it as to both theories. The term "aiding and abetting" are commonplace words, the meaning of which the jurors must be deemed to have understood; hence, and especially in the absence of a request therefor, the court was not called upon of its own motion to define them.

A careful examination of the entire transcript convinces us that defendant had a fair and impartial trial, free from any prejudicial error disclosed by the record.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

DARGIE v. PATTERSON (CONNERS et al., Interveners). (S. F. 7387.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE ⚷267(1)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—GIFT BY HUSBAND—AVOIDANCE.

Civ. Code, § 172, as amended by St. 1891, p. 425, declaring the husband has the management and control of the community property, with the like absolute power of disposition (other than testamentary) as he has of his separate estate, by adding: Provided, however, that he cannot make a gift of such community property or convey it without a valuable consideration, unless the wife, in writing, consents thereto—does not make such a conveyance void as to any one; nor voidable by husband, his executors or personal representatives; but does make it voidable by the wife, after the husband's death, to the extent, and only to the extent, of the half interest therein, which would pass to her as the survivor of the community; and such right of avoidance she has, without regard to the amount or condition of the estate remaining in the husband's hands at his death.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Erminia Peralta Dargie against Etta I. Patterson; John F. Conners and J. Clem Arnold, executors of William Edward Dargie, deceased, intervening. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck and McClanahan & Derby, all of San Francisco, for appellant. A. A. Moore and Stanley Moore, both of San Francisco, for respondent Dargie. Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley and Eugene E. Trefethen, all of Oakland (Edgar D. Peixotto, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents Conners and Arnold.

SLOSS, J. On October 20, 1910, William E. Dargie signed a deed purporting to convey to the defendant Etta I. Patterson, a parcel of land in the city of Oakland. Dargie died on February 10, 1911. By the present action his widow attacks the validity of said deed upon the ground, principally, that the land described in it was community property of herself and William E. Dargie; that the conveyance was without consideration, and that she had not consented to it. The complaint also contains an allegation that the instrument was never delivered. The answer of the defendant put in issue many of the allegations of the complaint. Before the case came on for trial, two of the three executors of the will of William E. Dargie intervened, and joined with the plaintiff in assailing the conveyance.

When the case came on for trial the parties entered into a stipulation disposing of many of the issues raised by the pleadings. It was admitted, for the purposes of the trial, that William E. Dargie and the plaintiff were husband and wife from December 15, 1881, until the death of Dargie; that all of the estate left by Dargie, as well as the property covered by the deed in controversy, was community property; that there was no consideration for said deed, and that the same was executed without the knowledge of the plaintiff, and without her consent, oral or written. Findings were made in accord with the stipulation. Evidence was offered on the issue of delivery, and the court found that the instrument was delivered to the defendant on October 20, 1910. Finding these facts, with some others which, so far as necessary, will be referred to later, the court concluded that the deed under which defendant claims the property is wholly void; that defendant has no right, title, or interest in or to said real property, and that the whole thereof is community property of William E. Dargie and the plaintiff, and forms a part of the estate of said William E. Dargie, deceased. From the judgment entered pursuant to these conclusions, the defendant appeals.

The questions presented for decision turn upon the effect of the amendment of 1891 (Stats. 1891, p. 425) to section 172 of the Civil Code. That section as originally enacted provided:

> "The husband has the management and control of the community property, with the like absolute power of disposition, other than testamentary, as he has of his separate estate."

By the amendment referred to these words were added:

> "Provided, however, that he cannot make a gift of such community property, or convey the same without a valuable consideration, unless the wife, in writing, consent thereto."

The proviso was first brought to the attention of this court in Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170. The decision in that case went off on the ground that the amendment could not operate upon property acquired and owned before the enactment of the proviso. Neither in that case, nor in any other decided up to the time when the first briefs on the present appeal were filed, was there a ruling by this court touching the effect of the amendment on conveyances of community property acquired after the proviso became law. We have, however, during the pendency of this appeal, had occasion to consider this very subject. Our recent decision in a second case entitled Spreckels v. Spreckels, 172 Cal. 775, 158 Pac. 537, has removed from the field of controversy some of the questions which counsel in the present appeal have elaborately argued in their briefs. We there said, among other things (175 Cal. page 782, 158 Pac. 539):

> "The proviso of 1891 does not render a gift of community property by the husband without the consent of the wife void as to him, nor confer upon him, in his lifetime, or upon his personal representatives after his death, any right or power to revoke the gift or recover the property. There is nothing in the language to express the idea that the title does not, as before, remain wholly in him. The provision is merely for a limitation upon his power to dispose of it. He is bound by his own gift as fully as if it was of his separate estate."

Nothing need be added to these expressions to demonstrate that the executors of the husband's will had no standing to join in the widow's attack upon the conveyance. Their intervention was based upon the theory that, under the amendment to section 172, the conveyance was absolutely void, and that the husband's representatives retained the same interest in the property that they would have had if the conveyance had not been made. So, too, the decision disposes of the contention, pressed by the widow as well, that the deed is an absolute nullity, and does not affect the ownership of the property in any degree. The gift, it is declared in the case just cited, is not void, but "only voidable by the wife at her option." The court goes on to amplify and explain this statement by means of the following quotation from the decision in Wildes v. Vanvoorhis, 15 Gray (81 Mass.) 139, 143:

> "In many cases where a transaction is declared void in terms by a rule of the common law, or even expressly by statute, where the obvious interest of the rule is to secure and protect the rights of another party, the construction of law is, that it is voidable so far that it shall not operate to defeat or impair those rights. Such deed is not a dead letter; but can be avoided by such persons only, and at such time, and in such manner, as may be necessary to secure those rights. In other respects it has its natural effect."

What, then, is the conclusion to be drawn? May the wife avoid the deed in its entirety, or only so far as necessary to protect her rights? While this question was not directly answered in Spreckels v. Spreckels, or in the later case of Winchester v. Winchester, 165 Pac. 965, the only logical conclusion is that the wife's right to assail the conveyance where, as here, the action is brought after the husband's death, is limited to an undivided half of the property. During his lifetime the husband, notwithstanding the statutory limitation upon his power of disposition, is the owner of the community property. The proviso attached to section 172 does not impair his right to dispose of the property, so far as concerns his own interest, and that of those claiming under him. If he had made no conveyance, the widow would, upon his death, have been entitled to one-half of the property in question, as of all other community property. The other half would have passed to his heirs or devisees, and the widow, as such, would have had no interest in it. His heirs or devisees are bound, as he himself was bound, by the conveyance made. Why, then, should the widow's claim extend to any more than the one-half which would pass to her as survivor of the community? The privilege of avoiding the gift is conferred upon her as a means of protecting her interest in the community property. We see no reason why, in assailing the gift, she should enjoy greater rights than she would have had if the gift had never been made. Furthermore, if the deed should be set aside in its entirety, and the property restored to the community, the one-half not passing to the widow would be distributed as a part of the husband's estate. His representatives and successors would therefore be in the very position which they would occupy if they were entitled, in their own right, to disaffirm the conveyance—a thing which, as we have seen, they cannot do. It is not necessary to the widow's protection that she attack the transfer, except as to one-half, and she should not be allowed to attack it for the benefit of others who are bound by it.

It is argued, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the wife need not await the dissolution of the marriage by death to attack such a conveyance; that she may, during the lifetime of her husband, bring an action to protect her interest in the community property. This question was mentioned, but not decided, in the later Spreckels Case, supra. There is no occasion to decide it here. If such action may be brought by the wife during the husband's lifetime, the relief could go only so far as to bind the property to such extent as may be necessary to protect the ultimate interest of the wife, in case the marriage should be dissolved by divorce or the death of the husband. It cannot be held that she would by proceeding during the existence of the marriage, be entitled to set aside the conveyance in its entirety. Such holding would be in direct conflict with the now established rule that the conveyance is binding upon the husband. It follows that the judgment declaring the conveyance void, and decreeing that the grantee has no interest in the property, cannot stand.

Certain facts, in addition to those already stated, were stipulated by the parties, and found by the court, and the appellant's claims, based upon these further facts, call for notice. It was agreed and found that the value of the estate of W. E. Dargie subject to distribution exceeds $500,000; that the value of the land involved in this action does not exceed $100,000. All of this was community property. It appearing, therefore, that the amount of the estate which passed into the hands of the executors was sufficient to satisfy the claim of the widow to one-half of all the community property, including the lot conveyed without her consent, she must, it is argued, seek satisfaction of her demand for one-half of the community estate out of the property retained by the testator until his death, instead of proceeding against his grantee. We may assume, for the purposes of this discussion, that the record shows that the debts of the estate and the expenses of administration are not sufficient to reduce the balance in the hands of the executors beyond the amount necessary to meet such claim of the widow.

The appellant's position is based upon the suggestion made by Chief Justice Beatty in his concurring opinion in the first Spreckels Case. The late Chief Justice thus expressed his view (116 Cal. page 350, 48 Pac. 232):

> "Upon the dissolution of the community by the death of the husband, or by divorce, I think that in estimating her share of the community property she would be entitled to have any property given away by the husband subsequent to the act of 1891 reckoned as a part of the community assets, and that she would be entitled to reclaim from the donee enough to make up her half of the whole, if less than one-half remained undisposed of. In all ordinary cases this would be the proper and sufficient remedy for any infringement of her rights. * * * If the wife survives her husband, she will get her full share of the community property out of that which remains. If the husband survives the wife, he will get everything that he has not voluntarily parted with."

No other member of the court joined in these declarations; a majority of the justices concurring in an opinion which held merely that the amendment of 1891 had no application to the property involved. The opinion of the Chief Justice does not, therefore, constitute authority which is in any sense binding. In the light of the further discussion of the subject in the second Spreckels Case, we are not disposed to adopt the suggested rule. The widow, upon showing the existence of the facts bringing a conveyance within the terms of the proviso of section 172, is entitled, so far as her rights are concerned, to treat that conveyance as a nullity. She has the right to avoid the conveyance so far as is necessary for the protection of her interest in the property conveyed. As to her, the case must be regarded as if there had been no conveyance, and the property had, accordingly, remained a portion of the community estate, of which the husband had died seized. Upon his death, she succeeded to one-half of such community estate as heir of the husband. Est. of Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 44 Pac. 734; Sharp v. Loupe, 120 Cal. 89, 52 Pac. 134, 586; Cunha v. Hughes, 122 Cal. 111, 54 Pac. 535, 68 Am. St. Rep. 27; Est. of Moffitt, 153 Cal. 359, 95 Pac. 653, 1025, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 207. Her right to succeed as such heir goes to every part and parcel of the community estate. Immediately upon his death she became the owner of an undivided one-half interest in every item of property owned by him, including the parcel of land which he had conveyed, but which, as against her objection, must be treated as still a part of the community property. Since, however, the conveyance made by him is binding upon those who claim under his will, and she cannot pursue her rights through the medium of any action instituted by the executors, she must have the right to proceed directly against the grantee claiming to hold the land in opposition to her right. If then, she, upon the death of the husband, is the legal owner of one-half of the land, on what ground can it be said that she should be divested of this legal ownership, and be required to resort to a proceeding against the other heirs of the husband for reimbursement to the extent of the value of the property of which she is thus deprived? Ordinarily the owner of an interest in specific real or personal property cannot be compelled against his will to surrender title to the specific property, and take in exchange therefor other property of like value, or the money equivalent of such value. The only reason for requiring the widow to seek recourse out of the other property of the estate is that thereby the gift in its entirety will be enforced against the grantor and his devisees, as to all of whom it was valid. But we are not, in this proceeding, passing upon the relative equities of the devisees and the grantee named in the deed. If any such equity exists in favor of a grantee who has given no valuable consideration for the conveyance, the widow is in no way affected thereby. Taking, as a volunteer, a conveyance declared by the law to be voidable at the option of the nonconsenting wife, the grantee knowingly runs the risk that the wife may elect to avoid the transfer. Such rights as may exist in favor of the grantee against those claiming under the husband's will cannot be worked out through the wife, but should be sought in an action brought directly against the parties concerned.

We conclude therefore that, upon the death of a husband who has attempted to convey community property contrary to the provisions of section 172, his nonconsenting wife may recover an undivided one-half of such property in an action brought against the grantee, and this without regard to the amount or condition of the estate remaining in his hands at the time of his death. Such is the case disclosed by the findings of fact, none of which are assailed on this appeal. There is no occasion to order any further trial.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment that the plaintiff is the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the property in question, and that the defendant is the owner of the other undivided one-half thereof. The rents, issues, and profits which have accrued during the pendency of the litigation should, by the terms of the judgment, be divided in accordance with this conclusion.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷843(4)—HARMLESS ERROR—STRIKING OUT PLEADING.

Where, had the motion to strike been denied, the complaint would nevertheless have been obnoxious to the general demurrer interposed, it is unnecessary to consider the alleged error in granting the motion.

2. CORPORATIONS ⚷121(4)—SALE OF STOCK—RESCISSION — CONDITION PRECEDENT—RESTORATION.

A complaint for rescission of a sale of shares of stock and recovery of the purchase price on the ground of false and fraudulent representations, alleging that plaintiff comes now and tenders return of the stock and consents to the cancellation of all agreements and obligations created or intended to be created thereunder, was demurrable, in the absence of any averment showing the stock to be worthless or that the sellers were able to, or had upon tender thereof before suit refused to, return the purchase price received by them, in view of Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 2, providing that when not effected by consent the party seeking rescission must restore to the other party everything of value he has received from him under the contract or must offer to restore the same upon condition that each party shall do likewise unless the latter is unable or positively refuses to do so.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by Lizzie M. Fairchild against the Western Securities Corporation and others. Judgment dismissing action, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. T. Hatfield, of Sacramento, for appellant. Dunn & Brand and W. E. Kleinsorge, all of Sacramento, and C. A. Tuttle, of Eureka, for respondents.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. In this action plaintiff sought a rescission of sale of 250 shares of its capital stock made to her by the California Guaranty Life & Accident Insurance Company and the recovery of $500 paid as consideration for the purchase thereof. As appears from the bill of exceptions, motions made by defendants California Guaranty Life & Accident Insurance Company and J. W. Carmichael for an order of court striking out certain portions of the first amended complaint and substantially all of a supplemental complaint filed by leave of court were granted. Thereafter plaintiff filed an engrossed copy of the first amended complaint omitting therefrom the portions so stricken out by order of court to which said defendants interposed a demurrer upon both general and special grounds. The court by an order in general terms sustained the demurrer as to each defendant, and plaintiff was granted 20 days in which to amend her complaint. At the expiration of the time so granted, plaintiff having failed to exercise her right to file an amended complaint, a judgment dismissing the action as to said defendants California Guaranty Life & Accident Insurance Company and D. W. Carmichael was entered, from which plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1] As we view the case, it is unnecessary to consider the alleged error predicated upon the ruling of the court in granting the motion to strike. This for the reason that, had the motions been denied, the complaint would nevertheless be obnoxious to the general demurrer interposed.

[2] The ground of rescission was on account of the alleged false and fraudulent representations as to material facts made by defendants to plaintiff by reason whereof she was induced to pay them $500 in consideration of which they sold and delivered to her a certificate for 250 shares of the capital stock of the California Guaranty Life & Accident Insurance Company, which shares of stock at the time of filing the complaint she retained in her possession. Not only is there a failure on the part of plaintiff to aver that the stock so held by her was of no value; but on the contrary the allegations of the complaint, indicating as they do that the stock had a substantial value, are wholly inconsistent therewith. Subdivision 2, § 1691, of the Civil Code, provides that when not effected by consent the parties seeking a rescission "must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract; or must offer to restore the same, upon condition that each party shall do likewise, unless the latter is unable or positively refuses to do so." In the absence of any averment showing the stock to be worthless or that defendants were able to or had upon tender thereof refused to return the $500 so received by them as the purchase price therefor, and there are none, an allegation showing compliance with this provision of the statute was an essential prerequisite to a statement of a cause of action for rescission against defendants or either of them.

The complaint contains a statement that:

> "Plaintiff comes now and tenders return of the certificates for 250 shares of the stock issued to her * * * and consents to the cancellation of all agreements and obligations created or intended to be created hereunder."

Counsel for appellant insists that this allegation is a sufficient showing of compliance with the statute in support of which he cites authorities from this and other jurisdictions involving cases where the plaintiff holding promissory notes of the defendant sought rescission without offering to return the same. Such cases, as pointed out in Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 502, 47 Pac. 369, 52 Pac. 797, Cowen v. Bloomberg, 66 N. J. Law, 386, 49 Atl. 451, and Coghill v. Boring, 15 Cal. 218, are inapplicable to cases of this character. In this case the stock was of substantial value, and, in the absence of anything pleaded excusing plaintiff from so doing, it was her duty, upon declaring that it was not her property to restore or offer to restore it to defendants upon condition that they repay to her the $500 so paid therefor, thus prior to bringing suit affording them an opportunity to join in the act of rescission. That under the circumstances shown to exist she was not entitled to a decree declaring the sale rescinded is supported by Gifford v. Carvill, 29 Cal. 589; Herman v. Haffenegger, 54 Cal. 161; Collins v. Townsend, 58 Cal. 608; Kelley v. Owens, supra; Buena Vista, etc., v. Tuohy, 107 Cal. 243, 40 Pac. 386; Loaiza v. Superior Court, 85 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 707, 9 L. R. A. 376, 20 Am. St. Rep. 197; Hammond v. Wallace, 85 Cal. 531, 24 Pac. 837, 20 Am. St. Rep. 239; Burton v. Stewart, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 239, 20 Am. Dec. 692—in some of which cases the facts were almost identical with those here involved.

The judgment is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Andrew Allen, deceased. A will was offered for probate by John Elliott, and Hannah A. Pearson contests. From a decree dismissing the contest, the contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Peter J. Crosby, of Oakland (Stanley R. Sterne, of counsel), for appellant. McNair & Stoker, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Andrew Allen died testate, leaving surviving him two adult daughters. In March, 1916, his will was offered for probate. Thereafter one of these daughters, Jane A. Allen, filed her grounds of contest, and the proponent of the will made answer thereto. Amongst these grounds of contest was the asserted unsoundness of mind of the testator. In due course the hearing of this contest was had before a jury, and the verdict of the jury was in favor of the validity of the will, and, of course, against the asserted unsoundness of the testator's mind in its execution. This was on the 13th day of February, 1917, and the court thereupon continued the petition for probate for further proceedings to the 16th day of February, 1917. On the 15th day of February, 1917, the other daughter, Hannah A. Pearson, appellant herein, filed her ground of contest and served copies thereof upon the proponent of the will and upon her sister. The ground of contest was the same ground of unsoundness of mind upon which the determination of the jury had just been received. This second contest was met by the proponent of the will with a motion to dismiss, supported by affidavit. The hearing of all these matters was duly continued until the 5th day of March, 1917, when the court granted the motion to dismiss. The contest was dismissed, the will was admitted to probate, and Hannah A. Pearson appeals.

Appellant based the contention of her right to be heard on her contest principally upon the Estate of Mollenkopf, 164 Cal. 576, 129 Pac. 997, but to this the conclusive answer is that the court in that case was not called upon to consider, and therefore did not consider, the peculiar features presented by the case at bar. We are not here concerned, as was the court in the Mollenkopf Case, with the question merely as to the time when a contest could be filed, nor with the limitation put by the law upon that time. We are here concerned with the effect of the determination of the previous contest upon the right of this appellant to contest at all, and as is answered the question, Was this appellant in law a party to and bound by the result of the previous contest? so will be answered the question as to whether or not the court erred in dismissing her contest.

It is made to appear that this contestant was a witness at the trial and gave testimony bearing upon the very matter of the asserted unsoundness of her deceased father's mind. But we need attach and do attach no legal weight to this fact.

[1] The essential fact is that by the provisions of our law she was a party interested in the estate, had legal notice of the contest, became in point of law an actor in it, and is bound by the result. The legal notice of the offer of the will to probate ran to all those interested in the estate, of which this appellant was unquestionably one. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1303, 1304; Gridley v. Boggs, 62 Cal. 190;

Curtis v. Underwood, 101 Cal. 661, 36 Pac. 110.

[2] The probate of a will is a proceeding in rem, binding on all persons interested in the will who, being constructively notified to appear at the probate, might have come in, and who, had they come in, would have been heard for or against the will. Black, Judgments, § 638; Est. of Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 150 Pac. 989.

[3] The issue of soundness or unsoundness of mind which had been resolved by the jury in favor of the validity of the will was thus as binding upon this appellant as though she herself had been the actual contestant. She was a party aggrieved under section 938, Code of Civil Procedure. She had the unquestioned right, as such heir at law and party aggrieved, to have appealed from the decree admitting the will to probate. Estate of Crooks, 125 Cal. 459, 58 Pac. 89; Estate of McDermott, 127 Cal. 450, 59 Pac. 783; Estate of Colton, 164 Cal. 5, 127 Pac. 643. Her remedy therefore was by such an appeal, and not by an attempt in the form of a new contest to retry an issue which had been decided adversely to her. The court in probate therefore did not err in dismissing her contest, and the decree so doing is affirmed.

In re MOREHOUSE et al. (S. F. 8323.)

1. JUDGMENT 🔑153(2) — SETTING ASIDE — TIME—MOTION—STATUTES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing for setting aside judgments within six months of rendition, not only a notice of motion, but the motion itself, must be made within six months.

2. JUDGMENT 🔑141 — SETTING ASIDE VOID JUDGMENTS—MOTION—DIRECT ACTION.

In order to set aside an order of court after six months on motion, the order must show on its face that the court had no jurisdiction to enter it, otherwise a direct action is necessary for relief.

3. GUARDIAN AND WARD 🔑13(3)—INFANTS—APPOINTMENT—WHO ENTITLED TO NOTICE—RIGHTS OF MOTHER.

Where after a separation the husband went to his wife's town and took their children into his own custody, and notified her of his act, notice to such wife was not necessary in a proceeding to have the husband appointed guardian, the relatives in the town of the residence of the husband having notice.

Department 2. Appeal from the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

In the matter of the guardianship of the persons and estates of Frank Beverly Morehouse and Marion M. Morehouse, minors. Frank B. Morehouse was appointed guardian. Merle M. Morehouse moved to set aside the appointment. From an order vacating the appointment, the guardian appeals. Reversed.

H. I. Stafford and W. F. Stafford, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The facts on this appeal are not in dispute. On January 3, 1916, the appellant Frank B. Morehouse and the respondent Merle M. Morehouse, his wife, separated. There were two minor children of the marriage. The mother took the two small children from the family home in San Francisco and went to Alameda county, where she still resides. The father remained at the family home in San Francisco. On June 18, 1916, the father went to Alameda and brought the children back to San Francisco, writing to his wife that he had done so and inviting her to return to the family home. She neither answered nor returned. On August 3, 1916, he filed a petition in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for the appointment of himself as guardian of the children. The only relatives of the children residing in San Francisco at the time were Mrs. Stewart, an aunt, and Frank B. Morehouse, a grandfather. They both requested the appointment of appellant in writing, and both had notice of the application.

[1] On August 3, 1916, an order was made appointing appellant guardian of the persons and estates of the minors. On February 1, 1917, the mother gave notice that she would move to set aside this appointment on February 9, 1917, which last date is more than six months after the order appointing appellant guardian was made and given. The motion was made on February 9, 1917, and was based on the ground of fraud and lack of jurisdiction. The charges of fraud were voluntarily withdrawn and the court found that no fraud had been practiced or attempted, but the court made its order vacating the appointment on the ground that "the same was inadvertently made, in that the court had no jurisdiction to do so." As a motion for relief, predicated upon the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, the motion having been made more than six months after the date of the judgment, the court should have refused to entertain it. People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645; Spencer v. Branham, 109 Cal. 337, 41 Pac. 1095; Estate of Eikerenkotter, 126 Cal. 54, 58 Pac. 370. It is not sufficient that notice shall be given within the six months that a motion will be made after the six months. The motion itself must be made and the action of the court requested on it within the six months.

[2, 3] It follows, therefore, that the order of the court vacating the appointment can be upheld only if the decree making the appointment is void on its face. It is contended that it is so void for lack of notice. It has been said that all of the relatives in the city and county of San Francisco appeared and requested the appointment of the appellant in writing, and the order appointing the guardian recites this and the additional fact that they had notice. In Whyler v. Van Tiger, 14 Pac. 846, a guardian, as here, had been appointed without any notice. It was so found, and an attack was made upon the acts of the guardian so appointed as being without authority. This court declared that: "We think that Mrs. Whyler was a guardian when she executed the lease to the defendant." The only jurisdictional notice required is one to be given to the person having the custody of the minor. In re Lunberg, 143 Cal. 402, 77 Pac. 156; Estate of Eikerenkotter, supra; section 1747, Code Civ. Proc.

This disposes of the ground upon which, manifestly, the court acted in setting aside the decree. Respondent, however, further argues that the order of appointment is void on its face as not being in accordance with, and supported by, the allegations of the petition, and also that the court was without jurisdiction to deprive the mother of her maternal rights under the facts pleaded and found. Without regard to the merits of the contentions thus advanced, it must suffice to say that they are not such as to establish a lack of jurisdiction to make the decree complained of, nor yet sufficient to establish that the decree so made is void on its face. For any such relief the respondent must proceed by direct action, and not by motion such as the one here under consideration.

The order appealed from is therefore reversed.

O'DEA v. COOK et al. (S. F. 8194.)

1. Municipal Corporations 🔑187—Police Pensions—Nature of—"Gratuity."

In view of Const. art. 4, § 31, prohibiting gratuities to individuals, etc., pensions for the families of policemen provided by San Francisco Charter, c. 10, § 8, cannot be deemed gratuities, but must be deemed a part of the contemplated compensation for the services rendered by policemen, the pension statute being in force when the services were rendered; for a pension is a gratuity only where it is granted for services previously rendered, which at the time they were rendered gave rise to no legal obligation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Gratuity.]

2. Municipal Corporations 🔑176(3)—Police Pensions—Statutes—Repeal.

Where pensions are predicated merely upon death occurring during the period of service, and death only fixes the right to a pension, a repeal of the pension statute before death destroys the pension right.

3. Pensions 🔑1—Construction of Statutes—Liberal Construction.

Pension statutes serving a beneficial purpose are to be liberally construed.

4. Statutes 🔑263—Construction—Prospective Effect.

Statutes shall be given a prospective effect and not a retrospective effect, unless the latter effect is made compulsory by the language of the act.

5. Municipal Corporations 🔑187—Police Pensions—Statutes—Construction.

San Francisco Charter, c. 10, art. 8, declared at the time a policeman received injuries which finally caused his death that commissioners, out of the police and pension fund, should provide for the family of any officer who was an employé of the department who may have been killed while in the performance of his duty. Thereafter, but before the death of the policeman, the provision was amended so as to declare that commissioners shall, out of the police relief and pension fund, provide for the family of any officer, member, or employé of the department who may be killed or injured in the performance of his duty, and who shall have died within one year from the date of such injury. Held, that as statutes should, if possible, be given a prospective effect, and as pension acts are to be liberally construed, the widow of a policeman is entitled to a pension under the old act, her rights, which came into being on the occurrence of the injury, not being affected by the change in the statute.

HENSHAW, J. Edward O'Dea was a member of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco when, in December, 1912, in the performance of his duties, he received injuries which directly and approximately caused his death on March 8, 1915, two years and three months thereafter. The foregoing statement, so far as this appeal is concerned, stands as an admitted fact. After his death his widow made application to the trustees of the police relief and pension fund of the city and county of San Francisco, seeking the pension which she asserted was due her under the law. Upon the trustees' refusal to recognize the validity of her demand she brought her action in mandate in the superior court, setting forth the foregoing facts. The board of trustees filed a general demurrer to her complaint, which was overruled. They declined to answer further, and judgment in mandate was given in favor of the widow. From this judgment the board of trustees has appealed.

[1] At the time O'Dea sustained the injuries which resulted in his death the law (found in the charter of San Francisco, art. 8, c. 10) declared that the commissioners, out of the police relief and pension fund, shall provide for the family of any officer, member, or employé of the department who may be killed while in the performance of his duty, as follows:

> "First. Should the decedent be married, his widow shall, so long as she may remain unmarried, be paid a monthly pension equal to one-half of the salary attached to the rank held by the decedent at the time of his death. * * *"

Subsequent to the time when O'Dea sustained his injuries and while he was suffering therefrom, this provision of the charter was amended to read as follows:

> "Sec. 4. The commissioners shall, out of the police relief and pension fund, provide as follows for the family of any officer, member or employé of the department who may be killed or injured, while in the performance of his duty, and who shall have died within one year from the date of such injury. * * *"

The refusal of the board to recognize the widow's claim was based upon its view that at the time of O'Dea's death, when the widow for the first time became entitled to a pension on account of death, the controlling law under which it could be granted was that found in the amendment of 1913, and as O'Dea admittedly had not died within one year from the date of his injury the widow's claim was not allowable. Upon this appeal this is the proposition argued, and in the argument it is pointed out that the amendment was made to relieve from the uncertainty as to the length of time which must elapse between injury and death, which uncertainty was noted in Edwards v. Sweigert, 15 Cal. App. 503, 115 Pac. 256. Further, appellant insists that the respondent had acquired no vested rights to a pension which the amendment could not take away, and that whatever rights she did possess were, in fact, taken away by the amendment and by virtue of the fact that her husband did not die within one year after sustaining his injuries.

A pension such as this law contemplates is not a gratuity or a gift. If it were, all of the provisions pertaining to it would be void, under the Constitution of the state. Art. 4, § 31; Taylor v. Mott, 123 Cal. 497, 56 Pac. 256. A pension is a gratuity only where it is granted for services previously rendered, and which at the time they were rendered gave rise to no legal obligation. United States v. Teller, 107 U. S. 64, 2 Sup. Ct. 39, 27 L. Ed. 352; Mahon v. Board of Education, 171 N. Y. 263, 63 N. E. 1107, 89 Am. St. Rep. 810; State, etc., v. Love, 89 Neb. 149, 131 N. W. 196, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 607, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 542. But where, as here, services are rendered under such a pension statute, the pension provisions become a part of the contemplated compensation for those services, and so in a sense a part of the contract of employment itself. Hammitt v. Gaynor (Sup.) 144 N. Y. Supp. 123; State, etc., v. Love, supra; People, etc., v. Abbott, 274 Ill. 380, 113 N. E. 696.

[3] It is a firmly established principle of judicial construction that pension statutes serving a beneficial purpose are to be liberally construed. Walton v. Cotton, 9 How. (60 U. S.) 355, 15 L. Ed. 658; Hanscom v. Malden, etc., Gas Light Co., 220 Mass. 1, 107 N. E. 426, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 145.

[5] Nothing in this act forces the conclusion that it was designed to apply to past injuries which thereafter might result in death. Its reasonable construction, under the rules of interpretation above given, is that it was designed to apply to cases arising in the future, and to set a time limit as to them alone. It therefore does not dispose of the matter to say merely that the respondent had no vested right in the pension until the death. True, she had no such vested right. True, she could secure no widow's pension at all, unless the death occurred under the circumstances contemplated by the statute, but from the very moment that her husband sustained his fatal injuries in the performance of his duty she had a right, springing from the fact of the infliction of the fatal injury, to the pension if and when death ensued, and that right, since we are not compelled to give the amendment a retrospective effect, was a right existing and continuing to exist under the unamended law. In its essence the principle is the same as that which governs the legal right of action for death. It is the injury which creates the right, though the right of action itself does not arise until death follows the injury.

> "While the action lies to recover damages for death, death does not constitute the tort. The fact of death is not the tort, but its consequence. Negligence, unlawful violence of a wrongful act is the tort, although death must result from injury caused by such negligence, violence, or act before the statutory cause of action accrues." Van Doren v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 93 Fed. 260, 35 C. C. A. 282.

Analogous in principle is the case of Baur v. Court of Common Pleas, 88 N. J. Law, 128, 95 Atl. 627. An employé had sustained injuries. He filed his petition for compensation more than two years after the occurrence of the accident. At the time of the accident there was no limitation prescribed by law concerning the time when application for compensation should be made, but before he filed his application, by amendment, the statute fixed a time limit of one year after the occurrence. It was argued that his application was filed too late and was barred by the very terms of the statute. There the court refused to give the act a retrospective effect and, holding to the "well recognized and established rule that a statute shall have a prospective effect only," decreed that the amended statute of limitation applied only to cases arising thereafter.

For these reasons the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

ZIRBES et al. v. MOUNSEY et ux.

1. Bills and Notes ⟹505—Evidence—Admissibility.

In action on note for broker's commission wherein defendants set up fraud in that plaintiffs, in arranging exchange of lands, agreed to take one-half of commission from each party, and accepted $1,000 from others, but represented that such others paid $2,500 and so secured the note in suit, it was error to exclude the agreement by which plaintiffs accepted $1,000 from one side.

2. Bills and Notes ⟹520—Fraud—Evidence—Sufficiency.

Where parties stipulated that an absent witness would testify to fraud inducing the note in suit, without objection to its competency, and no other evidence as to fraud was admitted, finding that there was no fraud was without support.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Joseph Zirbes and H. W. Hedgcock, copartners doing business as Zirbes & Hedgcock, against G. A. Mounsey and wife. Judgment for plaintiffs, and order denying new trial, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Lynn Helm, E. S. Williams, and W. T. McNeely, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Clyde E. Cate, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. Action to recover upon a promissory note executed by defendants. Judgment went for plaintiffs from which, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

Plaintiffs as real estate brokers and acting as the agents of both parties, negotiated an exchange of property valued at $100,000 owned by defendants for property of like value owned by J. C. Wilson. The note involved, for the sum of $2,500, was given by defendants for commissions claimed to be due from defendants to plaintiffs for the services so rendered.

In their answer the defendants admitted the making of the note, but alleged its execution was procured by fraud and deceit of plaintiffs, in that before and at the time of the making of the exchange it was agreed that defendants should pay as commission a sum equal to that paid by said Wilson as his share thereof, which amount was by plaintiffs represented to defendants as being $2,500, whereas, in truth and in fact, the amount of the commission exacted from Wilson, and which he agreed to pay plaintiffs, was the sum of $1,000; that defendants believing said representations to be true, and in reliance thereon, were thus deceived and thereby induced to execute the note in the sum of $2,500.

The alleged errors complained of are due to rulings of the court in excluding evidence offered in support of the allegations of fraud. At the trial the parties stipulated that Mary Lucena Mounsey, then absent, should be deemed as testifying to the truth of the allegations of fraud contained in the answer. Her codefendant was called as a witness for defendants and in substance testified that in view of the fact that the properties of the parties to the exchange were of like value, namely, $100,000, it was agreed that they should pay exactly the same commission, and that one of the plaintiffs, Mr. Zirbes, represented to the defendants that Mr. Wilson was to pay 2½ per cent. of said valuation of his property. Thereupon the witness was asked whether or not he relied upon such statements, to which the court sustained plaintiffs' objection that it was irrelevant and immaterial. A proposal for the exchange executed two days before the making of the note, and containing a provision that defendants should pay a commission of $2,500, on which was indorsed an acceptance thereof purporting to be signed by Wilson and wife whereby they agreed to pay a commission of $3,500, was on the cross-examination of the witness received in evidence.

[1] Thereupon Wilson was called as a witness, and produced an agreement made with plaintiffs fixing the commission which he was required to pay plaintiffs at $1,000, which document the court refused to admit in evidence, or permit the witness to state the amount of the commission exacted by plaintiffs from him in negotiating said exchange of properties, and likewise refused to permit testimony offered to the effect that defendants' assent to the amount of $2,500 commission specified in the agreement was procured by like false representations as those which induced them to execute the note. That such action constituted prejudicial error, to our minds, admits of no doubt. It is apparent from the record that the learned trial judge in making the rulings complained of accepted the view of counsel for respondents here urged, that such evidence was inadmissible for the reason that it was sought thereby to vary the terms of a written instrument by parol testimony, whereas, in fact, its purpose was to establish that such instrument was procured by fraud as alleged in the answer.

[2] Moreover, it having been, without objection to its competency, stipulated that Mrs. Mounsey might be deemed as testifying to the truth of the allegations of fraud as to which there was no contradictory evidence offered by plaintiffs, the adverse finding thereon made by the court is without support.

The judgment and order are reversed.

FULLER v. FULLER. (L. A. 4093.)

1. EJECTMENT 🔑65 — PLEADING — SUFFICIENCY.

Complaint alleging that plaintiff was lawfully in possession of, and had title to, as a homestead entryman under the laws of the United States, the property in controversy, that plaintiff has been and now is entitled to the possession of said land, and has held and now holds title thereto as such homestead entryman, and that, while plaintiff was in possession of and entitled to the possession of and had title to said land, as such homestead entryman, the defendant wrongfully entered into possession of a portion of the land and ousted plaintiff therefrom, and now wrongfully withholds possession thereof, is sufficient.

2. PLEADING 🔑8(11) — FACTS OR CONCLUSIONS.

Such allegations are of ultimate facts, and not of conclusions of law.

3. COURTS 🔑489(5) — JURISDICTION — STATE COURTS—HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

State courts have jurisdiction to determine conflicting claims to the possession of land after a homestead entry has been made.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Fuller against Preston B. Fuller. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals on the judgment roll. Affirmed.

H. N. Dyke, of Imperial, for appellant. E. L. Hotchkiss, of San Diego, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Judgment went for plaintiff in this action to recover possession of a tract of land in San Diego county. The defendant appeals on the judgment roll.

The complaint alleged that on February 13, 1912, plaintiff was lawfully in possession of, and had title to, as a homestead entryman under the laws of the United States, the property in controversy; that ever since said date plaintiff has been, and now is entitled to the possession of said land, and has held, and now holds, title thereto as such homestead entryman; that on or about December 4, 1913, while plaintiff was in possession of and entitled to the possession of, and had title to, said land, as such homestead entryman, the defendant wrongfully entered into possession of a portion of the land and ousted plaintiff therefrom, and now wrongfully withholds possession thereof.

The defendant demurred on the grounds that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter. It is urged that error was committed in overruling the demurrer.

[1, 2] In support of the first, or general, ground, it is argued that there is no proper averment of facts showing the nature and extent of the title claimed by plaintiff. We see no force in the objection. It has been held in this state that it is sufficient, in an action of this character, to allege that plaintiff was in possession of the land when he was ousted by defendant. Hutchinson v. Perley, 4 Cal. 33, 60 Am. Dec. 578. But if it be necessary that he allege his ownership, he complies with the requirement when he pleads that he has title as entryman under the homestead laws of the United States. The fee being in the United States, the only interest which the plaintiff could have was his possession and the right of purchase vested in him as entryman. Malony v. Adsit, 175 U. S. 281, 20 Sup. Ct. 115, 44 L. Ed. 163. This interest the complaint described in terms which amounted to an allegation of ultimate fact, rather than, as appellant claims, a conclusion of law. See Malony v. Adsit, supra.

[3] The point that the state courts are without jurisdiction to determine conflicting claims to the possession of land after a homestead entry has been made is without merit. Gauthier v. Morrison, 232 U. S. 452, 461, 34 Sup. Ct. 384, 58 L. Ed. 680; Whittaker v. Pendola, 78 Cal. 296, 20 Pac. 680; Thompson v. Basler, 148 Cal. 646, 84 Pac. 161, 113 Am. St. Rep. 321; 32 Cyc. 833.

Appellant makes no other contention that is worthy of notice.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. MARRIAGE 🔑65—ANNULMENT—DEFAULT—AFFIDAVIT TO VACATE.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by John Benson against Ruth Benson to annul a marriage. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order vacating and setting aside the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. T. Hogevoll, of San Francisco (Marcel E. Cerf, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Walter J. Thompson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued defendant for an annulment of marriage which he alleged the two entered into in the state of California on the 10th day of February, 1911. He averred that the defendant was at the time of the marriage a mulatto and by reason of that fact incompetent to enter into the marriage relation with the plaintiff, who is a white person. Substituted service of summons upon defendant was made by publication. On the last day fixed by law for defendant's appearance certain attorneys appeared and secured on her behalf a ten days' extension of time in which to plead. No other or further appearance was made. Defendant's default was entered, evidence was taken, and a judgment and decree annulling the marriage entered. Within one year thereafter the defendant moved to vacate and set aside the judgment upon the ground, amongst others, of her mistake, surprise, and excusable neglect. Defendant filed an affidavit in support of her motion in which she set forth that she married plaintiff in February, 1911; that some time thereafter plaintiff took her to Washington, D. C., where her relatives resided; that about the middle of April, 1912, plaintiff told her that he was obliged to return to California but would send for her within two months; that he abandoned and did not thereafter communicate with her; and she alleges that his purpose in taking her to Washington, D. C., was to abandon her and to leave her in destitution as he did, so that she would not be able to return to California and contest the action for annulment of their marriage. She declares that "the facts stated and contained therein (in his complaint) are absolutely false and untrue and were known by plaintiff, at the time said complaint was sworn to, to be false and untrue"; that she was never served with summons or complaint but that she received in Washington what purported to be a summons and complaint and "took the same to a man who represented himself to be a lawyer, in Washington, D. C., paying him a retaining fee in said action, and instructing him to prepare and file for her a contest to the same, * * * and he thereupon promised that he would do so; that defendant is ignorant of law and proceedings in court, and has never been in court in her life or had any kind of litigation whatsoever, and she fully relied upon her said attorney in Washington, D. C."; that on or about the 1st of March, 1915, she communicated with Walter J. Thompson of San Francisco, an attorney at law, requesting him to investigate the condition of said action, and then for the first time was advised that the judgment of annulment had been entered.

A counter affidavit was filed by plaintiff. In this, as in his complaint, he set forth the marriage as having taken place on the 10th day of February, 1911, and that it was only in the month of April, 1912, that he discovered that his wife was a mulatto; that for the purpose of deceiving him she had represented herself to be of white blood and "had painted herself in such a manner that the said plaintiff, who had known her a short time, could not tell that she was a mulatto."

Upon the application of the defendant thus made within the year, the court set aside the judgment and opened the default, and from its order so doing plaintiff has appealed. Upon appeal it is urged that the court abused its discretion, in that it was made to appear that the defendant had actual notice of the pendency of the action; that the failure of the attorney whom she asserts she employed in Washington, D. C., so to defend her, is not explained; that respondent failed to state any facts in her affidavit of merits showing a defense to the action; that the appearance of the attorneys asking for an extension of time was the equivalent of a submission to the jurisdiction of the court; and, finally, that while liberality is by this court countenanced in divorce actions, this is not an action for divorce but an action for annulment.

[1-3] To all of these contentions answer may briefly be made. The underlying principle dictating liberality in setting aside defaults in actions for divorce is present in the same, if not with more force, when the action is one for annulment. It is not necessary to do more than refer, amongst the many, the cases of Wadsworth v. Wadsworth, 81 Cal. 182, 22 Pac. 648, 15 Am. St. Rep. 38, and Rehfuss v. Rehfuss, 169 Cal. 86, 145 Pac. 1020. It is not even required that such an application, if made within the year, should be supported by an affidavit of merits. McBlain v. McBlain, 77 Cal. 507, 20 Pac. 61; Mulkey v. Mulkey, 100 Cal. 91, 34 Pac. 621. This being so, the inartificiality of defendant's affidavit of merits is immaterial to the consideration; the objections here made being to the language of that affidavit above quoted. The request of the attorneys to the court in San Francisco to allow defendant an extension of time in which to plead, which for all that appears was not authorized, was not the equivalent of an "appearance." Code Civ. Proc. § 1014; Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 302, 45 Pac. 470.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

JUDGMENT ⚷744 — RES JUDICATA — RIGHTS UNDER LEASE.

In a lessee's action for damage for breach of the lease by refusing to give him possession of the property and leasing it to another, judgment, in a former suit between the same parties, where it was adjudged that defendant landlord was entitled to possession of the premises under the lease involved, was conclusive, and a final determination of the lessee's rights under the lease, not having been set aside and not having been appealed from, so that the judgment roll was admissible in evidence.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by Ab. Horowitz against J. H. Speese. There was judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

M. O. Graves, of Los Angeles, for appellant. G. F. McCulloch, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge Pro Tem. By the terms of a lease in the usual form defendant demised and let to plaintiff a certain building for the term of five years from September 1, 1912, at a monthly rental of $250, payable in advance, and containing a clause to the effect that in case of default in the making of such payments, or in complying with any of the covenants therein contained, the lessor might re-enter and remove all persons therefrom. The action is by the lessee to recover damage for the breach of the lease, plaintiff claiming that defendant refused to give him possession of the property and leased it to another. A jury trial was had resulting in a verdict of one dollar in favor of plaintiff for which judgment was entered. The appeal is from an order of the court denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Appellant's chief claim for a reversal, and conceded to be the only error necessary to consider if said contention be not sustained, is that the court erred in admitting in evidence the judgment roll in a former suit between the same parties wherein it was by the superior court on January 14, 1913, adjudged that defendant was entitled to possession of said leased premises, and, in connection therewith, instructed the jury that plaintiff's right to the possession of the premises terminated on October 23, 1912, and that plaintiff's damage must be deemed limited to such as he sustained between said date and September 1st preceding. Reference to the judgment roll so received in evidence discloses that the subject of said action was plaintiff's asserted right to possession of the premises in question under and by virtue of the lease here involved from which he alleged he had been ousted October 23, 1912. It was adjudged therein that defendant, and not plaintiff, was entitled to possession. This judgment, not set aside and from which no appeal was taken, upon well-settled principles of law, must be deemed a final determination of plaintiff's rights under the lease.

The theory upon which the court submitted to the jury the question of damages sustained by plaintiff for the period extending from September 1st, the date when under the terms of the lease he was to have possession, and October 23d, is that he did not have possession during all of said period, and if, notwithstanding evidence tending to show that he had refused to comply with the covenant as to payment of rent, the jury found that he was entitled to possession, it might fix the damage sustained by reason of such fact. In other words, the right of plaintiff during such time was not involved in the former litigation.

HILL et al. v. RANSDELL. (L. A. 8274.)

WILLS ⚷665—CONSTRUCTION—"CONTEST"—"ATTEMPT TO CONTEST."

One who applied in Michigan for letters of administration on the ground that deceased died intestate, but stated that there were instruments on file in the probate court of Oakland county, Cal., alleged to be a will, and later objected to jurisdiction of the California court, but alleged such opposition was not a contest or an attempt to contest, but that the will should be probated in Michigan, did not forfeit her rights under the will, which provided that the rights of any one contesting or attempting to contest should be forfeited, because such actions did not show any "contest" or attempt to contest.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Contest.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Joshua Hill, deceased. Petition by Ellen P. Hill, J. Price Hill, and Hunt C. Hill, and Hunt C. Hill, trustee, for the forfeiture of the interests of Abbie R. Ransdell under the will of deceased and for partial distribution. From a decree denying the forfeiture, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Ira S. Lillick and Hill & Sealby, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Lloyd S. Ackerman, of San Francisco, and Samuel J. Patterson, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. In his will the deceased, Joshua Hill, declared as follows:

> "In the event that my said wife or any of my said children, shall contest or attempt to contest the allowance of this instrument as and for my last will and testament, for any reason or upon any grounds whatever, then such portions of my estate, or other benefits as have heretofore been directed to be paid to the person so contesting shall be by such person or persons forfeited, etc."

The testator died in the city and county of San Francisco leaving surviving him a widow and five children. The eldest of these children, Abbie H. Ransdell, respondent herein, filed a petition for letters of administration upon the estate of her father in the probate court of Oakland county, state of Michigan, in which she alleged that "said deceased died on the 29th day of September, 1915, leaving no last will and testament as I am informed and believe," and she also declared:

> "It is alleged that there are instruments on file in the probate court of Oakland county and in the state of California, purporting to be the last wills and testaments of said deceased."

Thereafter the will of the deceased was offered for probate in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. At that time there was pending in the probate court of Oakland county, Mich., a petition for the probate of decedent's will filed by Frank L. Perry, one of the trustees named therein. Respondent, having been advised by her attorneys that there could not be two forums in separate states each possessing original jurisdiction over the will of deceased, filed her opposition to the probate of the will in San Francisco. In this the respondent declared:

> "This opposition is not a contest nor an attempt to contest the allowance or admission to probate of the will of Joshua Hill as the last will and testament of said decedent, and that this showing is made solely for the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court to grant the probate of the will of said decedent as filed."

The ground of opposition was that above indicated, that original jurisdiction to admit the will to probate was in the courts of the state of Michigan. Upon petition for partial distribution, it was urged that respondent by her action and conduct as above set forth had forfeited all her rights under the will. The court held to the contrary and this appeal followed.

We need not here be at pains to elaborate upon the meaning which shall be given to the language employed by the testator, "contest or attempt to contest." This has been done sufficiently in the cases of In re Garcelon's Estate, 104 Cal. 570, 38 Pac. 414, 32 L. R. A. 595, 43 Am. St. Ry. 134, and Estate of Hite, 155 Cal. 436, 101 Pac. 443, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 953, 17 Ann. Cas. 993. Neither separately nor cumulatively can it be said that the acts of this respondent measure up either to a contest or to an attempt to contest the allowance of the will. True, in her petition before the Michigan courts she expressed her belief that her father had died intestate, but at the same time she advised the court that instruments were in existence which were asserted to be wills of deceased. It cannot be said that here was even an attempt to contest the validity of any of these purported wills which at that time had not been offered for probate, and the fairness of the respondent is evidenced by the information which she conveys to the court of the existence of these written instruments. Even less weight attaches to her action in filing an opposition in the courts of California. In no sense does it amount to an attempt to contest the allowance of an instrument for an interested party to say that the court of original jurisdiction for the reception in probate of this will is a court other than the one to which it had been presented.

The order and decree appealed from are therefore affirmed.

1. TAXATION 🔑87, 355 — REDUCTION OF DEBTS—PROPERTY IN LITIGATION—"SOLVENT CREDIT."

Where sum awarded plaintiff in condemnation proceedings was in the hands of the county treasurer on the first Monday of March, it was assessable against the treasurer in view of Pol. Code, § 3647, providing that money and property in litigation in possession of a county treasurer must be assessed to such treasurer, etc., and plaintiff was not entitled to reduction from such sum of unsecured debts owing by him and assessed to bona fide residents of the state as provided by sections 3628, 3629, subd. 6, 3650, subd. 15; such sum not being a "solvent credit" within the last-mentioned sections.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Solvent Credits.]

2. TAXATION 🔑597—ASSESSMENTS—APPEAL —PRESUMPTION.

On appeal from order sustaining city's demurrer to plaintiff's complaint for recovery of taxes paid by county treasurer on money awarded plaintiff in condemnation proceedings, and paid by city to county treasurer, it will be presumed, in the absence of allegation to the contrary, that the assessment was made to the county treasurer, as required by Pol. Code, § 3647.

3. TAXATION 🔑333 — REDUCTION OF DEBTS FROM CREDITS—CONDITION PRECEDENT.

Conceding that the money awarded plaintiff in condemnation proceedings by defendant city, on deposit with the county treasurer, constituted a "solvent credit," from which debts owed by plaintiff could be deducted by the assessor, plaintiff was not entitled to a deduction unless the amount of such debts were shown by a sworn statement, as required by Pol. Code, § 3629, subd. 6.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Angelo Bessolo against the City of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Courtney Lacey, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., and Charles S. Burnell, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. A demurrer to plaintiff's complaint was sustained, with leave to amend. No amendment having been made within the time allowed, judgment was given in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges that in October, 1911, the defendant, the city of Los Angeles, commenced an action against the plaintiff and others to condemn certain lands for public uses. In that action a parcel of land belonging to the plaintiff, Bessolo, was condemned upon payment of $11,310. The sum so awarded to plaintiff was paid by the city to the county treasurer, and it was in the treasurer's hands on the first Monday of March, 1913. After receiving from the county treasurer a statement of moneys in his hands, belonging to individuals, the city assessor of the defendant city assessed said sum belonging to plaintiff for Los Angeles city taxes for the year 1913–14, and collected a tax of $174.26 thereon. This tax was paid by the county treasurer out of plaintiff's moneys, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent. On the first Monday in March, 1913, the solvent credits owned by plaintiff, including the $11,310 so awarded to him, aggregated $11,863 and no more. The unsecured debts then owing by him, and assessed to bona fide residents of the state, aggregated $15,050, a sum exceeding the solvent credits owned by him. On the first Monday in March, 1913, plaintiff did not own any solvent credits subject to assessment, and said sum of $11,310 was exempt from taxation and was erroneously assessed. On April 16, 1913, plaintiff presented to the city a claim which set forth the foregoing facts regarding the assessment and collection of taxes, and asked a return of $174.26. Such return was refused, and the complaint, accordingly, prays judgment for the amount of the tax thus collected.

[1] The demurrer was based on want of facts, lack of jurisdiction of the subject, and various provisions of the statutes of limitations. Regardless of other points made, we think the demurrer was properly sustained on the first of these grounds. The fund in the hands of the treasurer was not such a "solvent credit" as, in the purview of our tax laws, is subject to the deduction of debts owed by the plaintiff. It was covered by the terms of section 3647 of the Political Code, which provides that:

> "Money and property in litigation in possession of a county treasurer, of a court, county clerk, or receiver, must be assessed to such treasurer, clerk, or receiver, and the taxes be paid thereon under the direction of the court."

The right to tax money or other property under this section "does not depend upon the ownership of the money or property, nor the final result of the litigation." Los Angeles v. L. A. City Water Co., 137 Cal. 699, 70 Pac. 770. Such money or property is to be assessed to the officer in whose hands it is, and an assessment to the real or ultimate owner is not authorized. City of San Luis Obispo v. Pettit, 87 Cal. 499, 25 Pac. 694.

[2] There being no allegation to the contrary, we must assume that the assessment in this case was made, as it properly should have been, to the treasurer. Statutory provisions for the deduction of debts from solvent credits (Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3629, subd. 6, 3650, subd. 15) clearly contemplate the deduction of such debts only as are owed by the person to whom the solvent credits are assessed—not a deduction of debts owed by one person from money, property, or credits assessed to another.

[3] But if it be conceded that the moneys on deposit constituted a "solvent credit," from which debts owed by plaintiff could be deducted, he was still not entitled to the deduction unless the amount of such debts were shown by the sworn statement which, on demand of the assessor, the taxpayer was required to make. Pol. Code, § 3629, subd. 6. The complaint does not allege that the assessor failed to exact a statement from plaintiff, or that plaintiff made a statement of any kind, to say nothing of one showing the debts owed by him. See Henne v. County of Los Angeles, 129 Cal. 297, 61 Pac. 1081; Brenner v. Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 72, 75, 116 Pac. 397. The complaint does not therefore exhibit the facts necessary to support plaintiff's claim of a right to have the deduction made.

The judgment is affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by E. Aigeltinger, Incorporated, against G. W. Burke and the Lindgren Company. From a judgment for the Lindgren Company, plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Wal J. Tuska, of San Francisco, for appellant. Francis V. Keesling and C. A. S. Frost, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to foreclose a lien for the value of materials alleged to have been furnished by the plaintiff to G. W. Burke Company, a corporation, subcontractor under a corporation known as Lindgren Company, who was the original contractor for the erection of a building for the Olympic Club in San Francisco. The materials were furnished for use, and were used, in said building, and in the completion of the subcontract of said G. W. Burke Company. Issues were formed, a trial was had, and findings and judgment were given in favor of the defendant Lindgren Company. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The only controversy upon this appeal is upon the question whether or not, by reason of a certain agreement executed by E. Aigeltinger, G. W. Burke Company, and Lindgren Company, on October 13, 1911, and the circumstances under which said agreement was made and carried out, the Aigeltinger Company is estopped from claiming a lien on the property. It is admitted that the notice of lien was duly filed within the time allowed by law, and that the amount claimed therein was justly due from G. W. Burke Company to the Aigeltinger Company for materials furnished by the latter to the former, as subcontractor, for use in said building.

The subcontract of the Burke Company with the Lindgren Company, under which the materials were furnished, was executed on February 14, 1911. Work was performed thereunder and a large part thereof was completed prior to October 13, 1911. At that time the Burke Company and Aigeltinger applied to Lindgren Company for assistance in carrying out the subcontract, and in consequence of said application the contract of October 13, 1911, was executed. The findings of the court relating to the subject of the estoppel and the effect of the last-mentioned contract were somewhat elaborate and need to be stated in detail.

Aigeltinger was at all times the president of the Aigeltinger Company, and exercised entire control of its business and affairs. The company adopted and used the name of E. Aigeltinger as its corporate name. It permitted him to mingle his own funds and the corporate funds, and otherwise to commingle his personal identity and affairs with the corporate business. The Lindgren Company had no knowledge, prior to the filing of the plaintiff's claim of lien herein, that E. Aigeltinger was a corporation, or that there was a corporation by the name of "E. Aigeltinger, Incorporated," but, on the contrary knew one E. Aigeltinger as a person and as a friend of W. G. Burke, president of the Burke Company, and as bondsman of the said company on said subcontract, and as a person financially interested as a partner with said Burke Company in said subcontract, but had no knowledge or information that the materials for which plaintiff's lien is claimed were furnished or sold by E. Aigeltinger, Incorporated, as a corporation, or as distinct from E. Aigeltinger as a person. The plaintiff during all this time made no effort to distinguish its identity in the minds of Lindgren Company's officers and agents from that of E. Aigeltinger personally. With the knowledge and acquiescence of the plaintiff corporation, E. Aigeltinger became financially interested in said subcontract at the time it was made, and with the consent of the plaintiff he mingled the moneys of the corporation with his own in paying for labor performed on said subcontract, all of which money was kept in a bank account in the name of said plaintiff corporation. Having no money with which to pay for the labor and material necessary to complete the performance of the subcontract, Aigeltinger and Burke applied to the Lindgren Company for financial assistance to enable them to complete the same. The Lindgren Company agreed to this proposal, and thereupon the agreement of October 13, 1911, was executed. As its effect is the main question in controversy, it is necessary to set it out in full. It is as follows:

"This memorandum of agreement, made this the 13th day of October, 1911, by and between the G. W. Burke Company, a partnership, and E. Aigeltinger, all of the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., parties of the first part, and Lindgren Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California, the party of the second part, witnesseth: That whereas, the party of the second part is the general contractor for the erection of the Olympic Club Building, now being built on the corner of Post and Mason Streets, in San Francisco, Cal., and the parties of the first part are jointly interested in a contract made by the G. W. Burke Company for the plastering work on said building, that the parties hereto agree each with the other as follows: The party of the second part agrees that it will pay for all the labor and materials necessary for the completion of the said plastering contract from and after this date that may be furnished and provided by the parties of the first part, including the labor furnished during the week ending on Saturday the 14th inst., and that it will reimburse itself for all moneys so paid out for labor and materials out of the money due and to become due to the parties of the first part on said plastering contract, and out of any balance that may remain after all bills as above mentioned have been paid, to pay, first, to G. W. Burke Co., a sum equaling $8 per day for the time actually spent on the plastering work by G. W. Burke, and, second, to pay any balance that may then remain in equal portions to the G. W. Burke Company and E. Aigeltinger.

"The parties of the first part agree that they will complete the plastering contract above referred to, and that upon the completion and acceptance of the work done under such contract they will release the party of the second part and the owner of the building, the Olympic Club, from any and all liens or claims for labor and materials furnished by them, and further agree that they will pay to the party of the second part interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum for all moneys advanced by it to pay for labor and materials for and during the time it shall be advanced before the money so advanced shall have been returned to said party of the second part from the payments due to said parties of the second part on account of said contract.

"In witness whereof the parties hereto have affixed their signatures this the 13th day of October, 1911. G. W. Burke Co., by G. W. Burke, Pres. E. Aigeltinger. Lindgren Company, by A. F. Lindgren, Vice President."

The Burke Company was not a partnership, as recited in said agreement, but was a corporation. The recital in the agreement that the Burke Company and Aigeltinger were jointly interested in the contract of the Burke Company for the plastering work on the Olympic Club building referred to the subcontract involved herein. Aigeltinger failed to inform Lindgren Company of the claim of E. Aigeltinger, Incorporated, against the Burke Company for materials furnished for use in the building, or of the existence of the plaintiff as a corporation distinct and separate from himself. But with intent to mislead Lindgren Company, and while exercising control of the business and affairs of the plaintiff corporation, E. Aigeltinger, represented to Lindgren Company that said account against the Burke Company for said materials was held and owned and that said materials were sold to said Burke Company by E. Aigeltinger personally, and that, if any rights to lien therefor should arise, they would belong to said E. Aigeltinger personally. The Lindgren Company believed said representations to be true, and in reliance thereon entered into the said agreement of October 13, 1911, and thereafter fully performed its part thereof. It would not have entered into the said agreement, or made further payments to the Burke Company under the said plastering contract, if it had known that the plaintiff, as distinct from Aigeltinger personally, was the real owner of the demand against the Burke Company for said materials. The plaintiff was jointly interested in the plastering contract with said Aigeltinger and said Burke Company, and, with full knowledge of all the facts concerning the agreement of October 13, 1911, accepted the full benefit of said agreement and of the performance thereof by Lindgren Company. The court also found that at the time of making said agreement of October 13, 1911, it was understood and agreed by and between the persons who accepted the same on behalf of the respective parties that all liens or claims for labor or material used, and to be used, in the performance of the said subcontract, would be released so far as the Olympic Club and Lindgren Company were concerned. This we take to have been intended as a statement of the true meaning and legal effect of the written agreement, and not as a statement of an oral agreement separate from the writing.

The answer sets up the defense based upon the agreement of October 13, 1911, in two counts. The first count alleged that the plaintiff corporation, by E. Aigeltinger, its agent, executed said agreement as one of the parties of the first part. The second count alleged the facts in accordance with the findings above set forth, with the additional allegation that all the acts and statements of E. Aigeltinger in regard to the matter were performed and made by him "as agent of and for the benefit of plaintiff," and that plaintiff knew of and authorized the same. The court made no explicit finding upon this additional allegation, nor upon the aforesaid allegation of the first count.

[1-3] It would have made the case clearer if the court had found as a fact that in all his proceedings as heretofore related Aigeltinger was acting as agent for the plaintiff and in its behalf, and that he was thereunto duly authorized by the plaintiff. The authority of a corporate agent need not be shown by a resolution or other express declaration of the directors. Like other facts, it may be proven by circumstantial evidence.

> "Where one has the actual charge and management of the general business of a corporation, with the knowledge of the members, or the directors, this is sufficient evidence of authority, and the company will be bound by his contracts, made on their behalf, within the apparent scope of the business intrusted to him. * * * A corporation which suffers appearances to exist, and its officers and agents to so act, as to give one employed by such officers and agents reason to believe that he is employed by the company, becomes liable to such person as his [its] employé to pay for the services rendered." Crowley v. Genesee M. Co., 55 Cal. 276; Goodwin v. Union Screw Co., 34 N. H. 378; Bates v. Coronado Beach Co., 109 Cal. 162, 41 Pac. 855; Phillips v. Sanger L. Co., 130 Cal. 434, 62 Pac. 749; Curtin v. Salmon, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 311, 74 Pac. 851, 99 Am. St. Rep. 75.

[4] There was ample evidence of the character indicated in the above quotation to prove the facts alleged in the answer as above stated. But the same results follow from the allegation and finding that the plaintiff, with full knowledge of all the facts concerning the agreement of October 13, 1911, accepted the full benefits thereof and of the performance thereof by Lindgren Company. In compliance with that agreement, Lindgren Company paid the money due for the labor and materials required to continue the work of the subcontract after October 13, 1911, until the same was fully completed. The plaintiff was interested in said subcontract, and these payments were a benefit to it. One cannot knowingly accept the benefits of a contract made in its behalf, or in which it is interested, and refuse to be bound by its terms and conditions. The plaintiff, therefore, in effect, ratified the agreement of October 13, 1911, and is bound thereby. Bates v. Coronado Beach Co., supra; Phillips v. Sanger L. Co., supra; Curtin v. Salmon, etc., Co., supra.

[5] Plaintiff earnestly insists that the clause of the agreement by Aigeltinger and the Burke Company purporting to release Lindgren Company and the Olympic Club "from any and all liens for labor and material furnished by them," meaning Aigeltinger and the Burke Company, refers to labor and materials thereafter to be furnished by them in completing the subcontract, and does not include any lien for the materials previously furnished to the Burke Company by the Aigeltinger Company. We think it is manifest that it refers to and includes the materials and labor previously furnished for the performance of the subcontract. According to the terms of the agreement, Lindgren Company was to pay for all materials and labor subsequently done and furnished to complete the subcontract. It was to be repaid by Burke out of moneys to become due on the subcontract. This implies, of course, that the Burke Company was to be fully paid for the labor thereon. The materials would be paid for by Lindgren Company, and no other person would have a lien therefor. Neither Aigeltinger nor the Burke Company could have any claim or lien on account thereof. The reference in the agreement must have been to a lien which had a possibility of existence, and the lien for the bill of the Aigeltinger Company for materials previously furnished to the Burke Company was the only one that could answer that description.

[6] It is claimed that the representations of Aigeltinger found to have been made, as above stated, were not proven by any evidence. There was no express statement by him to Lindgren Company that he had personally furnished the materials to Burke Company, or that he, personally, was the owner of the demand and of the right to a lien therefor. But his entire course of conduct and conversation in the affair, from beginning to end, amounted to a representation to that effect, and was such that the Lindgren Company might with good reason have believed that to be the fact. It is also implied by the terms of the agreement itself. The finding is therefore not without substantial support in the evidence.

[7, 8] It is also claimed that the contract for plastering work on the building, referred to in the agreement of October, 1911, as the contract in which Aigeltinger and the Burke Company were jointly interested, is not the subcontract under which the Aigeltinger Company supplied the materials to the Burke Company. There is no merit in this claim. The contract of the Burke Company was the only contract for the plastering of the building. The court found that Aigeltinger was personally interested as a partner therein with the Burke Company. This being the case, it would be true, as the recital states, that the two were jointly interested therein. The fact was that Aigeltinger had made an agreement with Burke Company whereby, in consideration of Aigeltinger's assistance in the performance of the contract, financial and otherwise, he was to have a part of the profits thereof, and it was shown by abundant evidence that in making this agreement and obtaining this interest Aigeltinger was acting in behalf of the plaintiff corporation, and that the interest which he thereby acquired in the subcontract was in equity the property of the plaintiff corporation. The court found that the plaintiff was interested in said subcontract, and this finding is sustained by the evidence. From all these circumstances it is manifest that the reference could have been to no other contract than the subcontract of Burke Company for the lathing and plastering of the building.

We are of the opinion that the estoppel against the plaintiff was established by the facts found, and that the findings are sustained by the evidence. Appellant's counsel presents a number of minor points as to the relevancy and competency of certain evidence. All of these points are either covered by what we have said or they are too trifling to deserve notice.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. TRUSTS ⚷25(1)—CREATION—INSTRUMENTS—SUFFICIENCY—"EXPRESS TRUST."

A writing between plaintiff and defendant, on one hand, and a third person, on the other hand, by which the third person agreed to assist in securing options on property, and plaintiff and defendant agreed to pay him certain amounts therefor, did not constitute an "express trust" within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 852, stating requisites of a trust in real property; no contractual relation being thereby created between plaintiff and defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Express Trust.]

2. TRUSTS ⚷63¾—CREATION—INSTRUMENTS — SUFFICIENCY — "TRANSFER" — "RESULTING TRUST."

Nor did such instrument, coupled with payment of money by plaintiff and taking of title by defendant, create a "resulting trust" within Civ. Code, § 853, providing that when a transfer of real property is made to one person, and the consideration therefor is paid by or for another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person by or for whom such payment is made, since the options so secured and taken in defendant's name were not a "transfer" of property within the definition of Civ. Code, § 1039, but were mere rights of election.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by J. H. Ware against T. L. Quigley and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant.
Butler & Swisler, of Sacramento, for respondents.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of dismissal entered upon the sustaining of demurrers to the amended complaint without leave to amend.

The complaint alleges: That defendants Evans, Gregory, and James were the owners of certain described lands located in what is known as Butte Basin in Sutter county; that on February 2, 1913, there was executed by and between plaintiff and defendant Quigley an agreement as follows, to wit:

"Sacramento, Cal., Feb. 8, 1913.

"This agreement made this 8th day of Feb. 1913 between T. L. Quigley and J. H. Ware of Seattle, Wash., parties of the first part and Morris Brooke of the second part:

"In consideration of the help and assistance which the party of the second part is to give to the party of the first part in tying up or securing prices or options on certain properties in the Sacramento Valley more particularly known as the Butte Basin of said valley, parties of the first part agree to pay the party of the second part a commission on all properties handled in said district of one third of a regular commission based on an understanding that a regular commission is five per cent.

"The party of the second part agrees to help parties of the first part in any way he can and shall be willing and ready to give said parties at any and all times such assistance as he or his office can give.

"He further agrees that he or his office shall not operate in the above described district excepting to give assistance to the parties of the first part.

T. L. Quigley.
"J. H. Ware.
"Morris Brooke."

That "in accordance with said agreement and the whole thereof" plaintiff and Quigley procured from defendants Evans, Gregory, and James a 90-day option taken in their joint names to purchase the land described in the complaint. That before the expiration of the option, "and in full accordance with the terms of the foregoing agreement, said option was renewed for a period of six months * * * by virtue of an agreement and understanding by and between plaintiff and defendant T. L. Quigley" for an additional period of six months "taken in the name of defendant T. L. Quigley but for the benefit of himself and plaintiff in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing agreement," which option as renewed provided that the same should be extended for a period of six months upon the payment of $1,500 to the owners of said land, which sum, pursuant to an agreement between the plaintiff and Quigley, the latter paid, upon an agreement that he should have recourse alone to the profits of any sale of said lands for repayment of the amount so advanced, with legal interest thereon. That prior to the expiration of the extended option so obtained by Quigley, and in consideration of the $1,500 paid therefor, plaintiff, who was not familiar with its terms or the expiration thereof, notified Quigley that the option should be exercised by a purchase of the property unless an extension of the option should be obtained and that he was ready and willing to contribute his part necessary to consummate such purchase or obtain such extension, and also demanded full information as to the terms and conditions thereof, to which Quigley made no response. That about January 3, 1914, Quigley obtained either an extension of the option or a new option expiring in January, 1915, for the purchase of the property with the purpose and intent to appropriate to himself the profits derived therefrom. That plaintiff in carrying out the terms of said contract contributed both time and money in assisting in procuring the original option and permitted the renewal thereof in the name of Quigley upon his promise that he would hold the same as trustee in accordance with the terms of said agreement. That unless restrained from so doing Quigley will exercise the said option and cause transfers of the property to be made by the owners of the land to purchasers obtained by him, at a profit of many thousands of dollars which he will appropriate to his own use in a manner so that plaintiff will be unable to reach or obtain any part thereof. The prayer of the complaint is for a decree that plaintiff is the owner of a one-half interest in and to any contracts or options which Quigley may have for the purchase of said property and that he be enjoined from exercising the same other than in conjunction with plaintiff and that defendants Evans, Gregory, and James be enjoined from making any deeds or transfers of the property under any contract or option with Quigley other than acting in conjunction with plaintiff.

To this complaint the defendants Evans, Gregory, and James interposed a general demurrer, and the defendant Quigley interposed a demurrer upon both general and special grounds both of which, as stated, were sustained without leave to amend.

[1] Appellant insists that the facts pleaded created a trust in Quigley for the benefit of plaintiff. This contention is based upon the theory, first, that the written agreement made by himself and Quigley with Brooke, constituted an express trust created by written instrument within the meaning of section 852 of the Civil Code, and, second, that "a trust is presumed to result in favor" of plaintiff by reason of the fact that he contributed several hundred dollars in labor and money in procuring the option. Neither position is tenable. Reference to the document upon which appellant based his first contention shows it to be a contract, not between plaintiff and Quigley, but by both of them as one of the parties thereto with Morris Brooke, the subject of which was not a trust, nor, indeed, any contractual relation whatsoever between plaintiff and Quigley, but certain services to be rendered by Brooke for which plaintiff and Quigley agreed to pay him a commission. It is not possible to construe this document as creating an "express trust" by an instrument in writing as provided by section 852.

[2] Neither does the complaint contain facts showing the creation of a "resulting trust" as defined in section 853 of the Civil Code. This section provides that when a transfer of real property is made to one person, and the consideration therefor is paid by or for another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person by or for whom such payment is made. The authorities, Faylor v. Faylor, 136 Cal. 92, 68 Pac. 482, and Moultrie v. Wright, 154 Cal. 520, 98 Pac. 257, cited by appellant in support of his contention, all involve facts where the title to the property was conveyed to one person, the consideration for which was paid by another, thus bringing the cases directly within the purview of said section. By section 1039 of the Civil Code a "transfer" is defined as "an act of the parties or of the law by which the title to property is conveyed from one living person to another." An option is not a transfer of property. No title is conveyed thereby. It is a mere right of election acquired by one under a contract to accept or reject a present offer within the time therein fixed. Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 924. Not only was there no transfer of title to the real property made by the owners thereof to Quigley, but, as appears from the allegations of the complaint, plaintiff neither paid, nor agreed to pay, any part of the $1,500 which Quigley paid for the option. Under the agreement he was to look for reimbursement to the profits derived from a sale of the property. Hence it seems clear that no trust was created under the provisions of said section 853 of the Civil Code.

Not only is the complaint for the reasons given obnoxious to the general demurrer interposed, but it is apparent from the views expressed that the allegations of the complaint based upon the instrument are wholly inconsistent with the terms thereof which does not purport to have been made by and between plaintiff and Quigley as to any subject of contract between them. As stated in the special demurrer of Quigley, it is impossible to say what is meant by the allegations that the options were procured and the renewals made in full accordance with the terms of the agreement and the renewal thereof obtained in Quigley's name with the consent of plaintiff "in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing agreement," nor what is meant by the allegation that plaintiff in carrying out the terms of said agreement contributed several hundred dollars in labor and money.

The demurrers were properly sustained, and the judgment is affirmed.

SCOTT v. HOLLYWOOD PARK CO. et al. (L. A. 4166.)

1. Appeal and Error ⟹934(1) — Presumptions—Regularity of Judgment.

All presumptions indulged in are in favor of the regularity of the judgment and proceedings upon which it is based, and it devolves upon an appellant to affirmatively show the existence of the error upon which he asks for a reversal.

2. Appeal and Error ⟹758(3) — Brief — Sufficiency.

Where a party presented typewritten transcript on appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, requiring necessary portions of record to be in the record, but he made no attack on the findings or their sufficiency, and pointed out no error of law, and failed to indicate the relief sought by the action, or the nature of the judgment, there was nothing for review.

3. Appeal and Error ⟹757(1) — Briefs — Statement of Case.

When Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a, 953b, 953c, as to bringing up necessary parts of record, are not complied with on appeal under such sections, no duty devolves on the court on appeal to search for the error through the typewritten transcript.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by J. George Scott, suing for himself and others, against the Hollywood Park Company and others. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robt. L. Hubbard, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Charles S. Burnell and Haas & Dunnigan, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. In support of his appeal herein, appellant, in lieu of a bill of exceptions and printed record, presents a typewritten transcript, in accordance with the provisions of sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. While section 953c declares the transcript of such record need not be printed, it, in express terms, provides that:

> "In filing briefs on said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court."

[1, 2] In his brief counsel for appellant states that:

> "While there were many and grievous errors committed by the court in the trial of this cause, the one and vital error, and the one relied upon, consisted in rendering judgment in favor of the defendants and against plaintiff, and denying plaintiff the relief to which he is entitled."

As appears from appellant's brief, no attack is made upon the findings, the sufficiency of which to support the judgment is likewise unquestioned, and our attention is directed to no error of law occurring at the trial. Neither in his brief nor in any supplement thereto is there anything to indicate what relief was sought by the action, nor is there anything printed in the brief indicating the nature of the judgment which appellant says was erroneously rendered. All presumptions indulged in are in favor of the regularity of the judgment and proceedings upon which it is based; hence it devolves upon an appellant to affirmatively show the existence of the error upon which he asks for a reversal. Upon the showing made, how can this court say the judgment thus attacked is erroneous? Assuming that appellant's real contention is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings, the answer is that the findings so attacked are not printed in the brief, without which, and the evidence upon which they are based, this court cannot say they are unsustained. The brief does not purport to contain all or other than a meager part of the evidence upon which the trial court made its findings.

[3] The direction contained in the statute is clear that, where the record is brought up under the provisions of sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, the appellant shall print enough of such record to show the alleged error of which he complains, and also illustrate the points made in the argument. When not thus exhibited, no duty devolves upon the court to examine a voluminous typewritten transcript of the stenographic report in search of error upon which to base a reversal.

The requirement of the statute in this regard has been repeatedly pointed out. Estate of McPhee, 156 Cal. 335, 104 Pac. 455, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 899; Marcucci v. Vowinckel, 164 Cal. 693, 130 Pac. 430; McKinnell v. Hansen, 167 Pac. 887; Miller v. Oliver et al., 163 Pac. 357.

Contracts ⟹164—Frauds, Statute of ⟹118(1)—Separate Instruments.

Two instruments simultaneously executed, by one of which defendants agreed to pay plaintiff a certain rate for hauling parcel post for a stated period, and by the other plaintiff agreed that after a year, if defendant then used auto trucks for hauling, all contracts between them were canceled, constituted one contract in view of Civ. Code, § 1642, requiring such instruments to be construed together, and section 1647, requiring reference to circumstances and subject-matter, and, so construed, there was no want of mutuality nor contravention of the statute of frauds.

McCoy & Gans, of Red Bluff, for appellant. Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for respondents.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. In this action plaintiff sought recovery of damages for the breach of an alleged written contract. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence the court made an order granting defendants' motion for a nonsuit upon the ground "that no contractual relation had been established between plaintiff and defendants in the action." In accordance with such order judgment was entered, from which plaintiff appeals.

It appears that at the times in question defendants were contractors engaged in the carrying of United States mail and parcel post from Redding to other points in California; that on August 14, 1915, two documents set forth in the complaint, designated therein as Exhibit A and Exhibit B as constituting the alleged contract between the parties, were executed in form and terms as follows:

Exhibit A.

> "We, the undersigned, agree to pay A. G. Frost for the hauling of parcel post from Redding to Weaverville the following rates: $1.40 per hundred pounds from December 1, 1915, to April 15, 1916; from April 15, 1916, to December 1, 1916, $1.00 per hundred pounds—the same each consecutive year as long as our contract with government holds, and the rates to intermediate points the same as per contract price from the government, save and except that portion that we might haul on our daily stage and not to exceed 750 pounds per day in excess of our 600 pounds load required by the government; said hauling to be done as required by the government. Said A. G. Frost is to receive and deliver parcel post in good order as received to the different points mentioned.
> "Leslie T. Alward.
> "C. F. Brouillard."

Exhibit B.

> "Redding, Cal., August 14, 1915.
> "I, the undersigned, A. G. Frost, hereby agrees after one year from Sept. 1, 1915, should Alward & Brouillard put on automobile trucks for the transportation of parcel post to consider all contracts canceled then held by the undersigned. A. G. Frost."

By answer defendants admit that on the date named they made, executed, and delivered to plaintiff the writing designated Exhibit A, and that at the same time plaintiff executed and delivered to them the instrument designated Exhibit B, which without denial is alleged in the complaint to have been executed and delivered to defendants by plaintiff as a part of the agreement made between the parties.

As appears from the evidence, plaintiff entered upon and continued in the performance of the duty of transporting parcel post for defendants until about May 1, 1916, when the latter committed the alleged breach of contract for which the action was instituted.

The sole question presented is whether the instruments hereinbefore set out constitute a contract between plaintiff and defendants. Both by the evidence and admissions in the pleadings they are shown to have been executed at the same time between the same parties and relate to the same subject-matter; hence, as provided in section 1642 of the Civil Code, are to be considered together as constituting one transaction, in effect as though the terms were embodied in one document. Flinn & Treacy v. Mowry, 131 Cal. 481, 63 Pac. 724, 1006; Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 564, 577; Makepeace v. Harvard College, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 298. Assuming the identical language set forth in the two documents to have been incorporated in one instrument signed by all the parties, it would clearly appear therefrom that for the period extending from December 1, 1915, to the termination of Alward and Brouillard's contract with the government, subject to their right to terminate the contract with plaintiff after December 1, 1916, by putting on auto trucks for the transportation of parcel post, they agreed to pay him, the plaintiff, the prices therein specified for hauling parcel post between designated points, and plaintiff agreed to perform the services in the manner required by the government and deliver the parcel post in as good order as it was delivered to him. Reference to the circumstances under which the contract was made and the subject to which it relates as provided by section 1647 of the Civil Code clearly warrants such interpretation. Thus construed, the contract is not in contravention of the statute of frauds, nor is there want of mutuality in its terms.

The judgment is reversed.

CITY SECURITIES CO. v. HARVEY et al.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑469(4)—IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS—FRONTAGE.

In proceeding under St. 1909, p. 167, for work and construction of sidewalks and curbing, section 6 of which provides that the expense shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting thereon on the same side of the street where said sidewalks shall be constructed, each lot or portion of lot being separately assessed in proportion to the frontage at a rate per front foot sufficient to cover the total expense of the work, it was improper to apportion and assess the cost of a sidewalk in proportion to the square feet of sidewalk in front of each lot.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑490 — IMPROVEMENTS—ILLEGAL ASSESSMENT—RELIEF.

In proceeding under St. 1909, p. 167, for work and construction of sidewalks and curbing, where assessment was illegal on its face, the property owner need not, as provided by section 10 of the act, appeal to the city council, but, the assessment being void, was no lien on the property, and the owner could rely on the invalidity in an action to enforce the assessment.

3. Evidence ⚷333(4)—Illegal Assessment—Evidence—Admissibility.

In proceeding under St. 1909, p. 167, for work and construction of sidewalks and curbing, where assessment was illegal on its face, the assessment roll was not admissible in evidence.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by the City Securities Company against Harriet Harvey and others. From decree for plaintiff and order denying motion for new trial, defendant Harvey appeals. Reversed.

Hiatt & Selby, William M. Hiatt, Edward M. Selby, and Howard R. Hinshaw, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. A. J. Sherer and Arthur G. Baker, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. Action to foreclose a lien based upon an assessment against a lot and parcel of land owned by defendant Harvey for the cost of constructing a sidewalk on Eleventh street, upon which said property fronted in the city of Los Angeles. A decree was entered as prayed for in favor of plaintiff, from which, and an order denying her motion for a new trial, defendant Harvey appeals.

The proceedings which created the alleged lien purport to have been had and taken by the city council of Los Angeles under and pursuant to the provisions of an act of the Legislature entitled "An act to provide for work upon and construction of sidewalks and curbing within municipalities" (Stats. 1909, p. 167), and provided for the construction of cement sidewalks varying in width on portions of both sides of Eleventh street, between Main and Figuroa streets.

At the trial the court, over defendants' objection, admitted in evidence the warrant, assessment, and diagram made by the superintendent of streets, together with the certificate of the city engineer as to the completion of the work, which under section 11 of the act, when accompanied by an affidavit of demand and nonpayment, are made prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment and the prior proceedings upon which said assessment, warrant, and diagram are based, and like evidence of plaintiff's right to recover in the action. Thereupon, plaintiff having rested, the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground, among others, that the documents offered and received in evidence were on their face illegal and void, and as made, without authority of law, for the reason that as appeared therefrom, the assessment included the work done on both sides of the street and against each lot, not in proportion to the frontage which it bore to that of all the lots in the same side of the street along which the entire sidewalk was constructed, but in proportion to the number of square feet of sidewalk constructed in front thereof as compared with the number of square feet in the whole area of sidewalk constructed, which motion the court denied.

[1] The chief question involved and the only one necessary to decide is the validity of the assessment made in apportioning the cost of constructing the sidewalk on the northeasterly side of Eleventh street on which defendant's property abutted and in front of whose lot the sidewalk as authorized in the proceeding was of a width of 9½ feet, while the specified width of other portions thereof on the same side of said street and in front of other lots was 7½ feet. Section 6 of the act provides that:

> The "expense incurred for the construction of any sidewalk authorized by this act * * * shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting thereon on the same side of the street where said sidewalks shall be constructed, each lot, or portion of lot being separately assessed in proportion to the frontage at a rate per front foot sufficient to cover the total expense of the work. * * *"

Concededly the assessment was not so made. As shown on the face thereof, the entire cost of the work on both sides of the street, together with the incidental expense thereof, was apportioned to and assessed against the lots fronting on each side thereof in such proportion as the number of square feet of sidewalk in front of each lot bore to the entire area of sidewalk constructed, so that the assessment against lots of the same frontage was greater or less in amount, depending upon the width of the sidewalk upon which they fronted.

[2, 3] It is suggested that, conceding the assessment was not made as provided by law, nevertheless the remedy of defendant, if aggrieved or objecting to the correctness or legality of the assessment, was an appeal to the city council, provision for which is made section 10 of the act, which declares the decision of such body to be final and conclusive as to all matters therein made the subject of appeal. Since unauthorized by any law of this state, the assessment is void on its face, constitutes no lien on defendant's property, and hence she is not an aggrieved party within the meaning of the provision. As stated in Ryan v. Altschul, 103 Cal. 177, 37 Pac. 340:

> "If, however, the assessment is void upon its face, it does not constitute an apparent lien upon the property, and as its invalidity is always apparent, the owner is not 'aggrieved,' and is not required to seek its correction by an appeal, but may defend, upon this inherent invalidity whenever an attempt is made to enforce it, or any right is asserted by virtue of its existence."

Where the assessment itself discloses that it is made in a manner not authorized by statute, it is void on its face. An owner of property thus assessed is not required to appeal to the city council for the correction of the assessment, but may as a defense in an action to enforce the same rely upon its inherent invalidity. Pacific Pav. Co. v. Verso, 12 Cal. App. 362, 107 Pac. 590. The court erred in admitting the assessment roll in evidence, and likewise erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

Our conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider other grounds urged for a reversal.

The judgment and order are reversed.

BLACK v. KNIGHT et ux. (S. F. 7212.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑318(3)—WRONGFUL DISPOSSESSION—DAMAGES—"EVICTION."

The prosecution to judgment of an action of unlawful detainer by a landlord, without malice, does not constitute an eviction which would entitle the tenant, on reversal, to damages, where no writ to dispossess was issued, tenant having moved by reason of the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Eviction.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Henry Black against Robert S. Knight and Henrietta C. Knight, his wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and Henrietta C. Knight appeals. Reversed.

Samuel Knight, of San Francisco, and Carl H. Abbott, of Oakland, for appellant. Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an action for damages for the alleged unlawful eviction of plaintiff by his landlord from premises held and occupied by him as a tenant under a lease. Judgment was given for the sum of $10,449, and the appeal is from such judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. All but $586 of the amount awarded was on account of the value of the unexpired term of the lease (fixed at $11,544), such $586 being for expense and damage incurred in defending the unlawful detainer action.

The only alleged eviction found was the prosecution by the landlord to judgment in the superior court of an unlawful detainer proceeding on account of the alleged violation by the tenant of a covenant of the lease, the judgment entered therein declaring the lease canceled and forfeited, and adjudging that the tenant "restore" and the landlord "have" possession of the demised premises, and that the landlord recover from the tenant $2,250 damages, $200 attorney fees, and $30 costs. The tenant appealed from the judgment, staying by bond the enforcement of the judgment pending appeal in so far as the money recovery was concerned, but not seeking any stay as to the portion of the judgment relative to possession of the demised premises. In the complaint it was alleged that by the judgment the tenant was required to "and did surrender possession of said premises" to the landlord. By the answer, it was denied that "the tenant was obliged to surrender" possession of the premises, "or that, he was deprived of the possession thereof by either of defendants." It was further alleged that without asking for any stay, "and before the issuance of any writ of execution or assistance whatever," the tenant "abandoned the possession of the said premises." The trial court found simply that the tenant, "in compliance with said judgment, was required to and did surrender possession of said demised premises" to the landlord. This finding is assailed as being without sufficient support in the evidence. There was no evidence whatever as to the circumstances attending the change of possession; nothing tending to show that the tenant, without the issuance of any writ and without any demand by the landlord, did not abandon possession to the landlord upon the entry of the judgment. For all the purposes of this appeal it must be assumed that he did actually abandon the premises without being compelled to do so under any process issued and served under the judgment in the unlawful detainer proceeding. On appeal, the judgment in the unlawful detainer action was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. The landlord then tendered possession of the premises to the tenant for the unexpired portion of the term, but the tender was not accepted. The unlawful detainer action was then dismissed by the landlord. In view of the record it must also be assumed for all the purposes of this appeal that the unlawful detainer action was commenced and prosecuted to the end in good faith and without malice. The judgment herein was for the amount found to be the full value of the unexpired term at the time the tenant surrendered possession, plus the amount of the expenses of the tenant in defending his possession, less certain counterclaims aggregating $1,891.

The theory upon which this judgment is sought to be sustained is that the prosecution by the landlord of the unlawful detainer action to a judgment in his favor, which judgment, by its terms, required the tenant to deliver possession to the landlord, entitled the tenant to treat the conduct of the landlord as a breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment and an unlawful eviction, with the result that not only could he regard the lease upon voluntary surrender of possession as at an end and himself exempt from liability for further rent, etc., thereunder, but, also, treating the lease as still in force, recover as damages the value of the unexpired term thereunder, in the event that he succeeded on his appeal from the judgment.

Consideration of the authorities satisfies us that such a theory finds no substantial support therein. It may be assumed purely for the purposes of this decision that if the tenant is actually ousted from possession under process issued upon such a judgment, he may treat such ouster as a breach of the implied covenant for quiet enjoyment, and recover his damages in the event of a reversal of the judgment. Certain states have statutes providing for the recovery of such damages, among which is New York, where the statute provides substantially that if the final order in such a summary proceeding is reversed upon appeal, the person dispossessed may maintain an action to recover the damage sustained by the dispossession. Even under such a statute it has been held that actual dispossession of the tenant by the landlord is essential to a right of recovery, and that, where the tenant removes from the premises without the taking of any steps on the part of the landlord to enforce the judgment, he cannot maintain the action. See Halperin v. Henry, 144 App. Div. 658, 129 N. Y. Supp. 599; Coe v. Haines, 44 N. J. Law, 134. There is no such statute in this state. It seems to us that wherever the tenant's claim is based solely on an alleged deprival of actual possession, and is for the consequent damages, no other rule can logically or reasonably be applied.

It is elementary that the covenant for quiet enjoyment goes only to the possession, and that to constitute a violation thereof, as said in Levitsky v. Canning, 33 Cal. 299, "there must be some act of molestation, affecting, to his prejudice, the possession of the covenantee." It is true that a complete physical ouster of the tenant is not always essential to an eviction, and it has often been declared that any wrongful act of the landlord which directly results in depriving the tenant of the full beneficial enjoyment of the premises is an eviction. In Levitsky v. Canning, supra, where the tenant was never actually ousted from or abandoned the premises, the slandering of the tenant's possession, the giving out and pretending publicly that the tenant had no right to possession, and the bringing of two actions at law to recover possession from the tenant and his subtenants, under the pretense that the lease had expired (one of which actions was dismissed by the landlord, and the other of which resulted in judgment for the tenant), with the result that the subtenants quit the premises by reason of their doubts caused thereby as to the lawfulness of the tenant's possession, leaving them vacant, and he was unable to let to other parties, were held to disturb and interrupt the possession of the tenant to his injury, in violation of the covenant for quiet enjoyment, to the same extent as if he had taken plaintiff's tenants by the shoulders and forcibly ejected them. But that there must be an actual deprivation of the beneficial enjoyment of the premises to constitute an eviction was emphatically stated, and the case is not authority for the proposition that the mere institution and prosecution, by the landlord, even to judgment, of an unlawful detainer action, in good faith and without malice, can be held to constitute an invasion of the beneficial enjoyment of the premises guaranteed the tenant by his covenant for quiet enjoyment. This was clearly and distinctly shown in the later case of Agar v. Winslow, 123 Cal. 587, 56 Pac. 422, 69 Am. St. Rep. 84, in which there was involved the question whether the previous institution of an action in ejectment by the landlord constituted an eviction of the tenant. As substantially stated in that case, the essential thing in Levitsky v. Canning, supra, was "that the acts complained of as amounting to an eviction had the effect to make the tenants of the lessee quit the premises, leaving them vacant." In the case at bar, if the tenant had been actually ousted from possession by the landlord, under process issued upon the unlawful detainer judgment, it might well be argued that Levitsky v. Canning, supra, required a conclusion, contrary to very respectable authority, that there had been a wrongful deprival of possession by the landlord, constituting a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. But, as we have seen, that element must be held to be lacking here.

So long, certainly, as there is no disturbance of the tenant's beneficial enjoyment of the premises caused thereby, the right of a landlord, acting in perfect good faith and without malice, to prosecute an action in the courts for the purpose of obtaining a determination of the question whether the tenant has not forfeited his term because of violation of some covenant of the lease, without making himself amenable to the tenant in damage, cannot well be disputed. Indeed, there is much authority which goes further in favor of the landlord's rights in this respect. It is substantially said in 2 Tiffany, Landlord and Tenant, § 289, that the general rule is that in order to make one liable for the institution of a civil suit it must have been with malice and without probable cause, and that, under this rule, a landlord would not be liable to his tenant for damage to the latter arising from his wrongful institution of a summary proceeding to recover possession, unless it was instituted maliciously and without probable cause. See, also, Porter v. Johnson, 96 Ga. 145, 23 S. E. 123; Hegan-Mantel Co. v. Cook's Adm'r et al., 57 S. W. [Ky.] 929. It has been declared that an entry by the landlord by virtue of summary process under the landlord and tenant act for nonpayment of rent is not an eviction (24 Cyc. 1132, note); and also, substantially, that the right to damage in such cases exists only where the dispossession proceedings have been instituted maliciously and without probable cause; or where the process has been used excessively or for a purpose which it was not intended by law to effect as in cases of abuse of process; or when expressly provided by statute. See 24 Cyc. 1462. But certainly there can be no eviction or liability in damage on the part of the landlord, in such a case, so long as there is no disturbance of the tenant's beneficial enjoyment of the premises. The mere pendency of the suit constitutes no such disturbance. The claim of learned counsel for plaintiff is based principally upon the fact that here a judgment was obtained in the superior court which, by its terms, required restoration of the premises to the landlord. It seems to us that this fact does not assist, and that the utmost that may reasonably be claimed by the tenant under these circumstances is that the landlord may not enforce his judgment by actually ousting the tenant from possession under the judgment, without making himself liable for the damage resulting from this deprival of possession, in the event of a reversal of the judgment. Until the landlord does so enforce the judgment, he does not actually disturb the possession and beneficial enjoyment, and the case in this respect is just as it was before entry of judgment. The landlord is not compelled to carry the judgment into execution simply because it has been given and entered. He may well decide to withhold execution until the final determination of his action—until it has been finally determined that the tenant has forfeited his term, and that he may treat the term as forfeited and safely enforce his judgment. The tenant has no right to assume from the mere entry of judgment that the landlord intends to do otherwise. Authorities are, of course, ample to the effect that the tenant may accept not only the prosecution to judgment of such an action, but also the mere institution thereof, as such an election on the part of the landlord to terminate the lease that he will be justified in treating the lease as ended, and may yield possession of the premises and be free from further liability under the terms of the lease. Such is the meaning of the declaration in section 675 of Underhill on Landlord and Tenant, relied on by plaintiff, where Jennings v. Bond, 14 Ind. App. 282, 42 N. E. 957, is cited, the same being an action for rent after a suit in ejectment maintained by him and after a subsequent offered surrender of the premises by the tenant. This, however, is an entirely different proposition from the one involved in this case. Here the tenant so yielding possession without being required to do so is insisting that the act of the landlord in prosecuting his action to judgment shall be treated as an eviction, and the landlord held liable to him for any loss suffered from his failure to enjoy the remainder of the term. To our minds neither reason nor authority warrants the holding that such position is correct, where the tenant actually abandons the possession without being compelled to do so under any process issued and served under the judgment in the unlawful detainer proceeding, and the proceeding was brought and maintained in good faith and without malice. As we read 1 Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, § 311, and 2 Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, §§ 184, 185, we find nothing contrary to this view.

Decisions to the effect that the establishment of a title paramount to that of the landlord by decree of a court of competent jurisdiction warrants the tenant in yielding possession to the true owner, without waiting to be dispossessed under a writ of possession, and in treating the judgment as an eviction by title paramount are, of course, not in point. In Mack v. Patchin, 29 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 20, Id., 42 N. Y. 167, 1 Am. Rep. 506, a case strongly relied on by plaintiff, the tenant was compelled to yield possession by virtue of a writ of assistance issued in foreclosure of mortgage proceedings, the mortgage being prior in right to his interest as lessee. The writ had been issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff, who "by virtue of it demanded the possession of" the tenant. It appeared further that the landlord had expedited, if he did not instigate, the foreclosure of the mortgage, and was a joint purchaser on the mortgage sale, and a joint petitioner, with the other purchaser, for the writ of assistance. In short, he had apparently actually connived, for his own benefit, in having the tenant dispossessed by paramount title.

We are not interested here in determining just what acts of a landlord interfering with the beneficial enjoyment by the tenant of the premises, short of actual physical ouster, will warrant the latter in abandoning possession and treating the conduct of the landlord as an unlawful eviction, with the right to the damage consequent upon being deprived of the remainder of his term. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case to hold, as we do, that the mere prosecution to judgment by the landlord of an unlawful detainer action, in good faith and without malice, for the purpose of obtaining a judicial determination of the question whether he is entitled to possession by reason of some default on the part of the tenant, and possession in the event that the determination is in his favor, is not such an act.

From what we have said it necessarily follows that, upon the record before us, the recovery against appellant cannot be sustained in whole or in part. It appears unnecessary to consider other points made by her for a reversal.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⟹294(3) — STREET OPENING—NOTICE—REQUISITES.

In proceeding for street opening under St. 1903, p. 376, section 3 of which, as amended by St. 1913, p. 430, § 2, requires notice of date of passage of ordinance for the improvement, the notice is prerequisite to confer jurisdiction, and must state the date of the ordinance, and a statement of the number is not sufficient, in spite of St. 1903, p. 386, § 37, requiring liberal construction.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⟹294(3) — STREET OPENING—NOTICE—REQUISITES.

In proceeding for street opening under St. 1903, p. 375, § 3, as amended St. 1913, p. 430, § 2, a notice of passage of ordinance for the improvement, defective in failing to set out date thereof, was not cured by reference to the ordinance "for further particulars."

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Injunction by Elizabeth Ferri and others against the City of Long Beach and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed with directions.

Phil M. Swaffield and Roland G. Swaffield, both of Long Beach, for appellants. Geo. F. Kapp, of Long Beach, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiffs, owners of property in the city of Long Beach, brought this action against the city of Long Beach, and the members of its board of public works, to enjoin the enforcement of a street assessment by the sale of the plaintiffs' property, and to have the assessment declared void.

The proceedings which are attacked were had under the "street-opening act of 1903," as amended. Stats. 1903, p. 376; Stats. 1909, p. 1035; Stats. 1911, pp. 855, 894; Stats. 1913, p. 429. The city authorities undertook to order the widening of a street in Long Beach, and to assess the cost of the improvement upon a certain district, which included the lands of the plaintiffs. Section 1 of the act gives to the city council power to order such work to be done. Section 2 provides that before ordering any improvement to be made, the city council shall pass an ordinance declaring its intention so to do. Section 3 provides for the publication and posting of notice of the passage of said ordinance. Such notice is to be posted at certain points, and "shall state the fact and date of the passage of said ordinance and briefly describe the improvement proposed, and refer to said ordinance of intention for a description of the assessment district and for further particulars." Under section 4, persons interested are authorized to file written protest within 30 days after the first publication of the notice; a time for hearing such protests is to be fixed, and the board is to pass upon the same. At the expiration of the time within which protests may be filed, or after the denial of protests which have been filed, the city council acquires jurisdiction to order the improvement.

From the findings of fact it appears that the ordinance declaring the intention of the council to order the improvement was passed on the 29th day of December, 1911. (It was passed on its first and second readings on the 22d day of December, 1911, but was not finally passed until December 29th, which must, of course, be taken as the date of its passage, within the meaning of the act.) The posted notice, in addition to stating that the ordinance of intention was passed on the 22d day of December, 1911, briefly described the improvement, and referred to said ordinance for further particulars. Notwithstanding the discrepancy between the actual date of the passage of the ordinance and the date recited in the notice, the court found that the proceedings had been conducted in substantial compliance with the law, and that the assessments levied were legal. Judgment was entered accordingly in favor of the defendants, and from this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

[1, 2] We think the conclusion of the trial court cannot be sustained. Unquestionably the giving of the notice required by the act is one of the steps necessary to confer upon the council jurisdiction to order the work done.

> "Proceedings for street assessments, being in invitum, must, in order to charge the property of the owner, be based upon a compliance with the provisions of the statute authorizing the assessment, in so far, at least, as those provisions have to do with the giving of notice or other steps precedent to the jurisdiction of the board to order the work done." Haughawout v. Percival, 161 Cal. 491, 493, 119 Pac. 649, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 115; Himmelmann v. Cahn, 49 Cal. 285; Brooks v. Satterlee, 49 Cal. 289; Dehail v. Morford, 95 Cal. 457, 30 Pac. 593.

Where the statute prescribes a certain kind of notice, a court is not justified in saying that some other kind of notice would be equally effective. Section 3 of the act provides that the notice shall state the fact and date of the passage of the ordinance. Confessedly, the notice in this case did not state the date of the passage of the ordinance, but stated, as such date, a day seven days prior to its actual passage. It is true that the act contains a provision (section 37) that its provisions shall be liberally construed. But no liberality of construction would justify a holding that a notice which fails to state the true date of the passage of an ordinance does state its date. Nor can we, as suggested by the respondents, hold that there was a substantial compliance with the statute because, as it is claimed, the notice gave the number of the ordinance. The argument is that any one who desired to inspect the ordinance could find it as readily from a reference to its number as from one to its date. This may be so, but it does not appear to have been the view of the Legislature, which saw fit to require a statement of the date. In Haughawout v. Percival, supra, relied on by the respondents, the notice was, as we held, substantially that required by the statute, not a notice different from, although perhaps just as good as, the notice called for by the act. For us to hold that a statement of the number of an ordinance is equivalent, or substantially equivalent, to a statement of its date would be to make a statute, rather than to interpret one. It may be remarked, incidentally, that the record does not show that the posted notice contained a statement of the number of the ordinance.

It need hardly be said that the defective notice is not cured by the fact that it refers to the ordinance itself for further particulars. The statute requires such reference in addition to the statement of the date. Upon the facts found, the conclusion of law should have been that the assessments complained of were void, and that their collection should be enjoined.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of the plaintiffs, as prayed in their complaint.

FEREM et al. v. OLSON & MAHONY.

(S. F. 7709.)

1. SHIPPING 🔑21—PARTNERS—RIGHTS.
Part owners of a vessel are cotenants and partners in the use of the vessel, but not partners in the ownership thereof, and the partnership necessarily terminates when the vessel is lost or sold.

2. SHIPPING 🔑21 — PARTNERSHIP — LOSS OF VESSEL—RIGHT TO ACCOUNTING.
Where a partnership in the use of a vessel was dissolved by the sale of the vessel under libel, one part owner had the right prima facie to an accounting.

3. SHIPPING 🔑21—LIBELS—GENERAL AVERAGE LOSS ADJUSTMENTS—CONCLUSIVENESS.
Where a vessel owned by a partnership was libeled, although the managing owner had power to make a general average loss adjustment, such adjustment was not conclusive and did not debar equity from calling for completion and settlement within the court.

4. SHIPPING 🔑21—LIBELS—GENERAL AVERAGE LOSS ADJUSTMENTS—CONCLUSIVENESS.
Under Civ. Code, §§ 2152–2154, as to adjustments of average loss where the managing owner after libel of the ship failed to make a general average loss adjustment, he could not urge that the minority owners prematurely sought aid of equity because he delayed in making such adjustment.

5. SHIPPING 🔑21—LIBEL—RIGHTS OF PARTNERS.
After a vessel is libeled, the managing owner is without authority to bind minority owners for subsequent costs, disbursements, and expenses.

6. ACCOUNT STATED 🔑2—PARTNERS.
Where the managing owner of a vessel rendered accounts to minority owners and they took no action thereon, the accounts did not become stated, since between partners an accounting cannot be stated at law.

7. SHIPPING 🔑21—ADJUSTMENTS—COMPENSATION OF ADJUSTER.
An adjuster, who adjusted the insurance on the freight earnings which was in its nature a partnership asset, was properly allowed a compensation against both the managing and the minority owners.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Marcel E. Cerf and E. P. Shortall, Judges.

Action by Lina Ferem and others against Olson & Mahony. From the judgment rendered, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

C. H. Sooy and F. R. Wall, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Henry A. Jacobs, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action in equity by the minority owners of the American schooner Wm. F. Garms against defendant corporation, the majority owner and the managing owner, for an accounting touching their respective partnership interests in the use and operation of the vessel. It had made two voyages. Its third projected voyage was from Puget Sound to Santa Rosalia, Mexico. When a few days out from its domestic port it encountered heavy weather, was disabled, and was towed back to a Puget Sound port by the Puget Sound Tugboat Company. Shortly thereafter this last company libeled the vessel and her cargo for salvage, and by a second libel for towage. From neither of these libels was she released. Default was entered in the libel for towage, and the vessel was sold for $5,800; the money being paid over to the United States marshal. At this sale the defendant, managing owner, bought the vessel. None of the minority owners appeared in either of the cases, nor has any of them since reacquired any ownership in the vessel thus sold. In addition to the $5,800 arising from the sale of the vessel, $3,000 was paid into court by the owners of the cargo in the libel against the vessel and its cargo for salvage. Payments were made out of this $8,800 amounting to $4,376.48. The balance was sent to San Francisco and delivered to W. T. Cleverdon, named by respondent as adjuster; $1,700 of this balance having been paid to the cargo owners. The $3,000 paid for salvage was received by the Puget Sound Tugboat Company in full satisfaction for salving both the vessel and her cargo. The admiralty court made no determination of the amount that the cargo should pay to discharge the lien against it for salvage, nor the amount that the vessel should pay to discharge the lien against it. There has thus been no determination of the amount in value of the lien against the vessel for salvage or of the amount in value of the lien against the cargo. The adjuster, Mr. Cleverdon, testified:

> "I presume the average adjuster is going to adjust the salvage and ascertain the proportion of it that the cargo will have to pay and the proportion that the vessel will have to pay. I certainly presume that I am going to do that."

The $1,700 paid over to the cargo owners was not authorized by the plaintiffs or any of them. Defendant, the managing owner, employed Mr. Cleverdon to estimate the general average loss and to make due and proportionate adjustment of it. This general average loss and adjustment had not been made at the time of the sale of the vessel and has not yet been made. Many items of expense involving charges against these plaintiffs' interests in the vessel and in its use remain to be settled. On June 3, 1915, according to the defendant, the general average statement was being prepared. When this cause came on for trial in December, 1914, it had not been prepared. In the matter of voyages numbered 1 and 2 above adverted to, which voyages had been completed, the defendant charged sums for managing the business of the voyages. Without further elaboration, the foregoing, for the purposes of the consideration to be had, presents with sufficient accuracy the situation when plaintiffs brought to trial their equitable action for an accounting of all these matters. The learned judge, in his opinion, declared the indubitable proposition that the managing owner has power to adjust general averages, but further laid down the proposition that:

> "The co-owners are bound by the adjustment. They are bound by all of its elements, even the alleged erroneous inclusion of the claim for salvage."

Further, that the minority owners must await the general average adjustment, and with further discussion as to certain items of insurance and items of the charges of the managing owner for compensation in managing the voyages, the court concluded "that there are not now in the hands of the managing owner any funds respecting which the plaintiffs are entitled to an accounting," and it gave judgment for defendant for costs.

[1] The status of these parties litigant is, of course, well settled. They were cotenants in the ship. They were partners in the use of the vessel. As part owners they were tenants in common and not partners. Freeman, Cotenancy, § 379; The New Orleans, 106 U. S. 13, 1 Sup. Ct. 90, 27 L. Ed. 96. Their partnership extended only to the use of the vessel and not to its ownership. Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 569, 17 Pac. 702; Civ. Code, § 2396. The proposition that upon the dissolution of a partnership an accounting may be had in equity at the instance of any surviving partner or of the representatives of a deceased partner is so fundamental as to require no citation of authority. The proposition is argued by respondent that this partnership still continues, undissolved. Indeed, respondent must maintain this position to uphold the judgment of the court. But from the nature of the thing itself this cannot be. Such a limited partnership, going only to the employment of the vessel itself, of necessity must terminate when the vessel is lost or sold, and so all of the adjudications hold. Abbott's Merchant Ships (14th Ed.) 145; Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 880 and 881; Watson, Law of Partnership, pp. 139, 142; Mumford v. Nicoll, 20 Johns. (N. Y.) 635. For many purposes the employment of the vessel upon each voyage is regarded as a special partnership which ends on the termination of the voyage. It is not necessary to enter with elaboration upon this. Suffice it to cite Smith v. Butler, 164 Mass. 37, 41 N. E. 60, and McLauthlin v. Smith, 166 Mass. 131, 44 N. E. 125. It is immaterial to the present consideration how this partnership may be regarded, since plaintiffs are seeking no legal relief, but equitable relief growing out of all the transactions of the partnership.

[2] The partnership thus unquestionably having been dissolved, the right to an accounting is established prima facie by this fact alone. 30 Cyc. 712.

[3] Seemingly the learned trial judge entertained the view that as it was within the power of the managing owner to make the general average loss adjustment, and as the minority owners in this partnership would be bound by that adjustment, and as that adjustment had not in fact been made, these minority owners and partners had prematurely sought the assistance of equity. If such in truth was his position, he was in error. No such finality attaches to such general average loss adjustments, and the fact that it has not been completed by the managing owner does not debar equity from calling for its completion and settlement under its own eye, and not only the right but the duty of equity to do this precise thing became fixed upon the dissolution of the partnership by the sale of the vessel. Says Story, speaking of general average adjustments:

> "A court of equity having the authority to bring all of the parties before it and to refer the whole matter to a master to take an account and to adjust the whole apportionment at once, affords a safe, convenient, and expeditious remedy." 1 Eq. Jur. (13th Ed.) 491.

If an adjustment be made without the aid of a court of equity, it is not conclusive. "The adjustment is not conclusive. The facts are open to inquiry." The Santa Anna (D. C.) 49 Fed. 878; The Alpin (D. C.) 23 Fed. 819; The Niagara, 21 How. 9, 16 L. Ed. 41. In The Star of Hope, 9 Wall. 203, 19 L. Ed. 638, the court made the average adjustment, and on appeal the court's right and power to do this was upheld; the Supreme Court of the United States pointing out merely the law to be applied in making an average adjustment. See, also, Minor v. Commercial Union Ins. Co. (D. C.) 58 Fed. 801.

[4] In brief, sections 2152 to 2154 of our Civil Code provide how the average loss is to be adjusted. The managing owner has the power to make or cause this adjustment to be made. If the adjustment so made be conformable to the law, it is valid. Otherwise it may be questioned. If at the time that the aid of a court of equity is sought this adjustment has been made, then equity will take up the matter upon the basis of the adjustment so made. If it has not been made then, as has been shown, it is quite within the power and province of equity to order the adjustment to be made and to subject it to equitable review. But it does not lie in the mouth of the managing owner after the termination of the partnership to urge that the minority partners have prematurely sought the aid of equity because he has delayed making such adjustment. Backus v. Coyne, 35 Mich. 5.

[5] Of course, it is well settled that after the vessel was libeled the managing owner was without authority to bind these plaintiffs for subsequent costs, disbursements, and expenses. If they were properly incurred, of course, these plaintiffs must bear their proportion thereof. Otherwise the managing owner was but a volunteer. Reed v. Bachelder, 34 Me. 205; The Augustine Kobbe (D. C.) 37 Fed. 702; The Esteban de Antunano (C. C.) 31 Fed. 924; Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co., Fed. Cas. No. 17,739; The Joseph Farwell (D. C.) 31 Fed. 844; Civ. Code, § 2155.

[6] Our law denies a partner the right to compensation for services rendered by him to the partnership (Civ. Code, § 2413), and declares that "a managing owner is presumed to have no right to compensation for his own services." Civ. Code, § 2072. The trial court allowed the items of compensation to defendant for voyages 1 and 2. It very properly refused to do so upon evidence of custom to this effect, but concluded that the charge made by the managing owner for these services and presented to these plaintiffs in accounts rendered, in view of the nonaction of these plaintiffs, bound them as by an account stated. But an inspection of these accounts and of the testimony supporting them shows that they were not and were not meant to be final, but by their very terms were subject to later modification and adjustment. Moreover, the principle governing the determination as to whether or not an account has been stated is necessarily different when the controversy is between partners from what it is when the parties to it stand at arm's length. And this is very well pointed out in Hinton v. Law, 10 Mo. 701, where it is said:

> "No principle is better settled than that between partners no account can be taken at law. The rule has its origin in this principle that, before an action can be brought for any particular item, the partnership accounts must be taken, with a view to ascertain whether that item has been affected in any, and in what, degree, by the intermediate gains or losses of the partnership business."

That the action or nonaction of plaintiffs in the matter of these accounts did not bind them as to an account stated is in full accord with our authorities. Ross v. Cornell, 45 Cal. 136; Fisher v. Sweet, 67 Cal. 228, 7 Pac. 657; Dukes v. Kellogg, 127 Cal. 563, 60 Pac. 44.

[7] The last item allowed by the court, whose allowance is criticized by these appellants, is a payment to Adjuster Cleverdon of $405 as compensation for his services in adjusting the insurance on the freight earnings. For several reasons, however, this item was properly allowed. Mr. Cleverdon was employed for this purpose by the managing owner in the interest of all of the partners before the sale or even the libel of the vessel. The insurance fund was in its nature a partnership asset, and, even if it be said that the respondent was without authority to procure the insurance in the first instance, yet, when the fund was collected and these plaintiffs accepted their portions of it without protest, they should not in equity be heard to complain.

It is finally urged by respondent that the trial court did not refuse to state the account between these parties and wind up the affairs of the partnership, but, to the contrary, that the court did in terms take and make an accounting, and declared that the defendant had accounted to each and all of the owners of the schooner for all moneys received, both as managing owner and as partner.

But it is apparent, from what has been said and from the quotations from the court's decision, that after passing upon a few questioned items it in effect refused to enter upon a general accounting and settlement of the partnership affairs, upon the ground that the plaintiffs were not entitled thereto.

For which reasons the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for such further proceedings as may be meet in equity.

FAIRCHILD et al. v. OAKLAND & B. S. RY. CO. (S. F. 7596.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑271—STREETS—RIGHT OF ABUTTING OWNERS—STREET RAILROADS—SPECIAL DAMAGES.

A property owner of a corner lot where a street railway track is laid close to the curb along the line of his property is entitled to damages under Const. art. 1, § 14, granting a recovery for the damage as well as the taking of property for public use; the rule being that one suffering any special or peculiar damage apart from the general inconvenience which may have been worked to all property owners is entitled to damages.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑293(4) — ISSUES — PLEADING.

Where an abutting lot owner is shown to be entitled to damages from a street railway, it is immaterial, as far as the company is concerned, that plaintiffs, who really own the lot, have not shown the kind of ownership pleaded in their complaint.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑298 — STREET RAILWAY COMPANY — SPECIAL DAMAGES — ELEMENTS.

In an action by a corner lot owner for special damages on account of a street railway track constructed close to the curb along the line of the lot, it was improper, where there was no improper construction or maintenance, to admit evidence of the jar occasioned by passing street cars, such being an inconvenience sustained in common with all others, and is not an element of damages.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Theodore Fairchild and Lilly Fairchild against the Oakland & Bay Shore Railway Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Corbet & Selby, of San Francisco, and Snook & Church, of Oakland, for appellant. Reed, Black, Nusbaumer & Bingaman, of Oakland, Cal., for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiffs, as tenants in common of a corner lot in the city of Oakland, brought this action against defendant to recover damages occasioned to their property by the construction and maintenance of an electric street railroad, the tracks of which were laid close to the curbing along the line of their property. They recovered judgment, and defendant appeals from that judgment, and from the order of the court denying its motion for a new trial.

[1] The first contention is that the proper operation of such an electric street railroad is not an additional burden or servitude upon the street so that an abutting property owner, not owning the fee of the street, is entitled to damages. Herein appellant relies upon Montgomery v. Santa Ana R. R. Co., 104 Cal. 186, 37 Pac. 786, 25 L. R. A. 654, 43 Am. St. Rep. 89. This case, however, is not in conflict with the later case of Smith v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 146 Cal. 164, 79 Pac. 868, 106 Am. St. Rep. 17, where such a right of action is recognized as a right belonging to the property owner along a street so used, if he suffers any special or peculiar damage apart from the general inconvenience which may have been worked to all property owners. This is precisely one of those rights of action for the damaging of property which, if it did not exist before, came into existence by virtue of our constitutional amendment granting a recovery for the damage as well as for the taking of property for public use. Const. Cal. § 14, art. 1.

[2] The second proposition advanced by appellant is that the ownership of the lot is not established, or at least is not established as pleaded in the complaint. With this, however, appellant has no real concern. It is sufficiently shown that all of the ownership in the lot is vested in the plaintiffs. The satisfaction of the judgment relieves the appellant from any possibility of future litigation over the damage so occasioned, and this is sufficient.

The evidence was sufficient to sustain the award of judgment which the court actually gave—$600. It would be unprofitable to set forth that evidence in detail.

[3] Mrs. Fairchild was permitted, over objection of appellant, to answer the following question:

> "When one of these freight trains is passing the house, what is the effect on the house itself? A. It jars it."

Unquestionably the discomfort or inconvenience which a property owner sustains in common with all others in the legitimate and proper exercise of a street or steam railway is not an element of damage. Eachus v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 103 Cal. 617, 37 Pac. 750, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149. Under certain circumstances, as tending to show an improper construction and maintenance, this question and answer might be permissible. Upon the other hand, if it went only to a common detriment or lessening of enjoyment or comfort, not growing out of faulty or improper construction and maintenance, it would not be an element of damage. We need not stay to analyze what it was or might have been in this case for the action was heard by the court without a jury, and it will be presumed that the court gave to this evidence the weight to which it was entitled and no more.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

COLLINS v. MARSH et al. (L. A. 4082.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑706(8) — STREETS—STANDING VEHICLES.

Under a municipal ordinance requiring standing vehicles to be not more than two feet distant from the curb, except in emergency, where plaintiff, driving up to the curb, had a space of only 22 feet in which to stand his vehicle, owing to other standing vehicles, and intended to alight and move the wheels of the buggy over to the curb, there was such an emergency that, in an action for injuries when his buggy was struck by defendant's automobile, it was proper to refuse instruction that he was guilty of negligence if any wheel on the curb side was more than two feet from the curb.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1050(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE—INTENT OF WITNESS.

While admission of plaintiff's testimony that he intended so to move the buggy was error, it was not ground for reversal, where the only way to get the buggy to the curb was the way he intended to use, and the emergency still existed when the accident occurred.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⊂⊃706(5) — STREETS — DRIVING AUTOMOBILES — NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held sufficient to establish negligence of defendant in driving automobile against rear wheel of plaintiff's buggy.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⊂⊃706(8) — USE OF STREETS—LAST CLEAR CHANCE DOCTRINE.

It was error in submitting the last clear chance doctrine in an action for injuries to plaintiff when his buggy was struck by defendant's automobile to predicate defendant's negligence on whether he should have known, in the exercise of ordinary care, of plaintiff's situation.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR ⊂⊃1064(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

But such instruction was not harmful where there was no dispute as to the position of plaintiff's buggy, and defendant testified that he saw it when he was still 40 or 50 feet away.

6. TRIAL ⊂⊃260(8)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS COVERED.

Requested instruction in an action for injuries when plaintiff's buggy was struck by defendant's automobile, that the jury could consider whether the street was in a secluded district or in a business district, was sufficiently covered by instruction that in passing on issue of negligence the jury must consider all the facts and circumstances.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Michael T. Collins against Robert Marsh and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, L. J. Marsh appeals. Affirmed.

O'Melveny, Stevens & Milliken, Walter K. Tuller, and Alex Macdonald, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. J. W. Carrigan and Zenus F. Barnum, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. In this action, brought against several defendants to recover damages for personal injuries, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against L. J. Marsh alone for $5,000. L. J. Marsh appeals from the ensuing judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The accident occurred on Hill street in the city of Los Angeles. Plaintiff, who was driving a horse attached to a buggy, had turned into Hill street from Seventh street, and was driving northerly on the easterly or right-hand side of Hill street toward Sixth street. He had occasion to go to a telephone office in the block between Seventh and Sixth streets. The entire curb line along the east side of this block was occupied by automobiles and other vehicles, with the exception of a space of some 22 feet, about the middle of the block. At this point the plaintiff undertook to drive in. The space was not sufficient to enable him to get his horse and buggy close up to the curb. He was compelled to drive in at an angle, and brought his horse to a stop, as he testified, with the horse's head over the curb, the right front wheel of the buggy about a foot and a half from the curb, and the rear wheel about four feet out. Before he could alight, his buggy was struck by an automobile driven by the appellant. Plaintiff was thrown to the pavement, receiving the injuries of which he complains.

The appellant's contention was that the collision was due to the act of plaintiff's horse in stepping back, and thus throwing the rear end of the buggy into the line of the automobile's progress. Without this backing, it was claimed, the automobile would have passed plaintiff's buggy in safety; the appellant's own testimony being that his front wheels had already passed, and that the right rear wheel of the automobile collided with the left rear wheel of the buggy. The answer, in addition to denying negligence on the part of the defendants, set up that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

There was offered in evidence a traffic ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, which contained this section:

> "Sec. 15. It shall be unlawful for the driver of any vehicle to stop the same, or to cause the same to be stopped, in or upon any street unless the side of such vehicle nearest the curb is not more than two feet distant from such curb; provided, however, that the provisions of this section shall not apply in case of emergency, or when such stop is made for the purpose of allowing another vehicle or a street car or interurban car or a pedestrian to pass in front of such vehicle so stopped, or when in compliance with an order or signal of a police officer."

[1] The defendant requested an instruction to the effect that this provision required that both wheels of a four-wheeled vehicle stopped upon a public street should be not more than two feet from the curb, and that:

> "If plaintiff upon the occasion in question stopped the buggy in question while the same was in such position that the rear right wheel thereof was more than two feet from the nearest street curb, then he was guilty of negligence as a matter of law. * * *"

The court did not err in refusing to give this instruction. It may be conceded that the appellant rightly construes the ordinance to mean that both the front and the rear wheel of a vehicle stopped on the street must be within two feet of the curb. The proviso appended to the section excludes from its operation, among other things, cases of "emergency." In view of the purposes for which the ordinance was adopted, the word "emergency" should not, in the connection in which it is here used, be given too narrow an interpretation. The plaintiff had a right to stop his vehicle on any block in which he had occasion to alight, and section 15 was surely not intended to make it impossible to exercise that right. "Emergency" is defined in Webster's Dictionary as "an unforeseen occurrence or combination of circumstances which calls for immediate action or remedy; pressing necessity; exigency." If the curb space was so occupied that plaintiff could not, in stopping, bring both right wheels close to the curb, it would be no stretch of reason to say that he was confronted by an "emergency," within the meaning of the ordinance. At any rate, the jury might well have found the existence of conditions which excepted the case from the operation of section 15, and the instruction proposed was erroneous in requiring a finding that plaintiff's act was a violation of the ordinance, and hence negligence, without regard to the existence or nonexistence of an "emergency."

[2] The plaintiff was allowed to testify, over objection, that when he stopped his buggy he intended to bring both right wheels close to the curb by pulling the rear end of the buggy in after alighting. The objection should have been sustained. If the plaintiff had been guilty of negligence in bringing his horse and buggy to a stop as he did, the character of his act could not have been affected by his undisclosed intention to thereafter move the rear wheels. But it was shown without objection, if, indeed, it was not apparent from the circumstances themselves, that the method which the plaintiff said he intended to follow was the only possible one for accomplishing the purpose of getting both right wheels close to the curb. Until he had time to do this, the emergency excusing compliance with the ordinance, if such there was, continued. With this evidence before the jury, the mere additional testimony of plaintiff's intent was not, we think, of such serious consequence as to have affected the result or to justify a reversal.

[3] There is no merit in appellant's claim that there was not sufficient evidence to show negligence on his part. It is true that he testified that a backing motion of the horse had brought the wheel of the buggy into the line of the automobile's motion. But the plaintiff's testimony was that the movement of the horse, which he described as a "settling motion," pushed the buggy back not more than three or four inches. The buggy stood on a slant, and the movement sidewise would therefore have been less than this distance. If the jury took this testimony as true, as, of course, it had the right to do, it was for it to say whether or not the defendant had been negligent in leaving so little clearance space as to strike the buggy when it had made the slight movement described by the plaintiff. There was an express instruction to the effect that the plaintiff could not recover if the accident was due to the sudden and unexpected backing of the buggy against or in the way of the automobile, and the jury, by its verdict, impliedly found that this was not the cause of the collision. The defendant testified that he left a clearance space of a foot and a half between the two vehicles. But the jury was not bound to accept this estimate in the face of testimony of facts indicating the contrary.

[4] The court gave an instruction designed to state the doctrine of the "last clear chance." In this instruction it stated that if the appellant saw, "or, in the exercise of ordinary care should have seen, the situation in which plaintiff was," and could then have avoided the collision by the exercise of ordinary care, and failed to take such care, he would be liable, notwithstanding the fact that plaintiff might have negligently placed himself in the dangerous position. The court should not have included the phrase which we have italicized. It is well settled in this state that the "last clear chance" rule does not apply where the defendant was not, but should have been, aware of the plaintiff's danger. "Under this rule, a defendant is not liable because he ought to have known." Herbert v. S. P. Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651; Wahlgren v. Market Street Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 656, 62 Pac. 308, 64 Pac. 993; Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 523, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85; Bennichsen v. Market Street Ry. Co., 149 Cal. 18, 84 Pac. 420; Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 Pac. 709.

[5] But, under the facts of this case, we think the instruction was not harmful. There was no dispute regarding the position of plaintiff's buggy when it was first brought to a stop. Nor was it denied that the appellant saw the buggy in ample time to enable him to avoid striking it. His own testimony was that he noticed it when he was still 40 or 50 feet away. Whether it was then in a position of danger, or whether the accident was brought about through the subsequent backward motion of the horse, is another question, upon which, as we have seen, the jury found in favor of the plaintiff. Upon the record as it stands it must therefore be taken as established that the appellant saw the buggy while he was 40 or 50 feet from it; that so seeing it he drove on until he struck it, and that his so striking it was not due to any intervening motion of the horse. The error in the instruction was therefore not one which would justify a reversal.

The appellant complains of the court's refusal to instruct the jury that the mere fact of the occurrence of the accident did not raise any presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant. But it appears that in an instruction numbered 18 the court gave a charge which was substantially the same as the one requested.

[6] The court refused to give a requested instruction on the subject of negligence. Included in it was a statement that the jury might consider, among other things, whether the street in question was in a secluded district where there was little traffic, or in a business district where there was much. Admittedly, the place in question was a business district. We think the court covered the subject sufficiently in instructing the jury, as it did more than once, that, in passing on the issue of negligence, it must take into consideration all the facts and circumstances surrounding the particular transaction.

Instruction No. 5, given at the request of plaintiff, also dealt with the question of negligence. Without quoting the instruction, we may say that it is, perhaps, open to criticism as somewhat confused in phraseology. But negligence was so fully and clearly defined to the jury in other instructions that no serious weight can be given to this minor defect.

No other points are made.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

In re FELTON'S ESTATE. (S. F. 8242.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1917. Supplementary Opinion, Dec. 22, 1917. Rehearing Denied Jan. 10, 1918.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑717—Scope of Review.

While opinions of trial judges are welcome on appeal, they are not part of the findings, and the court can consider only whether the findings have sufficient legal support in the evidence.

2. Taxation 🔑895(2)—Inheritance Tax—Appraisal—Evidence—Sufficiency.

An appraisal of property for an inheritance tax based on a schedule of property filed by the heirs, though some testimony indicated that it was of greater value, was proper.

3. Taxation 🔑895(5) — Inheritance Tax —Appraisal of Corporation Stock — Method.

Where decedent owned shares of a close family corporation stock of which had never been on the market and never sold privately, the only way to establish their market value was to ascertain the value of the property which they represented and assign to each share its proportionate worth.

4. Taxation 🔑895(5) — Inheritance Tax —Appraisal of Corporation Stock — Method.

In appraising stock for an inheritance tax, the mere fact that the stock passing was a minority interest did not decrease its value where it passed to one who thereby became the holder of a majority interest.

5. Taxation 🔑881—Transfers of Stock—"Valuable Consideration"—"Adequate Consideration."

Where the transferee of 728 shares of stock agreed to pay the transferor the dividends on 262 shares belonging to the transferee as well as on 728 shares transferred there was a valuable, but not an adequate, consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Valuable Consideration; Second Series, Adequate Consideration.]

6. Taxation 🔑881 — Inheritance Tax — Gifts of Stock.

Where the transferee of corporation stock testified that his father transferred it to him as a gift, and that he paid merely a nominal consideration, the stock was subject to inheritance tax.

7. Taxation 🔑861 — Inheritance Tax — Statutes Applicable.

Where deceased had made an irrevocable transfer of corporation stock, the transferee agreeing to pay him the dividends until his death, the rate of inheritance tax assessable at the time of the transfer, and not at the time of the death of the transferee, was the rate to be followed.

Supplementary Opinion.

8. Taxation 🔑861—Inheritance Taxes—How Computed.

Where decedent had made a gift of stock, reserving dividends thereon, and on his death the inheritance tax on moneys passing to his son was assessed under Statutes of 1913, p. 1066, and paid, and proceeding was brought to assess such tax on the stock which was subject to Statutes of 1905, p. 341, it must be computed as on a separate entity, without consideration of the money transfer.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Proceedings in the estate of Charles N. Felton, deceased, wherein Charles N. Felton, Jr., appeals from a judgment confirming the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, supported by John S. Chambers, Controller of the State. Reversed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for appellant. Robert A. Waring, of Sacramento, and John C. Altman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Charles N. Felton, Jr., appeals from a part of a judgment and decree confirming the report of the inheritance tax appraiser whereby the sum of $35,352.82 was declared to be the amount of inheritance tax due upon 728 shares of the capital stock of the Felton Company (a corporation) standing in the name of appellant, but held to be assessable for inheritance tax as a part of the estate of Charles N. Felton, deceased, because of its transfer to appellant during the life of Charles N. Felton as a gift intended to take effect in possession and enjoyment after the donor's death.

The Felton Company was a family corporation having a capital of $200,000, divided into 2,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. It was incorporated under the laws of this state in 1905. Upon the organization of the corporation Charles N. Felton, Sr., took one-half of the capital stock, and assigned to each of his two children (the appellant being one of them) one-fourth thereof. There was evidence tending to show that this division of the stock did not accurately represent the relative contributions of the stockholders to the assets of the corporation, but each of the three members of the family had furnished about one-third of the property. However, the children were entirely satisfied with the father's dominance in the corporation, and during his lifetime he received all of the dividends on one-half of the stock. On April 21, 1911, a certificate was issued signed by Charles N. Felton as president and P. H. McGrath as secretary of the corporation to the effect that Charles N. Felton, Jr., was entitled to 990 shares of the stock. It was in evidence that this certificate was promptly delivered to Charles N. Felton, Jr. Charles N. Felton, Sr., died on September 13, 1914.

A tabulated statement indicating appellant's estimate of the amounts of assets which had been contributed respectively by the father and the two children upon the formation of the corporation was submitted to the inheritance tax appraiser, and, using that statement, he found that upon the bases of their respective contributions the father was equitably entitled to 728 shares and the children to 636 shares each. Therefore, instead of assessing all of the stock which he regarded as a gift to be possessed and enjoyed after the father's death, he assessed only that part which he regarded as equitably the portion of Charles N. Felton, Sr., in the original allotment of stock.

Appellant contends: First, that if the stock were liable for inheritance tax, the amount assessed was excessive and based upon a wrong theory of the law; and, second, that no inheritance taxes could be lawfully charged against it.

The list of properties of the corporation furnished by Mr. Charles N. Felton, Jr., and Mr. McGrath showed, in addition to the estimated values of the assets contributed at the time of the organization of the company, the values placed by those gentlemen upon the possessions of the Felton Company on December 31, 1914, more than three months after Senator Felton's death. Appellant insists that the court erred: First, in accepting these arbitrary sums given by him and by Mr. McGrath (being merely their estimates of the value of the various items of property) as the sole bases of the worth of the assets; and, secondly, in fixing the "market value" of the shares of stock (which is the statutory measure for taxing purposes) by dividing the aggregate value of the entire assets of the Felton Company by the number of shares of stock issued. In support of this contention he calls our attention to the following language contained in the opinion of the learned judge of the superior court who tried the case:

> "The question as to the overvaluation of this stock by the inheritance tax appraiser is presented with counsel's usual force. This is a peculiar case, and presents some peculiar features. While it is true that through their attorney these two heirs have raised this question of the value placed upon this stock by the inheritance tax appraiser, yet these two heirs —the only parties interested in the valuation— have not given any testimony questioning the value placed upon these shares of stock by the inheritance tax appraiser, notwithstanding the fact that both of them were witnesses to the matter. While it is true outside parties having but little idea and only a general knowledge of the value of the property represented by these shares of stock were placed upon the stand in behalf of the two heirs, yet the heirs remained silent. A list of the cost and value of these properties represented by these shares of stock was handed to the inheritance tax appraiser by Mr. Felton, Jr., the manager of this estate.
> "I assume that the inheritance tax appraiser performed his duty and found that this list thus presented represented the market value of this stock, and the evidence upon this point seems to confirm the view taken by the inheritance tax appraiser upon this matter."

[1] We cannot accept appellant's view that the court acted solely upon his and Mr. McGrath's estimates of value. Indeed, the last sentence quoted above seems to contradict that assumption. But, even if the written opinion did show, as appellant insists that it does, a sole reliance upon that schedule, nevertheless we would be bound to examine the record to ascertain whether or not there could be found therein testimony of expert witnesses tending to support the findings. Opinions of judges of trial courts are always welcomed by this court because, as a rule, they aid the justices in discovering the processes by which the judgments have been reached. But such opinions are not part of the findings. We may only consider whether the findings have sufficient legal support in the evidence. Goldner v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 317, 125 Pac. 347.

[2] Surely the schedule prepared under appellant's own direction had some evidentiary force as an admission of the value of the property at a time near the date of Senator Felton's death. But, aside from this, there was expert testimony regarding the market value of the various items of property. Some of the estimates given by the experts exceeded, and some corresponded with, the values as given by appellant and Mr. McGrath. We find, therefore, that the court's conclusion regarding the correctness of the appraiser's finding of value of the assets is supported by substantial evidence.

[3] Respondent does not question the rule that the market value of stock at the date of the death of the appellant's father is the proper basis for the fixing of the tax, nor that generally such market value is quite distinct from the ratio between the number of shares assessed and the value of the corporation's property. The term "market value" has been fully defined by this court. Sacramento Southern Railroad Co. v. Heilbron, 156 Cal. 408, 104 Pac. 979; Estate of Ross, 171 Cal. 64, 151 Pac. 1138; Bullard v. Stone, 67 Cal. 477, 8 Pac. 17. Respondent also admits that the same rule for determining market values as that employed in other cases is applicable, generally speaking, to those in which the amounts of inheritance taxes are involved. Estate of Ross, 171 Cal. 64, 151 Pac. 1138. But the Felton Company is a close family corporation. Its shares of stock have never been upon the market, and they have never been sold privately. According to the views of respondent, the only way to establish the market value of such shares of stock is to ascertain the value of the property which they represent, assigning to each share its proportionate worth. This is the method of determining market value which has been adopted in New York and approved by the courts. In re Jones, 172 N. Y. 575, 65 N. E. 570, 60 L. R. A. 476; In re Crawford, 85 Misc. Rep. 283, 147 N. Y. Supp. 234; In re Valentine (Sur.) 147 N. Y. Supp. 231. We are in accord with respondent's theory that under the circumstances of this case the method of reaching the value of the shares of stock which was adopted was the proper one.

[4] There is no force in appellant's contention that the stock is of less value because we are here concerned with a minority interest. Appellant owns a majority of the stock; the other shares belonging to his sister. While the particular stock subject to the tax is less than half of the issue, appellant, as its possessor, is not under the disadvantages that sometimes confront holders of minority interests.

[5, 6] Appellant says that there was a "valuable and adequate consideration" for the transfer to him of the shares of stock; that the obligation on his part to pay to his father the dividends upon the 262 shares which were equitably his would have been consideration for the transfer of the 728 shares. Granting that this might be a valuable consideration, it would not be an adequate consideration. Estate of Reynolds, 169 Cal. 600, 147 Pac. 268. But the complete answer to appellant's contention is that he testified to the fact that the stock was received as a gift from his father, and that merely a nominal consideration was paid. But it is argued that the appraiser failed to make a finding that there was an absence of valuable and adequate consideration. Upon this failure appellant predicates an assertion that serious error was committed, citing McDougald v. Boyd, 172 Cal. 753, 159 Pac. 168. Conceding the duty of the appraiser to make such finding, it is true that the court, trying the matter de novo upon the transcript of testimony taken before the appraisers (which was introduced upon stipulation of counsel) and upon other testimony, made a formal finding "that said transfer was made without valuable or adequate consideration."

[7] The most important question relates to the rate of taxation applicable to the transfer of stock from Senator Felton to his son. It is here contended, under the authority of Hunt v. Wicht, 162 Pac. 639, L. R. A. 1917C, 961, that the rates applicable to the transfer in question should be those in force at the date of the transfer, and not those in effect at the time of Senator Felton's death. But it is suggested that the question here presented is somewhat different from that which was raised and answered in Hunt v. Wicht. It was held by this court in that case that, where a gift of property is irrevocably made with the reservation of a life estate in the donor, there being no inheritance tax upon such a gift at the time of the transfer, the property so vested may not be reached by a statute subsequently passed, imposing a tax upon such transfers. Our attention is called to the fact that there was a statute imposing an inheritance tax upon such a gift as this when it was made, and that the subsequent statute, which was retroactive by its terms, merely increased the rates. But we can see no escape from the conclusion, under the reasoning of the case of Hunt v. Wicht, supra, that an effective gift such as this may not be subject to taxation under the schedule provided by a statute subsequently passed. It was error, therefore, to assess the amount of the inheritance tax according to the statute of 1913 instead of that of 1905, in force at the time when the stock was transferred.

That the donor of the stock retained the enjoyment of the income from the transferred property during his life was a fact proven to the satisfaction of the court by ample testimony. It was plain that neither he nor his son intended that the gift should take effect in enjoyment during the former's life, and this conclusion is supported even if we ignore an indorsement in writing on the certificate which seemed to reserve the dividends to C. N. Felton during his life. This purported assignment was followed by the word "approved" and the signatures of both of the Feltons. Appellant insists that these signatures were not put upon the certificate at the time the writing was made nor for the purpose of indicating assent to the purported reservation, but we need not consider this question, because, even accepting the views of appellant regarding the indorsement, there was ample support for the finding that the gift was made with intent that enjoyment should be postponed until after the death of the donor, that it was made without valuable and adequate consideration, and that the stock was given in contemplation of the death of appellant's father. These conclusions are supported by the evidence under the principles declared in such cases as Estate of Reynolds, 169 Cal. 600, 147 Pac. 268, and Abstract & Title Guaranty Co. v. State of California, 173 Cal. 691, 161 Pac. 264.

No other alleged errors require discussion or analysis.

That part of the judgment from which an appeal is taken is reversed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

Supplementary Opinion.

MELVIN, J. [8] Since the filing of the opinion in this case doubt has been expressed by counsel regarding the proper method of computing the inheritance tax under the act of 1905. Counsel for the respondent insists that appellant is bound to pay a tax computed upon the amount of the gift of stock plus the money left to Mr. Charles N. Felton, Jr., by his father. But this method would be improper. A tax has been levied under the act of 1913 upon the money received by way of inheritance, and no appeal has been taken from that part of the judgment approving said tax, and, moreover, it has been paid. Upon the appeal that part of the judgment which declared the gift of stock subject to the collateral inheritance tax has been upheld, except that we have decided that the said gift is properly taxable under the act of 1905. It follows that in computing the amount of tax on said stock the other parts of the inheritance of Mr. Felton which have been taxed may not be considered, but the gift must be treated as a separate entity.

CALIFORNIA SAVINGS & COMMERCIAL BANK v. CANNE. (Civ. 1878.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑757(1)—BRIEFS—JUDGMENT ROLL—MATTERS RECEIVABLE.

Where the judgment roll is not printed in the brief, relevancy of testimony offered, refused, or received, or the matter of the correctness of instructions, cannot be received on appeal under the alternative method.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑757(1)—BRIEFS—ALTERNATIVE METHOD.

Although the alternative method of appeal permits parties to file typewritten transcripts in lieu of printed judgment rolls and bills of exception, such permission casts no burden upon the appellate courts to examine the typewritten documents in deciding the appeal, and enough should, under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, be printed in the brief to illustrate the points.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑757(2)—BRIEFS—ISSUES.

In order to show issues involved on appeal by the alternative method, it is ordinarily required that the complaint and answer at least be printed in the brief in full.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by the California Savings & Commercial Bank, substituted for the Traders' Bank of Los Angeles, against J. C. D. Canne, executor, etc., substituted for H. D. Canne. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing denied in Supreme Court, 169 Pac. 395.

Tanner, Odell, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellant. A. W. Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1] In this case we cannot find sufficient in the printed extracts from the record, as contained in appellant's brief, to warrant our ordering other than an affirmance of the judgment. The judgment roll is not printed in the brief, which leaves us without information presented in the way required by the law, as to the issues. Without this information, we cannot determine questions of the relevancy of the testimony offered, refused, or received, or the matter of the correctness of instructions given or withheld from the jury.

[2] While the alternative method of appeal permits parties to file typewritten transcripts in lieu of printed judgment rolls and bills of exception, such permission casts no burden upon the appellate courts to examine the typewritten documents in deciding the appeal. The statute expressly provides in such cases that:

> "In filing briefs on said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court." Code Civ. Proc. § 953c.

Both the Supreme Court and this court have repeatedly pointed to the provision of the statute in this regard. Marcucci v. Vowinckel, 164 Cal. 693, 130 Pac. 430; Wills v. Woolner, 21 Cal. App. 528, 132 Pac. 283; Miller v. Oliver et al., 163 Pac. 357; Pasadena Realty Co. v. Clune, 166 Pac. 1025; McKinnell v. Hansen et al., 167 Pac. 887. When it is required that the parties shall print in their briefs such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the appellate court, the law means that they shall print enough of such record to illustrate their points.

[3] In order to show the issues involved, it would ordinarily be required that the complaint and answer at least be set out in full. The better practice would require the printing of the entire judgment roll, and including the notice of appeal. Where it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the issues, or irrelevant to the issues, the printing of the complaint and answer cannot be dispensed with.

The judgment is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SAVINGS & COMMERCIAL BANK v. CANNE. (L. A. 5465.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑757(1)—BRIEFS—ALTERNATIVE METHOD.

In an appeal under the alternative method, only such part of the record as is necessary to illustrate the points so that they can be determined need be printed in the brief.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑757(1)—BRIEFS—EVIDENCE QUESTIONS.

It depends on the circumstances whether or not the entire complaint and answer should be printed in the brief, where it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding or is irrelevant to the issues; such not being necessary as to matters not disputed by the opposing party.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by the California Savings & Commercial Bank against J. C. D. Canne, executor of the estate of H. D. Canne, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. Affirmed by the District Court of Appeals of the Second Appellate District (169 Pac. 395), and the defendant petitions for a rehearing. Petition denied.

Tanner, Odell, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellant. A. W. Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District is denied. In denying this petition we deem it proper to say:

This is a case in which, under our Constitution, the appeal was properly taken to the District Court of Appeal, and the application for a hearing in this court is to be determined in accord with the rule declared in such cases as Burke v. Maze, 10 Cal. App. 211, 101 Pac. 438, 440, and Rauer's Law, etc., Co. v. Berthiaume, 21 Cal. App. 675, 132 Pac. 596, 833. We read the District Court of Appeal opinion as being simply to the effect that in this particular case there was not enough of the record printed in the appellant's brief to enable the court to determine what the issues in the case were, and that without such information they were unable to determine the questions raised as to the relevancy of testimony, and as to the propriety of instructions given or refused.

[1, 2] The law requires, as said by the court, that enough must be printed to illustrate the points made and to enable the court to determine those points. Just exactly what must be printed in any particular case in order to comply with this requirement necessarily depends upon the circumstances of the case, and we cannot give our assent to the proposition at the end of the opinion to the effect that in every case in which it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding, or is irrelevant to the issues, "the printing of the complaint and answer cannot be dispensed with." In some cases this may be true, and we must assume, in view of what is said in the District Court of Appeal opinion, that this is such a case. In many cases the only point urged in support of the appeal involves but a single allegation of the complaint or answer, and the printing of anything more than a statement of the substance of the other allegations thereof could give no assistance to the court. In many cases respondent does not dispute the statement of the appellant as to the facts involved in the points urged. The judgment roll is frequently of extraordinary length, sometimes extending to hundreds of pages, and to print it all, where the points involve only a small portion thereof, would benefit no one. It is impossible to lay down any rule for the government of attorneys in deciding what to print in their briefs where the record is prepared under section 953a. If it is understood that enough should be printed to illustrate the points presented, the good sense of attorneys should be sufficient to inform them of the subject.

EASTERLY v. PRAUL, Constable.

(Civ. 2287.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑757(1)—BRIEFS—RECORD.

On appeal by alternative method under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, requiring parties to print in their briefs such parts of record as they desire to call to court's attention, where no part of judgment roll is printed in appellant's brief, the judgment should be affirmed.

2. ATTACHMENT 🔑296—THIRD PARTY CLAIM—REQUISITES AND SUFFICIENCY.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 549, 689, requiring third party claims in attachment and execution to be verified by such party or his agent, a demand by the claimant's brother-in-law as her agent, not verified, was insufficient, though an acknowledgment was made before a notary as to truth of facts stated therein.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑994(3)—REVIEW—FINDINGS—PRESUMPTIONS.

In view of the provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 11, that property found in one's possession is presumed to be his, where attached property was found in the debtor's possession, and there was testimony in support of a third party claim, the credibility of the witnesses was for the trial judge.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by N. D. Easterly against C. S. Praul, Constable of Otay Township. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, and Albert J. Lee, of San Diego, for appellant. Walter W. Praul, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. [1] By the opening brief in this case we are told that the appeal taken by the plaintiff is from a judgment adjudging that the plaintiff was not the owner of certain horses alleged to have been held under attachment process by the defendant constable in a suit of one Hull v. A. F. Narver. The appeal is taken by the alternative method, which requires the parties to print in their briefs such portions of the record as they may desire to call to the attention of the court. Section 953c, Code Civ. Proc. No part of the judgment roll is printed in the brief of appellant, and we are left without record information as to what the cause of action was or the issues made between the parties. For that reason alone the judgment should be affirmed. Marcucci v. Vowinckel, 164 Cal. 693, 130 Pac. 430; Wills v. Woolner, 21 Cal. App. 528, 132 Pac. 283; Miller v. Oliver et al., 163 Pac. 357; Pasadena Realty Co. v. Clune, 166 Pac. 1025; McKinnell v. Hansen et al., 167 Pac. 887; Lillard v. Abbot Hardware Co., 168 Pac. 707; California Savings & Commercial Bank v. Canne, 169 Pac. 395.

[2] The main point upon which appellant appears to rely is that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings of the court determining that plaintiff, a third party claimant of the property held under attachment, was not the owner of the horses. The testimony given at the trial is set forth in the briefs. It appears from that testimony that A. F. Narver was at all times in possession of the horses which were attached and which were intermingled with other horses used by him, and which latter he admitted that he owned. When the attachment was made, Narver as agent for the plaintiff, who was his wife's sister, made a written claim or demand on behalf of the plaintiff for the release of the horses. This demand was not verified by the plaintiff as the law requires (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 549, 689), but an acknowledgment was made before a notary as to the truth of the facts stated in the demand. We think the third party claim was not in sufficient form to charge the defendant with liability. Furthermore, in view of the law that an appellate court has no function to review evidence where two different conclusions may properly be drawn therefrom, it must be held that there was some evidence sustaining the findings of the trial court.

[3] The property was found in the possession of Narver, and the presumption attending that possession was that he owned it. Section 1963, subd. 11, Code Civ. Proc. The persons concerned in the alleged ownership were all members of the family of Narver, it being claimed that his mother was the first owner, and that before she died she, by bill of sale and sufficient consideration, transferred her ownership to the sister of Narver's wife. The latter would not testify that she had ever seen the animals, and the testimony of Narver's wife and wife's sister appears as to many of its features to have been affected by uncertainty and hesitatingly given. In view of the presumption imposed by the Code provision, that Narver was the owner of the property found in his possession, it was for the trial judge to determine the credibility of the witnesses appearing before him in support of the third party claim. Section 1847, Code Civ. Proc. Upon the several grounds stated, it is very clear that this judgment should not be disturbed.

JONES v. AMERICAN POTASH CO. (Civ. 1910.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹757(3)—BRIEFS—EVIDENCE POINTS.

Whether the evidence supports the verdict, or evidence was improperly admitted or refused, cannot be considered on appeal by the alternative method, if such evidence is not printed in the brief.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by E. H. Jones against the American Potash Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert L. Hubbard, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Horace S. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is taken under the alternative method from a judgment entered against defendant. A number of points appear to be made in the brief of appellant, all of which refer to the evidence presented to the trial court. It is urged, among other things, that the findings and judgment are not supported by the evidence; that the court erred in excluding certain evidence, etc. No part of the record is printed in the brief of appellant, except three paragraphs from the findings of the court. Appellant has utterly failed to print in his brief any other matters to which he desires to call the attention of the court. Necessarily, in order to properly consider the points made as to the insufficiency of the evidence and as to the alleged errors of the court in excluding offered testimony, we should have before us the testimony received and offered. The result is that the only order that can properly be made by this court is one in affirmance of the judgment for want of any showing why the same should be reversed. Marcucci v. Vowinckel, 164 Cal. 693, 130 Pac. 430; Wills v. Woolner, 21 Cal. App. 528, 132 Pac. 283; Miller v. Oliver et al., 163 Pac. 357; Pasadena Realty Co. v. Clune, 166 Pac. 1025; McKinnell v. Hansen et al., 167 Pac. 887; California Sav. & Commercial Bank v. Canne, 169 Pac. 395.

STEWART v. ANDREWS. (Civ. 1925.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 7, 1917.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹757(1)—BRIEF—MATTERS REVIEWABLE.

On appeal by the alternative method, where the brief contains no part of the record, or the evidence to which attention is called, as specifically required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, the decision of the lower court must be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Gertie Stewart against Willedd Andrews. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Willedd Andrews, of Los Angeles, in pro. per. C. W. Hatton, of Los Angeles, and James W. Barnes, of Compton, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is said to be an appeal from an order granting plaintiff's motion to set aside the judgment and granting permission to plaintiff to file an amended complaint. There is no record other than a typewritten transcript, which we may assume was prepared in accordance with section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Appellant has not complied with section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that upon such a record the parties must "print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court." The brief for appellant is absolutely deficient in that it contains none of the evidence and contains no part of the record. On the authority of Jones v. American Potash Co., 169 Pac. 397, decided October 25, 1917, and cases there cited, the order is affirmed.

JAMES et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR BUTTE COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1736.)

CERTIORARI 🔑31—ORDER DISSOLVING PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—REVIEW.

Where petitioner brought action to enjoin the sale of capital stock to enforce payment of an assessment, petitioners' voluntary payment of the assessment fully settled and adjusted the matter in litigation, so that whether an order dissolving the preliminary injunction was void was immaterial and abstract, and afforded no ground for relief, so that certiorari to annul the dissolution order will be discharged.

Certiorari by Henry T. James and others against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Butte, and Henry C. Gesford, its presiding judge, to annul an order of such Superior Court discharging a preliminary injunction in a case by petitioners against certain defendants. Writ discharged.

Frank D. McClure, of Minneapolis, Minn., and Franklin P. Bull, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Frank Freeman, of Willows, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The application is to annul an order made by said superior court on July 27, 1915, dissolving a preliminary injunction directed to be issued on March 30, 1915, after notice and full hearing in the case of Henry T. James et al. v. P. B. Steifer Mining Company (a corporation) et al., pending in said court at the time said orders were made. No appeal was taken from the order granting the injunction. The contention of petitioner is:

"(1) That the superior court has no jurisdiction to change, modify, dissolve, or otherwise interfere with the temporary injunction granted upon hearing, after an order to show cause, and in full force and effect.

"(2) That any attempt to dissolve the temporary injunction, after its issuance, upon hearing, and order to show cause, would require a review of the motion for the injunction, and that the superior court has no jurisdiction to review such a motion. * * *

"(4) That the statute regulating proceedings on motion for temporary injunction is very general in its terms, covers the entire subject-matter, and prohibits the change, modification, or dissolution of a temporary injunction, except in cases of mandatory injunction by appeal, and in cases of unlawful diversion of water. * * *

"(6) That a writ of certiorari is the proper remedy, because the superior court exceeded its jurisdiction in dissolving the temporary injunction, and plaintiff has no other means of redress."

The foregoing propositions are apparently supported by the decision of the Supreme Court in the carefully and thoroughly considered case of United Railroads of San Francisco v. Superior Court, 170 Cal. 755, 151 Pac. 129, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 199; but respondents in their brief point out that in February, March, October, and November, 1915, petitioners herein paid severally the full amount of the assessment on their respective shares of capital stock, and the company issued to them receipts therefor, and said assessments have been marked paid on the books of said company. Since the said temporary injunction was issued solely for the purpose of preventing the sale of said capital stock to enforce the payment of said assessment, and the payment has been voluntarily made, the continuance in force of said writ would seem to be a matter of no practical importance. It is not to be presumed, of course, that the directors of the corporation will attempt to make a sale to accomplish a purpose that has already been accomplished by the voluntary act of petitioners. It can be said that the subject-matter of the litigation, as far as this proceeding is concerned, has been fully settled and adjusted. In other words, the actual controversy between the parties has ceased to exist as a live question. It is therefore no longer of any legal consequence whether petitioners are right in their contention that the order attemping to dissolve the injunction is entirely void. By the payment of said assessment they have made it virtually an abstract proposition of law, upon which no rights herein depend, and wherein really no relief can be afforded. Franklin v. Peers, 95 Va. 602, 29 S. E. 321; Morton v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. 496, 4 Pac. 489; People v. Burns, 78 Cal. 645, 21 Pac. 540; Estate of Baby, 87 Cal. 200, 25 Pac. 405, 22 Am. St. Rep. 239.

It may be said that petitioners make no reply to this contention of respondents, and we must conclude that they have no reply to make.

The writ is discharged.

PEOPLE v. ROGERS. (Cr. 555.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑49(1) — ACTIONS — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses that defendant was the owner of the furniture and a lease of a rooming house, evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

2. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑47 — PROSECUTION — EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Defendant, representing that he was negotiating sales of rooming houses, induced complainant to make a deposit with him to secure a rooming house. Thereafter defendant represented that he could not obtain the rooming house in question, and offered to sell complainant another rooming house, falsely representing that he owned the lease and the furniture thereof. Held, that evidence as to the first transaction was admissible.

3. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑32 — INFORMATION — SUFFICIENCY.

Where the information charged that defendant as the result of false representations and pretenses secured the sum of $600, it will be inferred that the money referred to was lawful money or current coin of the United States, and such information is sufficient.

4. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑30 — INFORMATION — SUFFICIENCY.

Where an information alleging that defendant obtained a sum of money by means of false and fraudulent representations that he was the owner of furniture and a lease of a rooming house, after generally alleging the falsity and fraudulent nature of defendant's representations, and that he knew them to be false and fraudulent, alleged the falsity of his representations that he was the owner of the apartments, etc., the information is sufficient; the general allegations not being limited by the particular allegation that defendant was not the owner of the apartment, etc., even though that allegation be taken to refer to the ownership of the realty, and not the lease and furniture which were the subjects of the misrepresentations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Robert R. Rogers was convicted of obtaining money by false and fraudulent pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. A. Bridges, J. B. Tatlow and Jesse R. Shafer, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime of obtaining money by false and fraudulent representations and pretenses. He appeals from the judgment entered after his conviction by a verdict of the jury. The evidence presented in the trial court and brought here under the alternative method of appeal tells a convincing story of the consummation of a bare-faced scheme by which a working girl was defrauded of her savings to the amount of $600. The complainant testified that she, together with a girl friend, desired to purchase the lease and furniture of some lodging house which they might thereafter conduct. Through a friend they were introduced to this appellant, who appeared to be in the business of negotiating such deals; that appellant took them to a hotel which he said he could secure for them, and requested them to make a deposit so that he might bind the bargain. Thereupon he was given by the complainant a check for the sum of $25. Several days elapsed, at which time he reported to complainant that the negotiations were not entirely closed, and finally he reported that he was unable to make the deal for the house which he had exhibited, and told the complainant that he had another house which he wanted her to look at. This witness testified:

> "He told us that he had bought that place, he got that place, and he wanted us to go over and look at it; that he fell through with the other deal, and he was going to give us that place instead of the Argus Hotel. * * * We went to see the place, and it met with our approval. * * * He said the rent was $226, but he would get it for us for $150. He told us to move over there that night and take possession; that he would come over next morning and fix things."

The complainant and her friend did move into the lodging house, and attempted to take possession at least, but they were ousted therefrom a few days later by the landlord. It appeared in testimony that the appellant neither acquired the ownership of the lease on the premises, nor the ownership of the furniture and furnishings. It further appeared that there were arrearages of rental due from the then tenant of the property to an amount in excess of $400, which the landlord was insisting should be paid before he would consent to a transfer of the lease being made. The return of the money was demanded by the complainant, but the appellant did not return the same, and his arrest followed. It sufficiently appeared by every fair inference to be made from the oral testimony given that complainant relied upon representations as to the ownership of the lodging house so made to her by appellant. It should be further stated that the total amount of $600 was paid over to appellant with intent that the money should be used in the purchase of the hotel first shown to the complainant. However, it also appeared that upon appellant's reporting that he could not consummate the deal for the first house, he continued to hold the money, and it was later agreed that the amount should be applied on the purchase of the second house which appellant claimed he owned. The agreement regarding the purchase of the second house was reduced to writing and signed, which contained the recital made on behalf of Rogers that be sold and transferred all of the household furniture and furnishings at the premises in question, "together with a lease" of the same. The fact that the money was first deposited with appellant with the understanding that he was to purchase the house first exhibited to complainant does not in any wise weaken the position of the prosecution which asserts that the money was in fact paid over on account of the representations made as to the ownership by appellant of the second house. The first deal having fallen through, the money of complainant in the hands of appellant was money which appellant had no ownership of, but he held the same as the agent or trustee for the complainant. When upon his representations she decided to make the purchase of the second lease and furniture, the money would be considered as being then delivered to the appellant for the last-named purpose simultaneously with the execution of the written contract covering the alleged deal.

[1] The point made that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict to us appears not to be well taken. The information charged that the appellant represented and pretended that:

> He "was then and there the owner of the furniture and lease of the Tradewind Apartments, in the city of Los Angeles; * * * that the same was then and there free and clear of all incumbrances, and then and there offered to sell the same to the said Ella Kunkel for the sum of $2,500, $600 in cash and $1,100 to be paid at the rate of $50 per month, according to the provisions of a certain contract. * * *"

It is thoroughly illustrated by the evidence that defendant intended, when he stated that he was the owner of the apartments (it was so understood by the complainant), to convey the information that he was the owner of the leasehold interest, together with the furnishings. As before stated, the evidence showed that he had never acquired the lease nor the right of possession thereunder from the landlord or owner, and consequently never delivered anything of value to complainant. As a matter of fact, the furniture was also incumbered by a mortgage. The evidence was amply sufficient to sustain the verdict.

[2] Objection was made in the trial court, and it is also urged here, to the introduction of the testimony showing statements made with reference to the hotel which appellant first proposed to sell to complainant. It will be remembered that the money of the complainant was placed in the hands of appellant for the purpose, first, of consummating the deal which he pretended could be made for the house first exhibited, and the whole transaction, including the negotiation and making of the agreement for the apartments, was so connected that such evidence was properly admitted as showing the whole circumstances of the transaction. The jury could not well have been given a clear understanding of the matter without being furnished evidence of all such details.

[3] The information charged that as a result of the making of the false pretenses appellant secured from complainant "the sum of $600." Appellant complains that this recitation in the information did not contain a description of anything of value; that is, that there should have been coupled with it some statement that the money was lawful money or current coin of the United States. We think that the allegation in this particular is sufficient. It will be assumed as necessary inference that the money so described was money of the United States and not money of a foreign country. While not precisely in point as to the facts, the decision in the case of People v. Green, 15 Cal. 512, is authority for this holding. See, also, the case of People v. Poggi, 19 Cal. 600.

[4] Another complaint made by appellant is that the information failed to charge a public offense in that it was not set forth therein that the particular representations and pretenses alleged to have been made were untrue. The information, after setting out specifically the representations made and to which we have hereinbefore referred, contained a general allegation that:

> "In truth and in fact each and all of the said pretenses and representations so made as aforesaid by the said R. R. Rogers to the said Ella Kunkel were then and there in all respects utterly false, fraudulent, and untrue, and were well known by the said R. R. Rogers to be false, fraudulent, and untrue."

There was a further statement in the information that the said Rogers was not then and there the owner of the apartments, and that the same were not then and there free of incumbrance. Counsel argue from this that such statement is a statement affecting the ownership of the apartments as distinguished from the lease and furniture. The information first charged that the representations were that appellant was the owner of the furniture and lease. We do not concede that this latter statement in any wise limited the effect of the general allegation that each and all of the pretenses and representations "so made as aforesaid" were untrue, but were we to concede logic to such construction, it still appears that the appellant represented that he was the owner of the leasehold interest, which was an interest in the realty and which representation would be negatived by the allegation that he was not in fact the owner of the apartments, if the latter allegation is deemed to refer alone to the realty. However, the general allegation was present asserting that all of the representations made were untrue, and this we think sufficient. We find nothing in the case of People v. Terrill, 127 Cal. 99, 59 Pac. 836, to change our view upon this matter, and cite in support of our holding People v. Hamberg, 84 Cal. 468, 24 Pac. 298, and the argument of the decision in People v. Bryant, 119 Cal. 595, 51 Pac. 960. All of the acts of the defendant, as illustrated by the evidence in this case, show beyond any question a deliberate intent to secure money of the complainant fraudulently and without returning any thing of value therefor. The swindle as planned and carried out was without shadow of excuse or palliating circumstance.

No other points are presented or relied upon which we think are entitled to any consideration here.

The judgment is affirmed.

LA HABRA OIL CO. v. FRANCIS.

(Civ. 2150.)

1. Corporations 🔑243(3) — Liability of Trustee Stockholder for Assessments.

A trustee, holding corporate stock as trustee for others, although the names of the persons for whom he holds are known to the corporation, is personally liable for assessments levied by the corporation for the purpose of paying corporate debts, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 313, as to voting stock held by trustee, or section 322, under which creditors of a corporation may not enforce stockholders' liability against pledgees or trustees, for the latter section does not, as between the corporation and its legal stockholders, purport to limit the right to enforce assessments, whether in the nature of calls upon the unpaid subscription contract or strictly as assessments under the statute for the purpose of securing money with which to pay corporate debts.

2. Stipulations 🔑14(1) — Construction — By-Laws of Corporation — Notice of Meeting.

Failure to comply with a corporate by-law requiring "not less than one day's notice" of special directors' meetings was not shown by stipulation that notice was mailed at Pasadena, addressed to a director in Los Angeles, "at least one day before" the meeting, for, even if mailing on the day preceding the meeting would not be sufficient, yet under the stipulation the notice might have been mailed several days before.

3. Corporations 🔑201—Actions—Burden of Proof.

One attacking the validity of a resolution of corporate directors as having been adopted at a special meeting of which insufficient notice was given has the burden of showing affirmatively insufficiency of such notice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by La Habra Oil Company against Ira J Francis. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Oscar C. Mueller and Alfred Wright, both of Los Angeles (Wm. W. Lovett, Jr., of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Heney & Carr and William F. Adams, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This was an action to enforce payment of an assessment levied by the plaintiff corporation. The appeal is taken from a judgment rendered in accordance with the prayer of the complaint.

[1] The appellant held the stock upon which the assessment was levied, as trustee for other persons. In the stipulation of facts upon which the case was decided there appears this recitation:

> "That at the time of the issuance of said certificate No. 133, and the delivery thereof to the defendant, plaintiff knew that the defendant held the stock represented by said certificate as trustee for other persons, a list of whose names was given to plaintiff at the time of the issuance of said certificate."

The main contention upon which we are asked to reverse this judgment is that, as the assessment levied upon the stock held by defendant was an assessment to pay debts of the corporation, no personal liability therefor existed as against this defendant, but that the right to enforce payment of the assessment, other than by sale of the stock, rested in the corporation only as against the persons for whom defendant was acting as trustee. In other words, that a trustee stockholder, where he has disclosed to a corporation the names of persons whom he represents, is not liable personally to the corporation on account of assessments.

We do not believe that either the statute law or the decisions support this contention. It is true that by our Code the creditors of a corporation may not proceed to enforce the stockholders' liability against pledgees or trustees. It is expressly provided in such cases that the equitable owner, and not the trustee, is liable. Civ. Code, § 322. Section 313 of the same Code provides that, whenever a pledgor or beneficial owner fails to represent stock at a stockholders' meeting, the trustee may vote it. Our Supreme Court has declared that a trustee must be deemed the legal owner of the stock, and "as against the corporation and all the world, except his cestui que trust, no inquiry may be had touching his actions in the premises." Market St. Ry. Co. v. Hellman, 109 Cal. 571, 42 Pac. 225. At common law a trustee of stock sustained full liability, even though he was recorded on the books as not being the actual owner of the same, and such is the uniform rule except where modified by statute. Cook on Corporations (6th Ed.) vol. 1, § 244 et seq. We have cited the chief modifications of that rule as expressed in our statute, which do not go to the extent of relieving a trustee stockholder from liability to the corporation. The District Court of Appeal for the First District decided in the case of Union Savings Bank v. Willard, 4 Cal. App. 690, 88 Pac. 1098, that a person holding stock as trustee was liable for calls upon the subscription contract made as assessments. That case we think is directly in point here.

Counsel for appellant insist that because the stock was not fully paid there, and because the assessment was virtually upon the subscription contract, the case should be distinguished from this, which was for the collection of money for the purpose of paying debts of the corporation generally. This argument is pressed because of provisions of section 322 of the Civil Code, cited above. We think that the provisions of that section only relieve the trustee stockholder where creditors seek to enforce the statutory liability in payment of their debts. As between the corporation and its legal stockholders, this section does not purport to limit the right to enforce assessments, and whether those assessments be in the nature of calls upon the unpaid subscription contract, or strictly as assessments under the statute for the purpose of securing money with which to pay corporate debts, we think immaterial.

[2, 3] One point further is made by the appellant. It is insisted that insufficient notice was given of the special meeting of the directors at which the resolution levying the assessment was adopted. In the stipulation of facts it appears that the by-laws of the corporation provided that special meetings of the directors might be called "by the president or vice president, by giving not less than one day's notice." It appeared further in the stipulation that four of the five directors were actually present and acted. The stipulation showed that the secretary had mailed notices, with postage prepaid, to each of the five directors "at least one day before the time set for the meeting; the notice to L. Teatsworth was deposited in the United States post office at Pasadena, Cal., addressed to him at his residence in Los Angeles, Cal." It is claimed that these facts show that insufficient notice was given to Teatsworth, the absent director, for the alleged reason that it appears that the notice to Teatsworth was deposited in the mails the day before the date of the meeting. Conceding that the mailing of the notice on the day preceding the meeting would not be sufficient, where the mailing was made in Pasadena and the director lived in Los Angeles, nevertheless no showing is made that this notice was mailed precisely on the day preceding; it may have been mailed several days before. The burden is upon the appellant to affirmatively show that insufficient notice was given. Stockton C. H. & A. Works v. Houser, 109 Cal. 1, 41 Pac. 809; Balfour-Guthrie Co. v. Woodworth, 124 Cal. 169, 56 Pac. 891; Sferlazzo v. Oliphant, 24 Cal. App. 81, 140 Pac. 289. The stipulation of facts here shows that four of the directors assembled at the time stated for the special meeting and that the resolution levying the assessment was thereat duly adopted.

PEOPLE v. AH WING. (Cr. 390.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 6, 1917.)

1. Witnesses 🔑240(2) — Leading Questions.

The court may in its discretion allow leading questions to be addressed to a witness, but the privilege should not be arbitrarily granted to one side and denied to the other.

2. Criminal Law 🔑438—Evidence—Photographs.

In a prosecution for murder, the admission of photographs of the place of the killing was not improper, though they showed sticks of wood laid in the street to indicate witness' idea of positions of deceased and defendant, where they were only used as an illustration.

3. Homicide 🔑166(1), 174(1) — Evidence — Motive.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence that after the homicide defendant went toward the tong headquarters was admissible as bearing on his effort to conceal himself and as indicating the tong's connection with the killing, and so furnishing a motive for the crime.

4. Criminal Law 🔑656(9) — Trial—Remarks of Court.

In a trial for murder, where the district attorney cross-examined a witness by asking an impeaching question, the court's remark that it could not see any conflict in the testimony as read and the testimony of the witness was not improper as an invasion of the province of the jury.

5. Witnesses 🔑287(1)—Redirect Examination—Explanation.

Where an officer testified that on the night of the shooting he saw one B. near the scene of the murder, and his attention was called to his testimony at the preliminary examination that he did not see B. at that time, his explanation on redirect that he meant by his former testimony that he did not talk with B. until the next day was proper; such right being recognized by Code Civ. Proc. § 2052.

6. Criminal Law 🔑706—Conduct of District Attorney—Examination of Witness.

In a trial for murder, where the district attorney apparently believed that an important witness for defendant was not telling the truth, he had a right to use every legal means within his power to vindicate such belief, and though his examination was unduly prolonged and unnecessarily persistent, and included some improper questions, the court could not say that it was prejudicial, as tending to discredit the Chinese witnesses.

7. Criminal Law 🔑1170½(5) — Appeal — Harmless Error.

Where matters as to which an important witness for defendant was interrogated and which might not have been within the proper range of cross-examination were clearly established by other witnesses, the cross-examination furnished no just ground for complaint.

8. Criminal Law 🔑1170(1) — Meaning of Expression—Harmless Error.

In a trial for murder, where defendant's counsel sought to show by the interpreter that in using the expression "angry" the witness had used a Chinese word indicating an appearance of the face, the court's exclusion of the explanation was harmless, where it clearly appeared that the expression had such meaning.

9. Criminal Law 🔑706—Conduct of District Attorney—Questions.

In a trial for murder, the court could not say that the district attorney was guilty of improper conduct in asking a Chinese witness whether a tong had threatened a tong war if defendant was convicted and whether the witness was testifying as he was because he knew of such threatened war, as the court must assume that the district attorney acted in good faith, believing that he had the legal right to ask such questions, though objection thereto was sustained.

10. Criminal Law 🔑448(3)—Evidence—Belief.

Where one element in the theory of self-defense was that defendant believed his life was in danger, it was proper for him to testify whether he believed he was in danger of death or great bodily harm, though the jury would not be compelled to accept his statement.

11. Criminal Law ⚷1170(2) — Appeal — Harmless Error.

In such case error in excluding such statement was cured where the question was fully covered by other questions and answers.

12. Criminal Law ⚷706—Conduct of District Attorney—Age of Defendant.

In a trial for murder, where defendant, a Chinese person, testified in chief that he was 18 years old, the district attorney, apparently believing that he was perhaps 28 years old, was not guilty of improper conduct in seeking to compel such admission from defendant or in asking him in reference to his identification papers.

13. Witnesses ⚷248(2) — Striking Unresponsive Answer.

In a trial for murder, where defendant was asked whether the first time he shot deceased he intended to kill him, answer, "I was protecting my own life; I was afraid," did not give a direct answer, and the court was not in error in striking it out as unresponsive.

14. Criminal Law ⚷655(1) — Prejudice of Court—Sentence.

In a trial for murder, the fact that the court imposed a sentence of life imprisonment did not show prejudice, as it would be assumed that the court believed such sentence was deserved, and any subsequent prejudice would not have affected the fairness of the trial.

15. Criminal Law ⚷1186(4) — Appeal — Harmless Error.

Where the defendant's story of the conduct of deceased seemed highly improbable, and where, even if true, it appeared substantially without conflict that defendant was not justified in firing successive shots, and where his guilt was made quite clear from the other testimony, any errors in the rulings upon testimony, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, were no grounds for reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; John Hancock, Judge.

Ah Wing was convicted of murder, and from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

A. H. Ashley, Gordon A. Stewart, and Hugh J. Tye, all of Stockton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Appellant was charged, with one Henry Lee, with the crime of murder, and on a separate trial was convicted of murder of the second degree and sentenced to life imprisonment. His associate was convicted of murder of the first degree, and his conviction recently affirmed by this court. People v. Henry Lee, 168 Pac. 694. It is sufficient to refer to said decision for a general statement of the case, and it may be further said that therein were considered some of the important points urged herein for a reversal. However, it is proper to state that, speaking generally, the record here presents the defendant in a somewhat less odious light than Henry Lee was exhibited in the other record, though by this it is not meant to say that the evidence is insufficient to warrant the verdict. Indeed, there could be found ample justification for a conviction of the higher offense, but there seems herein more plausibility in the contention that the defendant acted in self-defense than in the other case, and more reason in his claim that certain alleged errors resulted to his prejudice. As to these, however, it is manifest that many of the rulings complained of cannot be successfully assailed, and some of them are so inconsequential as to merit no specific attention. The others that we deem worthy of notice, we proceed briefly to consider.

[1] The rule is too well settled to be now questioned that the court may in its discretion allow leading questions to be addressed to a witness. It is true that the privilege should not be arbitrarily granted to one side and denied to the other. And it seems that the prosecution herein was somewhat more favored in that respect than the defendant, but we cannot say that any prejudice resulted therefrom.

[2] As to the photographic exhibits, what was said in the Lee Case will apply here, and we need add nothing further.

[3] The testimony as to the flight of his codefendant raises a more serious question in this case than in the other. If it appeared without substantial conflict that appellant fled, the cases in that respect would be similar, but Wing denied that he fled; his statement being that after the shooting he walked toward the headquarters of the Suey Sing tong. Thus, under the authorities cited, there is some force in the claim that the ruling was prejudicially erroneous.

We can see nothing improper in the action of the court in permitting the district attorney to show that the defendant after the homicide went toward said headquarters. Certainly the inquiry related to a circumstance in the case that might be legitimately construed as an effort to conceal himself, or as indicating the connection of said tong with the killing, and thus furnish a motive for the crime. At any rate, the fact was fully covered by the testimony of the defendant himself, and there seems to be no doubt that he did actually go in that direction, and while apparently not very important, the circumstance furnished some ground, however slight, for the support of respondent's contention as to the tong's connection with the crime.

[4] On cross-examination the attention of police officer Ingalls was called to a purported statement made by him at the preliminary examination as to the point at which he first saw deceased and the defendants at the time of the shooting. An objection was made by the district attorney on the ground that there was no contradiction therein, and the court said:

"The court cannot see any conflict in the testimony as read to him and the testimony as now given by the witness."

This is claimed to have been an invasion of the province of the jury. But we think the question amounted to an impeaching question, and the district attorney had the right to make such objection. The court was therefore called upon to determine whether there appeared to be any conflict. In sustaining the objection it was necessarily determined that there was no conflict, and the court added nothing to the force or effect of the ruling by making said statement. An examination of the record convinces us that the ruling was correct, and therefore we think there is nothing in the circumstance warranting criticism.

[5] Officer Fredericks testified that on the night of the shooting he saw near the scene of the homicide one Barthold, and then his attention was called to his testimony at the preliminary examination that he did not see said Barthold at that time, and that he first saw him the next day. On redirect examination he was permitted to explain that he meant by his former testimony that he did not talk with Barthold until the next day. This was entirely proper. It would be a very harsh and unjust rule that closed the mouth of a witness to any explanation of apparently conflicting and irreconcilable statements. It is always permissible to make an explanation, but the force or effect of it is, of course, for the jury. Section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure recognizes the right of the witness to explain, which right no appellate court, we think, would deny.

We find nothing seriously objectionable in the method pursued by the district attorney in the examination of the witness Barthold, although in that connection bitter criticism against that officer is directed by appellant. Some of the questions were somewhat suggestive, but we cannot say that the purpose was otherwise than to elicit the truth, or that such result was not accomplished.

[6, 7] One Mah Guey was an important witness for the defendant, and complaint is made of his cross-examination, appellant going so far as to state that it constitutes "simply a long prejudicial argument to the jury tending to throw distrust upon Mah Guey, and thereby cast doubt upon all of the Chinese witnesses." We do not so regard it. In the light of calm reflection, doubtless some reason is disclosed for criticism of the cross-examination, but we do not think that thereby any serious error was committed. No doubt, the district attorney believed that the witness was not telling the truth, and he had the right to use every legal means within his power to vindicate his belief. The examination seems to have been unduly prolonged and the district attorney unnecessarily persistent as to unimportant circumstances, and some of the questions should not have been propounded at all, but we cannot say that by anything said or done while the witness was on the stand appellant's cause was illegally impaired. Indeed, as far as concerns the witness himself, he seems to have emerged from the avalanche of questions with his credit unimpaired and his original story remaining unshaken for what it was worth. As to some matters, covering which he was interrogated and which may not have been within the proper range of cross-examination, we may say further that they were established by other witnesses beyond question, and hence they furnish no just ground for complaint.

[8] While one Hong Jo was on the stand appellant's counsel sought to show by the interpreter that in using an expression "angry" the witness had used a Chinese word indicating an appearance of the face. The court would not permit it, but, whether the court was right or wrong, it is entirely apparent from the testimony of the witness that such was his meaning; in other words, it clearly appears that he referred to the appearance of the face.

[9] We cannot say that the district attorney was guilty of improper conduct in asking Lee Wah the following questions:

"Isn't it a fact that the Suey Sings have threatened there will be a tong war here if the defendant is convicted?" and "Isn't it a fact that you are testifying in this case the way you have because you know that the Suey Sings have threatened a tong war in case the defendant is convicted?"

We cannot assume that the district attorney did not believe such fact existed or that the witness had knowledge of it, or that the knowledge of such threat affected his testimony. We must assume, on the contrary, that the district attorney acted in good faith, believing that he had the legal right to ask the questions, although it seems the court sustained an objection to them.

[10, 11] It is claimed that appellant was not allowed to testify as to the condition of his own mind at the time of the shooting. One important element in his theory of self-defense was that he believed his life was in danger, and his mental condition in that respect was, of course, a matter peculiarly within his own knowledge. While the jury would not be compelled to accept his statement, it would seem entirely proper for him to testify whether he actually did believe that he was in danger of death or great bodily harm. People v. Overacker, 15 Cal. App. 620, 115 Pac. 756; Barnhart v. Fulkerth, 93 Cal. 497, 29 Pac. 50; Kyle v. Craig, 125 Cal. 107, 57 Pac. 791. The particular question to which appellant refers is as follows:

"Did you at the time believe, or not believe, that it was either your life or his life?"

But it is apparent that the question was fully covered by other questions and answers, as the following from the record will show:

"Why did you shoot Lee Yow Juck? A. He threatened to kill me in the tan game. Had it not been that Mah Guey took the pistol from him, he would have killed me in the tan game, and then he threatened to go and get another pistol and kill me, so I was afraid of him. * * * Q. Now why did you continue shooting as Lee Yow Juck went across the street? A. His hand was still in his pocket, and I was afraid he might kill me."

He could have added nothing to the force of the foregoing by stating that he believed it was either his "life" or the "life" of the deceased. There was a similar situation in the Overacker Case wherein it was held that the error was cured.

[12] Appellant is very much dissatisfied with his cross-examination. One circumstance that he especially emphasizes relates to his age. He had testified in chief that he was 18 years old. Naturally this was important, as the average juror would be inclined to treat a minor more leniently than an adult charged with the same crime. The district attorney apparently believed that the defendant was much older than that, even 28 years old, and he sought earnestly to compel such admission on the part of appellant. We cannot see that he overstepped the bounds of legal propriety in the matter. We think it not censurable that he asked appellant in reference to his identification papers. The production of them manifestly might have been of great significance in the solution of this question. It does, however, appear, we think, that some improper questions were asked by the district attorney, but nothing of a prejudicial character.

[13] Appellant with some warmth complains because the court, on motion of the district attorney, struck out as not responsive the answer to the following question: "The first time you shot him, did you intend to kill him?" The answer was, "I was protecting my own life; I was afraid." It is apparent that it was not a direct answer to the question. In fact, the answer assigned a reason for what he did rather than the purpose he had in view. The question was not objected to, and indeed it was proper, and the court was not in error in insisting upon an answer to it. It may be further said that, as far as the reason thereby given is concerned, appellant gave it without objection in answer to other questions. Of course, if the witness had answered the question, he would have been permitted to explain it. Indeed, the court so advised him. He chose, however, to say that he could not answer in that way.

[14] Appellant contends that the court was prejudiced against him as evidenced by the sentence of life imprisonment meted out to him. We must assume that the court believed he deserved this sentence, and that it was not the result of prejudice. At any rate, it would be no evidence of the existence of any prejudice prior to the conviction of the defendant, and a subsequently acquired prejudice could not have affected the fairness of the trial. In fact, there seems to be no ground for the contention that the court was animated by any other desire than to do exact justice as between the people and the defendant, and since the penalty imposed was within that provided for the crime of murder in the second degree, there is nothing in said circumstance demanding further notice.

[15] Finally, taking a general view of the case, we may conclude in a few words. Some errors were probably committed during the trial, principally in the ruling upon testimony, but there was no invasion of the fundamental rights of the defendant. In our opinion he was justly convicted. To one at all familiar with the Chinese character and the method of Chinese murderers, the story of the conduct of the deceased as told by appellant would seem highly improbable. But, granting it credit, then it appears substantially without conflict that appellant was not justified in what he did. The evidence of his guilt is quite clear from the testimony of white witnesses. And, conceding that there was evidence of justification for the first shot fired by appellant, it appears from his own statements that he followed and shot the deceased when by no fair understanding of the situation or twist of construction of the law could it be said that he had reason to believe that his life was in danger, or that he acted in self-defense.

If section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution is not to be invoked here, then we should not seek to follow it in any case.

BURRELL v. SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA CANNING CO. (Civ. 2144.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 27, 1917.)

1. Sales ⚿178(4)—Acceptance—Waiver of Defects.

Where the purchaser of "cookers" used them throughout the entire season without any statement as to nonacceptance, an attempted rejection was ineffectual.

2. Corporations ⚿300—Assignments—Validity.

Where it was the business custom of the president of plaintiff's assignor to make assignments of its claims, an assignment of a claim to plaintiff for collection was valid, although there had been no meeting of the board of directors authorizing the assignment by the president.

3. Trial ⚿191(3)—Instructions Assuming Facts.

Where, after assignment to plaintiff was admitted in evidence, defendant introduced no evidence with reference thereto, whether there had been a valid assignment was for the court, and it was not error, in instructing, to refer to the seller as "plaintiff's assignor" in such a way as to assume that the assignment had been made to plaintiff.

4. SALES 🔑358(1)—ACTION FOR PRICE—EVIDENCE.

The question as to the expense of sending fruit to cold storage, while the fruit-canning machinery bought of plaintiff's assignor was out of order, was properly excluded, where the expense was not incurred, and was not claimed by defendant as an element of damages.

5. SALES 🔑418(19)—SPECULATIVE DAMAGES.

In an action for the price of machinery, the purchaser could not claim damages sustained by reason of the nonuser of the capacity of its plant as a whole during the canning season, due to defects in the machinery; such damages being speculative, and not contemplated by the parties as a result of a breach.

6. TRIAL 🔑198—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF COURT—MEANING OF TECHNICAL TERMS.

The court properly instructed as to the meaning of "perfectly constructed mechanically"; the words having a legal technical meaning.

7. PLEADING 🔑406(6) — DEFECTS — TRIAL OF MATTERS NOT IN ISSUE—ESTOPPEL.

Although rescission was not properly pleaded, where the case was tried upon that theory, defendant is estopped to object that no issue of rescission was raised.

8. SALES 🔑364(5)—RESCISSION—CONDITION PRECEDENT—COMPENSATION.

The buyer's use of the machinery throughout the entire canning season, during which time no rescission was made, and the attempted rejection three months thereafter, when it notified the seller to remove the machinery, justified an instruction that, to effect rescission, the return or tender of the property should be accompanied by an offer of compensation for the immediate use of the property.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1002—FEES BASED ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

A jury finding, based on conflicting evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by F. L. Burrell against the Southern California Canning Company. From an adverse judgment, and from an order denying motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Byron Waters and Henry Goodcell, both of San Bernardino, for appellant. F. J. Hambly, of San Jose, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. Plaintiff, as assignee of a certain corporation known as the Anderson-Barngrover Manufacturing Company, brought this action against defendant to recover the price of certain machinery and mechanical appliances used in the canning of fruits, which were alleged to have been sold by the Anderson company to defendant. Three counts or causes of action are set forth in the complaint. The defendant admits the ordering and receipt of the goods, but by answer and counterclaim raises certain issues as to the performance of the contract, and claims damages for alleged breach of warranty in connection therewith in a sum greatly in excess of the amount sued for.

The trial was had by jury, which rendered both a general and a special verdict. The special verdict found in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $5,824.42 based upon the first count, the further sum of $4,427 under the second, and the sum of $708.39 upon the third count. It also found in favor of the defendant in the sum of $2,500 as damages for breach of warranty as to articles embraced in the second count, and this sum was deducted from the amount awarded plaintiff under the special verdict, and a general verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $8,459.81. Defendant moved the court to vacate the verdict and grant a new trial, and urged as reasons therefor the insufficiency of the evidence to justify it, that it was against law, and upon the further ground of errors in law occurring at the trial, consisting of certain rulings as to the admission of evidence and in the giving of certain instructions to the jury. The motion was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and such order.

The main argument of appellant is based upon the claim that the evidence is insufficient to support that part of the verdict based upon the second count of plaintiff's complaint. Under this count plaintiff sought to recover the price of certain articles, called "cookers," which were used in the canning of fruits. By its answer defendant admitted the contract for the purchase and sale of these articles, but alleged that they were manufactured for a specific purpose and under a specific warranty, and that they were not fit for the purpose as warranted, and further that they were never accepted, and it is upon such question of acceptance that the evidence is claimed to be insufficient. The trial was a protracted one, lasting many days, and numerous witnesses were called on behalf of both plaintiff and defendant, and much evidence was adduced upon this subject, and, as is usual in such cases, there was a substantial conflict upon this question. There is, however, abundant evidence to show that the cooking machines furnished were in accordance with the contract, and were accepted, and we fail to see how the jury could have arrived at a different conclusion.

[1] The articles were delivered by the plaintiff's assignor in the early part of the canning season, were used by the defendant, and no attempt was made to reject them until long after the canning season was over, and when payment was demanded for them, at which time defendant not only refused to pay for the cookers, but also refused payment for the other machinery here sued for. While the evidence shows that there was a period of trouble, due in part to defendant's misuse of the machines, they were operated throughout the entire canning season by defendant in its business, and no notice or statement of nonacceptance was ever made during such period, and not until the appliances had fulfilled their purpose for that year. The attempted rejection at that time was ineffectual. Jackson v. Porter Land Co., 151 Cal.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

32, 90 Pac. 122. Besides this, the preponderance of evidence shows that there was no tentative or experimental use of the articles, but rather a complete acceptance of them.

[2] The alleged errors of the trial court as to the admission of evidence and the giving of instructions are numerous. The first point urged in this behalf is the action of the court in overruling defendant's objection to the admission in evidence of the instrument of assignment. This evidence was properly received. The assignment was signed by the president of the Anderson company for and in its name and bore the corporate seal; and while the president testified that there had been no meeting of the board of directors authorizing him to execute the instrument or to affix the seal, full proof was made that it was the business custom of plaintiff's assignor to execute assignments as here, and further that such claim had been assigned to plaintiff for collection and not otherwise. No contrary showing was made by defendant to overcome this evidence, and the admission of the assignment was proper. Leitch v. Marx, 21 Cal. App. 208, 131 Pac. 328.

[3] In this connection the further claim, that the court erred when instructing the jury by referring to the Anderson company as "plaintiff's assignor" in such a way as to assume that the assignment had been made, is equally without merit. The assignment having been properly admitted in evidence, and the defendant not having introduced any evidence subsequently on the point, no conflict existed, and the matter became a question of law, with which the jury was not concerned.

[4] Counsel for appellant also assigns as error the ruling of the court, made on its own motion, that the question as to the expense of sending fruit to cold storage, for the purpose of preserving it while the machines were out of order, was immaterial. This expense was never incurred, and was not claimed by defendant in its answer or counterclaim as an element of damage, and was properly excluded.

[5] So, also, the claim of error on the part of the court in sustaining plaintiff's objection as to the damage sustained by defendant, by reason of the nonuser of any portion of the capacity of its plant as a whole during the season, is without merit. The testimony was offered to sustain a claim for damages as set forth in the answer and cross-complaint, based upon delays and lack of capacity, due to the defects in the machinery, especially the cookers, by reason of which it is alleged that the entire plant of defendant was in a measure rendered useless during the whole season, and to that extent the defendant was deprived of the use and benefit of its investment. This amount of damage was arrived at by alleging that the investment exceeded $100,000, and that the rental value was $10,000, and that by reason of these facts the defendant was deprived of the use and benefit of its investment to the extent of two-thirds thereof, and to its disadvantage in the sum of $6,666.66. The ruling of the court was proper. Aside from the fact that the question called for the conclusion of the witness, such damages were remote and speculative, and were such as were not anticipated or contemplated by the parties when making the contract as the probable result of its breach. Hunt Bros. v. San Lorenzo, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 51, 55, 87 Pac. 1093, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 913.

[6] Nor is there any merit in the objection to the action of the court in instructing the jury as to the meaning of the term "perfectly constructed mechanically." In this behalf it is claimed that the question as to what was meant by these words was not a question of law but rather a question of fact for the jury; and it is argued that the meaning of this term could be explained by evidence, but not by any dictum or direction of the court. It is not only the proper function, but the duty, of a court to instruct a jury as to the use of words having a legal technical meaning. Here all the court did was to define the term, and it left it to the jury to decide whether the machines were so constructed. In so doing it committed no error.

[7] Equally untenable is the contention that the court committed error in instructing the jury in what cases a party to a contract may rescind. It is admitted that the court followed the Code provision, and that the instruction as given is a correct statement of the law; but it is claimed that the giving of the instruction was calculated to mislead the jury to the prejudice of appellant, for the reason that there was no issue of rescission in the case. While a rescission was not perfectly pleaded, the case was tried upon this theory. Defendant is therefore estopped to object that no such issue was raised.

[8] In this connection counsel also complains of an instruction wherein the court told the jury that, to effect a rescission, the return or tender of the property "should be accompanied by an offer of compensation for the intermediate use of the property." Defendant used the machinery throughout the entire canning season, during which time no rescission was made; and defendant's attempted rejection three months thereafter, when it notified plaintiff's assignor to remove the machinery, justified the court in instructing the jury as it did. Furthermore, the court in other instructions to the jury fully and correctly covered this subject.

Other instructions are excepted to and criticized as being contradictory. It is admitted that these intructions, taken by themselves, state a true rule; but it is claimed that the giving of them caused prejudice to the defendant. We have examined the instructions in the light of this objection, and are of the opinion that as a whole they state the law fully and fairly, and that the giving of them in no manner caused prejudice.

[9] Finally, complaint is made that the amount of damages allowed to defendant for breach of warranty is less than the evidence shows them to be; but the evidence upon this subject was conflicting, for which reason we are unable to disturb the finding made thereon.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WOOLLEY v. BATCHELDER et al.

(Civ. 2083.)

1. Brokers ⇨84(1) — Commissions — Right to.

For a broker to recover commissions for services rendered in connection with the sale of land, it must appear that he was duly authorized by an instrument in writing to act as the agent of the owners of the property in negotiating or accomplishing a sale of the property, and that he had either accomplished such sale under the agency, or had procured a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy on the terms authorized.

2. Brokers ⇨49(2) — Commissions — Right to.

The holder of the legal title to a mining claim in which two others had interests, through the aid of plaintiff, who was not acting under any written authority, entered into a written contract with one W., which gave W. the right to enter on the property, and do development work upon rendering a monthly account to the holder of the legal title, through plaintiff as her agent, and paying 20 per cent. of the amount of the clean-ups resulting from operation of the mine. W. was given an option to purchase the mine for the price of $40,000, which was to be paid by the aggregation of the percentages of the clean-ups paid to the holder of the legal title. The option agreement contained a clause providing that plaintiff might represent the holder of the legal title. After the death of the holder of the legal title, the others interested in the mining claim by action established their right to share in the claim and ratified the agreement giving W. an option to purchase. For over three years W. made no payments under the option, whereupon all parties interested in the claim conveyed their shares to him. Held, that plaintiff was not entitled to commissions as a broker on the theory that the parties interested in the claim accepted his services in effecting a sale, and then to defraud him dealt directly with the purchaser, for W. made no payments for a long period, and no sale resulted as a result of the option contract entered into through plaintiff's services.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by H. M. Woolley against Nancy E. Batchelder and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fabius T. Finch, of San Francisco, for appellant. J. A. Elston, of Berkeley, and G. Clark, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action brought to recover a real estate agent's commission.

The facts of the case are in the main undisputed, and are these: The property involved in the transaction out of which the plaintiff claims his right to a commission to have arisen is a mining property known as the Rising Hope mine. Many years ago the mine was located by three persons named McCrellish, Hamilton, and Batchelder, the title to the property being taken in the name of McCrellish alone, and upon his death it was distributed to his widow, Mary P. McCrellish, and stood in her name until her death in the years 1911. It is conceded, however, that Hamilton and Batchelder, the associates of McCrellish, had at all times each a one-fifth interest in the mine, which in course of time descended to Mrs. Batchelder and Mrs. Hamilton, the defendants herein. McCrellish in his lifetime owned, and his widow succeeded to, a three-fifths interest in the mine. Efforts were made from time to time to sell the mine, but without success, until finally in the year 1910, Mrs. McCrellish, through the aid and services of the plaintiff in this action—who, however, was not acting under any written authority at the time—succeeded in making a contract with one Schuyler N. Warren, by the terms of which the latter was given the right to enter upon the property and do certain development work thereon, rendering a monthly account to Mrs. McCrellish, through the plaintiff as her agent, of his labor and expenditures upon the premises, and paying into the Bank of California 20 per cent. of the gross amount of the clean-ups resulting from his operation of the mine. Warren was also by this agreement given an option to purchase the mine for the price of $40,000, which was to be paid by the aggregation of these sums accruing to Mrs. McCrellish from the clean-ups of the mine. The agreement contained a clause providing that:

> "H. M. Woolley may represent the party of the first part [Mrs. McCrellish] and J. R. Partridge and G. W. Englehardt may represent the party of the second part [Warren] in all the above-mentioned matters."

It was also provided that a deed conveying the entire property should be placed in escrow with the Bank of California to be delivered to Warren when the sum of $40,000, the purchase price of the mine, was paid in the manner specified in the agreement. This deed was so deposited, and with it Mrs. McCrellish also deposited two written orders directing the bank to pay the plaintiff herein 10 per cent. of all moneys paid in by Warren, and also to pay Mr. Partridge 10 per cent. of such moneys. Mrs. McCrellish died in February, 1911, and not long after her death Mrs. Hamilton and Mrs. Batchelder brought an action against the executor of her estate to have it determined that they were each the owner of a one-fifth interest in the mine. Judgment was rendered in their favor in the action in July, 1911, and about the time of its entry the plaintiffs in that action made an agreement with the executor of Mrs. McCrellish's estate by which they ratified expressly the Warren agreement. It does not appear, however, that either Mrs. Hamilton or Mrs. Batchelder at the time of ratifying the Warren agreement were aware of the existence of the orders in favor of Woolley and Partridge deposited with the escrow deed, or that they became aware of the same until the present action was begun. In the month of November, 1911, after the rights and interests of Mrs. Hamilton and Mrs. Batchelder had been established in the aforesaid action, they each executed and caused to be deposited in escrow with the Bank of California their respective deeds to Warren each to an undivided one-fifth interest in the mine, for a consideration to each of the sum of $8,000, to be paid by Warren in the manner specified in the original agreement with him made by Mrs. McCrellish and which they had theretofore ratified. During the period of 3½ years from and after the date of the original Warren agreement no clean-ups occurred at the mine as the result of the latter's operation of it under said agreement, and consequently no money whatever was ever paid into the bank under or by virtue of said agreement or of anything done thereunder. In the month of November, 1913, Mrs. Hamilton and Mrs. Batchelder sold and transferred their interests in the mine to Warren for a cash payment and price of $3,000 each. Subsequently the heirs and legatees of Mrs. McCrellish, of whom the plaintiff in this action was one, sold and conveyed their three-fifths interest in the mine to Warren for the sum of $9,000. Thereafter the plaintiff commenced this action to recover a real estate agent's commission from Mrs. Hamilton and Mrs. Batchelder, his contention being that under and by virtue of the original Warren agreement subsequently ratified by them he had been constituted the agent in writing of the owners of the mine in so far as any sale of it to Warren was concerned, and that the said defendants having thereafter and throughout the life of said agreement dealt with Warren directly, and sold their interests in the mine to him, they were bound to pay to the plaintiff a commission on their said sale.

Upon the trial of the case the court found against the plaintiff upon this contention, and rendered judgment in the defendant's favor, from which judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion that the trial court was not in error in its findings and judgment in this case. In order to a recovery against these defendants it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that he was duly authorized by an instrument in writing to act as the agent of the owners of the property in negotiating or accomplishing the sale of the property to some one, and that he had either accomplished such sale under such agency, or had procured a purchaser therefor who was ready, willing, and able to purchase the same according to the terms of his agency. But in this respect an inspection of the original agreement with Warren upon which the plaintiff relies for proof of his agency shows that he had no authority in writing during any part of the negotiations with Warren until they had been consummated in the agreement in writing with Warren, and that the clause in the agreement designating the plaintiff as the agent of Mrs. McCrellish had reference not to what had already been done in the way of finding and producing Warren as a prospective purchaser of the property, but to what Warren was thereafter to do in connection with his operation of the mine and with the possible exercise of his option to purchase the same. The plaintiff could have earned or been awarded no commissions from Mrs. McCrellish or any one else upon the strength of that agreement until Warren had exercised such option and had consummated the purchase of the mine in accordance with the terms of his agreement. It is conceded that Warren never did this, and that he never in fact did anything in the way of exercising his said option or of making any of the deposits in the Bank of California, through the accumulation of which the purchase price of the mine, the sum of $40,000, was to be paid. The agreement with Warren was in no sense a binding contract on his part to purchase the property or to do any of the acts of development and operation through the means of which its purchase might eventually be accomplished by him. It was at best a mere option which was never exercised; and it nowhere appears that Warren was ever at any time ready or willing or able to purchase the property for the sum of $40,000 or for anything approaching said sum. This being so, we think it is clear that the defendants in this action were in no wise bound to pay the plaintiff a commission on account of any services rendered by him under the terms of the McCrellish agreement, or of the defendants' ratification of the same, and that after the lapse of three years' time following the execution of said agreement, during which nothing had been done in the way of carrying into effect its terms, the defendants were at liberty to deal with Warren independently and to enter into a cash sale of their interests in the mine to him, and that their transaction in so doing has no relation to the original agreement, and cannot be construed as in any way carrying into effect its terms so as to entitle the plaintiff to claim that they were dealing with a purchaser produced by him. The record contains no evidence that the plaintiff had anything to do with the transaction between these defendants and Warren directly by which he became the purchaser of their two-fifths interest in the property for a cash price less than one-half of the amount stipulated as its purchase price in Warren's original option.

The cases cited by counsel for the appellant, to the effect that an owner of property after having duly authorized a broker to find a purchaser for the same cannot deal with such purchaser directly, and thus defraud the broker out of his commissions, have no application to the facts of the case at bar. Whatever may have been the scope or binding effect of the original appointment of the plaintiff as the agent of Mrs. McCrellish, and of the defendants' ratification of that agreement, we are satisfied that it cannot be extended to cover the later and independent transaction between Warren and these defendants directly with which the plaintiff had no connection and in which he is not shown to have taken any part.

It follows that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. COLLINS. (Cr. 561.)

1. LEWDNESS 🔑10—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.
Evidence in a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 269a, for cohabitation and adultery held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑406(2)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS.
In such prosecution a certified copy of the certificate of the death of the woman's child, signed by the defendant, admitting her residence and his to be the same, and that he was the father of the child, filed as required by the Vital Statistics Act (St. 1915, p. 575) §§ 4, 7, and 21, was admissible as a fact tending to prove that at the time of signing the certificate he was living with the woman as her husband, and not as her boarder, as she claimed.

3. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1086(14)—APPEAL—FAILURE TO INSTRUCT.
Defendant in a criminal case, even if entitled to an instruction that certain impeaching testimony had been admitted only for purposes of impeachment, could not complain of its absence where the record failed to show that he asked the court to give any instructions.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Truman D. Collins was convicted of the statutory offense of cohabitation and adultery, and from the judgment and from an order denying the motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Edward T. Lannon, of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was convicted upon an information charging him with the crime of cohabitation and adultery as defined by section 269a of the Penal Code. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The evidence is sufficient to establish the fact that the offense was committed within one year prior to the 4th day of June, 1917, when the amended information was filed. It was shown by the testimony of witnesses that the defendant and his paramour together occupied a house in San Diego for a year or more, beginning in May, 1916, and that the defendant, in conversation with persons residing in the neighborhood, referred to the woman as his wife. These facts are not contradicted by any evidence in the record, except that defendant and the woman testified that he was there only as a boarder.

[2] The woman had with her at that house a baby, which died on July 3, 1916, it being then of the age of nine months. The court did not err in admitting in evidence a certified copy of the certificate of death of that child. It was admissible as an official document showing that the defendant, over his own signature, admitted at that date that his place of residence and the place of residence of the child's mother were the same, and that he was the father of the child. The vital statistics act (Stats. 1915, p. 575), in section 4 thereof, provides for a local registrar authorized to receive certificates of death and issue burial permits. Section 7 provides that a certificate of death shall state certain facts, one of which is the name of the father of the deceased, and that those personal and statistical particulars shall be authenticated by the signature of the informant, who may be any competent person acquainted with the facts. Section 21 provides for the issuance of a certified copy of the record of any death registered under the provisions of the act, and that such copy, when properly certified by the state or local registrar, "shall be prima facie evidence in all courts and places of the facts therein stated." While the fact that this defendant was the father of that child (it having been both conceived and born prior to June 4, 1916) would not of itself establish that he was living in a state of cohabitation and adultery with the child's mother on and after June 4, 1916, it was nevertheless a fact tending to prove that at the time of signing the certificate the defendant was living with the child's mother as her husband, and not merely as a boarder.

[3] Appellant claims that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury that certain impeaching testimony had been admitted only for purposes of impeachment. Assuming that the defendant was entitled to such an instruction, he cannot complain of its absence, since the record fails to show that he asked the court to give any instructions. Assuming also that there were some errors in the rulings of the court upon the admission of evidence, they are of comparatively small importance in view of the fact that the guilt of the defendant was fully established by competent evidence.

DINI v. BYRNES et al. (Civ. 2248.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS ⟹327(2)—SALE IN NO-LICENSE TERRITORY.

The prohibitory provision of Wyllie Local Option Law (St. 1911, p. 599) § 13, and section 16, providing that it shall not be unlawful to serve alcoholic liquors by any person at his own home to members of his own family or to his guests, as an act of hospitality, when nothing of value is received in return therefor, and the home is not a place of public resort, do not permit a person conducting the business of selling alcoholic liquor in license territory, there receiving an order for liquor from a person residing in no-license territory, to deliver such liquor to the purchaser at his place of residence, even for the purpose of being served by the purchaser in his own home; for the language of the paragraph refers not to the ultimate purpose of the original sale of the liquor, but to its ultimate distribution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by Silvio Dini and another against R. R. Byrnes and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

C. H. McConaughy, of Ft. Bragg, and Preston & Preston, of Ukiah, for appellants. Hale McCowen, Jr., of Ukiah, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The question presented upon this appeal is whether a person conducting the business of selling alcoholic liquor in license territory, who there receives an order for liquor from a person residing in no-license territory, may lawfully deliver such liquor to said purchaser at his place of residence?

Section 13 of the so-called Wyllie Local Option Law (Stats. 1911, p. 599) forbids such a sale unless it comes within the exceptions contained in section 16 of the same act. That section reads:

> "Nothing in this act shall be interpreted as rendering it unlawful to keep alcoholic liquors for distribution, or to sell or distribute such liquors, in no-license territory in the manner and for the purposes in this section provided."

Then follow seven paragraphs, each relating to a particular manner of or purpose in distributing alcoholic liquor; and of these it is admitted that none but the first and seventh can have any bearing upon the question involved as it relates to this case.

The first of such paragraphs reads:

> "The serving of such liquors by any person at his own home to members of his [own] family or to his guests, as an act of hospitality, when no money or thing of value is received in return therefor, and when said home is not a place of public resort."

The seventh of such paragraphs is as follows:

> "The keeping of alcoholic liquors on the premises where manufactured, receiving orders at such premises for such liquors, and the shipping of the same from such premises; provided, said liquors are not distributed or delivered in no-license territory within the county in which such premises are located, in quantities of less than two gallons, and are not delivered to any person or place in such territory within said county except as follows: * * * (d) To any person at his or her permanent residence. * * *"

The attempted delivery of liquor in the present case was not made by its manufacturer, nor does it appear from the complaint to have been in a quantity of not less than two gallons; so it is apparent that this exception provided by the statute does not cover the case at bar.

This conclusion leaves for consideration the effect of the first paragraph. If the language of that provision is to be construed as meaning that alcoholic liquor may be sold and distributed in no-license territory for the purpose of being served by a resident thereof to his guests in his own home, then the question at issue in this case must be decided in the affirmative. Such a construction, however, would to a great extent nullify the purpose of the enactment, and, we think, should not be indulged if the language can be otherwise reasonably construed. We think it must be obvious that the language of this paragraph refers not to the purpose of the original sale of the liquor, but to the manner of its ultimate distribution; the language of section 16 above quoted being "Sell or distribute such liquors in no-license territory in the manner and for the purposes in this section provided."

This seems to be the view adopted by the court (Third appellate district) in Golden & Co. v. Justices' Court, 23 Cal. App. 778, 140 Pac. 49, where the construction given here is very vigorously upheld. Upon the authority of that case the judgment herein is affirmed.

MARTY v. SOMERS. (Civ. 2257.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS ⟹31 — NATURE — TORT OR CONTRACT—UNSUCCESSFUL OPERATION.

A complaint alleging that defendant physician was employed by plaintiff to cure him of a certain malady, that defendant advised an operation, that the operation was performed, but left plaintiff in a worse condition, that plaintiff has suffered and still suffers great pain, and has become weakened in body, and his physical health and constitution have been greatly impaired, and that by reason of the premises plaintiff has suffered damages in the sum of $10,000, did not state a cause of action for breach of contract to effect a cure, but an action sounding in tort for damages for defendant's act or neglect, governed by Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, requiring such actions to be brought within one year.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Paul Marty against Howard Somers. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for appellant. Wm. P. Hubbard, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Defendant, being a physician and surgeon, was employed by plaintiff "to cure him of bladder trouble," which the complaint alleges he undertook to do. Thereafter defendant advised plaintiff that an operation was necessary in the treatment of the malady, and agreed with the plaintiff to perform the same for the sum of $250. Said operation was performed, and, according to the complaint, "was unsuccessful, and said defendant did not cure said plaintiff of his malady; that said operation left plaintiff in a worse condition; that plaintiff's urinary organs have become paralyzed, and plaintiff has completely lost the use thereof; that plaintiff has suffered and still suffers great pain, and has become weakened in body, and his physical health and constitution have been greatly impaired; that by reason of the premises plaintiff has suffered damages in the sum of $10,000." The complaint prays judgment for said sum. The action was commenced more than one year after the performance of said operation and treatment, and the defendant demurred to the complaint, and pleaded subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure in bar of the action. This demurrer was sustained, and judgment entered for defendant for his costs, from which plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

In support of the appeal it is urged quite earnestly that the action is one for breach of contract to effect a cure; but it appears quite plain to us, from a consideration of the allegations of the complaint above recited, that the action sounds in tort, and is for the recovery of damages for the defendant's wrongful act or neglect, thus bringing it within the operation of the section of the Code referred to. We think this case is disposed of by what is said in Basler v. Sacramento, etc., Co., 166 Cal. 33, 134 Pac. 993, where Mr. Justice Melvin, after discussing numerous authorities, concludes the court's opinion as follows:

"We see no escape from the reasoning of the foregoing authorities. The demurrer was properly sustained, for the reason that the cause of action was pleaded as one arising ex delicto; but, even if we should regard it as arising upon contract, nevertheless the damages sought are directly referable to the personal injuries suffered by Mrs. Basler, and consequently the time for the commencement of the action is limited by the terms of subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

See, also, Harding v. Liberty Hospital Corp., 171 Pac. 98.

The judgment is affirmed.

MAYER v. GOLDMAN. (Civ. 2245.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 24, 1917.)

APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑977(1) — NEW TRIAL 🔑6—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—MOTION.
An order granting plaintiff a new trial rests largely in the trial court's discretion, and will not be reversed where based upon sharply conflicting evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by Samuel A. Mayer against Isaac Goldman. From an order granting plaintiff a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. H. Wascerwitz, of San Francisco, for appellant. Henry G. W. Dinkelspiel, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this action, after judgment for defendant for his costs, the trial court granted plaintiff's motion for a new trial which was based upon the grounds, among others, that the evidence was insufficient to justify certain findings, and that the court failed to find upon material issues. Defendant appeals.

As has been so often stated by appellate courts, the granting of a motion for a new trial or its refusal is largely a matter of discretion in the trial court, and where, as here, the evidence is sharply conflicting, the court may well, upon consideration of a motion for a new trial, take a different view of its effect than upon its first presentation, and arrive at the conclusion that its findings as made are insufficiently supported by it. With the discretion of the court thus exercised this court will not interfere.

The order is affirmed.

In re LEFAVOR.

LEFAVOR v. LUDOLPH.

(Civ. 2377.)

1. NEWSPAPERS 🔑3(3)—GENERAL CIRCULATION.
A "newspaper of general circulation," as contemplated in Pol. Code, § 4460, providing that such paper must be one "established, published and printed" for one year in a certain place, need not be actually printed at the place of circulation, at least not uninterruptedly.

2. NEWSPAPERS ⚷3(1)—GENERAL CIRCULATION.

Under Pol. Code, § 4460, providing that a paper, to become a "newspaper of general circulation," must be published for a year, the changing of the name of a paper during such year from "the Watts Advertiser" to "the Advertiser" did not change its character or destroy its identity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

In the matter of the application by W. L. Lefavor to secure a judgment declaring a newspaper published in the city of Watts to be a newspaper of general circulation, contested by P. H. Ludolph. From a judgment denying his prayer, the applicant appeals. Reversed, with directions to enter judgment for petitioner.

Neighbours, Hoag & Burke, of Los Angeles, for appellant. A. R. Holston and S. C. Schaefer, both of Los Angeles, and Peebles Shoaff, of Watts, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appellant herein petitioned the superior court for the purpose of securing a judgment declaring a newspaper published in the city of Watts to be a newspaper of general circulation, as defined in section 4460 of the Political Code. We quote the section:

> "A newspaper of general circulation is a newspaper published for the dissemination of local or telegraphic news and intelligence of a general character, having a bona fide subscription list of paying subscribers, and which shall have been established, printed and published at regular intervals, in the state, county, city, city and county, or town, where such publication, notice by publication, or official advertising is given or made, for at least one year preceding the date of such publication, notice or advertisement. A newspaper devoted to the interests, or published for the entertainment or instruction of a particular class, profession, trade, calling, race, or denomination, or for any number of such classes, professions, trades, callings, races or denominations when the avowed purpose is to entertain or instruct such classes, is not a newspaper of general circulation."

Section 4462 of the same Code contains provisions authorizing this proceeding to be brought. The trial judge determined the facts to be that the newspaper had been published weekly in the city of Watts for the required time, and that it was a newspaper containing general news intelligence as required by the act. A finding followed which recited that the newspaper had been "published and printed" at all such times, "except that for seven issues—being the issues from October 27 to December 8, 1916, inclusive—said newspaper was printed at the city of Redondo Beach, Cal., and that said newspaper and its proprietor had no press and no newspaper plant at the city of Watts, Cal., during the time said newspaper was so printed at said Redondo Beach, and that the then owner of the paper never thereafter printed said newspaper at said Watts, Cal.; that a new management began after the said seventh issue, to wit, December 8, 1916, printing said newspaper in the office of the Observer, on the press of the Observer, at Watts, Cal." Upon these findings judgment was ordered and entered denying the prayer of the petitioner.

[1] From these findings, made by the trial judge, it is very apparent that the only ground upon which the denial of the petition was made was because seven issues of the newspaper were not actually "printed" in the city of Watts. The newspaper was circulated there and was a paper local to that community. We think to construe the statute in such a close and literal sense is to narrow its meaning more than was intended by the Legislature. The object to be accomplished was to define newspapers in which public notices might be made and which would fairly express such notices to the particular community intended to be reached. If the trial judge is correct in his conclusion, then in any case where perhaps a very large newspaper, having all the characteristics of a public journal for the dissemination of general news, through accident or otherwise, is obliged to have its printing done outside of the city or county, as the case may be, even for one issue, its character as a newspaper of general circulation, within the meaning of the Code, would be destroyed. Neither could such a journal establish its character in that respect without proving continuous printing of the same without interruption for the period of at least a year within the prescribed limits. The case of Bayer et al. v. Hoboken, 44 N. J. Law, 131, is directly in point. There a statute required the printing of a notice in a newspaper "printed and published" within the limits of a municipality. The newspaper in which the publication was made was printed altogether on presses in the city of New York, but was distributed in Hoboken. The court held that such a newspaper was "printed and published" as required by the statute. See, also, Ricketts v. Village of Hyde Park, 85 Ill. 110; Brown's Estate v. West Seattle, 43 Wash. 26, 85 Pac. 854; all of which cases are cited in Stanwood v. Carson, 169 Cal. 640, 147 Pac. 562.

[2] It did appear, and was found to be a fact by the court, that during the year in question the name of the newspaper was changed from "the Watts Advertiser" to "the Advertiser." The mere dropping of a part of the wording in the name did not change the character of the newspaper, nor destroy its identity. We think that, on the findings of fact as made by the trial judge, the prayer of the petition should have been granted.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of petitioner.

HATHAWAY v. COLEMAN et al. (Civ. 2145.)

1. LIVERY STABLE AND GARAGE KEEPERS 🔑 11—DIRECTIONS TO DRIVER.

Where plaintiff who engaged a taxicab and directed the driver to take her to a hospital, and in response to the driver's question as to the location of the hospital informed him that it was out H. street on B. avenue, and the driver proceeded out that street, going up two steep hills, such statement was not a direction that the driver should pursue that route on the return journey; the statement as to the location of the hospital being for information of the driver.

2. NEW TRIAL 🔑6 — DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—PROPRIETY OF OVERRULING.

In such case, where the taxicab skidded on the return journey, which was made down the two steep hills which had been ascended on the outgoing trip, the setting aside of a verdict for defendant and the granting of a new trial cannot, it appearing that the day was rainy, be deemed an abuse of discretion, reviewable on appeal for the trial court might have deemed that while it was not negligence to go up the hills, it was negligence to go down the same.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Martha R. Hathaway against Robert L. Coleman and Max Mamlock, copartners doing business under the name of the Alco Taxicab Company. From an order granting plaintiff a new trial after verdict in their favor, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edwin H. Williams, of San Francisco, for appellants. Edward C. Harrison and Maurice E. Harrison, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants for damages for personal injuries suffered while she was riding in a taxicab operated by an agent of the defendant. The case was tried before a jury, and it resulted in a verdict for the defendant; but upon a motion for a new trial, made upon all of the statutory grounds, the court made a general order granting a new trial, and the appeal is taken from that order.

The accident out of which the case arose occurred in the following manner: The plaintiff, who desired to go to a certain hospital known as St. Joseph's Hospital, from some point in the busy section of San Francisco, engaged the taxicab and its driver, and directed him to take her to the St. Joseph's Hospital. It appeared that the driver of the taxicab did not know just where the hospital was, although he was otherwise a trained, skillful, and experienced driver of taxicabs, having driven such vehicles in the city mentioned for several years, and being, as the evidence shows, familiar with the streets of that city. He asked the plaintiff where St. Joseph's Hospital was, and she informed him it was out Haight street on Buena Vista avenue. The driver proceeded out Haight street and went up two steep hills to reach the hospital. Arriving at her destination the plaintiff alighted, went into the hospital, remained a while, and then came out and re-entered the taxicab. The driver undertook to return by the same route he had taken to reach the hospital. He descended one of the hills, which the evidence shows was the only feasible route at that point, and arrived at Haight street, where there was another hill to descend. It had been raining and the streets were wet. The driver undertook to go down this hill on Haight street, and on the way down the vehicle skidded and collided with a post, and the plaintiff was injured.

Upon the trial of the case the plaintiff undertook to show by witnesses that there were other routes by which the driver could have avoided going down this steep hill on this rainy day; that by taking a detour he could have avoided the steep declivity. The court refused to permit that proof to be made, to which refusal an exception was taken. There is, however, in the record some evidence that there were other such routes and that the driver knew of them.

[1, 2] The appellants contend here that the verdict was properly in their favor, for the reason that the driver took the route directed by the plaintiff, and that as a matter of law the plaintiff, having directed the driver to take a particular route, cannot maintain an action for damages if an injury occurs while the driver is obeying that direction. The evidence, however, in the case apparently in the opinion of the trial court—as it seems to us also—does not go so far as to amount to a direction on the part of the plaintiff that the driver take a particular route, because while he did not know where the particular hospital was, the evidence shows that he knew all of the streets of the city; that he had driven up and down this particular street before; and that the only direction she gave was the one as to the location of the hospital, namely on Buena Vista avenue, and was not a direction to him to pursue a particular route. But, however that may be, that direction only had reference to the route out and up the hill, and the plaintiff gave no direction as to the route which the driver should pursue on the return journey; and it may well be that the trial court took the view that while it might not have been dangerous to ascend this hill upon a rainy day, it was a matter of great danger to undertake to descend it when there were other routes available. It seems to us that these considerations may well have entered into the conclusion of the court in granting a new trial. We think that the discretion of the court thus exercised should not be interfered with under the circumstances.

The order is affirmed.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT 🔑166(3) — ACTS OF AGENT — RATIFICATION — KNOWLEDGE OF CONDITIONS.

Where a car was placed with an agent for sale for $800 cash, and the agent exchanged the car and got $50 cash, and sent $400 to his principal telling him he had exchanged and had received that amount on the trade, which the principal accepted conditionally, there was no ratification of the exchange, where there was no connection shown between the $50 and the $400, and the principal did not know with whom the car had been exchanged, or the conditions; because in order to constitute a ratification of the unauthorized acts of an agent the principal must be fully advised as to what the actual transaction was which the principal, by his acts or conduct, is to be held to have ratified.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by Joseph K. Hutchinson against Scott, Magner & Miller, a corporation. Judgment for defendant and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Joseph K. Hutchinson, of San Francisco, in pro. per. A. A. Sanderson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in defendant's favor in an action for the recovery of the possession of personal property.

Concerning the facts of the case there is no substantial dispute. The plaintiff was the owner of a certain automobile known and designated as a "1915 Hupmobile Roadster," and which he desired to sell. While on a visit to the east he opened correspondence with a Mr. Llewellyn Johnson regarding the sale of his machine, as a result of which he sent the latter a telegram on September 20, 1915, to the effect that he had instructed the garage to deliver the car to him, as the plaintiff's agent, for sale at $800 cash; no delivery to be made until full price was paid. Johnson received the car under this instruction, and within a short while thereafter he made an exchange of it with the defendant for a touring car owned by it, receiving $50 cash on the trade. On October 22, 1915, Johnson wrote a letter to the plaintiff, who was then in New York City, that he had after some difficulty made a deal by which he had sold the plaintiff's automobile for $400 cash and a Hupmobile runabout, which he could sell for the same amount as soon as some repairs were made upon it, and that as soon as sold he would remit the balance of the purchase price. He inclosed in this letter a draft for $400 which he thus claimed to have received, but did not disclose the name of the purchaser of the plaintiff's car. Upon receiving this letter the plaintiff replied acknowledging the receipt of the $400 inclosed and stating that:

> "While I am not entirely satisfied with the sale of the car for less than $800 cash I shall accept the situation if I have both your promise to pay the remaining $400 to me in cash within the next thirty days, and a credit to me of that amount upon the Linz-Sanborn Motor Company. Please advise me if you can provide me with these assurances."

The Linz-Sanborn Motor Company referred to in this reply was a firm of dealers in automobiles with which the plaintiff had previously been led by Johnson to believe that he was connected in some responsible capacity. Receiving no reply from Johnson, the plaintiff returned to San Francisco a few weeks later and began to look the matter up. He saw Johnson and could get no satisfaction from him, either as to whom he had sold the car, or as to the terms of its sale, or as to the payment of the balance of its purchase price; but he learned that Johnson had deceived him with respect to his connection with the Linz-Sanborn Motor Company and that he had no such connection. He finally learned that his car was in possession of the defendant, who claimed to have purchased it from Johnson. The plaintiff thereupon wrote a letter to the defendant denouncing the acts of Johnson and demanding the return of the car, with damages for its depreciation and retention, and, these demands being refused by the defendant, the plaintiff instituted the present action.

The defendant in its answer claimed to be the owner of the car by virtue of its transaction with Johnson which it was claimed the plaintiff had ratified; but the defendants did not set forth in its answer the details of the transaction by which it had become possessed of the car, nor does it appear that the plaintiff was informed as to the terms of the transaction or of the payment of the $50 by the defendant to Johnson until the trial of the case.

The court found that the plaintiff had ratified the acts of Johnson in the premises and rendered judgment in defendant's favor, from which judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

Upon the undisputed facts thus set forth, it seems clear to us that the finding of the trial court that the plaintiff ratified the transaction between the agent Johnson and the defendant finds no support in the evidence in the case. The instruction of the plaintiff to Johnson creating his agency and investing him with possession of the car limited his authority to the making of a cash sale of the plaintiff's automobile for the sum of $800, and required that no delivery of the car should be made until that cash price had been paid. The acts of Johnson in making an exchange of the plaintiff's car with the defendant for another car and $50 were clearly and grossly beyond the scope of his powers. The transaction which Johnson reported to the plaintiff, and which plaintiff, by his qualified acceptance of it, is claimed to have ratified, never in fact occurred, and, never having existed, of course could not be ratified. Nor can it be claimed that the retention of the $400 sent to the plaintiff by Johnson, or his qualified acceptance of the latter's purported acts, constituted a ratification of the real transaction between Johnson and the defendant, for the all-sufficient reason that in order to constitute a ratification of the unauthorized acts of an agent the principal must be fully advised as to what the actual transaction of the agent was which the principal, by his acts or conduct, is to be held to have ratified. Civ. Code, § 2310; Stemler v. Bass, 153 Cal. 791, 96 Pac. 809; Lambert v. Gerner, 142 Cal. 399, 76 Pac. 53; Maze v. Gordon, 96 Cal. 61, 30 Pac. 962; Meux v. Hogue, 91 Cal. 442, 27 Pac. 744; Hall v. Wells & Sons, 24 Cal. App. 238, 141 Pac. 53; Palo Alto Mut. B. & L. Ass'n v. First Nat. Bank, 164 Pac. 1124.

In the case at bar it is not pretended that the plaintiff knew anything whatever about the actual transaction between Johnson and the defendant at the time of his receipt of the letter from Johnson purporting to detail a transaction for the sale of his automobile which was an entire fiction, or at the time of his qualified acceptance of its terms, or at any time up to the actual trial of the cause. It is, however, contended by the respondent that, because the plaintiff received and retained the sum of $400 sent him by Johnson as part of the proceeds of a sale of his machine which had never occurred, he must be held to have received and retained a portion of the benefits of the actual transaction between Johnson and the defendant, and thus to have ratified the same. It is argued that the $50 which was paid by the defendant to Johnson is to be held to be included in the larger sum of $400 which the plaintiff received from Johnson as the result of the fictitious transaction which he reported to him. There are two answers to this contention, the first of which is that the record does not disclose any connection between the $50 paid to Johnson by the defendant and the $400 sent by Johnson to the plaintiff, or that he ever retained the $400 with knowledge that any portion of it was derived from the defendant. And the second answer is that the plaintiff was never informed, so far as the record discloses, as to what the transaction between the defendant and Johnson was, or as to any payment by the defendant to Johnson of any sum of money whatever in the course of the transaction until the actual trial of the cause; nor does it appear to have been intimated in that trial that the plaintiff's retention of the money received from Johnson amounted to such an acceptance of the benefits of the defendant's transaction as to prevent a recovery in this action. On the contrary, the findings of the court as to the plaintiff's ratification of his agent's acts expressly refers the same to October 22, 1915, the date of the plaintiff's qualified acceptance of Johnson's reported transaction. These findings, as we have shown, have no support in the undisputed evidence in the case.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

RYAN v. WALKER. (Civ. 1729.)

1. BROKERS 🔑56(3) — COMMISSIONS — SERVICES.

Where a real estate broker introduced the purchaser to the owner of the property, he has done all that the law required of him to entitle him to his commission, even though the owner subsequently sells the property, or a part thereof, at a reduced price.

2. BROKERS 🔑43(1)—CONTRACTS—ACTIONS.

Under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, requiring agreements authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or a commission to be in writing, an action will not lie by a real estate broker to recover upon a verbal contract for compensation for producing a purchaser of real estate.

3. BROKERS 🔑43(1)—REAL ESTATE—"MIDDLEMAN"—"AGENT."

Under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, requiring real estate employment contracts to be in writing, there is no distinction between a middleman and an agent, as applied to real estate brokers; such brokers being middlemen, whose business is to bring seller and buyer together.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Agent; Middleman.]

4. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF 🔑116(3, 4) — BROKERAGE CONTRACTS—PERSONALTY.

Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, requiring agreements authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation to be in writing, does not apply to an agent's contract for the sale of personalty.

5. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF 🔑23(4)—DEBT OF ANOTHER—BROKERAGE CONTRACTS.

Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 2, pronouncing invalid a special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, has no application, where a prospective purchaser of real estate, upon the seller's refusal to pay a commission, promised to pay the broker a certain commission in case he purchased entire property; such promise not being one to answer for the default of the owner.

6. NOVATION 🔑1—BROKERAGE CONTRACTS.

Where an owner of property refused to pay a commission to a real estate broker, and the prospective purchaser promised to pay such commission in case the deal was closed, the transaction did not constitute a novation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Novation.]

7. PLEADING 🔑193(6)—COMPLAINT—DEMURRER.

A complaint in an action for broker's commission for the sale of real property, and also for the sale of personal property, but not stating the two causes of action separately, was demurrable, under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 5, providing that the defendant may demur where several causes of action have not been separately stated.

8. BROKERS 🔑40—CONTRACT — CONSIDERATION.

A promise by a prospective purchaser of personal property to a broker to pay a commission in case he purchased was not enforceable, though part of the personalty was subsequently purchased from the owner without the broker's intervention; the agreement not being supported by a sufficient consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Maurice F. Ryan against S. O. Walker. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. E. Clark, of Visalia, for appellant. Maurice E. Power, of Visalia, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from a judgment of dismissal after a demurrer to the second amended complaint had been sustained. The complaint itself is rather a curious piece of composition. It abounds in evidentiary and redundant matter. It comprises over 12 pages of the transcript, whereas every material allegation could have been expressed in one-fourth that space. It is unfortunate that the pleader did not carefully consult the case of Green v. Palmer, 15 Cal. 412, 76 Am. Dec. 492, before drawing his complaint. If he had done so, he probably would have saved himself much trouble and the court considerable anxiety in the effort to determine the theory of his cause of action. It appears to be an action for the recovery of a commission for the sale of real and personal property. It appears without question that there was an oral contract entered into with the owner of the property in the beginning. The contract seems thereafter to have been canceled, and a new contract made with the defendant, the respondent herein. To indicate the nature of the said contract it is probably sufficient to quote the seventh paragraph of the second amended complaint, as follows:

> "That plaintiff thereupon called the attention of said Mr. Leebon to the fact that the defendant was a customer whom he had produced, pursuant to the agreement of Mr. Leebon to compensate him for his services, and that he expected compensation at the rate of 5 per cent. on the sale price if Mr. Leebon sold to defendant. Mr. Leebon then informed plaintiff that if he should sell the property for less than $80,000 he could not pay plaintiff 5 per cent. on the same. Whereupon plaintiff remarked: 'This man is my customer; if you sell to him, I will expect you to pay me as you agreed to do.' In reply Mr. Leebon said: 'If I am obliged to pay you 5 per cent. on a less sum than $80,000, we will just call the trade off.' And he then and there turned to walk away. Defendant then spoke to Mr. Leebon and said: 'Hold on, Mr. Leebon; if I buy this property, I will pay Mr. Ryan 5 per cent. on whatever amount I agree to pay for it.' Whereupon plaintiff asked the defendant: 'Is that right?' And the defendant answered: 'Yes; I will pay you myself.' Defendant and Mr. Leebon then engaged in some further conversation, but did not at that time agree upon terms, and no deal was consummated that day, between defendant and Mr. Leebon, and plaintiff and defendant returned to Visalia."

[1] It thus appears, in connection with the fourth and fifth paragraphs of the complaint, that the owner of the property undertook to pay the agent a commission for finding a purchaser, and in pursuance of said agreement plaintiff did find a purchaser in the person of the defendant. There can scarcely be any doubt that plaintiff, by introducing defendant to the owner, performed all that the law required of him to entitle him to his commission, even though the owner saw fit subsequently to sell the property or a portion of it at a reduced price. Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87; Brown v. Mason, 155 Cal. 155, 99 Pac. 867, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 328.

[2] It is the contention, however, of the respondent here, as it was in the court below, that, since the alleged promise was verbal, it is brought within the provisions of subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, requiring agreements authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or a commission to be in writing. It is therefore contended, and it was so held by the trial court, that plaintiff counts upon a void promise. A large number of cases is cited, illustrating the application of this provision of the Code. It is not necessary to call attention to all of them, as the rule is very clearly stated in the Code itself, and there can be no question about it in the proper case. We content ourselves with referring to Dolan v. O'Toole, 129 Cal. 488, 62 Pac. 92; Jamison v. Hyde, 141 Cal. 109, 74 Pac. 695; Hicks v. Post, 154 Cal. 22, 96 Pac. 878.

[3] Nor is it any answer to this contention that plaintiff was a "middleman, and not an agent," as claimed by appellant. His complaint alleges that he was a real estate broker, and it is settled that a broker is a middleman, whose business is to bring seller and buyer together. He need have nothing to do with negotiating the bargain. 19 Cyc. 186; Brown v. Mason, 155 Cal. 155, 99 Pac. 867, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 328. No such distinction as claimed by appellant is recognized in this state. As to this point certain cases are cited from other jurisdictions, but they are under different statutes from that prevailing in this jurisdiction. Among the cases cited is Deitch v. Feder, 86 N. Y. Supp. 802. Therein it appears that the owner would not sell below a certain price if compelled to pay his agent a 1 per cent. commission, but that he was willing to sell for a less price if the buyer would bind himself to pay that commission. It appears that there was a definite agreement between the owner, buyer, and agent, by which the owner was released from his obligation to the agent, and the buyer in consideration of obtaining the property at a reduced price, agreed to pay the agent his commission. The sole point decided in the case was that the verdict of the jury must stand where the evidence is conflicting. A somewhat different question was presented in the case of Siegle v. Rosenzweig, 129 App. Div. 547, 114 N. Y. Supp. 179; it appearing therein that the buyer requested the agent to do nothing and to allow him to deal directly with the owner, the buyer promising the agent a commission for his inaction. The vital point in the case was apparently whether the transaction was based upon an immoral consideration, and the court held that it was not. Some of the other decisions are to the effect that contracts may be oral, if not required by statute to be in writing. Of course, as to this there can be no controversy. Nor can there be any question that a broker may in some instances require commissions from both parties.

[4] We think that it can be safely said that, as far as the action concerns the agreement to pay a commission for the sale of the real estate, it is within the provisions of said statute of frauds, and being invalid, it cannot be enforced, and this applies to the second agreement as well as the first. The complaint shows, however, that the transaction related, not only to real estate, but also to personal property, and we see no good reason against holding that it is, therefore, severable, and such statute is not applicable as far as the personal property is concerned; such contract not being required to be in writing. As to this latter property, it may be said, further, that there is an allegation in the complaint that:

> "Plaintiff was since the commencement of this action informed, and he now believes, and he therefore, upon information and belief, alleges, that defendant purchased at the time of the purchase of the said land, all of the aforesaid personal property that was upon said premises, and that was embraced in said Leebon's original proposition to sell, and which was separately valued, and by defendant purchased from said Leebon at the price of $15,000."

[5, 6] It is further contended by respondent that Walker's statement, as set out in the seventh paragraph aforesaid, was a promise to answer for the debt of Leebon, and therefore void under the provisions of subdivision 2 of said section 1624, pronouncing invalid "a special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, except in the cases provided for in section 2794." We are not inclined to agree with respondent in this connection. We think it may fairly be inferred from the language of the complaint that the agreement between plaintiff and the defendant constituted an independent contract. It appears, in other words, that plaintiff had first entered into a contract with the owner of the property for a commission of 5 per cent.; but, after producing a purchaser, said contract seems to have been rescinded by mutual consent, whereupon defendant, in consideration of obtaining the property at a lower price, promised to pay plaintiff a commission of 5 per cent. upon what he should be required to pay for said real estate and personalty. We can perceive no necessary connection between this contract and the one made with the owner. Strictly speaking, it is not a promise to answer for the default of the owner, nor is it a novation.

In the demurrer, which was both general and special, it is claimed that the said complaint is uncertain, in that it cannot be ascertained whether the cause of action grows out of a claim for commission for the sale of real property or the sale of personal property, or what portion of the said $2,700 the commission is claimed for one or for the other; furthermore, that it cannot be ascertained whether defendant ever promised to pay any commission or any sum whatever for the sale of the personal property, and that it cannot be ascertained whether or not defendant promised or agreed to pay any commission after or before any services were performed, if any were performed, by the plaintiff. These grounds of demurrer may be considered together. From paragraph 7 of the complaint, considered in connection with what precedes, the conclusion would follow that the parties had in view both the real and personal property, but in paragraph 8 we find this allegation:

> "That on the return trip to Visalia on the occasion last aforesaid, defendant and plaintiff talked over the possibility of handling the property and defendant remarked to plaintiff: 'You are now interested in the deal, 5 per cent. on whatever price I pay for the property, and unless I can get it at a price a great deal below what Mr. Leebon now holds it at, I cannot handle it, therefore, if you make anything out of the deal you should assist me in buying the property as low as possible and if I could get the ranch for a fair price, and leave the personal property out, I think I could handle it, but I don't want to get mixed up with the chattel mortgage on the personal property.'"

This would seem to qualify the promise as to the personal property and confine it to the realty. It does at least indicate an intention on the part of respondent that appellant should do nothing toward the purchase of the personalty, and we find that appellant acted upon the statement and actually performed no service for respondent in that particular.

[7] As to the point in reference to the apportionment of the $2,700, it does appear, as we have seen, that the personal property was sold for the sum of $15,000, and it is a mere matter of computation to determine how much of the commission was claimed for that sale. Another ground of special demurrer was that:

> "Two causes of action are united in said complaint, the one for the commission growing out of the transfer of real property, and the other for the commission growing out of the transfer of personal property, and said causes of action are not separately stated."

It seems clear that this position is well taken, and that for this reason the complaint was demurrable under subdivision 5 of section 430 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[8] The other criticism, moreover, suggested by the general demurrer of respondent, seems to involve a fatal defect in the complaint. In considering it we must, of course, keep in view the fact that the contract with respondent was entirely distinct from the one made with the owner, and that the real property must be eliminated from consideration. Then the question arises whether plaintiff earned any commission, as against the defendant, for the sale of the personal property. If so, he must have performed some service for the defendant in connection with said sale. It is not sufficient that he may have earned his commission as against the owner by bringing the vendor and vendee together, since that service related to the first contract and had been completed when the second contract was made with the purchaser, and it would seem, on familiar principles, that the plaintiff, in order to earn his commission on the sale of said personalty, must have performed some service to effect said sale; but we look in vain through the complaint to find any such allegation. It does not appear that plaintiff had any further communication whatever with the owner in reference to said personalty, nor that he made any effort to bring the parties together in relation to it. It is true he performed some service in regard to the real property, but that cannot be considered, as before stated.

In fact, immediately after the agreement relied upon by plaintiff, he was informed by defendant, as we have seen, that he, the latter, did not desire to purchase said personalty, and it seems defendant purchased it without the knowledge of plaintiff. We can see no principle, therefore, upon which it can be held that plaintiff can recover from defendant for said sale. The promise to pay, if made, was entirely without consideration, and cannot be enforced. It amounts to no more than this: Defendant says to plaintiff:

> "If I buy the whole of this property for less than $80,000, I will pay you a 5 per cent. commission on the purchase price."

Defendant did thereafter purchase the personalty for $15,000 without any aid whatever from plaintiff. Indeed, as we have seen, it was understod that plaintiff was to perform no service in that connection.

There was no benefit conferred upon defendant, no prejudice suffered by plaintiff in consequence of said promise, nor was it intended that there should be. The promise, therefore, was without consideration and void as far as the personal property was concerned. Or the promise may be considered as implying that the services would be performed, and since there was no performance, to its entire extent the promise failed.

We think the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. CAVALA. (Cr. 391.)

1. WITNESSES 🔑304(4)—IMMUNITY—NONINCRIMINATING TESTIMONY.

Under Pen. Code, § 1324, relative to requiring one to testify against another, he is not immune from prosecution for the same offense, where his testimony, so given, did not incriminate himself.

2. WITNESSES 🔑304(4) — IMMUNITY — SELF-INCRIMINATION—STATUTE.

Pen. Code, § 1324, providing that an offender compelled without warning to testify against another like offender shall be immune from prosecution for the offense, his testimony, incriminating himself, does not apply to one called as witness on preliminary examination of another without suspicion that he was implicated in the offense.

3. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1188—APPEAL—REVERSAL OF ORDER FOR NEW TRIAL.

Reversal of order erroneously granting new trial will be with direction for judgment on verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

John Cavala, after a verdict of guilty, was granted a new trial, and the People appeal. Reversed, with directions.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People. H. A. Gabriel, of San Jose, and J. J. Griffin and H. S. Shaffer, both of Merced, for respondent.

HART, J. Under an information filed in the superior court of Merced county, by the district attorney of said county, the defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, in that he did, on the 29th day of April, 1915, feloniously steal, take, and drive away a certain cow, the personal property of J. B. Coito & Co., a firm engaged in the business of dairying in said county.

The court below, upon the application of the defendant, ordered a new trial, stating the ground therefor as follows:

> "The motion for a new trial made herein is granted on the ground that the court committed an error in refusing to grant defendant's motion that the action be dismissed, and that a verdict of 'not guilty' be pro forma rendered in the case, by reason of his immunity from prosecution for the offense charged in this information, because of testimony given by him as a witness upon the preliminary examination of that same matter or charge, wherein the people were prosecuting one George A. Avila."

The people appeal from said order. Obviously, the only question presented here is whether the defendant was entitled to immunity from prosecution for the charge preferred against him by the information under the terms of section 1324 of the Penal Code.

One George M. Avila had previously been prosecuted in the superior court for the identical offense charged against the defendant here, and the latter testified in that case. In this case the defendant did not take the stand, but his testimony, given in the Avila case, was introduced by the district attorney in the present case. In the Avila case, the defendant practically admitted that he stole the cow referred to in the information. It appears that Avila was engaged in the business of a butcher, and that he did his own slaughtering. On his ranch, where he conducted his business, the defendant, at the time of the commission of the larceny here charged, had about 30 head of milch cows, which he had left there a day or two before the larceny. Avila was to take care of said cows for the defendant and sell the same whenever the opportunity to do so presented itself. Avila maintained a slaughter house for the purposes of his business, but occasionally slaughtered cattle in his barn on the ranch.

On the 29th day of April, 1915, at about half past 8 in the evening, and a couple of hours after he had had supper at the Avila home with the family, the defendant, having previously left the Avila place in his automobile, returned to said place and brought with him the cow referred to in the information. According to his own testimony given in the Avila case, the defendant, as he was driving along the road on his return to the Avila ranch and when near the latter's house, observed a cow in the road and at the same time saw a man jump over the fence skirting the road and start to run. The defendant yelled at the man, but the latter made no response, and kept on running. He thereupon drove to Avila's house, there left his machine, and returned to get the cow, he then supposing, so he declared, that it was one of his cows. He drove the cow to Avila's place and, on turning a light on her, discovered that the animal did not belong to him. He then blew the horn on his auto, and Avila thereupon came out of his house and went to where the defendant was standing. The latter then requested Avila to kill the cow and ship the carcass to O'Connor Bros. at San Jose. The defendant thereupon left the premises; and, in accordance with the instruction given him by the defendant, Avila that night slaughtered the cow and dressed the carcass in his barn, but in the place of shipping the beef as directed by the defendant, cut it into meat and sent it out the next morning in a wagon, used by him for that purpose, to be peddled or sold to the people living in the country thereabouts, explaining that he had forgotten the address to which the defendant directed him to ship the beef, and that he would himself pay the defendant for it. The defendant, in his testimony at the trial of Avila, explained that the reason that he instructed Avila to slaughter the cow after discovering that the animal was not his property was because he "figured that the other man was going to get away with her, and I said if the owner shows up, I am willing to pay for her—I am willing to pay for the cow."

The owners of the cow, having missed her from their ranch the next morning after the above narrated incidents occurred, notified a constable of the fact, and that officer, with one of the owners of the cow, thereupon started to search for her. On the afternoon of that day they went to Avila's ranch, and in his barn they found what they identified as the hide of the cow in a roll on the floor or ground. Avila was questioned about the cow, gave equivocating and unsatisfactory answers, and was thereupon placed under arrest. Later he was formally charged before a magistrate with the larceny of the cow, and thereafter given a preliminary hearing and held for trial in the superior court. The defendant, as seen, was called by the district attorney to testify for the people at the preliminary examination of Avila.

At the trial of the defendant, after the people had presented and rested their original case, counsel for the defendant thereupon introduced in evidence the defendant's testimony given at the preliminary examination of the charge against Avila, and upon said testimony and the admission of the district attorney that section 1324 of the Penal Code was not at any time read to the defendant at said examination by the justice before whom the proceeding was held, presented a motion that the court instruct the jury to acquit Cavala on the ground that, under the showing thus made, the defendant "is immune from prosecution under the provisions" of said section. The court disallowed the motion, but, as seen, granted the defendant's motion for a new trial on that ground.

The section of the Penal Code referred to in substance provides that a person offending against any of the penal laws of this state is a competent witness against any other person so offending, and may be compelled to testify against such other person, and that if such person demands to be excused from so testifying on the ground that such testimony may incriminate himself he shall not be excused, but in that case the testimony so given by him shall not thereafter be used against him in any criminal prosecution against him (except for perjury in giving such testimony), nor shall he be liable for prosecution or punishment for the offense with reference to which such testimony was given, etc.; that a person giving such testimony shall not be exempt from prosecution or punishment for the offense with reference to which he may have thus testified if he so testifies voluntarily, or where he fails to ask to be excused as above indicated; that the person so testifying shall be deemed to be excused from testifying, unless, before any testimony is given, etc., the judge, foreman, or other person presiding at such trial, etc., shall distinctly "read this section of this Code to such witness," etc.

It is nowhere made to appear in the record as it is presented before us that Cavala, either before or at the time of the preliminary examination of Avila for the offense charged in the information against him, was formally charged with or otherwise accused of the crime set out in said information, or that the district attorney or any of the other officers connected with the prosecution of Avila then or at any time, until after the trial of Avila in the superior court upon said charge, supposed or even suspected or had any reason to suppose or suspect, other than that growing out of the mere circumstance of the presence of Cavala at the Avila ranch when the hide of the animal was found at said ranch, that the defendant was in any manner or degree connected with or implicated in the commission of said crime. On the contrary, in his opening statement to the jury, which is incorporated into and made a part of the record here, the district attorney declared that the defendant was not under arrest at the time he testified at the examination of Avila before the magistrate. Moreover there was nothing in the testimony of the defendant given before the committing magistrate at the hearing of the charge against Avila which incriminated the defendant or which tended to show that he was connected in any way with the commission of the crime. He was asked at the examination about his presence at the ranch of Avila at the time the latter was arrested; whether he had cattle of his own on said ranch, and, if so, when he took them there; whether he sold the stolen cow to Avila. He admitted having been at the Avila home at the time the hide of the stolen cow was discovered by the owner and the constable, and that he was there the previous day and evening; that he had the day before driven a number of head of his own milch cows to said ranch and left them in charge of Avila; that he did not sell the stolen cow to Avila, and knew nothing about the killing of the animal until Avila had told him of it. It appears that the stolen cow, when killed, was with calf and that, upon slaughtering her, the calf was taken from her and its carcass, with the hide unremoved therefrom, left in the barn. Cavala was asked at the hearing if he knew that a calf had been taken from the cow, and he replied that he knew it only from Avila himself—that he never saw the calf until the next day after the constable was at the Avila ranch looking for the cow. He stated that he sold one of his own cows to one Enos.

Thus we have given the sum and substance of Cavala's testimony before the magistrate at the examination of Avila, and, as before stated, there is nothing in it incriminatory of the defendant or indicating that the district attorney suspected him of being implicated in the crime or was using him as a witness against Avila upon the assumption that he was the latter's confederate in the crime. In brief and in fact, so far as the record shows to the contrary, the defendant's connection with the crime as a party thereto was not developed or discovered until after he had voluntarily or of his own volition testified as a witness for Avila in the latter's trial before the superior court, when, as we have seen, he admitted under oath that he stole the cow and turned the animal over to Avila to be slaughtered.

[1] It has been held that, to justify the application of section 1324 of the Penal Code where a witness who has given testimony in a criminal case or proceeding claims, under said section, immunity from prosecution for the offense concerning which he has given such testimony, it must be made to appear that the testimony so given has incriminated or tended to incriminate him. People v. Richman, 28 Cal. App. 761, 764, 155 Pac. 142. That case went to the Supreme Court on petition for a hearing in said court, and the petition was denied. We may, therefore, accept as settled the rule as thus stated, and, applying it to this case, the defendant, not having incriminated himself in the testimony given by him before the magistrate in the Avila case, is without a legal foundation upon which to base his claim to exemption from prosecution and punishment for the crime charged against him in the information.

[2] But, if we were to assume that his testimony before the magistrate in that case tended to or did in fact incriminate him or tended to or did in fact show that he was implicated in the commission of the crime charged against Avila before the magistrate and later against himself, the fact that at the time he gave such testimony he was not formally or otherwise charged with the crime or any offense growing out of said crime, and the further fact that the record does not show that he was then even suspected by the officers of the law of having been in any way connected with the commission of said or any crime still remain; and while, of course, we do not hold that, to have entitled a witness to invoke the benefit of section 1324 when called and required to testify against a confederate in crime, he must have first been formally charged with the offense with reference to which his testimony was so given, yet the fact that the defendant in this case was not so charged at the time he testified at the Avila hearing lends persuasive force to the conclusion to be drawn from the absence in the record of an affirmative showing to the contrary that he was not, at that time, supposed or believed by the officers to have been implicated in the commission of the offense to which his testimony at the hearing related, or not used by the district attorney as a witness at said hearing upon the theory or assumption that he was a confederate of Avila in the perpetration of the crime charged and under hearing against the latter. For aught that appears in the record to the contrary, the district attorney, the constable who arrested Avila and the magistrate who examined the charge against the latter, supposed and assumed, when the defendant was called and sworn and testified as a witness at the said preliminary hearing, that the defendant had nothing to do with the stealing of the cow. Indeed, from the character of the examination to which the defendant was subjected by the district attorney before the magistrate as well as the character of the testimony there given by him, the natural inference is that the district attorney and other officers did not at that time suppose or for a moment entertain even a suspicion that he committed or assisted in committing the crime charged against Avila. And, in the absence of an affirmative showing that the district attorney did believe from his investigations that the defendant was connected with the commission of the crime, or that he was in possession of evidence pointing to the defendant's guilty connection with the crime, and intended later to charge him therewith and prosecute him therefor, or for some other offense growing out of the offense to which his testimony before the magistrate related, we may assume that the district attorney then had no testimony against the defendant, and, when requiring him to testify at the hearing, had no intention or thought of prosecuting him for the crime under examination or any other offense arising out of said crime. The situation then stands thus: That the district attorney called a witness to the stand and required him to give testimony as to some fact or circumstance which he conceived might tend to establish probable or reasonable cause for believing that Avila committed the offense for which he was being preliminarily examined, and that, unexpectedly to that officer, it transpired or was discovered, after the witness had so testified, that he had himself committed or aided in the commission of said crime; that section 1324 was not read to the witness, as required, for the very good reason that his connection with the crime with reference to which he so testified was, when he gave his testimony, unknown to the district attorney and the magistrate who heard the case. Now, may it justly be declared that it was fairly and reasonably within the intent or contemplation of section 1324, that in such a case, the witness might legally have claimed (section 1324 was repealed by the Legislature of 1917 and since the trial of this case) and have been entitled to immunity from prosecution and punishment for his offense under the terms of said section? We think not. So to hold would compel a construction of said section which would, to protect the rights of the people in criminal cases, have required that said section be read to every witness called by the people to give testimony in support of the prosecution in every criminal case, since it is not at all unlikely that some witness so called and testifying, unbeknown to the district attorney, the judge or justice or officer presiding in the proceeding in which such testimony was given, might have been a party to the very crime to which his testimony might have related or subject to prosecution and punishment for some other offense growing out of said crime and upon which such testimony might have some material bearing. It seems to us that the section cannot be so construed without reducing it to a manifest absurdity. "The purpose of the act," said the Supreme Court, in the very late case of People v. Fryer, 167 Pac. 382, referring to said section, "is to compel a confederate in the commission of crime to testify against his coconfederates, which could not be done under the law as it stood prior to the enactment of this section," and said section, proceeded the opinion, "is based on the assumption of the guilt of the person compelled to testify."

As is clearly true upon the record as we see it here, or upon the assumption justified by that record, the defendant was not introduced as a witness by the people at the Avila hearing upon the theory that he was the confederate of Avila, or that he had anything to do with the commission of the crime with reference to which he so testified. It did not then appear, in other words, that he was of the class of witnesses referred to by said section who were entitled to invoke the protection afforded to confederates in crime called by the people to give testimony against their coconfederate. He was not then a codefendant with Avila because, as we have shown, he had not at that time been jointly with the latter or otherwise formally charged with the commission of the offense. He was, in short, as any other ordinary witness might be, called to the witness stand by the district attorney and testified as a witness for the people, without any knowledge or belief on the part of the prosecuting officer and the magistrate that he was in any manner or degree implicated in the commission of the crime.

The cases of People v. Knowles, 27 Cal. App. 498, 155 Pac. 137, and People v. Fryer, 167 Pac. 382, are altogether different from the present case. In those cases, it will be noted, the witnesses, before being called by the people to testify concerning the offense under examination, were either formally charged with or were amenable to a grand jury indictment for the offense with reference to which they were asked and required to give testimony for the people, and the records of those cases, as they were presented for review by the appellate court, clearly so disclosed. Such is not the case here, as has been shown.

[3] We think the learned trial judge, upon the record as it is presented to this court, fell into error in granting the defendant a new trial on the ground stated, and therefore the order granting the same is reversed, with directions to the court below to proceed with the rendition of judgment upon the verdict as returned. COLUSA & H. R. CO. v. GLENN. (Civ. 1535.)

COURTS 🔑91(1)—FORMER DECISIONS AS AUTHORITIES—DECISION OF SUPREME COURT.

The decision of the Supreme Court in a condemnation suit was decisive on an appeal to the Court of Appeals, in a suit to condemn other land owned by a different party, where the physical conditions surrounding the two tracts were substantially the same, and the testimony, the rulings on the important points, and the instructions were practically the same, and all the important points urged for a reversal had been passed upon and overruled by the Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Colusa & Hamilton Railroad Company against Charles H. Glenn. From a judgment for damages and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 25 Cal. App. 634, 144 Pac. 993; 31 Cal. App. 746, 161 Pac. 1011.

Frank Freeman and George Freeman, both of Willow, for appellant. Charles L. Donohoe and W. T. Belieu, Jr., both of Willow, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action is in eminent domain, and was initiated by the plaintiff for the purpose of condemning and thereby acquiring for its purposes a strip of land belonging to the defendant and comprising, as the jury found, 12.18 acres.

The jury assessed the damages for the land thus to be taken at the sum of $2,801.40 and for the land not taken, because of the depreciation in the value thereof by reason of its severance from the land proposed to be taken and the resulting damage, at the sum of $14,130. Upon the verdict so returned the court made and caused to be entered judgment, from which and from the order denying the plaintiff a new trial the latter appeals.

The tract of land from which the strip is sought to be taken in the present case adjoins the tract of land of which a portion, involving approximately the area sought to be taken in this case, was condemned in the case of the Colusa & Hamilton Railroad Co. v. Leonard, 167 Pac. 878. Upon an examination of the records of the present and the said Leonard Case, we have found that the physical conditions surrounding the two tracts of land are substantially, if not precisely, the same; that is to say, that the two tracts are similarly situated with respect to the conditions that the evidence showed would exist as the result of the building and the running of the railroad tracks of the plaintiff, according to the plan as shown, through and over the strips to be taken, and that each tract would be equally subject to the increased danger, which it was shown would result to the untaken lands, from the flood waters of the Sacramento river, in case the levees protecting the lands against said stream were to give way from any of the causes suggested; that therefore the elements contributing to and forming the bases determinative of the depreciation of the value of the lands not taken by reason of the severance therefrom of the strips taken and of the use to which the latter were to be put in conformity with the design disclosed by the evidence were practically and substantially the same in both cases.

The Leonard Case was the first of the two cases to be tried in the court below; the trial of the instant case following closely on the termination of the trial of the former. The testimony in both cases was practically the same, the rulings upon the important points the same, and the instructions, so far as the principles of law therein stated were concerned, were in all substantial particulars the same.

All the important points urged herein for a reversal of the judgment and the order appealed from were made and presented in the said case of Colusa and Hamilton R. R. Co. v. Leonard, supra. That case was elaborately and ably presented to the Supreme Court on behalf of the appellant in a large number of voluminous briefs, of which some were prepared by the attorneys of record in the case, and some by attorneys appearing amici curiæ, and all involving forceful and able support of the position of the appellant on the various points relied upon for a reversal. The Supreme Court, in a well-considered opinion in that case, after giving such of the points so made as it conceived were of vital importance in the determination of the appeal, held that the record was free from substantial error, and so affirmed the judgment and the order.

Although counsel for the plaintiff filed in this case, on October 20, 1917, an additional or supplemental brief in which they enter into an analytical examination of the instructions given herein with the view of demonstrating that they did not properly state the law upon the question of damages, or, in other words, as to the ascertainment of the depreciation of the value of the untaken property, claiming that upon that proposition the instructions were not consistent with themselves, and also that they were too abstract to furnish light upon the concrete elements entering into the basis upon which such depreciation may justly be founded, still we are perfectly satisfied that the decision of the Supreme Court upon all the vital points involved and presented in the Leonard Case is, for the reasons above stated, decisive of the present case.

It may be added that a petition for a rehearing of the Leonard Case was filed in the Supreme Court and the points therein decided and herein urged by the appellant again fully and ably discussed. A rehearing was denied by that court.

For the reasons above stated, we can see no reason for specifically examining and considering herein the points made against the validity of the judgment and the order appealed from. Accordingly, upon the authority of the case of Colusa & Hamilton Railroad Company v. Ella Glenn Leonard et al., the judgment and the order which are the bases of these appeals are affirmed.

McGRATH v. LANGFORD, Sheriff of Santa Clara County et al. (Civ. 2054.)

JUDGMENT 🔑412 — VOIDABLE JUDGMENT — RESTRAINING ENFORCEMENT.

The court set Saturday afternoon, which by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 10, 133, 134, has been made a nonjudicial period, for a hearing upon defendant's demurrer. Although defendant failed to appear, an order was made on said day overruling his demurrer, and giving ten days in which to answer, of which fact defendant was notified. No answer being filed by the defendant, judgment was rendered against him by default. Code Civ. Proc. § 135, provides that if any day mentioned in section 10, other than a special holiday, happen to be the day appointed for the holding or sitting of court, or to which it is adjourned, it shall be deemed appointed for or adjourned to the next day. Held, that as the hearing was by operation of law continued to Monday, the order was premature rather than void, and defendant's only remedy was by a direct attack in the original proceeding, and not by an action to enjoin a sale of his property under an execution issued upon the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasly, Judge.

Action by E. O. McGrath against Arthur B. Langford and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

F. J. Solinsky and Frank R. Wehe, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Beggs & McComish, of San Jose, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enjoin the sale of his property upon an execution issued upon a judgment of a justice's court rendered against the plaintiff herein in an action for work and labor, and also for goods furnished in connection with the operation of a mine, and which judgment defendant claims to be void.

The facts of the case are these: On or about January 29, 1909, W. A. Lloyd, one of the defendants herein, commenced an action in the justice's court of Mokelumne township, county of Calaveras, against the plaintiff herein for three certain claims for work and labor, and goods alleged to have been furnished to said plaintiff and for which he had not been paid. Summons was duly issued and served in said action, and the defendant therein presently appeared by his attorney and filed a demurrer. The court, as affirmatively appears by its docket, set the hearing upon said demurrer for May 15, 1909, at 3 o'clock p. m. This date fell upon Saturday, and the stated time of hearing and trial of the issues of law raised by said demurrer was Saturday afternoon, which under the statute is a legal holiday. The defendant did not appear in person or by counsel at said time; but notwithstanding the foregoing facts the court proceeded to hear and overrule said demurrer, and to order that defendant be given ten days to answer. The docket of the justice contains this entry: "Demurrer overruled. Defendant given ten days to answer, and so notified by U. S. mail." No answer being filed within the allotted time, judgment was rendered against the defendant for the sum of $215.75 and costs. No notice of the rendition of this judgment was shown to have been given the defendant, and nothing further was done in the case until somewhat more than a year later, when, as the justice's docket shows, the judgment was docketed in the judgment docket of the superior court of that county, and an execution was issued to the sheriff of Santa Clara county, which was on September 10, 1910, returned unserved. On April 13, 1913, the plaintiff in said former action caused another execution to be issued, directed to the sheriff of Santa Clara county, with an instruction to him to levy upon the property involved in this action, which was done. Thereupon and on May 13, 1913, the defendant in that action appeared in said justice's court and moved the court to set aside the said default and judgment, which motion the court denied, whereupon he instituted the present action to enjoin the levy of said execution and the sale of his said property thereunder, setting forth in his complaint the foregoing facts, and further averring that he had no notice or knowledge of the rendition or entry of said judgment until the attempted levy of said last execution in May, 1913; and further alleging that he never owed said W. A. Lloyd anything, and that said Lloyd never had any cause of action against him, and that he had a substantial defense to said former action upon the merits. The sheriff presented no defense to this action, but his codefendant, W. A. Lloyd, answered, and upon the issues thus tendered the trial court gave judgment in plaintiff's favor, from which judgment the defendant Lloyd prosecutes this appeal.

The paramount point presented upon this appeal is whether the judicial determination by the justice's court of the issues raised by the defendant's demurrer in the case before it was void because done upon and during a half holiday, and that any later judgment which might be rendered would be necessarily predicated upon the previously void judicial action, and would also be void.

Saturday afternoon has been made a nonjudicial period by the Code. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 10, 133, 134. Section 135 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "If any day mentioned in section ten of this Code other than a special holiday happen to be the day appointed for the holding or sitting of a court, or to which it is adjourned, it shall be deemed appointed for or adjourned to the next day."

Hence when the court set the hearing upon the demurrer for May 15, 1905, at 3 o'clock p. m., the time happening to fall upon a Saturday afternoon, it was by operation of law continued to the following day, which being Sunday was, in turn, by operation of law, continued to the following Monday, at which time the defendant had notice as a matter of law to appear for the hearing of the demurrer. The fact that the demurrer was heard and overruled and the order made that defendant be given ten days to answer on the said Saturday afternoon, which was before the time allowed by law for the hearing of the demurrer, renders the order a premature rather than a void adjudication. If the defendant in that action had acted upon the statutory notice as he should have done, the premature act of the court would doubtless have been corrected upon motion, and certainly would have been rectified upon appeal. Similarly, it has been held that the action of a court in rendering a judgment by default before the time allowed the defendant to answer had expired was merely voidable, and could only be attacked upon motion or on appeal. In re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 220, 16 Pac. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146.

The present action is one in equity to restrain the enforcement of the judgment rendered in the former action and claimed by defendant to be void. Usually in a case where the power of a court of equity is invoked to restrain the enforcement of a judgment in a court of law the validity of the judgment and the apparent right of enforcement is conceded. Metropolis Sav. Bank, etc., v. Barnet, 165 Cal. 449, 455, 132 Pac. 833. It is only upon direct attack by appeal from a judgment by default that there is no presumption in favor of the existence of any fact essential to the jurisdiction of the court over the defendant. But when an action is brought in equity to set aside a judgment at law the attack, although not collateral, is always indirect, and such an attack does not question or dispute the effect of the judgment as an adjudication, but seeks to be relieved from its operation upon equitable grounds. Eichhoff v. Eichhoff, 107 Cal. 42, 40 Pac. 24, 48 Am. St. Rep. 110.

Defendant's remedy was by a direct proceeding in the original action. Alderson v. Bell, 9 Cal. 315; Whitwell v. Barbier, 7 Cal. 54; and inasmuch as opportunity for relief was had in the original proceedings, equity will not now set the judgment aside. Chipman v. Bowman, 14 Cal. 157; Ede v. Hazen, 61 Cal. 360.

Judgment reversed.

PERRIN v. MILLER et al. (Civ. 1721.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 25, 1917.)

1. Statutes ⟹188 — Construction—Meaning of Language.

The words of a statute must be interpreted according to their common acceptation, and if they have a technical as well as a popular meaning must be given their popular signification.

2. Dismissal and Nonsuit ⟹60(2)—Want of Prosecution — Failure to Bring to "Trial."

Within Code Civ. Proc. § 583, providing for the dismissal of any action, not brought to trial within five years after the answer is filed, the word "trial" refers to the hearing and determination of the issues of fact involved, and the hearing on a demurrer is not a trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Trial.]

3. Dismissal and Nonsuit ⟹60(6)—Want of Prosecution — Failure to Bring to Trial.

Code Civ. Proc. § 583, providing that an action shall be dismissed, unless brought to trial within five years after the answer is filed, except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended, is mandatory, and an action was properly dismissed where more than six years had lapsed from the filing of the answer, and no written stipulation, extending the time, had been entered into, though plaintiff's attorney claimed to have been relying on an oral understanding with defendant's attorney, that the trial of the cause might be taken up at the pleasure of plaintiff's attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by E. B. Perrin against Carrie M. Miller and another. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. Bolton and Randolph V. Whiting, both of San Francisco, for appellant. C. E. McLaughlin, of Sacramento, and C. P. McLaughlin, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, J. The appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment of dismissal because of his failure to bring the action to trial within five years after the answer was filed, pursuant to the provisions of section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Said section, so far as applicable here, reads:

> "* * * Any action heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced or to which it may be transferred on motion of the defendant, after due notice to plaintiff, or by the court on its own motion, unless such action is brought to trial within five years after the defendant has filed his answer, except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended."

The complaint in this action was filed on October 20, 1908, and the answer and cross-complaint on January 5, 1909. A demurrer to the answer and cross-complaint was filed on February 1, 1909, more than six years before the motion to dismiss the action was made. While the record discloses the fact that said demurrer was overruled, it does not show at what date such action was taken, but it is stated in respondents' brief that it occurred more than five years before the making of the motion to dismiss. Said motion to dismiss the action was heard upon affidavits. C. E. McLaughlin, attorney for defendants whose affidavit was dated May 14, 1915, deposed that at no time since the answer was filed had any stipulation been entered into, in writing or otherwise, extending the time in which said action might be brought to trial; that, in September, 1913, affiant and A. E. Bolton, attorney for plaintiff, had a conversation in substance as follows:

> That said Bolton said to affiant: "We must arrange to try the case of Perrin v. Miller. It should have been tried before this, but Perrin has had so much trouble with the government, and has been so annoyed, and so much of my time has been taken up in connection with his difficulties, that we have never seen our way clear to try the case." That affiant replied to said statement: "We are ready to try the case at any time, but a date must be fixed which will not interfere with my other engagements."

The affidavit of A. E. Bolton, attorney for plaintiff, referring to said conversation with Judge McLaughlin in 1913, was in practical accord with the latter's statement regarding the troubles of his client with the government, and proceeded:

> "That affiant does not remember the exact conversation that took place at that time but as affiant understood the substance thereof, said McLaughlin said he would take up the trial of said cause at the pleasure of affiant; and affiant assured said McLaughlin that there was no disposition on the part of affiant or said Perrin to put off the trial of the case; that the difficulties arose by reason of the condition of the affairs of said Perrin."

It is also stated that "affiant, by reason of the understanding of affiant, was taken by surprise" when he learned from Judge McLaughlin, in March, 1915, that his clients were insisting that the cause be dismissed, and "that affiant had relied upon said understanding."

Appellant, in his brief, says that:

> "After the demurrer of the plaintiff to defendant's answer and cross-complaint had been overruled, no notice of the overruling of the demurrer was given to the plaintiff."

And he further states:

"If the action was brought to trial by the filing and hearing upon the demurrer to the answer, then the action had been brought to trial and was pending, and could not be dismissed."

The following cases are cited holding that "a trial is the examination before a competent tribunal, * * * of the facts or law"—that is, "when a court hears and determines any issue of fact or of law for the purpose of determining the rights of the parties, it may be considered a trial": Tregambo v. Comanche M. Co., 57 Cal. 504; Redington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 62, 27 Pac. 40; Flagg v. Peterbaugh, 98 Cal. 136, 32 Pac. 863; Botto v. Vandament, 67 Cal. 332, 7 Pac. 753; Goldtree v. Spreckels, 135 Cal. 669, 67 Pac. 1091. Appellant then says:

"At the time of the enactment of section 583 in 1905, the word 'trial' had by these decisions been given a distinct meaning."

Said section 583 was first before the Supreme Court in the case of Romero v. Snyder, 167 Cal. 216, 138 Pac. 1002, wherein it was said that the section fixes—

"a maximum period of five years, upon the expiration of which, the delay is declared to be sufficient as a matter of law and the dismissal is made mandatory."

In Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 154 Pac. 841, the court said:

"Unless the parties have, in effect at least, stipulated in writing that the action need not be brought to trial within five years from the date of the filing of the answer, it must be dismissed at the expiration of such five years, if not 'brought to trial' within that time. * * * it is a stipulation in writing extending the five-year period that the statute provides for, and without such a stipulation, certainly in the absence of some element of estoppel, there can be no effective answer to a motion to dismiss, if the action has not been 'brought to trial' within such period. The language of the statute is so plain in this regard that no other intent can be attributed to the Legislature. We are not concerned here with the exact meaning of the term 'brought to trial,' for it is manifest that with whatever liberality we construe it in favor of plaintiff here, this action was not brought to trial within five years of the date of filing the answer."

In the case before us it becomes necessary that we should determine what was the intention of the Legislature when it used the expression, "brought to trial."

[1] Our Supreme Court has declared:

That "the words of a statute must be interpreted according to their common acceptation" (Quigley v. Gorham, 5 Cal. 418, 63 Am. Dec. 139; Gross v. Fowler, 21 Cal. 393; People v. Reis, 76 Cal. 269, 18 Pac. 309); and also that "where a word, having a technical as well as a popular meaning, is used in * * * a statute, the courts will accord to it its popular signification" (Weill v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111).

[2] There can be no question that, applying the above rules of construction to the section under consideration, the "common acceptation" and the "popular signification" of the word "trial" must be construed as referring to a hearing and determination of the issues of fact involved. To hold otherwise would be to give to the word a strained and technical meaning. If the judge of a superior court in this state should announce that he would proceed to set cases for trial, every attorney present would know that he meant that the issues of fact were to be tried. There may be several "trials" of issues of law besides the ruling on a demurrer, such as an order granting or denying a motion to change the place of trial, the ruling on a request of a party to be permitted to amend pleadings, etc. It is inconceivable that, if its attention had been directed to the various "trials" possible in an action, the Legislature should have been so careless as not to have inserted in the section words definitely indicating whether the trial referred to was one of fact or of law.

[3] If, as we hold, the word "trial" means the trial of the issues of fact, we are unable to perceive any just reason why the judgment should be reversed. Said section 583 is mandatory in its terms. It directs that:

An action "shall be dismissed by the court * * * except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended."

More than six years had elapsed since the filing of the answer, and no written stipulation extending time had been entered into. If the conversation between the counsel for the respective parties, in September, 1913, was as stated by appellant's attorney, to have prevented the terms of the section from applying to his cause of action, the understanding should have been reduced to writing in the form of a stipulation to extend the time of trial and signed by the attorneys for both parties. By the entering into of such a written stipulation only could the imperative mandate of the section have been made unavailing to the defendants.

Much space is devoted in the briefs to a discussion of various questions arising under the pleadings—as to who are necessary parties, whether the demurrer to defendants' cross-complaint was properly overruled, etc. Inasmuch as we hold that the action was properly dismissed, we conceive it to be unnecessary to examine and decide the questions thus discussed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action in claim and delivery by H. E. Bradley against Roland McDonald and L. Allen. From a partial judgment for plaintiff, he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry K. Norton and Wilbur Bassett, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. E. L. Foster and Charles A. Barnhart, both of Bakersfield, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff brings the action in claim and delivery as the assignee of the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company, hereinafter referred to as the Collender Company. It is alleged in the complaint that on the 10th day of March, 1912, the Collender Company was, and ever since until the 17th day of January, 1913, has been, the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of certain saloon fixtures, the articles referred to being embraced in what is designated in the record as the first contract, and that the said Collender Company was on the said 17th day of January, 1913, the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of four booths with four mahogany tables referred to in the record as embraced in what is termed the second contract of sale, and that on the said 17th day of January, 1913, said company transferred and assigned all its right, title, and interest in and to said goods and chattels to the plaintiff, who thereupon became, and ever since has been, and is now the owner and entitled to the possession of the said goods and chattels, all of which are alleged to be of the value of $2,000; that the defendants, McDonald and Allen, "without the consent of the plaintiff and against his will, now detain the said goods and chattels from the possession of said plaintiff." It is also alleged "that the said goods and chattels are now in the actual possession of defendant L. Allen, but that plaintiff is informed and believes, and on such information and belief so alleges the fact to be, that defendant L. Allen is the agent for defendant McDonald, and has been at all times and is now acting under instructions from said defendant McDonald in this matter"; alleges that on said 17th day of January, 1913, and before the commencement of this action, plaintiff demanded of defendants and each of them possession of said goods, and possession was refused, and that defendants and each of them still unlawfully withhold and detain the said goods and chattels to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $2,000.

A general demurrer was overruled, and defendants answered; denied on information and belief that the Collender Company was the owner of said goods as alleged in the complaint, and denied that it had transferred and assigned its right in the said goods to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of the same; alleged that the said property was of no greater value than $1,000; denied that the defendants detain said goods otherwise than as hereinafter set forth; denied that the said defendant Allen is the agent of defendant McDonald or is acting under his instructions in any manner or at all; denied that they unlawfully withhold and detain said goods from the possession of plaintiff to his damage as alleged.

For separate answer and defense the defendants allege that the property described in the plaintiff's complaint was part of the estate of F. M. Carrillo, a bankrupt, and that the trustee in bankruptcy, under and by virtue of an order of the referee in bankruptcy in and for the county of Kern, sold at public sale all the right, title, and interest of the bankrupt, F. M. Carrillo, to the defendant L. Allen, and that the latter is now the owner of all the right, title, and interest of F. M. Carrillo, a bankrupt as aforesaid, and that said Carrillo was declared a bankrupt by the United States District Court in and for the Southern District of California, Northern Division, on or about the 25th day of May, 1912; that said Collender Company sold the said goods and chattels to said Carrillo, and that he had paid large sums of money on account of the purchase thereof, and that the said Collender Company had failed to give credit for the full amount paid thereon by said Carrillo, and that these defendants have demanded of said Collender Company that they give proper credit for payments made, and stated that, when such amount was ascertained, the defendant Allen would pay the said Collender Company the correct amount; allege that defendant Allen is willing, ready, and able to pay the correct balance due thereon.

The cause was tried by the court, a jury having been expressly waived, and the court made the following findings: That it was stipulated that plaintiff was simply the assignee of the Collender Company for the purpose of this suit, "and that all defenses raised by the defendants were applicable in this action against the plaintiff"; that the property described in plaintiff's complaint was sold to Carrillo under two contracts of sale, the first being for certain bar fixtures, and the second for four booths and four mahogany tables; that the first contract or agreement for sale of property referred to therein "had been fully paid by F. M. Carrillo, and that nothing was due thereon"; that it was stipulated by the respective parties that the value of all the personal property was $1,000; that the property described in plaintiff's complaint was part of the estate of F. M. Carrillo, a bankrupt, "and that the trustee in bankruptcy, J. W. McGrath, the duly appointed, qualified, and acting trustee in bankruptcy for the said estate, under and by virtue of an order of the referee in bankruptcy in and for the county of Kern, state of California, sold at public sale all the right, title, and interest of the bankrupt, F. M. Carrillo, to the defendant L. Allen, and that the defendant L. Allen was the owner of all the right, title, and interest of F. M. Carrillo, a bankrupt, and that the said F. M. Carrillo was declared a bankrupt * * * on or about May 25, 1912"; that the defendants do not detain the goods and chattels from the possession of the plaintiff mentioned in the first contract; that the said goods and chattels referred to in the second contract "are in the actual possession of the defendant L. Allen, and that L. Allen is not the agent of defendant Roland McDonald, nor is he acting under instructions from the said defendant McDonald in this matter"; that before the commencement of this action plaintiff demanded of the defendants at the time and as alleged in the complaint the possession of said goods and chattels, and defendants refused and still refuse to deliver the same to plaintiff; that on the 17th day of January, 1913, the Collender Company assigned, for the purposes of this action, all its right and interest in said goods; that the defendants have not damaged the plaintiff in the sum of $2,000 by withholding and detaining the same as alleged; that defendant Allen is the owner of and entitled to the immediate possession of the goods mentioned in the first contract, "and that the said contract for sale of same to F. M. Carrillo had been fully paid and discharged, and the title to said property was vested in F. M. Carrillo at the time that the said F. M. Carrillo was declared a bankrupt, and that the trustee in bankruptcy of his estate had the title, and right of possession to said property, and sold the same to the defendant L. Allen for a valuable consideration"; that the second contract was not paid in full by Carrillo, and title to same had not passed from plaintiff's assignor, "but that said four booths and four mahogany tables at all times have been and are now the property of the plaintiff," and that the value thereof is the sum of $425, "the balance due on the second agreement"; that all said property is now in the possession of the defendant L. Allen.

As conclusions of law, the court found that defendant Allen is the owner of, and entitled to the immediate possession of, the goods mentioned in the first contract; that the plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of the four booths and four mahogany tables mentioned in the second contract, "and in case delivery of the same cannot be had, then for the value thereof, to wit, the sum of $425, and plaintiff is entitled to his costs of suit." Judgment was accordingly entered.

By the judgment it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant Allen is the owner of, and entitled to the immediate possession of, all the goods mentioned in the first contract, but there was no alternative provision in that connection for money judgment in case possession could not be delivered. As to the second contract, the judgment was for immediate possession of the goods therein mentioned "and in case delivery of the same cannot be had, then for the value thereof, to wit, the sum of $425, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from date until paid." Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

No contention arises concerning the second of these contracts, and it need not be considered. The question here is simply: Is the finding supported by the evidence that the first contract was fully paid? This contract in effect provides for a conditional sale, and took the form of a lease for the term of 12 months and 2 days from date (March 29, 1910) on the following terms:

> "$625 upon the execution of the contract, and the further sum of $80 to be paid on the 1st day of every month ensuing, commencing May 1, 1910, until the full term of 11 months and 2 days from this date shall have expired; said payments being for the rental use and wear of said property."

The purchaser, Carrillo, was to keep the property in good repair and return the same at the expiration of the term in good order, reasonable wear and tear thereof excepted, "it being specially agreed that the title to all said property is and shall remain vested in said party of the first part [the Collender Company]." The purchaser was to keep the property insured, the Collender Company to take out the policies at the purchaser's expense; purchaser also to pay all taxes assessed upon the property; interest at 8 per cent. was to be charged on unpaid installments. It was further provided that upon full performance on his part by the purchaser the Collender Company would sell and convey the said property to the purchaser, Carrillo, on the 1st day of April, 1911, for the sum of $106.80.

Witness F. P. Simpson, called for plaintiff, testified that he was vice president of the Collender Company, and acquainted with all the facts relating to these contracts. He testified:

> "Neither Mr. Carrillo nor any one acting for him has paid to the company or offered to pay to the company or tendered to the company any money or any property in payment of all of the money called for in the first contract covering the bar fixtures."

On cross-examination, and referring to the first contract, he testified:

> "Mr. Carrillo failed to keep the terms of his contract, because he failed to pay the insurance on the property covered by that contract. It was my recollection that that was the only breach of the first contract."

The evidence following this statement seems to have been introduced solely for the purpose of clearing up the single question whether or not there was a default in the first contract as to an item of insurance.

The Collender Company made a statement of the account between the company and Carrillo dated August 1, 1912, two months after the latter was declared a bankrupt. This bill includes items of merchandise, and among other items the following:

May 26, 1910.	To 1 yrs. ins. on bar fixtures, expiring May 24, 1911...........	$37 00
May 11, 1911.	To 1 yrs. ins. on fixtures, expiring May 24, 1912.............	37 00
Dec. 1, 1912.	Ins.	60 00

The balance struck showed $41.05 due from Carrillo.

It appeared, however, that the item of $60 was incurred in 1911, and was for insurance on the property covered by the second contract. The item of $60 being eliminated, there remained the two insurance charges of $37 each, May 26, 1910, and May 11, 1911. Counsel for plaintiff introduced a copy of two pages of the Collender Company's ledger "showing," as stated by counsel, "the payments made, and how made, and how they were credited on the two contracts." On the face of this ledger account it would appear that on April 1, 1911, the date Carrillo was given credit for $106.80, there was due on the first contract $746.80, and yet witness Simpson testified that this contract was fully paid except a claim for insurance, and this is confirmed by a letter written by the Collender Company's attorney to defendant's attorney. Unexplained, these ledger entries throw no light on the case, and as a complete statement of the account between the company and Carrillo they are of little value. As to the two items for $37 each for insurance, we are left to such aid as can be given by the exhibits referred to. The ledger shows a charge of $37, account of insurance on May 11, 1910, and opposite is a credit of $37. A group of items appears aggregating $156.50 debit, among which is an item "May 26, 1910, Insu. $37.00." Opposite is a group of credits, the items showing that they were intended as credits against the group of debits, aggregating $157.50, or $1 more than seems to have been charged, including insurance on the first contract. Among the credits shown on the statement dated August 1, 1912, is an item October 3, 1911, of $37, which paid the insurance charged May 11, 1911, expiring May 24, 1912. This is the same payment as shown on the ledger of the same date. This policy carried insurance to May 24, 1912. On April 26, 1911, Carrillo sent to the Collender Company a draft for $106.80, stating in his letter that it was the last payment on the bar fixtures, and the evidence shows that it was the final payment on the first contract. That being true, the Collender Company had no right to charge insurance under that contract covering the year ending May 24, 1912.

[1] So far as we are able to determine from the confused condition of the record, the findings of the court that the first contract was fully paid is supported by sufficient evidence. It was within the power of plaintiff to produce the original entries of debits and credits showing the exact condition of the account of plaintiff's assignor and Carrillo. This was not done. It is conceded that defendants acquired no rights to the property without having shown full performance on Carrillo's part, and that the trustee in bankruptcy acquired no better title than the bankrupt had.

[2, 3] It is claimed that the judgment is void for uncertainty. It was not necessary, as contended by appellant, that as to the goods included in the first contract there should have been an alternative judgment for the value. The court found that title and possession were in Allen, and this was sufficient. As plaintiff was entitled to neither title nor possession, he cannot complain of the form of the judgment. Claudius v. Aguirre, 89 Cal. 501, 26 Pac. 1077; Caruthers v. Hensley, 90 Cal. 559, 27 Pac. 411. It appeared without dispute that all the property was in the possession of defendant Allen, and that defendant McDonald had nothing to do with it. The following statement found in the respondents' brief, it seems to us, satisfactorily shows that the judgment as to the property involved in the second contract may be sustained. We quote:

> "Finding 14, that all of said property is now in the possession of defendant L. Allen, and was at all times, and not in the possession of any of the other defendants, the judgment necessarily refers to the findings, and the right of the immediate possession of the same; the right of possession of part is adjudged to Allen, and the other part of the personal property is adjudged to belong to Bradley, as against Allen, who has the possession of same, or for the sum of $425, as against Allen, together with interest thereon. This is made so expressly by the findings, as well as by the judgment, and the findings constitute part of the judgment. Consequently there is no uncertainty as against whom the judgment is rendered for the possession of the four booths and four mahogany tables, and in case delivery of the same cannot be had from L. Allen, then for the value, or $425, as against L. Allen."

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BYLER. (Cr. 551.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 5, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 3, 1918.)

1. Homicide 🔑250 — Manslaughter — Sufficiency of Evidence.

Evidence held to support verdict of guilty of manslaughter.

2. Homicide 🔑234(1) — Conviction — Evidence—Statute.

Under Pen. Code, § 1105, providing that, on trial for murder, homicide by defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation or that justify or excuse it devolves on him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that defendant was justified or excusable, the people are under no stronger requirement than that they prove defendant's guilt of the offense of which he is convicted beyond a reasonable doubt under all the evidence.

3. Homicide 🔑145, 151(1) — Burden to Prove Mitigation—Statute.

The first part of Pen. Code, § 1105, dispenses with the necessity for a showing of intent on a trial for murder, and shifts the burden of proving mitigation after proof that defendant committed the homicidal act.

4. Homicide 🔑250—Conviction of—Sufficiency of Evidence — Rebuttal of Discredited Defense by People.

Whenever a defendant admits the killing of the person with whose murder he is charged, and the evidence of the people tends to show him guilty of manslaughter, and he offers evidence to mitigate, excuse, or justify the killing, the jury may justly assume that the defense offered is the only defense defendant has made, rejecting it if unreasonable on any account, and may convict him of manslaughter if satisfied of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt from all the evidence, without any attempt by the people to rebut by evidence the incredible or discredited defense.

5. Criminal Law 🔑830—Trial—Requested Instructions.

Requested instructions which were not statements of law were properly refused.

6. Criminal Law 🔑829(1) — Trial — Instructions—Repetition.

A refusal of requested instructions given in effect in the instructions read to the jury was not erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

J. J. Byler was convicted of manslaughter, and from the judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, J. E. Greene, of Dinuba, and Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Frank Lamberson, Dist. Atty., of Visalia, for the People.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. The appellant was tried under an information charging him with the murder of Frank Meadows, was found guilty of manslaughter, and was sentenced to 4 years' imprisonment.

[1] At the time of the commission of the offense, Byler was over 60 years of age, while Meadows was about 50. Byler was somewhat weakened by disease. Meadows was of unusual physical strength and proportions. Both men were addicted to the use of liquor, and they were both probably intoxicated at the time of the tragedy; Byler certainly was. The killing occurred late at night, just outside Byler's house, near or at North Dinuba. The two men were together early in the evening, with some of their neighbors, at a pool hall in the village, and started home together, as their residences were not far apart, earlier than 9 o'clock. They were both then under the influence of liquor. The killing did not take place until nearly 1 o'clock. Upon these various points there is no dispute in the evidence.

Byler testifies that after he and Meadows left the pool hall they went to Meadows' home, stopped for a very brief time in the road in front of the place, and that Meadows went alone towards the house. Byler, according to his testimony, then went to his home, entered the house, lighted a couple of lamps, and "started to look over" certain newspapers, "over the headlines some." While he was thus engaged he heard a disturbance at his barn and went out to ascertain if anything was wrong with his horses, going into the barn and speaking to the animals. As he came out he says he met Meadows at the door. The latter asked if Byler did not have some wine, and he responded that he had some in his wagon, which was then standing in the yard. Meadows took two or three drinks from the bottle while the two were together, a period of 20 or 30 minutes, and started towards home, Byler at the same time returning to his house. Byler says there was no altercation or trouble between him and Meadows during the period just mentioned. Upon Byler's re-entry into the house he resumed his perusal of the newspapers, drank some wine, and soon began his preparations for bed. He extinguished the two lamps he had lighted and entered his bedroom, when he heard a knock at the kitchen door and responded to it. At this point it is proper to interrupt the narrative by stating that Byler testifies that he and Meadows saw a "hobo" camp fire near the road soon after they left the pool hall together, around which there were two or three men. This circumstance has much to do with the remainder of Byler's story.

When Byler got to the kitchen door, to resume his narrative, he stepped out on a platform at the door, and was seized by some one to him then unknown, who said, "Your change!" and who "grabbed me and hit me several times." The two went down together, according to Byler, after they had "scuffled" and "boxed around." The witness then went on:

"He grabbed me by the privates and by my chin. Q. Was that after you were on the ground? A. That was after I was on the ground, and I commenced, I tried to get my knife, and I got my knife some way, some how, I do not know how, and I got it open. And I commenced cutting him just anywhere and as fast as I could; any way to save my life. I saw that it was the only way to save my life. Q. After striking him with the knife, what happened? A. Well, some way he relaxed and I got loose and got up. Q. When you were striking were you on your back? A. Yes, sir; he was on top of me. Q. Were you on your side? A. Some way or the other; I was on my back, and he held me there, by the privates; held me this way, and I was striking him. I got my knife. * * * Q. After you got up what did you do? A. I jumped up to one side; I got up and got away, and there were a couple of parties got up and ran by me. I struck at one, once or twice. I thought that I hit him; did not know."

The latter portion of this quotation, as well as some of Byler's other statements in the record, indicate a belief on his part, either real or pretended, that his assailant was one of the men he had seen at the "hobo" camp, and that the others were near at hand and were assisting, or were ready to assist, the principal actor against him. Byler says that he ran to the house of a neighbor, near the store at North Dinuba, for help, as soon as he had extricated himself from the grasp of his assailant, and that he did not know that the stricken man was Meadows until others who examined the body told him so considerably later. Meadows had five wounds, all knife stabs; one of which penetrated one of the ventricles of the heart. This stab, according to the testimony of a physician who saw the wounds, must have caused death within a minute or a minute and a half. On the night of the tragedy Byler was alone at his house, as his wife had that day gone to Fresno to visit a sister.

The appellant contends that the evidence in the case is insufficient to support the verdict of the jury. In order to solve this question, we have first stated the evidence most favorable to Byler. By way of contrast, we now state the features of the case opposed to his story.

It will be remembered that Byler says Meadows left him, at Meadows' home, immediately after their departure together from the pool room. Mrs. Meadows' testimony, however, was to the contrary. She says she saw the two men come together to the front of the Meadows residence at about 8:30 o'clock; says that they stopped there and talked for some time, and then moved away towards Byler's house. Her testimony is direct and positive. She says the night was not dark, and that she had no lights in the house. She was attending to her children at the time, getting them covered for the night, and was watching for the return of an older daughter who had gone out with a young horse and for whom she was uneasy. She saw the men out of the window several times as they stood talking, heard and recognized their voices, Byler talking very loud, and recognized their outlines. As they moved along the road together she says it was the last time she saw her husband alive. She heard them cross a bridge which was on the way towards Byler's house, and she heard Byler's voice "all the way up to the house." She was sleepless until after midnight, last looking at her watch at 12:45, and heard the voices, particularly Byler's, until a few minutes before that time.

Another witness, Mrs. Guse, who lived a little distance from the Byler home, says she was outside her house for about five minutes, immediately after midnight, and heard Byler loudly quarreling with some one during the entire time, in the direction of his house, although she heard no other voice in response. Byler says, it will be remembered, that there was no altercation between him and Meadows during the only time they were together at Byler's place, a period of less than half an hour, previous to the moment of the killing. It is to be noted here, in connection with the statements of Mrs. Meadows and Mrs. Guse as to the loudness of Byler's voice, that several witnesses testified that he talked in the same manner at the pool hall.

On two or three occasions, within a short period following Meadows' death, Byler voluntarily told the sheriff of the county, and others, his story of the events of the night. On one or more of these occasions the sheriff told Byler that the story did not cover all the time during the evening. For instance, the sheriff testified, as to one occasion:

"I said, 'Now, Mr. Byler, you have about three hours or three hours and a half to account for. You say that you arrived home something before 9 and retired about 9. Now you did not show up at North Dinuba until about 1. Now, where were you from 9 o'clock until about 1?'"

To this question Byler's only response was:

"Well, you have heard my story, and that is the truth."

On another occasion Byler told the sheriff that his story was absolutely the truth, and that he would carry it, if need be, to the gallows. This state of affairs is alone almost controllingly significant for the reason that Byler at no time before the trial told of his meeting with Meadows outside the barn, when Meadows drank from the wine bottle at the wagon. On the telling of his tale at every previous time he leaves Meadows in front of the Meadows home, and does not see him again until he kills him, not then knowing his identity.

There are inherent defects in Byler's story, as told on every occasion. It is difficult to believe that his assailant, an unusually powerful man, having an advantage from the surprise of the attack, and getting Byler on the ground under him, should permit Byler, a man weakened by disease and advanced in years, to take a clasp knife from his pocket, open it, and use it with such terrible effect.

It would not be profitable to further refer to the showing made by the voluminous record of the trial, which consumed five days' time. There are many things in the evidence, naturally, which discredit and some which support the theory of Byler's innocence. There were several serious discrepancies in the stories he told, on the witness stand and elsewhere, concerning the happenings of the night whose events have enmeshed him. It is sufficient here to say that the verdict finds support in the record, and that the jury was within its province in believing that Byler did not tell the truth. In connection with appellant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, there yet remains a question to be discussed. It arises under the provisions of section 1105 of the Penal Code, which reads:

> "Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable."

[2-4] The appellant asserts that the latter portion of the section, commencing with the word "unless," operates strongly in favor of appellant, for it is contended that the evidence offered by the prosecution tended to show that Byler was guilty of manslaughter only. We need not pause to determine whether the people's evidence tended to so show. Whatever may be the effect of section 1105, it is certainly true that the people can be under no stronger requirement than that they prove a defendant's guilt of the offense of which he is convicted beyond a reasonable doubt under all the evidence. People v. Ashe, 44 Cal. 288. This rule ordinarily goes to the extent of requiring proof of guilty intent, or of circumstances from which the jury may properly infer such intent, but the first part of section 1105 dispenses with the necessity for a showing as to intent in a trial for murder and shifts the burden of proving mitigation to the defendant after mere proof that he committed the homicidal act. People v. Jones, 160 Cal. 358, 370, 117 Pac 176. The effect of the latter part of the section is to indicate that the ordinary rule as to reasonable doubt pertains to murder cases in which the evidence on the part of the people tends to show that the defendant is guilty of manslaughter only. In this case the defendant attempted to show that he killed Meadows in self-defense. After the evidence was all in it became the duty of the jury to determine, upon the entire evidence and under the instructions of the court, the crime of which Byler was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt; and the court gave an instruction setting forth the substance, and which was almost in the exact language of section 1105. But the defendant asked for a certain instruction, which was refused, and which was as follows:

> "If you believe from the evidence in this case that the prosecution has failed to establish that the crime committed amounts at most but to manslaughter, then and under those circumstances you are instructed that the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation or that justify or excuse such crime of manslaughter does not devolve upon the defendant in this case, but that the prosecution must show by evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that such circumstances of mitigation or such circumstances that justify or excuse the crime of manslaughter did not exist, and the prosecution must so show the same affirmatively and beyond a reasonable doubt, otherwise it is your duty to acquit the defendant."

The assertion in the latter half of the requested instruction that "the prosecution must show by evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that such circumstances of mitigation or such circumstances that justify or excuse the crime of manslaughter did not exist," does not properly set forth the law applicable to the case. It cannot be that after a defendant has made his proof in mitigation, excuse, or justification, on his trial for murder, whether the evidence of the people tends to show him guilty of murder, or of manslaughter only—it cannot be, we say, that the people must in rebuttal show by affirmative evidence that the mitigating, justifying, or excusing circumstances do not exist, however weak, improbable, or perjured the evidence produced by the defendant may be. Whenever a defendant admits the killing of a person with whose murder he is charged, as the defendant here does, and the evidence of the people tends to show him guilty of manslaughter, and he offers evidence to mitigate, excuse, or justify the killing, the jury may justly assume that the defense offered by him is the only defense he has, may reject the defense if it be unreasonable on any account, and may convict him of manslaughter if satisfied of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt from all the evidence, without any attempt on the part of the people to rebut, by evidence, the incredible or discredited defense. This view seems to be supported by People v. Forsythe, 65 Cal. 101, 3 Pac. 402, although that case was one in which the evidence of the people did not reduce the showing to one of manslaughter only. The Supreme Court there said:

> "If the defendant introduced evidence which tended to prove that the homicide was justifiable or excusable, it simply raised a conflict for the jury to determine, subject only to the power of the court below to grant a new trial."

Surely, a defense of mitigation, excuse, or justification may as well be met, in the minds of the jurors, upon considerations arising from the inherent weakness of the defense, as from evidence produced by the people in rebuttal of the defense. A defense which is no defense can require no rebuttal. The court gave the usual instructions on the question of reasonable doubt, and that was sufficient as against the defendant's request for the giving of the proposed instruction quoted above.

[5, 6] The appellant contends that the trial court committed error in refusing various instructions requested by him, but the instructions were properly refused, as some of them were not statements of the law, and all the remainder were given, in effect, in instructions read to the jury. It is also claimed that there was error in certain rulings upon the admissibility of evidence. If the claim be just as to any of the rulings whatever, the errors were of such a nature as not to affect the substantial merits of the case. We are satisfied, after a careful examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, that no error complained of by appellant has resulted in a miscarriage of justice in the case.

1. BILLS AND NOTES 🔑491 — AFFIRMATIVE MATTERS IN ANSWERS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action on a note and to foreclose a mortgage securing its payment, the burden was upon defendant to establish the affirmative matters set up in his answer.

2. BILLS AND NOTES 🔑527(1)—PAYMENT—FINDING—EVIDENCE.

In such action, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that the note was not paid.

3. BILLS AND NOTES 🔑516—EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT—FINDING—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in such action held to sustain a finding that the time for payment of the note had not been extended.

4. NOVATION 🔑12 — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In such action, evidence held not to show a novation by the giving of certain instruments.

5. BILLS AND NOTES 🔑491 — PAYMENT — EXTENSION—PROOF.

Where a party depends upon an extension of time to meet his obligation, he must show an agreement for a time certain.

6. EVIDENCE 🔑385—WRITTEN INSTRUMENTS —PAROL EVIDENCE.

In an action upon a note and to foreclose the mortgage securing it, parol evidence was not admissible to vary the terms of written instruments set up by way of defense.

7. EVIDENCE 🔑471(29)—OPINION EVIDENCE.

In such action, questions to a witness as to the understanding of the parties and as to the intention and consideration in and for the execution of certain instruments, were objectionable as calling for his opinion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Action by Theodore H. Minor against Samuel Carpenter and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants Carpenter and Pentuff appeal. Appeal dismissed as to defendant Pentuff, and judgment and order as to defendant Carpenter affirmed.

L. F. Coburn, of Yreka, for appellants. Frank M. McGowan, of San Francisco, and Clifford E. Butler, of Berkeley (Blaine McGowan, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for the amount due on a promissory note and to foreclose a mortgage given to secure the payment of the same. The complaint is in the usual form, and the genuineness and the execution of the note and mortgage were not denied.

The defenses were: (1) That the note was fully paid on December 21, 1909; (2) that by virtue of certain instruments in writing set out in the answer "the time for the payment of the debt represented by said promissory note and mortgage sued upon herein was extended and postponed to the time of the expiration of the said bond for a deed, Exhibit C, to wit, to the 20th day of August, 1916"; (3) that Exhibit A was taken and accepted by plaintiff as a substitution for the said promissory note and mortgage, with the intention to extinguish the same, and that "there was a novation of said contract, Exhibit A, for said promissory note and mortgage, and that said promissory note and mortgage was thereby annulled, extinguished and fully paid"; (4) that the execution and delivery of a certain deed was intended "as a full and complete payment of all and every debt of all and every kind, due from said Carpenter to said plaintiff, including the promissory note and mortgage debt involved in this action; that plaintiff accepted said deed as such full payment, and then and there agreed with said Samuel Carpenter to reconvey to said Carpenter the said property described in said deed on the payment by Carpenter to him of the sum of $26,400."

The findings and judgment were in favor of plaintiff, and the appeal is from the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial. Defendant Pentuff, who had taken a bond for a deed of the premises, has filed a stipulation herein that the appeal as to him may be dismissed, so that in considering the cause upon its merits only the interest of the plaintiff and the defendant Carpenter will receive attention.

[1, 2] It is not disputed that the burden was upon the defendants to establish the affirmative matters set up in their answers. Brenneke v. Smallman, 2 Cal. App. 306, 83 Pac. 302; Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 514, 62 Pac. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127. That the debt was not paid and the note discharged as an existing obligation, either by the payment of money or by virtue of the execution of any instrument in writing or agreement of the parties, is fully shown by the evidence. It also appears, at least sufficiently to support the finding of the court, that the time for the payment of the obligation was not extended. To show abundant support for the conclusion of the trial court, respondent calls attention to various portions of the transcript wherein are revealed important facts that justify the inference that the original obligation remained in full force and effect. A brief résumé of these facts may not be amiss:

Plaintiff testified positively that no part of the note had been paid. In defendant Carpenter's original proposition, the words "cancel my note and mortgage" were included, but they were omitted from said "Exhibit A" with Carpenter's knowledge and consent. In said "Exhibit A," signed by him on December 20, 1909, occur these words, "the mortgage and interest and notes heretofore given T. H. Minor, amounting at this date to about $15,000, will be paid, and T. H. Minor to have besides the payment of the mortgage notes and interest, $11,400, out of the first payment made on sale, bond, or lease." The words "and additional accrued interest on existing mortgage" were inserted in supplemental agreement of December 21, 1909, with full knowledge of the matter. The power of attorney, prepared by defendant Carpenter and dated September 1, 1911, contains this significant phrase, "Cash and additional accrued interest at 8 per cent. per annum upon the existing $12,462.15 mortgage upon said 800 acres of land from December 20, 1909, to the date of sale or bonding." Carpenter admitted that he included $12,462.15 at 8 per cent. interest in his statement in the amount specified in the bond, the sum for which this mortgage herein was given. In the deed to plaintiff dated November 14, 1910, defendant incorporated this provision, "subject, however, to $12,462.15 at 8 per cent. per annum, mortgage dated December 13, 1907, and executed by Samuel Carpenter in favor of T. H. Minor," and he had in his possession this deed containing this exception from November 14, 1910, until September 1, 1911. At no time did defendant ask to have the mortgage canceled. Other significant circumstances are pointed out, but the foregoing are sufficient to show how substantial is the support for the finding of the court that the note was not paid nor the time extended.

[3-5] Indeed, the language of the instruments themselves, upon which Carpenter relies as operating to discharge the indebtedness or to extend the time for its payment, affords no ground for his contention. There is nothing of the kind provided therein. No expression is used from which the inference would follow that the parties thereby intended or contemplated that a novation should take place, or that the obligation arising from the note was extinguished, extended, or modified in any respect. The terms of said instruments, to the contrary, expressly recognize the validity of said note as an existing obligation. In addition, as to the extension of time it may be said that no definite time is stated or intimated to which the payment is to be deferred, and, of course, it will not be disputed that, where a party depends upon an extension of time to meet his obligation, he must show an agreement for a time certain. Prather v. Young, 67 Ind. 480; Brennecke v. Smallman, supra.

It is apparent that only by virtue of parol evidence could it be held that the instruments referred to should be deemed as constituting a novation or modification of the terms of said note. Appellant, indeed, claims that parol evidence was admissible to show such intention of the parties, and he insists that the court erred in sustaining the objection to certain questions having that object in view. The inquiry assumed various forms, but the following will illustrate the situation:

"What was your agreement with Col. Minor with reference to the mortgage and notes here in controversy, as connected with or modified by the Exhibit A contract which is now in evidence?

"What was your understanding at that time—what was your belief, rather—as to the understanding Col. Minor had as to whether that mortgage and note would be in existence, or this would take its place?

"You may state whether or not, at the time of the execution of Exhibit A, from Mr. Minor's conversation with you at the time, you believed, and now believe, that he understood at that time that by the execution of Exhibit A the debt represented by the note and the mortgage in this case was to be extended until you bonded, sold, or leased the Gold Mountain mine and received the money therefor?"

In considering the ruling of the court upon these and other similar questions, we can hardly lay out of view the utterly inconsistent attitude assumed by appellant. Necessarily these instruments could not constitute at once a novation, an extinguishment of the obligation on the note, and an extension of the time for its payment. It is difficult to understand how such could have been the intention of the parties, or of either of them; and it seems rather strange that an attempt was made to show these contradictory purposes. If it could be said that the parties had in view such condition when they executed said instruments, then it would follow that the instruments themselves, by reason of this uncertainty and inconsistency, could not be effectual for any purpose.

[6, 7] Moreover, it is clear from what has already been said that it was not a proper case for the consideration of such parol evidence. The written instruments disclosed the contrary of such intention, and the claim of appellant brings him within the inhibition of the rule as to varying the terms of a written instrument. The question is more fully discussed in Piper v. Kellerman, 32 Cal. App. 128, 162 Pac. 423, to which we refer for additional consideration of the matter. Again, it is manifest that some of said questions were objectionable, as calling for the opinion of the witness as to the understanding of the parties, and, moreover, he did testify quite fully on the cross-examination as to what was the intention and consideration in and for the execution of said instruments. He even went so far as to give his impression of the effect of said transactions, and to state that he would not have executed the instrument of December 20th and 21st, if it had not provided for the payment of the mortgage out of the sale or bonding or leasing of the property.

Of course, it is possible that it was intended that said written instruments should operate as claimed by appellant; but, if so, the pleadings should have been framed so as to call for a suitable reformation of said instruments. Or, if appellant believed that he was defrauded, he should have tendered the issue by appropriate averment. As the matter is presented to us, there is no ground for interfering with the conclusion of the trial court.

The appeal as to Pentuff is dismissed. The judgment and order as to Carpenter are affirmed.

McCLELLAN et al. v. LEWIS. (Civ. 1713.)

1. JUDGMENT 🔑725(4)—RES JUDICATA—TITLE TO LAND—STATUTES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1908–1912, relative to the effect of judgments or final orders on rights in various cases, the effect of other judicial orders, what is deemed adjudged in a judgment, etc., where a husband and wife were sued for specific performance of their contract to sell a house and lot by the trustee of a fraternal order, who secured judgment with findings that the wife's declaration of homestead was void, etc., and that there was a contract of sale as set out in the complaint, such judgment determined the questions presented in a subsequent action by husband and wife to quiet title, and was conclusive therein, though the declaration of homestead was filed by the wife, who knew of the sale, before the judgment was docketed.

2. JUDGMENT 🔑720—RES JUDICATA—COMMUNITY CHARACTER OF PROPERTY.

Where the character of a house and lot as community property was admitted in a suit for specific performance against husband and wife, and adjudicated by the court to be such, its character as such became a matter res judicata, not subject to be again litigated in action to quiet title by the husband and wife.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑267(1)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—SALE BY HUSBAND—INTEREST OF WIFE—STATUTE.

A husband, by Civ. Code, § 172, had power to sell community property of himself and wife as if it were his separate property for an adequate consideration, so that it was immaterial that his contract to sell it was not signed or acknowledged by his wife; her interest being a mere expectancy.

4. JUDGMENT 🔑586(2) — RES ADJUDICATA — IDENTITY OF SUBJECT-MATTER.

An action against husband and wife for specific performance of the husband's contract to sell a house and lot, community property, and a subsequent action to quiet title to such property by husband and wife against plaintiff in the former action, were actions in equity relating to the same subject-matter.

5. HOMESTEAD 🔑128—RIGHTS OF PURCHASERS.

The rights of the purchasers of community property acquired, under the husband's contract of sale, by their action for specific performance, were superior to the homestead declared by the wife, because they related back to the time of the sale of the property, previous to the filing of declaration of homestead by the wife.

6. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑267(8) — EQUITABLE TITLE OF PURCHASERS.

Where a husband sold community property for adequate consideration, the purchasers acquired an equitable title, and became the equitable owners, and the husband, the vendor, held the legal title merely in trust for them.

7. HOMESTEAD 🔑81 — ACQUISITION BY WRONGFUL POSSESSOR.

Homestead right in community house and lot wrongfully in possession of the wife, her husband having previously sold it and holding legal title merely in trust for his vendees, could not be acquired by the wife by filing declaration of homestead.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by Minnie McClellan and F. E. McClellan against John T. Lewis. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying their motion for new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

See, also, 169 Pac. 438.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellants. Max Grimm and John R. Cronin, both of Stockton, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action is to quiet title. The claim of appellants is grounded upon the consideration that said Minnie McClellan filed a declaration of homestead upon the house and lot in controversy. Defendant relies upon a contract of sale executed by said F. E. McClellan to said Lewis, as the trustee of the Stockton Grove No. 118, United Ancient Order of Druids, and upon a final judgment in favor of said Lewis in a former action between the same parties.

The court found that on April 1, 1913, the defendant Lewis for and on behalf of said grove brought an action, No. 10741, in said superior court, against said F. E. and Minnie McClellan, for the conveyance of said property, setting out in his complaint sufficient facts to justify specific performance; that said defendants appeared and filed separate answers denying plaintiff's allegations (except that no denial was made by either of said defendants that the property in controversy was community property); that thereafter the case came on regularly for trial on the 29th day of May, 1913, both defendants being represented by counsel; that upon the conclusion of the trial the court orally announced judgment for the plaintiff and directed findings to be prepared in the case; that findings were prepared by both parties in said action and presented to the judge of the court, and left with him; that the findings prepared by the plaintiff were signed by the judge on the 28th day of June, 1913, and on said date judgment in said case was also signed and filed, and was docketed on the 13th day of July, 1913; that in and by said judgment it was and is adjudicated that the real property in question herein was the community property of Frank E. and Minnie McClellan; that the contract of sale was entered into as set out in the complaint in said action; that the purchase price agreed upon, $4,250, was a fair and adequate consideration and value of the said property, and said contract was just and reasonable between said grove and said F. E. McClellan; and that said judgment is conclusive and binding in this action. There is also a finding to the effect that the said Lewis, acting for the said grove, had made the first payment called for in said contract of sale, and had tendered the balance due, and had deposited the same in the bank to the credit of said F. E. McClellan and Minnie McClellan; that the said McClellans appealed from portions of the judgment in said case to the Supreme Court of the state of California, and that thereafter, to wit, on the 2d day of March, 1914, the appeal was dismissed by said court; also that the lis pendens was filed in the office of the county recorder of the county of San Joaquin; furthermore, that on the 18th day of October, 1913, said F. E. McClellan drew and received from the Commercial Savings Bank of Stockton, Cal., the sum of $2,750, which had been deposited therein by said Lewis as the representative of the said grove of Druids to the account and credit of the said McClellan; furthermore, that said plaintiff Minnie McClellan had full knowledge and notice of the execution of the said contract of sale by said plaintiff F. E. McClellan before the institution of said action to enforce the conveyance of said property. As to the declaration of homestead it was found by the court that on the 3d day of June, 1913, five days after the trial of the case in which judgment was rendered in favor of said Lewis and against the plaintiffs herein, the said Minnie McClellan and F. E. McClellan moved onto the property in question, and on the 4th day of June, 1913, said Minnie McClellan executed a declaration of homestead, and on June 30, 1913, two days after the findings and judgment were signed by the judge and filed as a record of the court said declaration of homestead was recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county of San Joaquin, and that the judgment in said action was entered on the same day that the homestead was recorded.

[1] There are also findings to the effect that said declaration of homestead is null and void, and that the act of plaintiffs in taking possession of said premises and the execution and filing and recording of the declaration of homestead were "illegal, wrongful, and fraudulent." There can be no serious question as to the sufficiency of the facts to sustain the material findings of the court, and, directing our attention to the judgment rendered in the former action, it is equally plain that it bars any judgment for plaintiffs in the present suit. We think there can be no serious controversy as to the following proposition: The character of the property and the title and interests of the parties therein were fairly in issue and determined in said action No. 10741, and therefore said judgment fully determines the material questions that are presented in this action. Sections 1908 to 1912, Code Civ. Proc.; Boston v. Haynes, 33 Cal. 31.

[2] The character of the property in controversy, namely, that it was community property, was admitted in the original suit and adjudicated by the court to be such, and therefore became a matter res adjudicata, and not subject to be again litigated. Jackson v. Lodge, 36 Cal. 28.

[3] It was immaterial that the contract of sale was not signed or acknowledged by Minnie McClellan, since the husband had power to sell the community property the same as if it were his separate property, for an adequate consideration. Section 172, Civ. Code; Tolman v. Smith, 85 Cal. 280, 24 Pac. 743; Farrington v. McClellan, 26 Cal. App. 375, 146 Pac. 1051. The interest which the wife had was a mere expectancy. Estate of Moffitt, 153 Cal. 359, 95 Pac. 653, 1025, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 207.

[4] There can be no doubt that said action No. 10741 and the present action are actions in equity and relate to the same subject-matter. Gish v. Ferrea, 10 Cal. App. 537, 101 Pac. 27. It must be plain, therefore, that the judgment therein is conclusive as to the merits of the case before us, nor does it make a particle of difference that said declaration of homestead was filed before said judgment was docketed. The wife knew before she declared the homestead that her husband had sold the property to the Druids for $4,250, being $250 more than the value of the property, according to the testimony. It must be plain upon principles of equity, as well as upon authority, that she could not, by herself or with the connivance of her husband, declare a valid homestead thereon after the same had been sold for a sufficient consideration.

[5] The rights of the Druids, acquired under the contract of sale, are superior to the homestead (Smith v. Bangham, 156 Cal. 359, 104 Pac. 689, 28 L. R. A. [N. S.] 522), because such rights related back to the time of the sale of the property. In the Smith Case, supra, it is said in reference to an option for the purchase of land that:

> It "vests in the grantee the right or privilege of acquiring an interest in the land, and, when accepted, entitles him to call for specific performance. * * * Such right, when exercised, must necessarily relate back to the time of giving the option * * * so as to cut off intervening rights acquired with knowledge of the existence of the option. A subsequent purchaser with notice of a valid and irrevocable option would certainly take subject to the right of the option holder to complete his purchase, * * * and we see no reason why the declarant of a homestead should stand in any better position. A declaration of homestead creates no new or additional title. It attaches certain privileges and immunities to such title as may at the time be held."

See, also, Copple v. Aigeltinger, 167 Cal. 706, 104 Pac. 1073.

[6, 7] Stating the case a little differently, there can be no question that under the terms of the said contract of sale of December 19,

1912, F. E. McClellan having sold the property to the Druids for an adequate and sufficient consideration, they acquired an equitable title to said property, and they thereby became the equitable owners, and the vendor held the legal title merely in trust for said vendees. Baldwin v. Morgan, 50 Cal. 585; Gilbert v. Sleeper, 71 Cal. 290, 12 Pac. 172. The Druids were therefore entitled to the possession of the property on February 1, 1913, which was well known to Mrs. McClellan. She was therefore a wrongful possessor of said property when she filed said declaration of homestead, and the homestead right could not thereby be acquired. Mann v. Rogers, 35 Cal. 316.

Indeed, it is quite apparent from the record that to give effect to said declaration of homestead and to decree that plaintiffs are entitled to judgment would be to tolerate and encourage a fraudulent transaction, and to make of the homestead law a cloak for wrongdoing. No one, of course, would contend for such a construction of this beneficent provision. Shinn v. MacPherson, 58 Cal. 598.

The situation, then, if we may state it in a few words, is as follows: The husband made a contract of sale of the property for an adequate consideration. The court, having jurisdiction after trial had in which both parties herein were defendants and appeared in the cause, found said property to be community estate. This finding was a final determination of the character of said property, and could not thereafter be controverted by either of said defendants, who are plaintiffs herein. The vendee under said contract of sale paid a part of the purchase price, and at the time specified tendered the balance due. In fact, the vendee complied with all the terms of said contract, was clothed with the equitable title, and was in a position to demand the legal title to said property, and had, therefore, the right to enter into possession of it. After the foregoing situation had developed, plaintiff Minnie McClellan, with knowledge of said sale, attempted to file upon said property a declaration of homestead, claiming it as her separate estate. The foregoing statement inevitably demands the conclusion that her attempt thus to defeat the claim and interest of the vendee in and to said property can find no support either in law or in equity.

It is apparent from what has gone before that plaintiffs and appellants appear before the court in an unenviable light. Having sold the property for a full and adequate consideration, plaintiffs refused to make a proper and legal conveyance, compelled the purchaser to resort to legal proceedings to enforce the contract, and, upon being defeated in court, appellants attempted to cloud the title of the property and incumber it with a homestead. More than that, after defeating, as they supposed, the just and equitable rights of the purchaser, appellant McClellan drew out the balance of the purchase price for the property, which had been deposited in the bank to the account and credit of plaintiffs, and they thereupon commenced an action, averring that they are the owners in fee thereof; in other words, they want both the money and the property. It seems somewhat incredible that such claim should be made in a court of justice. In fact, about the most astonishing thing in connection with this whole matter is that the appeal should ever have been taken from the conclusion of the lower court.

Some minor considerations are advanced by appellants, but they are sufficiently answered by respondent, and they do not demand specific notice.

McCLELLAN v. LEWIS. (Civ. 1712.)

1. JUDGMENT ⚷461(5) — MODIFICATION FOR FRAUD — FINDINGS — SUFFICENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by a wife for damages and to modify judgment for defendant in his suit against her and her husband for specific performance of their contract to sell realty, evidence held to support the trial court's findings of fact that the judge in the previous case was not deceived or imposed upon by defendant's attorney, that the previous judgment was not false, fictitious, fraudulent, wrong, etc., and that by such judgment it was adjudicated that the realty in question was the community property of the husband and wife.

2. TRIAL ⚷393(3) — ORAL STATEMENTS BY JUDGE—MODIFICATION IN MAKING FINDINGS—STATUTES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 632, requiring that the court's decision must be given in writing and filed with the clerk, and section 633, providing that in giving the decision the facts and conclusions of law must be separately stated, and judgment on the decision must be entered accordingly, in an action against husband and wife for specific performance of their contract to sell realty, the remarks of the trial court as to the question of costs and the wife's relation to the case, made at the close of trial, did not preclude him from making different findings to meet the issues in accordance with the facts, being but the court's informal views subject to future modification when he came to make his findings.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by Minnie McClellan against John T. Lewis. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant. Max Grimm and J. R. Cronin, both of Stockton, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This action grew out of the action entitled Minnie McClellan and F. E. McClellan, Her Husband, Plaintiffs and Appellants, v. John T. Lewis, Defendant and Respondent (Civil No. 1713) 169

Pac. 436, in which the opinion of this court was filed October 22, 1917. That action was brought by plaintiffs therein to quiet title to a certain lot situated in the city of Stockton. It will appear from the opinion in that action that the defendant relied upon a contract of sale executed by the said F. E. McClellan to the said Lewis as trustee of the Stockton Grove No. 118, United Ancient Order of Druids; that on April 1, 1913, the defendant, Lewis, on behalf of said grove, brought an action, No. 10741, in the superior court of the county of San Joaquin against the plaintiff herein and her said husband for the conveyance of said property, sufficiently alleging facts to justify specific performance; that both of said defendants in that action answered, but neither of them made a denial that the property in controversy was community property; that thereafter said case came on for trial on May 29, 1913, both defendants being represented by counsel, and at the conclusion of the trial, the court announced its judgment in favor of the plaintiff and directed findings to be prepared; that findings were prepared by both parties and presented to the judge of the court; that the findings prepared by plaintiff in the action were adopted by the judge on the 28th day of June, 1913, and judgment was duly signed and filed on that date and was docketed on July 13, 1913; that by said judgment it was adjudged that the real property in question was the community property of the said Frank E. and Minnie McClellan; that the contract of sale was entered into as set out in the complaint in said action; that the purchase price agreed upon was a fair and adequate consideration; that the contract was just and reasonable; and that the said judgment is conclusive and binding in the said action, Civil No. 1713, in which opinion was filed October 22, 1917.

The foregoing and some other facts in the said action No. 10741 are set forth in the plaintiff's amended complaint in the present action, but it is alleged that at the close of the trial of said action last referred to the court announced from the bench:

> "That Minnie McClellan did not sign the agreement that plaintiff seeks to have specifically enforced, and the judgment of the court can only be that Mr. McClellan execute the deed; that there is nothing upon which the court could direct Minnie McClellan to execute a deed; that the court is satisfied that Minnie McClellan is not in this case; she is entitled to judgment for any costs she has; and the attorney for plaintiff (Max Grimm) will prepare without delay the findings and decree in accordance with these instructions."

It is then alleged:

> That the attorney for plaintiff, the said Max Grimm, "willfully neglected and refused to prepare or present said findings and decree to the court for a period of about 30 days, and until he knew that the attorney for Minnie McClellan had left the state for a 3 months' absence, and that then, in the absence of said attorney, and on the 28th day of June, 1913, and for the purpose of taking advantage of the said Minnie McClellan in the absence of her attorney, and of deceiving and imposing upon the judge who tried said case, and of thereby injuring and defrauding the plaintiff herein, as one of the defendants in said case, and of depriving her of all her right and title to said real property, presented to the judge who tried said case in the said superior court, the findings and decree as drawn by him and as they now appear in said case, and which contain, among other things, the following findings, to wit: That the said defendant Minnie McClellan did not sign or execute the said agreement with Stockton Grove No. 118, U. A. O. D.; that the said Minnie McClellan has no title to the aforesaid described real property, and her claim and interest therein is subject to and inferior to the rights and title thereto of the plaintiff, Lewis, and that all the material allegations of the answer of the said Minnie McClellan are not true and are not sustained by the evidence."

It is further alleged that it was adjudged in said action:

> "That said Minnie McClellan has not now, and never has had, any right, claim, title, or interest in or to said real property, except as the wife of the defendant F. E. McClellan, and that the said Minnie McClellan be, and she is hereby, restrained and enjoined from hereafter asserting any right, claim, or interest of, in, or to the property described in plaintiff's complaint herein."

It is then alleged:

> That the said Max Grimm, as attorney for the plaintiff in said case, "willfully, unlawfully, fraudulently, and in violation of said express instructions of the court, and for the purpose aforesaid, omitted and left out from both the said findings and decree in said case the following portions of said decision as announced by the court at the close of said trial, namely: That there is nothing upon which the court could direct that Minnie McClellan execute a deed; that the court is satisfied that Minnie McClellan is not in this case, and that she is entitled to judgment for any costs she has, and that each and all the aforesaid additions, interpolations, and omissions were wrongfully, unlawfully, fraudulently, and in violation of the express instructions of said court, added to, inserted in, or omitted from said findings and decree, as hereinbefore averred, for the express purpose of enabling the said Lewis, as the plaintiff in said case, to fraudulently secure said real property from the plaintiff herein, and thereby cheat and defraud her of her homestead right without due process of law; and that the said Max Grimm then and there, on said 28th day of June, 1913, falsely represented to the said judge that said findings and decree, with all the aforesaid wrongful interpolations, additions, and omissions, were drawn in all respects as directed by the court at the close of the trial as aforesaid, and that the judge, relying upon said false statements and without noticing the aforesaid irregularities, signed both said findings and decree, and thereafter, on the said 28th day of June, 1913, the same were filed with the clerk of said court and duly entered and docketed in said court and cause, as provided by law."

It is further alleged:

> That the said Max Grimm by his conduct in said matter "imposed upon and deceived the judge and caused him to sign said findings and decree through mistake of their contents, and that said findings and decree as signed were wrong, erroneous, absurd, inconsistent, not in accordance with said court's express instructions, entirely without the issues raised by the pleadings, and extremely prejudicial to the plaintiff herein, as she was deprived of her costs in said case, and was forever enjoined from asserting title to her real property, in violation of the express instructions of the court as hereinbefore pointed out."

It is further alleged in the amended complaint:

That, after the said superior court had announced its decision from the bench, "it had no right, authority, or jurisdiction to adjudge or decree in said findings in said case that Minnie McClellan has or had no right or title to the aforesaid real property, or that her claim and interest therein is or was subject to or inferior to the rights and title thereto of the said Lewis, or that the material allegations of the said Minnie McClellan's answer are not or were not true or sustained by the evidence, or to adjudge or decree in the judgment in said case that the said Minnie McClellan has not now or never has had any right, title, or interest in or to said described real property, except as the wife of said F. E. McClellan, or to enjoin or restrain the said Minnie McClellan from thereafter, or at all, asserting any right, claim, title, or interest in or to the aforesaid real property or any part thereof, and that all such adjudications and findings were nugatory, void and without the issues raised by the pleadings in said case."

It is further alleged:

That the plaintiff herein, through her attorney, heard the said original decision of the court as made at the close of the trial, and believed that the findings and decree therein would be made and entered in accordance with said decision, "and that by reason thereof the plaintiff herein, as one of the defendants in said case, allowed her time to appeal from said judgment in said case to expire without taking such appeal or preparing the record for the same by bill of exceptions or otherwise, and that, after such right of appeal had lapsed, she discovered the aforesaid fraudulent and deceitful acts whereby said decision was procured and entered, and that the same was so rendered and entered without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff herein, and not by reason of any negligence on her part."

It is further alleged that the plaintiff herein, on June 30, 1913, while actually residing on the property with her husband, duly made, executed, and acknowledged a declaration of homestead upon the land and premises, and on said date recorded the same in the office of the county recorder of said county, and plaintiff alleges:

That since said last-named date the said "real property and premises have been, and now are, the duly selected and declared homestead of the plaintiff herein, and that this action concerns and relates thereto."

It is further alleged:

That since the rendition of said judgment as aforesaid "the said defendant and his attorney have repeatedly disturbed, annoyed, and threatened to eject and remove plaintiff, who is and at all times herein named and referred to has been an invalid, from said premises which she claims and occupied as a homestead, and have taken execution out of said superior court in said case, * * * whereby the sheriff of said county was thereby falsely and fraudulently authorized and empowered to remove and eject plaintiff from her said homestead, and that in pursuance thereof the said sheriff, under the instructions of said defendant and his said attorney, has been upon said premises, attempted to eject, and threatened to eject and remove plaintiff from her bed and her said homestead, and forcibly take possession of the same for the said defendant, and has repeatedly harassed and annoyed plaintiff with notices and demands for such possession and threats of ejectment, whereby plaintiff has been and is damaged by the rendition and entry of said false, fictitious, and fraudulent judgment and the said proceedings had and taken thereunder in the sum of $5,000."

The prayer of the complaint is:

For judgment in the sum of $5,000 and her costs of suit; that the aforesaid judgment entered in the said case of John T. Lewis, Plaintiff, v. F. E. McClellan and Minnie McClellan, Defendants, of date June 28, 1913, "be reviewed, modified, and changed so as to conform to law and with the original announcement thereof by the said superior court, and in the following particulars: (1) That the findings and conclusions of law be made to recite that the plaintiff therein, John T. Lewis, is not entitled to specific performance or any relief whatsoever against the defendant Minnie McClellan, and that she is entitled to judgment for her costs herein incurred"; (2) that the judgment therein be made to recite that plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance, and that plaintiff herein is entitled to judgment for costs; (3) that the "interpolation that the defendant Minnie McClellan has no right or title to the aforesaid described real property * * * be stricken from said findings and conclusions of law"; (4) likewise the findings that the material allegations of Minnie McClellan's answer are not true, and that they be stricken out; (5) likewise the provision that the plaintiff herein be restrained from asserting any right in the premises be stricken out from the conclusions of law and the judgment; (6) that the portion of the judgment adjudging that the said Minnie McClellan has not now, and never has had, any right, claim, title, or interest in the property be stricken from said judgment, and that "said John T. Lewis be forever enjoined and restrained from enforcing said judgment in its present form, and for such other relief as may seem meet to the court."

An amendment to the amended complaint was made by leave of court to the effect that the said contract of sale was intended to be signed by both McClellan and his wife, and that it was understood that until it was so signed by both it was to be ineffectual for any purpose, and that thereafter, and before the said contract was signed or executed by both of said last-named parties, "the same was canceled and annulled, and that by reason thereof the same never became binding upon either or any of the proposed parties thereto."

A demurrer on general and specific grounds was overruled, and the defendant answered; denied that on the 1st day of April, 1913, or at any time, the defendant commenced an action against the McClellans to enforce the specific performance of an unjust or unreasonable contract, or that the said contract was unfair or the consideration inadequate; alleged that at the time of the execution of said agreement the said realty was the community property of the said McClellan and his wife; denied the averment of the amended complaint that the real property "had been purchased largely with moneys that plaintiff had received from her deceased father's estate, and that it was in truth and in fact, or in truth or in fact, her individual property"; denied that said plaintiff was at said time or at all entitled to select and claim said property as a homestead; denied that the plaintiff herein did at any time "duly select and claim or claim as her homestead under and by virtue of the laws of this state said real property"; denied the allegations as to what occurred at the time of the close of the trial referred to in the complaint; and avers "that at close of said trial said court made certain oral statements from the bench, but which oral statements were not its judgment, and which were in substance and in part as follows: That it would be the duty of the court to direct specific performance upon the part of Mr. McClellan; that the judgment of the court can only be that Mr. McClellan execute the deed; that there was nothing upon which the court could direct the wife to execute a deed, whereupon the following and the only colloquy or conversation took place between the counsel and the judge presiding upon said trial." We do not think it necessary to set out this colloquy.

Defendant denied that he willfully or at all refused to prepare or present the proper findings and decree to the court "for a period of about 30 days and until or until he knew that the attorney for Minnie McClellan had left the state for a 3 months' absence"; denies that "on the 28th day of June, 1913, or at any time or at all, and for the purpose or for the purpose of taking advantage of the said Minnie McClellan in the absence of her attorney and of deceiving and imposing or of deceiving or of imposing upon the judge who tried the said cause, or thereby or of thereby injuring and defrauding or of injuring or of defrauding the plaintiff herein, as one of the defendants in said case, and of depriving her or of depriving her of all her right and title or right or title to said real property, presented to the judge who tried the said cause in the said superior court, the findings and decree or the findings or decree in said case, or as they now appear in said case, but, on the contrary, said defendant avers that said findings and conclusions of law and judgment as they are now were drawn, prepared and submitted to said court by said attorney, Grimm, for signing without any fraud or deceit and without imposing upon said court and without any purpose on the part of said attorney or the plaintiff in said case of unlawfully, wrongfully, or fraudulently depriving her of any rights to said property."

Other of the accusatory averments of the amended complaint are also denied, and defendant alleged "that said attorney for the plaintiff in said case, well knowing that the said oral remarks and announcements of said trial judge in said case at the conclusion of said trial do not and did not constitute the judgment and decision in said case, and well knowing that the defendant Minnie McClellan was not entitled to judgment for costs under the pleadings and issues raised in said case, and the proofs had therein, and that the said plaintiff, Lewis, in said case was entitled to all the facts found in said findings and to the relief obtained and contained in said judgment and decree, said attorney prepared and submitted said findings and judgment to the said trial judge for signature as they now are." The defendant alleges "that all of the representations made by the said Max Grimm to the judge who tried said cause, upon presentation of the findings and conclusions of law and decree in said cause, were true and correct, and were within the issues as raised by the pleadings in said cause"; alleged "that the plaintiff herein was not entitled to judgment against the plaintiff, Lewis, in said cause, for her costs in said action; that he was entitled to the judgment and decree of this court in said cause; that the plaintiff's right, title, interest, and claim in and to said realty, under the pleadings in said cause, could be adjudicated in said action and was adjudicated in said action;" alleged that all of the facts and matters set forth in the findings in said action were within the issues raised by the pleadings in said case, "and the said court acquired jurisdiction and authority to adjudge and decree upon all of said matters as raised by the pleadings in said case, and as they are now in said findings and judgment"; denied that any fraudulent or deceitful acts of any kind or nature "were done or committed by said Lewis or his attorney in said case of procuring said judgment and said findings or of having said findings or any judgment entered, and further denies that said decision and judgment was procured and entered without the knowledge or consent of said plaintiff Minnie McClellan"; denied that the said Minnie McClellan was on June 30, 1913, the owner of said real property or any part thereof, and denied that she duly made, executed, or acknowledged the declaration of homestead upon the said premises; alleges that on said date, "after the said plaintiff, Minnie McClellan, had full knowledge and information that the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, state of California, in said cause, had made and entered judgment in said case adjudging and decreeing that the said plaintiff, Lewis, in said action, for and on behalf of said grove, was the true and lawful owner of said real property described in plaintiff's complaint herein, said Minnie McClellan, by and through the advice and counsel of her husband, F. E. McClellan, and one A. R. Carpenter, her counsel, fraudulently and with the intent and purpose to defeat the said judgment and decree of said court, and in violation of its terms and provisions, and for the purpose of clouding the title to said property and vexing and annoying the said plaintiff, Lewis, in the ownership and possession thereof, attempted to make and declare and file a homestead thereon, and in pursuance thereof did cause to be recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county of San Joaquin, state of California, a pretended and attempted homestead on said premises; that said alleged and pretended homestead is fraudulent, illegal, void, and of no force and effect."

Defendant avers that the only notices and demands sent to or made upon said Minnie McClellan in the said action above referred to were sent and made in accordance with the lawful judgment and decree of said court in said case, and denies that said plaintiff in this action has been damaged in the sum of $5,000 or any sum whatsoever by reason of any of the acts or conduct of the said Lewis or his attorney, Grimm. Defendant also pleads in bar of the action all the proceedings, findings, and judgment had in the action of Lewis v. McClellan, above referred to, numbered 10741. For further answer, also, defendant alleges the pendency of an action commenced by the said Minnie McClellan and her husband against the said John T. Lewis, defendant herein, on November 12, 1913, in said court, said action being numbered 10943, in which the plaintiffs seek to have the title to said property quieted and their homestead rights determined; that the said defendant, Lewis, has appeared in said action and filed an answer and cross-complaint therein; that the said action numbered 10943 is between the same parties as the action numbered 10741, and that the subject-matter of the action in both cases is the same; that said action is an issue of fact and is undetermined.

The present cause was tried by the court without a jury, and the court made findings in favor of the defendant herein, and judgment was accordingly entered, from which plaintiff appeals. Among the findings are the following:

"That at no time subsequent to the trial of said action No. 10741, or at any time or at all, did the attorney for the plaintiff, Lewis, in said action, to wit, Max Grimm, deceive or impose upon the judge who tried said case, as to the contents or substance of the findings signed by the judge in said action, and the judge in said action signed said findings after reading and understanding same, and he refused to sign the findings presented by the attorney for the defendants in said action."

"That the said judge was not deceived or imposed upon by the said Max Grimm, or any other person, as to the contents of the said findings, and no fraud, deceit, or imposition was committed upon said court by any person in connection with the signing of said findings, or in procuring said judgment in said action No. 10741."

"That the said judgment in said action No. 10741 was not false, fictitious, fraudulent, wrong, absurd, erroneous, or inconsistent, but was supported by the evidence therein, and was obtained without fraud, mistake, inadvertence, or imposition, and is in all respects a good and valid judgment."

"That in and by said judgment in the case 10741 it was and is adjudicated that the real property in question herein was the community property of Frank E. and Minnie McClellan; that the purchase price agreed upon of $4,250 was a fair and adequate consideration and value for the said property, and said contract was just and reasonable between said grove and said F. E. McClellan."

"That said plaintiff, Minnie McClellan, did not suffer any damages whatsoever by reason of said findings, conclusions of law, or judgment rendered, filed, and entered in said action No. 10741."

As conclusions of law, the court found:

That plaintiff "is not entitled to recover any judgment for damages, and is not entitled to have the findings, conclusions of law, or judgment in said action No. 10741 amended, modified, changed, or reformed, nor to any other relief from the defendant, and the court further finds and decides that the defendant, John T. Lewis, have judgment for his costs incurred herein."

[1] We think there is ample evidence in the record to support the findings of fact. Upon the principle stated in Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 484, 89 Pac. 317, that a party may have relief against a judgment on the ground of fraud or mistake, it is contended that it sufficiently appears from what occurred at the conclusion of the trial in the case of Lewis v. McClellan that the findings and judgment, as entered in that case, were not the findings and judgment directed to be entered by the court. It is also contended that the announcement made by the judge from the bench must be treated as the decision, and that the findings and judgment, not being in accord with such decision, must be treated as void.

[2] We do not think it reasonably inferable from the oral statements of the judge at the close of the trial in Lewis v. McClellan that he was precluded from making findings to meet the issues in accordance with the facts. The statute requires that the decision of the court "must be given in writing and filed with the clerk" (Code Civ. Proc. § 632); and "in giving the decision, the facts and conclusions of law must be separately stated. Judgment upon the decision must be entered accordingly." Code Civ. Proc. § 633. The remarks of the court touching the question of costs and Mrs. McClellan's relation to the case were but the informal views of the court, subject to future modification when it came to make its findings, "as only properly they could be found, in the formal findings of fact and conclusions of law." Montecito Valley Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 595, 77 Pac. 1113. In Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 627, 645, 87 Pac. 93, the court had rendered a written opinion in which it said:

"Let each party herein pay his, her, or their own costs."

Subsequently the court made findings and entered judgment thereon:

That "plaintiffs recover their costs incurred in this action."

There the claim was made:

That "the court, having announced its views as to the costs in the written opinion, could not in the findings and judgment make different provision from that indicated in the opinion."

The Supreme Court said:

"This written opinion was, however, no part of the decision in the case, cannot be treated as such, and was entirely without legal effect."

That the findings were not made through fraud or mistake was fully supported by the evidence, and that they were framed to meet and were based on the issues in the case is clearly shown.

Plaintiff's alleged rights arising from the homestead filed by her, from her claim that the property was not community property, but was purchased with her money, from the fact that she did not sign the contract of sale—in fact, every claim advanced by her in support of her title to the property was adjudicated and decided against her contention in the action of McClellan et al. v. Lewis, and the judgment has been affirmed on appeal to this court.

Plaintiff has failed to establish the truth of the averments in her amended complaint.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

J. I. CASE THRESHING MACH. CO. v. COPREN BROS. et al. (Civ. 1697.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 22, 1917.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑520(3)—Papers and Files in Case — Matter Appearing in Transcript on First Appeal.

Matter appearing only in the transcript, on appeal from the judgment rendered in the first trial, does not properly form any part of "the papers and files in the case," on appeal from an order to change the place of second trial.

2. Venue 🔑21—Trial in County of Defendants' Residence—Change.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, defendants had a right to have the case tried in the county of their residence, but such right was subject to the right given either party, by section 397, to have the place of trial changed when there is reason to believe that an impartial trial cannot be had in the county where the action is pending.

3. Venue 🔑72—Change—Burden of Proof —Local Prejudice.

The burden was on plaintiff, moving to change the place of trial from the county of defendants' residence to another, to establish that a fair and impartial trial could not be had by a jury in the county of defendants' residence.

4. Appeal and Error 🔑837(1)—Review—Change of Venue—Facts Considered.

On appeal from an order changing place of trial, on the ground that a fair and impartial trial could not be had by a jury in the county of defendants' residence, only the facts set forth in the affidavits, and such other facts as were before the court and had been made part of the record, can be considered.

5. Appeal and Error 🔑912 — Review — Change of Venue—Presumption.

On appeal from an order to change the place of trial from the county of defendants' residence, on motion of plaintiff, a foreign corporation, the court cannot indulge any presumption that the citizens of the county of defendants' residence are incapable to administer justice fairly and impartially between a foreign corporation and defendants, citizens of the county.

6. Venue 🔑50—Change—Local Prejudice —Evidence.

In an action by a foreign corporation against individual defendants, brought in the county of their residence, it is not a reasonable conclusion that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had by plaintiff in such county, from the facts that plaintiff is unacquainted in the county, which is sparsely settled, its population being 4,098, that a defendant has served the county as assessor, and that defendants are widely and favorably known in the county.

7. Venue 🔑50—Change—Difficulty to Secure Impartial Trial—Conduct of Jury on First Trial.

That the jury on first trial hesitated to render a verdict for plaintiff as directed furnished no ground to assume that plaintiff foreign corporation could not have an impartial trial in the county as against defendants, individuals widely known and influential therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sierra County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company, a corporation, against Copren Bros., a copartnership, and William J. Copren and C. A. Copren, as partners and as individuals. From an order to change the place of trial, defendants appeal. Order reversed.

John V. Copren and W. I. Redding, of Downieville, for appellants. Dunn, White & Aiken, of Oakland, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Appeal from an order to change the place of trial from Sierra county to Plumas county on motion of plaintiff made on the ground that an impartial trial cannot be had in Sierra county. The action was to recover judgment upon certain promissory notes executed by the defendants for the purchase price of a certain traction engine, and was begun in the city and county of San Francisco, but the venue was changed to Sierra county on the ground that all the defendants resided therein.

The cause was tried before a jury in Sierra county and a verdict directed by the court was rendered in favor of plaintiff. An appeal was taken to this court which resulted in a reversal of the judgment. The remittitur went down in January, 1917, and on April 18, 1917, the court made its order from which this appeal was taken. As yet the cause had not been set for trial and, of course, no attempt had been made to obtain a jury. The motion was heard upon the affidavit of Jesse J. Dunn, attorney for plaintiff, and "upon the papers and files in the case," and upon the affidavits in rebuttal of John V. Copren, attorney for defendants, and Wm. J. Copren, one of the defendants in the action.

By the affidavit of Attorney Dunn, it appears that plaintiff had fully stated all the facts in the action to him, and that plaintiff was advised by him that it had a good and sufficient cause of action; that the facts of the case are within the knowledge of affiant who makes the affidavit in plaintiff's behalf. The grounds for the motion are set forth in the affidavit as follows:

> "That the said plaintiff is a foreign corporation and a manufacturer of threshing machines and engines, and that in the year 1912 it sold to the said defendants one of its said engines; that on a failure of the said defendants to make payment, in accordance with their contract therefor, plaintiff brought suit in the above named county, and defendants have asked for a jury trial of the said action; that on a previous trial thereof, a jury was impaneled, sworn, and charged, and the case presented in the said court before the said jury; that on the conclusion of the action, the court instructed the jury to return a verdict in plaintiff's favor, which the said jury refused to do until after admonished by the court that it could not avoid it except by the violation of their jurors' oaths; that the said plaintiff is practically unacquainted in the said county; that the said defendants, as your affiant is informed and believes, were born and raised in the said county, and are well and favorably known throughout its entire length; that they lived there nearly, if not entirely, the whole of their lives, and are at this time mature men; that the county is a sparsely settled county, and the acquaintanceship of the said defendants extends throughout its course and length; that one of the said defendants, Honorable William J. Copren, has for a number of years occupied the position of county assessor of said county, and is of wide and consequential influence therein."

It is then stated:

> "That the plaintiff, by reason of the foregoing facts, believes and has a good reason to believe, and avers as a fact, that it cannot have a fair and impartial trial of its said action before a jury in the said county."

Attorney Copren, in his affidavit, avers that he is now and has been the attorney for the defendants, and is familiar with all the facts in the case; denies that by reason of the alleged facts in the affidavit of Attorney Dunn, or by reason of any fact, the plaintiff cannot have a fair and impartial trial before a jury in Sierra county; alleges that on the previous trial of the action in September, 1915, a jury was impaneled and the cause presented before the said jury, that at the conclusion of the trial, the court instructed the jury to return a verdict for plaintiff "which the said jury did, and judgment was accordingly entered thereon in favor of plaintiff," that on appeal to the District Court of Appeal the judgment was reversed, "that since the reversal of said judgment in favor of plaintiff, no motion has been made to set the above-entitled case for trial, and, as yet, no jury has been demanded," "that at the previous trial there was no difficulty had in impaneling a jury, that there were but 13 jurors examined, and each and every one of the said jurors qualified and was accepted by plaintiff, that one juror was excused by reason of the fact that his hearing was defective, * * * that plaintiff's rights were in every way protected at said former trial, and no subsequent fact has arisen upon which plaintiff can base its contention that a fair and impartial trial of said action cannot be had by a jury in Sierra county, or that there would be any difficulty in impaneling an unbiased jury in said action in Sierra county, and no such fact is alleged, or attempted to be alleged, in plaintiff's said affidavit on motion for change of venue; denies that any acquaintanceship of defendants, or either of them, in Sierra County, would affect the trial of said action, or prevent plaintiff from having a fair and impartial trial of said action before a jury in said Sierra county"; alleges that all the facts in the case are within the knowledge of affiant and that he believes, and has so advised the defendants, that they have and each of them has a good and substantial and valid defense to the action.

The defendant Wm. J. Copren, in his affidavit, denies that the acquaintanceship of his codefendant, C. A. Copren, "extends throughout the course or length of said Sierra county," and alleges that the said C. A. Copren "is unacquainted in said county, except in the Sierra Valley and in and about the town of Sierra City in said county"; admits that affiant for a number of years occupied the position of county assessor of said county, "but denies that he is of wide or consequential influence therein, and in this connection he states that neither he nor the said defendant C. A. Copren have ever used, attempted, or intended to use, nor do they now intend to use, the influence of said defendants, or either of them, or of any other person, either social, political, official, or otherwise, to prevent the plaintiff from having a fair or impartial trial of the issues herein before a jury, or otherwise, or at all"; admits that the county of Sierra is sparsely settled, and that his acquaintanceship extends throughout its course and length, "but he states that he is not acquainted with all of the persons subject to jury duty in said county, and that quite a large percentage of such persons are unknown to him." Affiant then states at some length the facts relating to the topography of the county and the various settlements of the people therein, and shows that, by reason of mountain barriers and the location of the valleys of the county, these settlements of inhabitants are so separated by mountain barriers "as to have but little communication, social or otherwise" with each other; that in various portions of the county the inhabitants are engaged exclusively in mining, and that in other portions the industries are grazing, agricultural, and lumbering, "and that each of said sections is almost entirely independent of the others in their business relations, and to the extent that the inhabitants of each section have almost no business relations with the inhabitants of the other sections." It is further averred in the affidavit "that the fact that the jury, on a previous trial of this action, temporarily refused to return a verdict for the plaintiff does not establish that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had before a jury selected from the body of the county, and that such fact can only be established after an attempt has been made to impanel a jury and it is then demonstrated that a fair and impartial trial cannot be so had." Affiant denies that plaintiff, by reason of the facts set forth in the affidavit of merits made by Attorney Dunn, or by any fact, cannot have a fair or impartial trial of the action before a jury in said county, but, on the contrary, that there is no reason why plaintiff cannot have a fair and impartial trial therein.

[1] Some reference is made in respondent's brief to what occurred at the former trial when the jury was instructed to bring in a verdict for the plaintiff, and some reliance is placed by respondent upon that episode as tending to show that the plaintiff cannot have a fair and impartial trial in Sierra county. This matter is not made a part of the record in this appeal and does not properly form any part of "the papers and files in the case," for it appears only in the transcript on appeal from the judgment rendered in the first trial. The certificate of the judge is that the foregoing record "is a full, true, and correct transcript of all papers and files used, and of all proceedings had and conducted, at the hearing and in the determination of the motion of the plaintiff for a change of the place of trial of the above-entitled cause." It may be doubted whether what occurred at that time can properly be considered on this appeal. Lest, however, we may do respondents an injustice, we will quote what purports to have occurred at that time, as shown by the respondent's brief, to which is added, also, a paragraph appearing in appellants' reply brief as part of what then occurred. This matter, as shown by respondent's brief, is as follows:

> "The Court: Mr. Dunn, you will prepare the verdict in accordance with the ruling of the court.
> "(The Court instructed the jury and they retired to the jury room. Jury returned.)
> "The Court: The clerk may call the names of the jurors.
> "(Jurors all present.)
> "The Court: Gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed upon a verdict in this case?
> "Foreman: We can't agree to this; we can't come to this verdict.
> "The Court: Do any of the jurors misunderstand the instructions of the court that you are to find in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $918, there being no issue in the case for your determination? The court has determined that for you.
> "Foreman: I thing it is understood that we are to follow your instructions, whatever they are, but we don't like to subject ourselves to that will.
> "The Court: As the court instructed the jury, there is no issue before you. Under the rulings of the court, the testimony in behalf of the defendants' answer was incompetent and consequently the court instructed you accordingly.
> "Foreman: They don't like to be parties to forcing the payment of the $198 [$918].
> "The Court: That is a matter that they have nothing to do with. Perhaps I should have stated to the jury that three-fourths of you are a sufficient number to agree upon a verdict. In a civil case nine are a sufficient number to agree on the verdict.
> "Foreman: There is no other verdict that we can agree on, is there? Do we have to agree to this verdict that is handed to us?
> "The Court: Unless you wish to violate your oaths as jurors."

To the foregoing is added, as shown by appellants' reply brief, the following:

> "Foreman: The plaintiffs have put in their evidence and in that contract it is stated that they sold a 30 horse power engine. Our judgment as citizens leads us to believe that their signatures over that agreement to sell a 30 horse power engine should be binding, and that they should sell a 30 horse power engine.
> "The Court: That is a matter that under the instructions of the court, you have nothing to do with. I think perhaps you had better retire again to the jury room. You should have no trouble in determining whether you are going to comply with the instructions of the court, or not."

The jury returned a verdict as directed by the court. The foregoing presents all the facts which the trial court had before it in ruling upon the motion, including what occurred at the rendering of the verdict, which is not a part of the record, and was not before the court when the motion was heard and decided.

[2] Under section 395, Code of Civil Procedure, defendants had a right to have the case tried in the county of their residence, but this right is subject to the right given either party by section 397, Code of Civil Procedure, to have the place of trial changed "when there is reason to believe that an impartial trial cannot be had" in the county where the action is pending.

[3, 4] Beyond dispute, the burden was upon plaintiff to establish the fact that a fair and impartial trial could not be had by a jury in Sierra county, and to determine that fact only the facts set forth in the affidavits, and such other facts as were before the court and have been made part of the record, can now be considered. People v. Yoakum, 53 Cal. 566; People v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 157 Pac. 599. It was stated in Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works v. Houser, 103 Cal. 377, 37 Pac. 179:

> "Applications like this are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and its action cannot be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that there was an abuse of that discretion." Citing Hanchett v. Finch, 47 Cal. 192; Avila v. Meherin, 68 Cal. 478, 9 Pac. 428; Clanton v. Ruffner, 78 Cal. 268, 20 Pac. 676; People v. Vincent, 95 Cal. 427, 30 Pac. 581.

In People v. Vincent, supra, the court said:

> "It is true that the discretion of a trial court to grant or refuse a change of venue is not an arbitrary discretion—a mere naked, irresponsible power; but when there has been fair room for the play of such discretion, and its exercise has not gone beyond legitimate and reasonable limits, it cannot be rightfully interfered with by the appellate court."

The right of appeal given to a party aggrieved by the order granting or refusing a change of venue presupposes that the reviewing court may determine for itself, from the record presented, whether the trial court "has gone beyond legitimate and reasonable limits" in making the order in question.

In support of the order, counsel for respondent in part relies with apparent confidence upon certain presumptions which they claim the court had the right to and did indulge in when considering the application. We quote from respondent's brief:

> "Courts, it has been said, are presumed to know the things which people generally know, and we submit that not only people generally, but every practicing lawyer and court in the land knows, as an indisputable fact, that when controverted questions of fact are submitted to trial juries in communities such as this, between a foreigner and a favorably known local citizen, that the citizen has more than an 'even break'; he has all the best of it; that every reasonable, possible intendment and conclusion that can be drawn in his favor is drawn for him against his foreign antagonist. Lawyers know this; people know it generally, and, of course, courts know it. If this is true of a foreign individual, how much more true is it when, as is set forth in this affidavit, the plaintiff is a foreign corporation, which is generally considered nothing more nor less than a natural enemy of every local resident when controversy arises. That the foreign corporation shall not be permitted to win, if it is a possible thing to beat it, is always orthodox. No citizen, lawyer nor court expects anything else, and the foreign corporation does not look for it. We submit that the foregoing statements are recognized facts by everybody, and, being so, the trial court, when considering the affidavit filed in this case, started in with that knowledge and had a right, and it was its duty, to consider that knowledge in weighing the affidavit submitted."

We confess to some surprise that this court should be asked to give countenance to such a doctrine. We are loath to believe that the inhabitants of Sierra county are different in moral and intellectual fiber from those of any other county in the state. We are not willing to believe that they are incapable of fairly and impartially administering justice between a foreign corporation and one of their citizens. Respondent's proposition means that while a foreign corporation must bring such an action as this in the county of the defendants' residence, a presumption arises, which, if invoked, the trial court must treat as a fact, that the corporation cannot have a fair and impartial trial in that county, and if it seeks to change the venue, its application must for that reason be granted, for it would be impossible to overcome this presumption, since the entire inhabitants are inoculated with this hostile virus.

[5] In our opinion, no such presumption can be indulged in support of the order. The fact that plaintiff is a foreign corporation is an inconsequential factor, and of no probative value in determining the question. The remaining facts relied upon are: That at the former trial, when instructed by the court to render a verdict for plaintiff, the jury showed reluctance to do so, although after so expressing themselves, they did obey the instruction of the court; that plaintiff is practically unacquainted in Sierra county, while defendants were born and have lived to mature age therein, "and are well and favorably known throughout its entire length"; that the county is sparsely settled "and the acquaintanceship of said defendants extends throughout its course and length"; and that one of the defendants "has for a number of years occupied the position of county assessor of said county, and is of wide and consequential influence therein." Except that plaintiff is unacquainted in said county, and that the county is sparsely settled, and that one of the defendants has served the county as assessor, these alleged facts are controverted by respondents. The population of Sierra county, as shown by the census of 1910, was 4,098. It appeared that there was no difficulty in obtaining a jury at the first trial; the members as called having been accepted by both parties. Since then the case has not been set for trial and, of course, no attempt made to secure a jury.

[6] We do not think it a reasonable conclusion from the facts alleged that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in Sierra county. It is an unwarranted inference that an impartial jury cannot be called from the citizens of that county capable of impartially trying a case between a foreign corporation and residents therein simply because these persons are widely and favorably known in the county. To disqualify the entire inhabitants of a county to sit as jurors on such grounds would, in our opinion, be an unreasonable exercise of judicial power. This impeachment of its citizens would include logically the judge of the superior court, and for like reasons his disqualification to sit in the case might be invoked.

Speaking generally of statutory provisions for change of venue, the Supreme Court said, in Cook v. Pendergast, 61 Cal. 72, 79:

> "So he [plaintiff] may move on the ground that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county where the action has been commenced or whenever he ascertains the disqualification of the judge. But neither plaintiff nor defendant can move for a change of the place of trial because of the convenience of witnesses, or because a fair trial cannot be had, until the event has occurred which, in the one case, can alone enable the court to decide what facts are material to be proved by the respective parties, or which, in the other case, will assist the court in ascertaining whether such local prejudice exists as may influence the conduct of the jury. The fact that an impartial trial cannot be had must be clearly established. So plainly does it appear that a motion on this ground should be made after answer, that the practice of attempting to secure a jury before passing on the motion has been approved. It has even been held that nothing less than an actual experiment, by way of trial or attempt, to impanel a jury, and a consequential failure, will be sufficient to show that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had." Citing Messenger v. Holmes, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 203; Patchin v. Sands, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 570; 2 Wait's Practice, 620.

It has been several times held that it is not error to postpone the consideration of an application for a change of venue until an attempt has been made to impanel a jury, where leave is granted to counsel to renew his application if the facts disclosed in the impanelment should further warrant it. People v. Staples, 149 Cal. 405, 412, 86 Pac. 886, and cases cited.

While we do not hold that a change of venue on the grounds here stated would, under no condition of circumstances, be granted, until an unsuccessful attempt had been made to impanel a jury, no case has come under our observation in which a change of venue was sought or granted where there had not been one trial, or where some effort had not been made to obtain a jury. It is conceivable that a showing might be made of a prejudice against a plaintiff so widespread, intense, and outspoken, through the public press and otherwise, as to warrant a conclusion that the plaintiff would not have a fair trial where the action was pending. But it must be conceded that, without making an attempt to secure an impartial jury, it would require something more than a showing that the defendants "are well and favorably known throughout the entire length of the county," and that one of them, "is of wide and consequential influence therein" because he had been intrusted with the office of county assessor. As above shown, there was no difficulty in getting a jury at the former trial.

[7] That they hesitated at first to render a verdict as directed, it seems to us, furnishes no ground for assuming that an impartial trial cannot be had in that county. Defendants' right to have the case tried at the place of their residence is given them by statute. This right should not be taken from them without the plaintiff clearly shows that its right to a fair and impartial trial cannot be had where the action is pending.

We do not think sufficient showing has been made to justify the order. We think the learned trial judge has, in the exercise of his discretion, "gone beyond legitimate and reasonable limits."

The order is therefore reversed

35 Cal. App. 225

DONLON et al. v. MEYER et al. (Civ. 2177.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 7, 1917.)

1. Sales 🔑152—Demand for Delivery—Actual Payment or Offer.

Where bags sold were not present when the buyers demanded delivery of the sellers, it was unnecessary that actual payment or offer thereof accompany the demand for delivery, for, if the goods are not present, the buyer may accompany his demand with an offer to pay when actual delivery is made to him.

2. Sales 🔑406—Refusal of Sellers to Deliver—Accrual of Buyers' Cause of Action—Performance or Offer of Performance as to Payment—Statute.

Where the buyers of goods demanded delivery of the sellers, subsequent to the time when delivery was due under the original contract, and the sellers notified the buyers they would make no other or further delivery under the original contract, the buyers' cause of action accrued, under Civ. Code, §§ 1439, 1440, providing when performance of conditions is essential and when excused, without the necessity of previous performance or offering to perform the condition of payment on their part.

3. Sales 🔑411 — Complaint Good under One of Two Constructions.

In an action by the buyers of goods against the sellers for breach of contract, if either construction of the complaint concerning demand to uphold its validity be correct, in the absence of special demurrer, it must be held that the complaint stated a cause of action on the original contract.

4. Estoppel 🔑78(1)—Oral Agreement to Extend Written Contract.

Under Civ. Code, § 1698, providing that a contract in writing may be altered in writing or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise, where the buyers of goods, by written contract, orally agreed to an extension of the contract, at the request and for the convenience of the sellers, in the buyers' action for breach, the sellers are not estopped from asserting that they are not bound by the oral agreement.

5. Frauds, Statute of 🔑125(1) — Oral Agreement to Extend Written Contract —Suit on Original Contract—Statute.

Civ. Code, § 1698, does not prevent a plaintiff from suing on an original written contract which has been orally extended, since the rule that neither a plaintiff nor a defendant can at law avail himself of a parol agreement to vary or enlarge the time for nerforming a contract previously made in writing, and requiring so to be by the statute of frauds, serves rather to preclude defendant from setting up an agreement to enlarge the time for delivery, than to prevent plaintiff from suing on the original contract for breach.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by James D. Donlon and Peter A. Donlon, copartners doing business as Donlon Bros., against Celine Meyer and others, copartners doing business as L. Meyer & Co. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Judgment affirmed.

M. R. Jones and Titus, Creed, Jones & Dall, all of San Francisco, for appellants. W. S. Tinning and A. B. Tinning, both of Martinez, and Matthew Ward, of Antioch, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. Defendants appeal on the judgment roll alone, and urge as grounds for a reversal of the judgment the following points, namely, that the amended complaint does not state a cause of action, and that the findings do not support either the conclusions of law or the judgment.

It appears from the record that on April 29, 1915, L. Meyer & Co. agreed to sell, and Donlon Bros. agreed to buy, 30,000 grain bags at 6¾ cents per bag, payable on delivery, delivery to be made during the months of June and July, 1915. Up to June 30, 1915, defendants, in pursuance of the contract, had delivered to plaintiffs 2,000 bags. About the middle of July, 1915, plaintiffs demanded of the defendants delivery of the remaining 28,000 bags, but defendant requested that they be allowed to deliver the remaining bags within a reasonable time after the month of July, 1915, and plaintiffs, upon the representation of defendants that the postponement would be of advantage to the defendants, orally consented to the proposed postponement. Thereafter, and up to January 22, 1916, the defendants continued to deliver bags to the plaintiffs. On that date defendants refused to deliver any more bags. The value of the 11,069 bags which remained undelivered to plaintiffs on January 22, 1916, was $1,300.62, and as the contract price was $747.17, the court awarded damages in the sum of $553.45.

In support of the first point defendants contend that the amended complaint is defective because it does not contain an allegation that plaintiffs tendered the price of the bags. While it is true that the complaint is not free from uncertainty as to whether or not a demand was made for delivery during the months of June and July, 1915, which was the time provided for delivery by the original contract, nevertheless, we think, it is fairly inferable from the allegations of the complaint as a whole that such demand was made, accompanied by a statement in effect that the plaintiffs were ready, able, and willing to accept delivery of the bags and pay therefore.

[1] It is also fairly inferable from the allegations of the complaint that while the plaintiffs and the defendants were both doing business in the town of Antioch, in Contra Costa county, the bags, which were the subject-matter of the contract, were in the warehouse in San Francisco. Hence it is apparent that the bags were not present at the time of the demand to be delivered to the plaintiffs, and therefore it was unnecessary that actual payment or offer thereof accompany the demand for delivery, for "if the goods are not present to be delivered to the buyer, the buyer may accompany his demand with an offer to pay when actual delivery is made to him." Pearson v. McKinney, 160 Cal. 649, 660, 117 Pac. 919.

[2] Even if it cannot be said that the complaint does, in effect allege a demand for delivery at the times when delivery was due under the original contract, still other allegations of the complaint, even though they were intended to be the foundation for a cause of action, in part, for the failure to deliver pursuant to the parol agreement to extend the time of delivery, nevertheless suffice, in our opinion, when read and considered with the allegations of the complaint as a whole, to constitute a demand for delivery subsequent to the time when delivery was due under the original contract. The complaint further avers that in response to that particular demand the defendants notified plaintiffs that they would make no other or further delivery under the terms of the original contract. That being so, then pursuant to the provisions of sections 1439 and 1440 of the Civil Code the plaintiffs' cause of action accrued without the necessity of previous performance or offering to perform the condition of payment on their part.

[3] If either construction of the complaint concerning the demand be correct, then, in the absence of a special demurrer, it must be held that the complaint stated a cause of action upon the original contract.

[4] The trial court made a finding to the effect that the time of performance of the original contract was extended by an unexecuted oral agreement. Defendants contend that under this finding the trial court should have declared as a conclusion of law that the oral extension of the contract was invalid. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, argue in support of the finding and conclusion of law that, inasmuch as they entered into the oral agreement at the request and for the convenience of the defendants, defendants are estopped from asserting that they are not bound by the oral agreement, and the case of Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 106 Pac. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154, is relied upon to support this contention. That case affirms the right of courts of equity to hold a person estopped to assert the statute of frauds where such assertion would amount to practicing a fraud, stating that the operation of this equitable doctrine is not limited to any particular class of contracts included within the statutes of frauds, provided, always, the essential elements of an estoppel are present, and that to constitute an estoppel by acts or conduct the presence of fraud on the part of the person estopped is necessary.

In the present case the complaint contains no allegation of fraud on the part of defendants, nor any averment from which fraud might be inferred, nor did the court find fraud.

> "The rule which prohibits the modification of a written contract by parol is a rule, not of evidence, but of substantive law. * * * By that law the solemn obligations of parties evidenced by their writings may not be modified or set aside for fraud unless the rules of this substantive law in pleading the fraud are duly complied with." Harding et al. v. Robinson et al., 166 Pac. 808.

To extend the equitable doctrine expounded in Seymour v. Oelrichs to cover a case of this kind, where there is no fraud, and the only injury consists in the breach of the contract, would be, in effect, to do away with section 1698 of the Civil Code.

[5] However that section does not prevent a plaintiff from suing on the original written contract. The rule that neither a plaintiff nor a defendant can at law avail himself of a parol agreement to vary or enlarge the time for performing a contract previously entered into in writing, and required so to be by the statute of frauds, serves "rather to preclude the defendant from setting up an agreement to enlarge the time for delivery in answer to the plaintiff's demand, than to prevent the plaintiff from suing on the original contract for a breach of it." Hickman v. Haynes, L. R. 10 C. P. 598; Williston on Sales, §§ 123-124.

While the finding that the extension of time within which to perform rested in parol should have compelled the conclusion of law that such extension was invalid because in contravention of the provisions of section 1698 of the Civil Code, nevertheless the plaintiffs' complaint pleads, and the cause of action proceeds, primarily upon the original written contract and a breach thereof by the defendant resulting in damage to the plaintiff. This finding is not assailed, as, indeed, it cannot be in the absence of a record showing the evidence adduced upon the trial of the case.

This finding in itself is sufficient to support the judgment, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: KERRIGAN, J.; RICHARDS, J.

35 Cal. App. 184

DURST et al. v. JOLLY et al. (Civ. 1730.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⟹28(2)—LEASES—UNCERTAINTY OF TERMS.

Where, under an unsigned memoranda of lease, defendants went into possession and made improvements under promise of the execution of a lease, they cannot enforce specific performance where the memoranda left for future settlement, terms and payment of rents, leveling of land, and purchase of plaintiffs' implements, as a court of equity cannot fix the terms and conditions to which the parties are to bind themselves.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ⟹121(9)—TERMS OF INSTRUMENT—EVIDENCE.

Where a court is called on to specifically enforce an instrument, it must ascertain the terms from the instrument itself, and a pleading cannot construe such instrument or supply deficiencies.

3. QUIETING TITLE ⟹39—ANSWER—RIGHT OF POSSESSION—TENANTS HOLDING OVER.

In an action to quiet title, answer and cross-complaint held not sufficient to raise the issue that defendants, who held under an unenforceable agreement to execute a lease, had held over so as to entitle them to possession as tenants from year to year under Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, subd. 2.

4. QUIETING TITLE ⟹39—ANSWER—ALLEGATIONS IN CROSS-COMPLAINT.

An answer, in an action to quiet title, alleging that defendants' interest in the property was "as will more fully hereinafter appear," followed by a cross-complaint seeking specific performance of an agreement to lease, made the cross-complaint a part of the answer, although the cross-complaint was held bad as to the affirmative relief prayed for.

5. PLEADING ⟹349—JUDGMENT ON PLEADINGS—ADMISSION.

As owner of land is presumed to be entitled to possession, where a complaint to quiet title alleges ownership in plaintiff and the owner admits such allegation without negativing right of possession, there is no issue as to such right and the court properly gave judgment on the pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; E. P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Rose Francis Durst, Murray H. Durst, Ralph H. Durst, Jonathan H. Durst, and Vernon R. Durst, against A. Jolly, Raphael Jolly, and Jane Doe Jolly. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. Ray Manwell, of Marysville, and John M. Fulweiler, of Auburn, for appellants. W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondents.

HART, J. The complaint was filed in January, 1915, and is in the usual form of an action to quiet title; the lands involved being ranch property in the counties of Yuba and Placer.

The defendants, A. Jolly, Raphael Jolly, and Mrs. Minnie Jolly, filed an answer in which they admitted that plaintiffs were the owners of the lands in question, but denied that they (plaintiffs) were entitled to the possession thereof. Defendants A. Jolly and Raphael Jolly admitted:

> "That they assert a claim and interest in and to said lands, and to the possession thereof, * * * but they deny that Mrs. Minnie Jolly * * * has or claims any interest whatever in or to said described lands, except as residing thereon with her husband, A. Jolly."

By way of cross-complaint, the defendants A. Jolly and Raphael Jolly alleged:

> "That on and prior to about the 1st day of September, 1913, the said defendants were and had been residing upon and cultivating and farming and raising hops on and under a lease from year to year for the plaintiffs a large portion of the lands described in the complaint; that on or about said 1st day of September, 1913, the plaintiffs were desirous of leasing to these two defendants the lands described in the complaint, to be farmed and cultivated by defendants as hop lands and to be farmed as such, for the term of five years, and after considerable negotiations the plaintiffs drew up and submitted to the defendants a memoranda of lease containing the terms and conditions of the lease to be executed and delivered to the defendants within a reasonable time thereafter, a copy of the said memoranda of lease is hereunto annexed and made a part hereof, and marked 'Exhibit A.'"

The said memoranda were not signed by either of the parties.

It is next alleged that defendants "accepted the terms and conditions of said proposed lease"; that it was understood and agreed that a lease, in accordance with the terms of said "memoranda of lease," should be drawn and executed by plaintiffs; that in the meantime defendants were to enter into possession of said lands, the same as if said lease had been executed and delivered; that defendants went into the possession of said lands and began the farming and cultivation thereof according to the terms of said "memoranda of lease," believing a lease would be executed to them for the term of five years from the month of September, 1913, to the 1st of October, 1918; that, relying on said "memoranda of lease," defendants began farming said lands and planted the same in hops, expended large sums of money in putting a certain levee in proper condition, in clearing about 20 acres of land, boring a well, the purchase of wagons and mules, etc. It is alleged that, about the 15th day of December, 1913, plaintiffs presented to and asked defendants to sign a lease, but that defendants refused so to do "because the said lease was altogether different and much more onerous than the one agreed upon, as set out in said Exhibit A, and plaintiffs promised and agreed to change the same, and told defendants to go right ahead the same as had been agreed upon for the term of five years, that the matter would be fixed out thereafter as originally agreed upon"; that, relying upon said understanding, defendants continued to work said lands as required by the terms of said Exhibit A, "and at the end of the year in September, 1914, had done so at a loss of more than $250, besides the performance of their own labor up to said date." It is further alleged that, relying upon said understanding and with the consent of plaintiffs, defendants, in September and October, 1914, did a large amount of work on said ranch preparing the same for cultivation in the season of 1915, at a cost to them of more than $2,100.

The prayer of the cross-complaint is:

> "That plaintiffs be required to execute and deliver to said defendants a lease of the lands described in the complaint for a term of five years in accordance with and containing the terms and conditions set out and contained in the memoranda of lease, Exhibit A."

Exhibit A, attached to the complaint, covers four typewritten pages and, in terse sentences, specifies what each of the parties to the proposed lease was expected to do. To said cross-complaint and to said Exhibit A, plaintiffs filed a demurrer on general grounds and also specifying that certain designated portions thereof were ambiguous, uncertain and unintelligible. The judge presiding at the hearing of the demurrer in the court below filed a written opinion which, among other matters, contained the following:

> "An inspection of the memoranda prepared and set forth as Exhibit A in the complaint shows that the minds of the parties never met in many of the terms to be contained in the lease. These terms were left for after consideration and agreement between the parties. * * * The cross-complaint seems to be full and well pleaded. I cannot see how it will be possible for defendants to state the matters therein stated, or to supply any allegation that would render the pleading unobjectionable. Therefore the demurrer is sustained without leave to amend."

On the 28th of June, 1915, the cause coming on regularly for trial, plaintiffs moved for judgment upon the pleadings in accordance with the prayer of plaintiffs' complaint. The motion was granted, and judgment was entered quieting plaintiffs' title to the premises described in the complaint and decreeing that they were entitled to the possession thereof. The appeal is by defendants from said judgment.

[1] The demurrer to the cross-complaint was properly sustained, and, since the relief demanded by that pleading depended entirely on the "memoranda of lease," it is manifest that no cause of action for such relief could be stated by the plaintiffs; hence the order refusing leave to amend was proper.

As seen, the learned trial judge, who heard and disposed of the demurrer to the cross-complaint, filed a written opinion setting forth his reasons for sustaining the demurrer. Said opinion is printed in the transcript on appeal. One of the reasons advanced by him in said opinion for holding that the cross-complaint failed to state a cause of action for the relief demanded by that pleading was that it appeared from the "memoranda of lease" referred to in said complaint that the agreement or lease to be executed by the parties was to be reduced to writing, and that, since the instrument just named was signed by neither of the parties and the proposed lease was not executed or put in writing and signed by the parties, there was no completed contract or agreement which was binding upon either of the parties, thus bringing the case as made by the cross-complaint within the doctrine enunciated in the following cases: Fuller v. Reed, 38 Cal. 100; Spinney v. Downing, 108 Cal. 666, 41 Pac. 797; Ambler v. Whipple, 20 Wall. 546, 22 L. Ed. 403; Morrill v. Tehama, etc., Co., 10 Nev. 125—which hold that where parties agree to reduce to writing contracts of a certain character whereby and wherein they propose to set forth the terms and conditions of the agreement verbally made with respect thereto, and fail to put their agreement in writing, there is a failure to make a completed contract or one that is binding upon either of the parties, and that an action on such an agreement cannot be maintained, notwithstanding that one of the parties may have partly executed the terms thereof. It may be observed that it is further held in said cases that, as to contracts of the character of those dealt with therein, the party who claims to be entitled to the benefit of such contract on the ground of part performance with the knowledge of the other party cannot set up an estoppel as a defense against the repudiation of the agreement by the latter.

Cases may readily be conceived in which verbal agreements for the sale or leasing of real property might be enforced, or where the attempted repudiation or rejection of such agreements by the vendor or lessor might be met or overcome by setting up and establishing an estoppel. Cases in which contracts not enforceable in courts of law because they contravene the statute of frauds, but which will nevertheless be enforced by courts of equity, are not uncommon. But the facts in such cases must be so clear that there can be little or no question as to their effect or that they plainly and clearly call for the favorable interposition of equity. The case here, however, so far as the cross-complaint is concerned, proceeds entirely upon the theory that the instrument called the "memoranda of lease" clearly and unmistakably discloses the terms and conditions of the proposed lease, or sufficiently so to render the writing capable of being specifically enforced so that the result would be that the defendants, through a decree requiring the specific performance of its terms, would secure the lease which they conceive that its provisions call for. This in effect is the relief demanded by the cross-complaint. But the instrument is not clear and unmistakable as to its meaning and terms. Indeed, the difficulty standing in the way of its specific enforcement lies in the very fact of its manifest uncertainty and indefiniteness as to the terms upon which the land was to be leased to the defendants for the term of five years. In fact, as is stated and was pointed out by the trial judge in his written opinion:

> "An inspection of the memoranda shows that the minds of the parties never met on many of the terms to be contained in the proposed lease. These terms were left for future consideration, ascertainment, and agreement between the parties."

A few of the particulars in which the instrument referred to is wholly wanting in certainty and definiteness as to terms and conditions may be given: It is provided therein:

> "It is contemplated that Jolly & Sons shall have a lease for five years. However, we must arrive at terms and rates of pmts. etc."—evidently meaning, "terms and rates of payments."

Again, it is provided that:

> "Durst Bros. stand ready to advance Jolly & Sons money to buy their cattle or other stock, if proper terms according to their judgment can be obtained."

It is further provided that:

> "Jolly & Sons to buy Durst Bros. farming implements—wagons, scales, etc., as mutually agreed on."

Furthermore, the "memoranda of lease," while containing a provision that the proposed lease shall likewise contain a provision that a certain portion of the land shall be "leveled," in no way designates or describes the portion of the land to which that provision refers. Nor is there any provision or statement in the instrument indicating when the lease shall begin.

The foregoing is sufficient to show that there were vital features of the proposed lease upon which the minds of the parties had not met or come together. The writing upon which the defendants rely is therefore too indefinite and uncertain to make it capable of specific enforcement or to justify a decree compelling the plaintiffs to execute a lease in purported conformity thereto.

A court of equity obviously cannot prescribe or fix the terms and conditions to which the parties are to bind themselves by a contract or an agreement, and this is what the court in this case would be required to do in the several particulars above indicated if it were to attempt to compel the plaintiffs to execute to the defendants a lease to run for five years. It would have to ascertain, perhaps upon conflicting evidence, the matter of the "rates and terms of payments." It would be required to ascertain, perhaps upon conflicting evidence, when the five-year lease was to commence, and it would have to determine, possibly upon conflicting proofs, what portion of the land demised was to be leveled by the defendants. In addition to the particulars above mentioned in which the instrument called the "memoranda of lease" is deficient because of uncertainty and indefiniteness, there are other particulars in which the provisions contained in said instrument are ambiguously phrased, and this language would require construction to get at or ascertain the real meaning thereof. That the parties themselves do not agree as to the full meaning of the "memoranda of lease" is shown by the fact that the plaintiffs submitted to the defendants a written lease, which the latter refused to accept because, as they claimed, it did not conform to the terms set out in said memoranda.

"An agreement, the terms of which are not sufficiently certain to make the precise act which is to be done clearly ascertainable," cannot be specifically enforced. Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 6; Magee v. McManus, 70 Cal. 553, 12 Pac. 451; Smith v. Taylor, 82 Cal. 533, 23 Pac. 217; Berry v. Woodburn, 107 Cal. 504, 40 Pac. 802; Stanton v. Singleton, 126 Cal. 657, 59 Pac. 146, 47 L. R. A. 334; Reymond v. Laboudigue, 148 Cal. 691, 84 Pac. 189.

In Magee v. McManus, supra, it is said:

> "Whether the true contract be that which the court finds or that which the plaintiff alleges, it is indefinite and uncertain not only as to the time of the payment of the note and mortgage to be executed, but as to the amount for which the mortgage was to be given, and the rate of interest upon the debt. It appears that these things were to be the subject of future ascertainment and agreement, so that the mortgage when executed would be sufficient security for the plaintiff. As therefore the agreement was not final, and it was indefinite and uncertain in its terms and in itself, specific performance of it could not be enforced in equity"—citing Morrison v. Rossignol, 5 Cal. 65; Los Angeles, etc., Ass'n v. Phillips, 56 Cal. 539; Potts v. Whitehead, 20 N. J. Eq. 55.

In Pomeroy on Contracts, § 159, it is said:

> "A greater amount or degree of certainty is required in the terms of an agreement which is to be specifically executed in equity than is necessary in a contract which is the basis of an action at law for damages. An action at law is founded upon a mere nonperformance by a defendant, and this negative conclusion can often be established without determining all the terms of the agreement with exactness. The suit in equity is wholly an affirmative proceeding. The mere fact of nonperformance is not enough; its object is to procure a performance by the defendant, and this demands a clear, definite, and precise understanding of all the terms; they must be exactly ascertained before the performance can be enforced."

[2] It is not necessary to cite authorities to support the proposition that the court, when called upon specifically to enforce an agreement, must ascertain the terms of the instrument sought to be enforced from the instrument itself and not from the construction put upon it in the pleading demanding its enforcement. A complaint in specific performance cannot supply the deficiencies which may render the contract nonenforceable in equity.

[3] But there appears to be some claim that the cross-complaint shows that the defendants held over and remained in possession of the land after the expiration of their first year's possession thereof under the alleged lease a sufficient length of time, without any demand of possession or notice to quit by the plaintiffs, to raise the presumption, declared in subdivision 2 of section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that they were then holding the possession by permission of the plaintiffs and so entitled to hold under the lease for an additional full year. The section mentioned provides that a holding over by the tenant for a period of 60 days under the circumstances above indicated will have the effect stated.

There is no such issue set up in the cross-complaint. Nor is there anything therein showing precisely when the defendants went into the possession of the land under the agreement whereby the plaintiffs are alleged to have agreed to execute the five-year lease of the land to the defendants; and there is no allegation showing when their first year of possession under said agreement expired. As we have shown, the cross-complaint alleged that "about the 1st day of September, 1913," the defendants were and had been residing on and cultivating, etc., the land; that "on or about the 1st day of September, 1913, the plaintiffs were desirous of leasing to these defendants the lands described in the complaint," etc.; and that after considerable negotiations the plaintiffs submitted to the defendants the "memoranda of lease," above referred to, and the latter accepted the same. In paragraph 4 of the cross-complaint, it is alleged that the defendants entered into the possession of said land with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiffs and began the farming and cultivation thereof according to the terms of said memoranda of lease, and believing that "said properly executed lease of said lands would be drawn up and delivered to them for the term of five years from the month of September, 1913, up to the 1st day of October, 1918." Elsewhere the complaint sets forth in detail the work and improvements put upon the land by the defendants during the first year they occupied the same under the agreement, and concludes by alleging:

> "And did other and all the work on said lands necessary to properly farm and occupy the same for the year ending October, 1914, and also for the full term of five years," etc.

Again, it is alleged that all that was required of the defendants by the alleged agreement in the way of working and farming the land was faithfully performed by the defendants "and at the end of the year in September, 1914, they had done so at a loss," etc. In paragraph 11 it is alleged that "these defendants during the months of September and October, 1914, continued to farm and work said lands," etc. In the same paragraph it is alleged that the defendants cleared the land in certain particulars preparatory to "the cropping of said lands for the year 1915," etc. In paragraph 12 it is alleged that the defendants "laid out and expended in cash and labor between the 25th day of September and the 19th day of October, 1914, the sum of $2,139.65," etc.

The above is a reproduction, in substance, of every allegation in the cross-complaint respecting dates or the times when the several acts referred to by the said complaint were done; and from said allegations it cannot be told whether the first year expired in the month of September or the month of October; nor is it made to appear therefrom that the defendants were in possession after the expiration of the month of October, 1914. Assuming, though, that the cross-complaint shows that the first year expired on the 1st of October, 1914, and that the defendants were in possession down to the last day of October or to the 1st day of November, 1914 (and this does not clearly appear from said pleading to be true), and yet the showing thus made or assumed to be made is not sufficient as to the time of holding over to bring the case within the terms of section 1161, subd. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, so as to entitle the defendants to the possession of the land "for another full year."

We do not think the court erred in granting the motion of the plaintiffs for judgment on the pleadings.

In paragraph 1 of the answer, the defendants, while admitting that the ownership of the land is in the plaintiffs, deny that the "plaintiffs were at the time of the commencement of this action or are now entitled to the possession of the lands or any part thereof, as will more fully hereinafter appear." In paragraph 2 it is alleged that the defendants admit that they assert and claim an interest in and to said lands, and to the possession thereof, "as will more fully hereinafter appear." In paragraph 3 the defendants "deny that their claim of interest in or to said described lands, or that their or any of their estate or right or title or interest or claim in or to said lands or premises is without right, but on the contrary they aver that their said estate and right and title and interest and claim is good and valid."

[4, 5] Taken alone or without reference to the cross-complaint, the answer might perhaps properly be held to be sufficient to have submitted an issue upon the right of possession to the land in controversy. But it is evident that, in support of the denials of the answer or as showing the grounds upon which the defendants based their claim to the right of possession, the intention was to make the allegations of the cross-complaint a part of the answer, and that the answer does in fact do so by the words, used in two of its paragraphs, "as will more fully hereinafter appear." In fact, counsel for the appellants insist that, notwithstanding the order sustaining the demurrer to the cross-complaint, whereby the latter pleading as such was eliminated from the case, its allegations must, nevertheless, in so far as they may go in support of the denials of the answer, be regarded and considered as a part of the last-named pleading. We think that this position is sound. The effect of the language, "as will more fully hereinafter appear," followed by the allegations of the cross-complaint setting forth in detail the nature of the claim of the defendants to the right of possession, is to make the latter allegations a part of the answer as effectually as though they were actually incorporated into and made a part of the answer. So far, therefore, as said allegations were intended as a cross-complaint calling for the affirmative relief appropriate thereto, they are no longer in the case; but, as a part of the answer or the defense set up thereby, they can still be considered; and, so considering them, the irresistible conclusion is that they do not support the general denials of the answer. To the contrary, they vitiate or set at naught or contradict said denials. The complaint, as we have seen, alleges ownership in the plaintiffs. The answer admits this allegation. The presumption following from ownership is that the right of possession is in the owner. This presumption of the right of possession was not negatived by the allegations of the answer considered as above indicated. There was, then, no issue of fact to try, and, consequently, there was nothing left for the court to do but to order judgment on the pleadings.

We have discovered no reason for disturbing the judgment, and it is, accordingly, affirmed.

CLINE, Sheriff, v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2478.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 26, 1917.)

1. Certiorari 🔑5(1)—Existence of Other Remedy.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, as to writ of review, the writ does not lie when petitioner has a right of appeal from the order which he seeks to have reviewed.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑115—Right of Appeal.

Where a sheriff after levy of execution upon personal property, and service on him of written claim under Code Civ. Proc. § 689, refused to make sale without indemnity bond, which plaintiff declined to furnish and plaintiff in the action procured and served on him an order to show cause, upon which the court ordered him to make the sale without requiring bond, he had a right of appeal from such order, it having the effect of a judgment against him as to his claims of rights under Code Civ. Proc. § 689, and he having, by the order to show cause and the subsequent proceedings thereunder, been made a party to a collateral proceeding arising in the action.

Petition by John C. Cline, Sheriff, for writ of review against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and Charles Monroe, judge thereof. Writ discharged, and proceeding dismissed.

Loewenthal, Loeb & Walker, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. A. W. Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. In this proceeding a writ of review has been issued whereby the petitioner seeks to obtain judgment annulling an order made by the superior court of Los Angeles county. In an action wherein one E. O. Lenox was plaintiff, judgment was entered against several defendants, one of whom was Max Goldschmidt. A writ of execution upon that judgment was duly issued and placed in the hands of the petitioner as sheriff of Los Angeles county. Pursuant to instructions in writing by the attorney of Lenox, the sheriff levied upon all the right, title, and interest of Max Goldschmidt in and to certain personal property described as property of Goldschmidt Bros., it being claimed by Lenox that Max Goldschmidt was a partner in that firm. After the levy had been made, one Herman Goldschmidt served upon the sheriff a written claim, verified by his oath and made out in accordance with the provisions of section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, claiming as his property the said property levied upon by the sheriff and setting out the right of said Herman Goldschmidt to the possession thereof. Thereupon the sheriff informed the plaintiff's attorney that he would not make sale of the property, unless the plaintiff would deliver to the sheriff a bond in the sum of $300,000 to indemnify the sheriff against such third party claim. The plaintiff declined to furnish the indemnity bond, and the sheriff refused to proceed further in the matter without indemnity. Thereupon Lenox, by his attorney, filed in said action an affidavit which stated the foregoing facts and the circumstances in full detail, and asked that the court order the sheriff to advertise for sale and sell the interest of Max Goldschmidt in said property without requiring the delivery of any bond by the plaintiff. An order to show cause was issued and served upon the sheriff, and a hearing was had before the court upon the above-mentioned affidavit and counter affidavits. The court determined the matter against the sheriff, granted the motion of Lenox, and ordered the sheriff "to sell the interest in the partnership property without requiring bond." The principal facts are not only stated in the petition, but are admitted by the return filed herein. Together with its return, respondent court demurred to the petition, and has moved the court for an order dismissing this proceeding upon several grounds, of which one is that the petitioner has a right of appeal from said order of the superior court.

[1] The writ of review does not lie when the petitioner has a right of appeal from the order which he seeks to have reviewed. Code Civ. Proc. § 1068; Stoddard v. Superior Court, 108 Cal. 303, 41 Pac. 278.

[2] We are satisfied that the sheriff has a right of appeal from the order in question. It is admitted that he is not a party to the action in which the writ of execution was issued, and that he is not interested in the subject-matter of that writ; but he is interested in the order made against him, and in the protection of the rights which he claims to have under the provisions of section 689, Code of Civil Procedure. As to those claims the order in question has the effect of a judgment against him. By virtue of the order to show cause and the subsequent proceedings thereunder, the sheriff has been made a party to a collateral proceeding arising in the action, and he has a right to appeal from an order having the nature and effect of a judgment against him in such proceeding. The case is governed by the principles announced by the Supreme Court in Anglo-Californian Bank, Ltd., v. Superior Court, 153 Cal. 753, 96 Pac. 803. In that case it appeared that in an action to which the Anglo-Californian Bank was not a party, the superior court made an order requiring that the bank pay over to the receiver in the action money which the bank had in its possession as agent of the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, an insolvent corporation. The bank did not claim any interest in the funds, but refused to pay to the receiver because claims were made to the bank by third parties who asserted ownership in said funds. Claiming that the order was one made in excess of the jurisdiction of the superior court, the bank applied to the Supreme Court and obtained a writ of review. After full consideration of the matter, that court determined that the writ was improperly issued because the petitioner had a right of appeal from the order. For that reason the proceeding was dismissed. The court said:

> "That an order of the character of the one under consideration is generally appealable by one affected thereby who is a party to the record is practically conceded by learned counsel for plaintiff, and it must be under the decisions of this court. The theory upon which the decisions sustain such right of appeal by such a party from such an order is that the order is in effect a final judgment against him in a collateral proceeding growing out of the action—is so far independent of the suit itself as to be substantially a final decree for the purposes of an appeal. * * * See Grant v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 324 [39 Pac. 604]; Grant v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 71 [47 Pac. 872]; Los Angeles v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 134 Cal. 121 [66 Pac. 198]. Plaintiff's position on the merits is that by reason of the claim made against it by the third parties as to this money, it cannot safely pay the same to the receiver except in pursuance of some judgment or order made in a proceeding to which such claimants are parties, and that it is entitled either to retain the money until such controversy is determined, or to pay the money into a court having jurisdiction thereof, to abide such determination. The order in question is a final adjudication against plaintiff upon these matters. Its effect, if valid, is to require plaintiff to forthwith pay such money to the receiver, and finally deprive it of possession thereof without securing it against the claims of such third parties. It is clearly within the class of orders referred to in the cases last cited. Plaintiff was, of course, a party to the record, so far as such collateral proceeding was concerned, having been brought in as such a party by the order to show cause, and is fully within the rule of Elliott v. Superior Court, 144 Cal. 506 [77 Pac. 1109, 103 Am. St. Rep. 102], in regard to parties entitled to appeal."

In the case at bar the sheriff has been made "a party to the record, so far as such collateral proceeding was concerned, having been brought in as such party by the order to show cause." Being thus before the court and having been subjected to an adverse judgment affecting his substantial rights, he has the right of appeal from that judgment. It follows that the writ of review in this proceeding was improperly issued.

The writ is discharged, and the proceeding dismissed.

PEOPLE v. CASA CO. et al.

CHOWN v. ALEXANDRE et al.

(Civ. 2022, 2191.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 1, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 31, 1917.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑306—NUISANCE 🔑60—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—ABATEMENT ACT.

The abatement act (St. 1913, pp. 20, 22), declaring all buildings and places used for purposes of assignation, or prostitution to be "nuisances," and providing for their abatement and prevention by injunction or otherwise, does not violate the Fourteenth Amendment, by depriving one of his property in consequence of a misdemeanor committed therein, without his knowledge, connivance, or consent, as every owner of property who leases it owes the public a certain degree of diligence, and as proof of general reputation of the place is sufficient to impute knowledge to him, and as the act does not undertake to provide for a judgment of abatement otherwise than against persons properly joined as defendants in an action and brought in by proper process and afforded an opportunity to be heard.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Nuisance.]

2. NUISANCE ⟹77, 81, 88 — ABATEMENT — PROCEEDING.

The suppression of a nuisance is essentially a proceeding in rem operating upon the property used in the maintenance of the nuisance, and while the owner having no actual knowledge of the character of the business carried on in his building might personally be bound for the costs, the building and furniture may be proceeded against and subjected to forfeitures prescribed by the state.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⟹81—FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT—POLICE POWER.

The Fourteenth Amendment does not affect or in any manner curtail the police power of the state, and all owners hold their property subject to such police power and to such reasonable conditions as may be deemed by the governing authority essential to the public safety, comfort, and health.

4. NUISANCE ⟹60—ABATEMENT ACT—VALIDITY—PENALTY.

St. 1913, pp. 20, 22, declaring all buildings in which acts of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution occur, or which are used for such purposes, to be nuisances and providing for their abatement and prevention by injunction or otherwise, and permitting the building to be closed and kept closed against its use for any purpose for one year, unless sooner released in the manner provided by law, is not invalid as harsh, unreasonable, and oppressive, and in effect a penalty.

5. STATUTES ⟹64(6)—PARTIAL INVALIDITY—ABATEMENT OF NUISANCE.

The provision of section 6 for punishment by contempt is not a necessary or inseparable part of such act, and may be entirely eliminated, and the remainder of the statute be treated as valid.

6. STATUTES ⟹76(1)—GENERAL OR SPECIAL LAW.

The Legislature has power to determine whether a general law can be made applicable to any given case, and to make different laws for different classes of persons, which determination may not be interfered with by the courts, unless the classification is palpably arbitrary.

7. STATUTES ⟹77(1) — SPECIAL LAWS — CLASSIFICATION—ABATEMENT OF DISORDERLY HOUSES.

The abatement act (St. 1913, pp. 20, 22) is not objectionable as special legislation, as such classification is justifiable and in furtherance of the public policy of the state to suppress houses of prostitution.

8. NUISANCE ⟹82—ABATEMENT—"PROSECUTION" IN NAME OF PEOPLE.

Such act, providing not merely for the abatement of the nuisance described, but also for the removal and sale of all the personal property used in its maintenance and for the effectual closing of the building or place for one year against its use for any purpose, unless sooner released as provided by law, is not a "prosecution" within Const. art. 6, § 20, which must be conducted in the name of the people of the state; the word "prosecution" being used in a limited sense to signify only prosecutions of a criminal character.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Prosecution.]

9. NUISANCE ⟹60 — PRESUMPTION OF CONSTITUTIONALITY — NATURE OF REMEDY — ABATEMENT LAW.

Every presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of such act, and the fact that the criminal aspect of the maintenance of houses of prostitution was fully covered by existing statutes fortifies the presumption that the Legislature intended thereby to provide a remedy for the prevention and abatement of a recognized evil which would be in the nature of a civil proceeding rather than a criminal prosecution.

10. NUISANCE ⟹77—INJUNCTION—JURISDICTION OF EQUITY.

Courts of equity have jurisdiction to restrain and enjoin common nuisances.

11. NUISANCE ⟹60—ABATEMENT LAW—VALIDITY—SUIT BY CITIZEN.

The abatement law (St. 1913, pp. 20, 22) is not invalid because authorizing an action to abate a nuisance to be brought by an individual citizen without a showing that he is especially damaged, as it prevents a multiplicity of suits; that being a mere matter of legislative discretion, not reviewable by the court.

12. NUISANCE ⟹82—ABATEMENT OF PUBLIC NUISANCE—RIGHT OF PRIVATE INDIVIDUAL.

The state may confer the right to bring an action to abate a public nuisance upon a private individual in addition to his existing right to bring such action where there is a special injury to him, and such power is expressly conferred by Code Civ. Proc. § 369.

13. NUISANCE ⟹77 — ABATEMENT LAW — "BILL OF ATTAINDER."

The abatement law (St. 1913, pp. 20, 22) declaring buildings in which acts of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution occur, or which are used for such purposes, to be nuisances, and providing for their abatement by injunction or otherwise, is not in the nature of a "bill of attainder," the purpose of which at common law was to punish by forfeiture and corruption of blood, but the object of the act is not to punish, but to effect a reformation of the property itself, and is not a "bill of attainder" for the further reason that there is no forfeiture of property.

Civ. No. 2022:

Walter H. Linforth and George Appell, both of San Francisco (A. S. Newburgh, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ), for appellants. Chas. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., and A. L. O'Grady, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco (Edward C. Harrison, of San Francisco, of counsel, and Alvin Gerlack and J. E. White, both of San Francisco, amici curiæ), for respondents.

Civ. No. 2191:

Edward C. Harrison and Maurice E. Harrison, both of San Francisco, for appellant. J. A. Cooper, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. These actions were instituted against the defendants pursuant to the provisions of an act entitled "An Act declaring all buildings and places nuisances wherein or upon which acts of lewdness, assignation or prostitution are held or occur, or which are used for such purposes, and providing for the abatement and prevention of such nuisances by injunction and otherwise." Stats. 1913, pp. 20, 22.

In the case of People of the State of California v. Casa Co. et al., the trial court made its findings in substantial accord with the allegations of the complaint, and to the effect that the designated building had been and was being used and occupied for the purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution, and that because thereof the said building was a public nuisance. Accordingly judgment was entered decreeing that said building and each and every part thereof be effectively closed against its use for any purpose, and so kept closed for a period of one year, unless sooner released in the manner provided by law.

The appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone, and the points made in support of the appeal are directed solely to the constitutionality of the act in question.

[1, 2] Appellants contend that the act provides for a judgment which may deprive a man of his property in consequence of misdemeanors committed thereon without his knowledge, connivance, or consent, and therefore that it violates the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. This point is not well taken. Every owner of property who leases it or puts another in possession of it owes to the public a certain degree of diligence, and proof of the general reputation of the place is sufficient to impute to him knowledge. State v. Gilbert, 126 Minn. 95, 147 N. W. 953. Furthermore, the suppression of a nuisance is essentially a proceeding in rem, operating upon the property used in the maintenance of the nuisance, and "while, therefore, the owner having no actual knowledge of the character of the business carried on in his building might personally be bound for the costs, the building and furniture may nevertheless be proceeded against and subjected to the forfeitures prescribed by the statute." People v. Barbiere, 166 Pac. 812.

The act does not undertake to provide for a judgment enforcing and insuring abatement of the nuisance otherwise than as against persons who are properly joined as defendants in the action and brought in by proper process and afforded an opportunity to be heard, and thus the constitutional requirement of due process is fully complied with. Littleton v. Fritz, 65 Iowa, 488, 22 N. W. 641, 54 Am. Rep. 19; State v. Jordan, 72 Iowa, 377, 34 N. W. 285; State v. Gilbert, 126 Minn. 95, 147 N. W. 953.

[3] The Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution does not affect or in any manner curtail the police power of the state (Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 31, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923), and since all owners hold their property subject to such police power and to such reasonable conditions as may be deemed by the governing authority essential to the public safety, comfort, and health, the real question to be determined is whether or not the act is a valid exercise of the police power by the Legislature.

[4] Appellants contend that the provision of the statute in question permitting the building to be closed and kept closed against its use for any purpose for one year unless sooner released in the manner provided by law is unduly harsh, unreasonable, and oppressive, and that it is in effect a penalty. In answer to this contention we need only point out that the states of Nebraska, Washington, Minnesota, and Illinois all have red light abatement statutes similar in substance and form to the act under discussion, and in each of these states this provision of the act has been held constitutional and valid against precisely the same contention made here. English v. Fanning, 96 Neb. 123, 147 N. W. 215; State v. Emerson, 90 Wash. 565, 155 Pac. 579, L. R. A. 1916F, 325; State v. Gilbert, 126 Minn. 95, 147 N. W. 953; People v. Smith, 275 Ill. 256, 114 N. E. 31, L. R. A. 1917B, 1075.

[5] It is unnecessary to consider the point made by appellants to the effect that the provisions of section 6 of the act in regard to punishment for contempt are void because they are in the nature of special legislation and in conflict with section 1218 of the Code of Civil Procedure, fixing a penalty for contempts generally. In the first place, appellants are not aggrieved by this section, inasmuch as no contempt was alleged or found to have been committed, and, in the second place, this provision is not a necessary or inseparable part of the act, and may therefore be entirely eliminated, and the remainder of the statute be treated as valid. Davidson v. Von Detten, 139 Cal. 469, 73 Pac. 189; State Commission v. Chicago Co., 275 Ill. 555, 114 N. E. 325, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 50.

This point and the other points raised on this appeal are fully discussed and decided adversely to appellants' contentions in a recent decision of the appellate court of the Third district in the case of People v. Barbiere, 166 Pac. 812, and we are satisfied with the reasoning of, and the conclusion arrived at, by Mr. Justice Hart in that case, and concurred in by his associates.

The case of Chown v. Alexandre et al. comes up on an appeal from a judgment sustaining defendants' demurrer to a complaint, similar in purpose and allegations to the case previously considered.

[6] The only additional point raised in this case involves the constitutionality of the act under consideration to the extent that it provides for and permits the institution and maintenance of the action by an individual citizen in his own name without a showing that he is specially damaged.

[7] In this behalf it is argued that a general law can be made applicable to the present case, and that therefore the act in question is objectionable as special legislation. It is well settled that the Legislature has power to determine whether a general law can be made applicable to any given case and to make different laws for different classes of persons, and we may not interfere with its determination upon that question unless the classification is palpably arbitrary. People v. Mullender, 132 Cal. 217, 221, 64 Pac. 299. It has been decided that the classification is justifiable and in furtherance of the public policy of the state to suppress houses of prostitution. Pon v. Wittman, 147 Cal. 280, 292, 81 Pac. 984, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 683.

[8] It is contended that, inasmuch as the act provides not merely for the abatement of the nuisance described, but also for the removal and sale of all the personal property used in the maintenance of the nuisance and for the effectual closing for one year of the building or place against its use for any purpose, unless sooner released in the manner provided by law, that the act is penal in its nature, and that therefore a proceeding under it constitutes a prosecution within the meaning of section 20 of article 6 of the state Constitution, and consequently must be conducted in the name of the people of the state.

That the word "prosecution" in section 20 of article 6 of the Constitution is used in a limited sense, viz. as signifying only prosecutions of a criminal character is not questioned, but it is insisted that, while the action is in form a civil action in equity to abate a nuisance, in substance it is a criminal prosecution. We do not so construe it. The purpose of the statute as stated in its title is "the abatement and prevention of such nuisances by injunction and otherwise," and, we think, the provisions of the statute merely effectuate this purpose.

[9] Every presumption is in favor of the constitutionality of the statute (Stubbe v. Adamson, 220 N. Y. 459, 116 N. E. 372, 376), and the fact that the criminal aspect of the maintenance of houses of prostitution was already fully covered by existing statutes when the statute in question was enacted fortifies the presumption that the Legislature intended thereby to provide a remedy for the prevention and abatement of a recognized evil which would in its nature be a civil proceeding rather than a criminal prosecution (Pen. Code, §§ 315, 316; State v. Gilbert, 126 Minn. 95, 147 N. W. 953).

[10, 11] The jurisdiction of courts of equity to restrain and enjoin common nuisances affecting the public generally has never been denied, and is not here disputed. But in this connection it is argued that the statute is invalid because it authorizes an action to abate a nuisance to be brought by an individual citizen without a showing that he is especially damaged. The reason for the rule in this behalf was to prevent a multiplicity of suits, but that is a mere matter of legislative discretion, and questions of policy or expediency in legislation are for the lawmaking power itself, and not for the courts to determine. Littleton v. Fritz, 65 Iowa, 488, 22 N. W. 641, 54 Am. Rep. 19.

[12] It is well established that the state may confer the right to bring an action to abate a public nuisance upon a private individual in addition to his existing right to bring such actions where there is a special injury to him (State v. Fanning, 96 Neb. 123, 147 N. W. 215; Littleton v. Fritz, supra), and in this state this power is expressly conferred by section 369 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which states that a person expressly authorized by statute may sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted.

[13] The point urged by amicus curiæ to the effect that the act is in the nature of a bill of attainder is without merit. The purpose of attainder at common law was to punish and its consequences were forfeiture and corruption of blood. Jones' Blackstone, vol. 2, § 430. The object of the act in question is not to punish; its purpose is to effect a reformation in the property itself. Furthermore, there is no forfeiture of property. The closing of the place for one year with the privilege of sooner releasing it in the manner provided by law is merely a means of abating the nuisance, and that it is a reasonable method for enforcing the judgment of abatement has been decided in several jurisdictions where similar enactments exist. People v. Smith, 275 Ill. 256, 114 N. E. 31, L. R. A. 1917B, 1075; State v. Fanning, supra.

It follows that the judgment in the case of People v. Casa Co. is affirmed, and the judgment in the case of Chown v. Alexandre et al. is reversed.

BRUCE v. WESTERN PIPE & STEEL CO. (L. A. 4054.)

1. Pleading 🔑237(8) — Amendment to Conform to Proof—New Cause.

In an action for personal injuries due to the breaking of a rafter, an amendment of the complaint after the close of evidence, by the elimination of the charge that it did not adopt the proper and safer method of doing the work, did not constitute a change in the cause of action, where the pleading also alleged that it was necessary for plaintiff to stand on a board supported by the rafter, which defendant well knew was not sufficiently strong to support plaintiff, and that while at work the rafter broke, whereby he fell and was injured.

2. Evidence 🔑359(4) — X-Ray Picture — Personal Injury.

In a personal injury case, it was not error to allow plaintiff to introduce in evidence an X-ray picture of a normal foot for illustration to enable the jury to compare it with plaintiff's foot after the injury, although the X-ray was taken in the absence of defendant; there being no claim that the picture was inaccurate.

3. Witnesses 🔑240(2) — Leading Questions—Discretion of Court.

It is largely within the discretion of the trial court to allow leading questions.

4. Trial 🔑260(8)—Instructions—Gross Negligence—Request for Definition.

Under Employers' Liability Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 796), allowing a deduction from damages caused by an injury resulting from the combined negligence of employé and employer, where the negligence of the employé is slight and that of the employer gross in comparison, the omission from an instruction of the definition of gross negligence was not error, in the absence of a request for a more definite one.

5. Trial 🔑185—Instructions—Comments on Evidence.

It is not error for the trial court to state to the jury that certain testimony has been given in the case, provided it states the same with accuracy and not in a manner to mislead the jury; Const. art. 6, § 19, providing that judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law.

6. Master and Servant 🔑293(15) — Injuries to Servant—Instructions.

In a personal injury action, based upon the breaking of a rafter upon which plaintiff stood, an instruction as to defendant's duty to exercise ordinary care to discover hidden defects in the rafters was not erroneous, as against an objection that the rafter broke at a knot, which was obvious, where the break occurred at another point.

7. Negligence 🔑101—Comparative Negligence—Injuries to Servant.

Under Employers' Liability Act of 1911, providing that, where the employé's negligence contributed to his injury, recovery may nevertheless be had, if the employé's negligence was slight in comparison with that of the employer, the jury may diminish the damages in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the employé.

8. Master and Servant 🔑293(21) — Injuries to Servant—Instructions.

In an injury action, due to the breaking of a defective rafter, an instruction that the master is not under any duty to warn or instruct servants who have already enjoyed ample opportunity to become acquainted with the danger, or where the servant has had prior experience, or where the employment is not for a hazardous undertaking, was erroneous, as being too broad and sweeping; the term "hazardous undertaking" being too indefinite.

9. Trial 🔑260(1) — Requested Instructions—Instructions Given.

It is not error to refuse to give instructions as to matters already covered by instructions given.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by William Bruce against the Western Pipe & Steel Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and a denial of a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Morton, Hollzer & Morton, J. Crider, Jr., W. O. Morton, Harry A. Hollzer, and Chas. E. Barrett, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. Ibeson Sweet and W. D. Van Nostran, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The action was to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff while in the service of the defendant. The plaintiff was working for the defendant in putting a wooden roof on a circular steel tank 22 feet high and 42 feet in diameter. At the time he was injured the roof was so far constructed that there were rafters, 2 inches by 6 inches in size and over 20 feet long, extending from the edge of the tank to the center thereof. In order to do the work, it was necessary for him to lay a board across two of these rafters, and to stand on the board thus supported. While so standing, one of the rafters supporting the board on which he was standing suddenly broke, and in consequence thereof he fell to the ground and was injured. The action was to recover the damages caused by the injuries so received.

[1] Upon the trial, after the close of the evidence, the court allowed the plaintiff to file an amended complaint to conform to the proof. There was no error in this ruling. The cause of action was not essentially changed by the amendment. It is true that the previous pleading had charged that the defendant did not adopt the proper and safer method of doing the work in which plaintiff was engaged at the time of his injury, and that the amendment at the trial omits this charge. But the former pleading also alleged that it was necessary for plaintiff to stand on the board supported by said rafters, as aforesaid, and that defendant well knew that the rafters so placed were not sufficiently strong to support him while he was doing the work referred to, and that while he was so at work, supported thereon, one of them broke, whereby he fell and was injured. In substance this is the same charge as that contained in the amended complaint filed at the trial, and upon which the plaintiff bases his right to recover.

[2] The plaintiff was allowed to introduce in evidence an X-ray picture of a normal foot, for illustration, and to enable the jury to compare the same with the condition of the plaintiff's foot after the injury. This was not error. The fact that the X-ray was taken in the absence of the defendant, or without his knowledge, does not of necessity affect the propriety of this evidence. It is not claimed that the picture of the normal foot was inaccurate.

[3] It should not be necessary to remind attorneys that it is within the discretion of the court to allow leading questions. It is usually the proper way to conduct the examination until the attention of the witness is brought to the point to which he is expected to testify. It saves time and tends to make the testimony clearer. The allowance or exclusion of such questions rests almost entirely in the discretion of the trial court. It was not improper to allow the plaintiff to be asked the question, "Did the foreman in charge warn you of any danger?" when it was obvious that the answer would be in the negative. No abuse of discretion is shown by the record.

[4] Objection is made to the giving of an instruction on the law of contributory negligence, as qualified by the Employers' Liability Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 796), allowing a deduction from the damages caused by an injury, where it is the result of the combined negligence of the employé and employer, and the negligence of the employé is slight and that of the employer gross in comparison; the complaint being that the court did not define the meaning of the term "gross negligence." The defendant was at liberty to offer instructions upon any subject upon which it desired to have the jury informed. It could have done so at the close of the instructions given, if the occasion required it. It did not request any additional instruction on the subject except that one of the instructions asked and refused stated that if the negligence of the defendant "was not gross—that is, great or palpable"—the plaintiff could not recover. We cannot perceive that the addition of the words "great or palpable" would materially assist in the understanding of the meaning of the word "gross." The meaning of the latter is as well known and as definite and clear, as the meaning of the words "great" and "palpable." The defendant should have asked a more elaborate instruction on the subject, if it desired the jury to have fuller information. We do not think the failure of the court to add these adjectives, in connection with the word "gross," is of sufficient importance to justify a reversal of the judgment, even if it were error.

[5] It is not error for the trial court to state to the jury that certain testimony has been given in the case, provided it states the same with accuracy, and not in a manner to mislead the jury. "Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." Const. art. 6, § 19. The instruction complained of did not misstate the testimony, nor tend to mislead the jury in any respect.

[6] The appellant complains of an instruction relating to its duty to exercise ordinary care to discover hidden defects in the rafters on which plaintiff was required to stand while at work. The ground of the objection is that the evidence disclosed that the defect was not latent but was patent. There was a knot in the rafter upon which the board on which the plaintiff was standing rested when the rafter broke. This knot was about midway of the length of the rafter from the edge to the center of the tank. The plaintiff, before placing the board upon the rafter, observed this knot, called for a board 1 by 8 inches in size, and several feet long, for the purpose of strengthening the rafter, and nailed said board upon the rafter for that purpose, at the location where the knot was found. The plaintiff contends that this was the defect which caused the rafter to break, and that it was visible and patent, and not a latent defect. There is evidence, however, that the rafter did not break at the point where the knot was located, but that it broke at a point some 2 feet away from said knot, at which point the evidence does not show that any weakness was discovered by the plaintiff. The jury, therefore, might have found that the defect was latent, and the instruction was proper for their information as to the law on the subject. This observation applies to the complaints of the same character regarding other instructions upon the subject of latent defects.

[7] The defendant excepted to the refusal of the court to give several instructions, to the effect that if the jury should find that the plaintiff was injured by reason of his own contributory negligence, the verdict should be for the defendant. Since the enactment of the Employers' Liability Act of 1911, above mentioned, the fact that employé's negligence contributed to his injury, does not exonerate the employer, where the employé's negligence is slight and that of the employer gross in comparison. In such a case the jury may diminish the damages in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to the employé. The court of its own motion correctly instructed the jury on this subject, and it was not required to repeat the same doctrine at the request of the defendant.

[8] The court refused to give the following instruction asked by the defendant:

> "The master is not under any duty to warn or instruct servants who have already enjoyed an ample opportunity to become acquainted with the danger, or where the servant has had prior experience, or where the employment is not for a hazardous undertaking. Servants are expected and required to keep their eyes open and exercise such reasonable care for their own safety as their situation permits. They are bound to use all their faculties of seeing and hearing, and are charged with what they might see, hear, or learn by the use of their senses of hearing or sight. The master is therefore under no duty of warning or instructing a servant as to dangers which are discoverable by the exercise of ordinary care and the use of his faculties on his part, with such knowledge, experience, and judgment as he actually possesses or as the master is justified in believing he possesses."

The language of this instruction is too broad and sweeping. The fact that a servant has had prior experience does not, in all cases, excuse the master from the duty of warning him of a danger which is known to the master at the time the servant is put to work in the particular place where he is injured; nor can it be said, as matter of law, that the master is absolved from such duty in all cases where "the employment is not for a hazardous undertaking." The term "hazardous undertaking" is too indefinite. There may be employments or undertakings which in ordinary parlance would not be called hazardous, but where it is nevertheless the duty of the master to warn the servant of such dangers as there may be in the surroundings. The jury were fully instructed by the court that it was the duty of the plaintiff to use ordinary care for his own protection while engaged in the work. The instruction was properly refused.

[9] We have already stated that the plaintiff himself strengthened the rafter at the knot, and that there was evidence that the rafter did not break at that place, but at another place where there was no proof that any weakness was discovered. With reference to the knot, the court instructed the jury that if they should find that plaintiff, upon discovering the knot, attempted to make the rafter safe by nailing the board alongside of it, and that the injury occurred because of the weakness at that point, and because of his failure to reinforce it sufficiently, the plaintiff could not recover. The defendant asked several instructions, numbered respectively 13, 14, 15, and 17, which were refused, based upon the theory that the rafter broke at the knot, instead of at the other place, and to the effect that plaintiff could not recover if the jury found such to be the fact. The instruction given by the court on the subject was clear and covered all the points presented in the instructions asked and refused on this subject.

The instructions last mentioned, and some others which the court refused, dwell at length upon the duty of the plaintiff to exercise ordinary care for his own protection while engaged in his work, and that for that purpose he must use his natural faculties. The instructions given stated this duty repeatedly, and there was no error in refusing further repetitions at the request of the defendant.

The appellant claims that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. We need not discuss this question in detail. It is sufficient to say that an examination of the defendant's brief in connection with the evidence in the record satisfies us that there was enough evidence to support the verdict.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re FELTON'S ESTATE.

CHAMBERS, State Controller, v. FELTON.

(S. F. 8276.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 19, 1917.)

STIPULATIONS 🔑14(12)—CONSTRUCTION—INTEREST ON JUDGMENT.

Where it was stipulated that a decree as to inheritance tax should bear 7 per cent. interest if affirmed, such an award of interest was required where the decree was modified and affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Charles N. Felton, deceased. Appeal by John S. Chambers, as Controller of the State of California, from a decree fixing inheritance tax as to Charles N. Felton, Jr. Modified and affirmed.

Robert A. Waring, Inheritance Tax Atty., of Sacramento, and John C. Altman, of San Francisco, for appellant. Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Upon this appeal it was stipulated that if the decree in the matter of the above-entitled estate fixing the inheritance tax due and payable to the state should be affirmed, then the amount of the award of the inheritance tax should bear interest at the "rate of 7 per cent. per annum from and after the 13th day of March, 1916." The decree thus referred to was ordered modified, and, as modified, affirmed. Estate of Felton, No. 8242, 169 Pac. 392, opinion filed December 12, 1917.

It is therefore ordered that the modified decree which will be entered by the court in probate in the matter of said estate shall contain as a part thereof an award of interest upon the amount of such decree at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from and after the 13th day of March, 1916.

WESTERN INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

(S. F. 8122.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑419—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—DISABILITY.

In a proceeding on an injured employé's claim for compensation filed in 1914, consolidated with his widow's claim filed after his death in 1916, evidence held to sustain a finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that a slight disability consisting of a sinus and hernia were present continually from the day of the first operation by the insurer's physicians in 1914, until the second operation by them in 1916, followed by death from peritonitis.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑419—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—CLAIMS—LIMITATIONS.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) § 16, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1085, § 5, providing that unless compensation is paid or agreed to be paid within the time limited in the section for instituting proceedings for its collection the right to such proceedings shall be barred, and by subdivision b (2) providing that proceedings for the collection of the death benefits can only be maintained when death ensues within one year from the date of the injury, or when the injury causing death also caused a disability continuing to the date of death, for which a disability indemnity was paid, or an agreement for its payment made or proceedings for its collection commenced within the time limited for the commencement of proceedings to recover disability indemnity, a widow's proceeding wherein such continued disability was found was not barred; the ability of the young workman to perform the labor for which he is employed not being the sole measure of disability, so that the fact that he went back to work did not necessarily contradict a finding of continuous disability.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑419—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — PROCEEDINGS — CONSOLIDATION.

Though a proceeding by an employé for injury and a proceeding two years later by his widow for his death were separate, the latter was supplementary to the former, where the injury and death arose out of the same casualty, so that the continuing jurisdiction given by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 25d, is immaterial to the widow's application, and an order consolidating the proceedings was an unnecessary caution.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑419—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — CLAIM — EVIDENCE—FINDINGS AND AWARD.

In a proceeding for compensation for the death of an employé brought by his widow after his death arising from the same casualty as the injury, the findings and awards made by the Industrial Accident Commission upon the original proceeding by the injured employé, having the effect of a judgment binding upon the insurer, were admissible.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑419—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—AWARD OF COMPENSATION—DEATH CONSEQUENT UPON INJURY.

Where an employé was injured, and underwent an operation performed by the insured's physicians, and obtained an award of compensation for temporary total disability, and a slight disability was found to have been present continually from the date of the first operation until the date of the second operation, followed by his death, the Industrial Accident Commission in a proceeding by his widow for compensation had power to award compensation for his death.

In Banc. Application for writ of certiorari by the Western Indemnity Company against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California, to review the Commission's award of compensation to the widow of John Henne, deceased. Writ dismissed, and award affirmed.

Eugene F. Conlin, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. A writ of certiorari was issued to the end that this court might review the award of the Industrial Accident Commission to the widow of John Henne, deceased.

Henne had been employed by J. H. Hjul, and in March, 1914, while engaged with other workmen in lifting certain cabinets, he suffered injuries for which he demanded and received treatment from the physicians of the insurance carrier. On May 6, 1914, he filed an application for compensation, and after the insurance carrier had answered and a hearing had been given by the commission upon the issues joined an award was made in his favor on June 6, 1914, for temporary total disability. The Western Indemnity Company paid the weekly indemnity as provided by the award until June 29, 1914, when upon the advice of its medical staff the corporation ceased further payments upon the theory that the injured man had recovered. The total amount paid to that date was $175.75. There was no formal order by the Industrial Accident Commission exempting the insurance carrier from further payment to Henne, but it is the contention of the petitioner here that the evidence shows without contradiction a complete recovery before the date of the last payment.

Henne engaged in various occupations during the ensuing two years, and in March, 1916, two years after the accident, he applied to the Western Indemnity Company for further treatment. During initial disability an operation had been performed involving the excision of the umbilicus and certain surrounding tissues and when he made application for further treatment Henne was suffering from that which he asserted to be a recurrence of his former trouble. A second operation was found necessary and was performed by a surgeon employed by the Western Indemnity Company. After the operation peritonitis supervened, and on April 10, 1916, the patient died. In the following month Elizabeth Henne, the widow of John Henne, filed with the Industrial Accident Commission an application for a death benefit award, asserting that John Henne had died as a result of the injury received by him two years before. The Western Indemnity Company duly answered denying the causal connection between the original injury and the man's death, and pleading the alleged fact that full compensation had been paid in accordance with the award of the Industrial Accident Commission. A hearing was had and during its progress the commissioners made an order consolidating the widow's claim with that which had been filed by her husband in 1914. After the taking of testimony the Industrial Accident Commission made findings and an award in favor of Elizabeth Henne for $2,141.59, and thereafter denied a motion by the Western Indemnity Company for a rehearing. It is the contention of the petitioner that respondents acted in excess of their jurisdiction, and that the award is in violation of petitioner's rights under the provisions of article 1, section 13 of the Constitution of California.

[1] The finding which is attacked by petitioner as being without support in the testimony is, in its substantial part, as follows:

> "That on the 7th day of April, 1914, the said John Henne was operated upon by the medical staff of the defendant insurance carrier for the cure of the condition proximately caused by said injury; that the operative wounds received at said operation never wholly healed, and that by reason of a defective closing of said operative wounds, a postoperative sinus resulted in the region of the navel and a postoperative peritoneal hernia in the same region, both of which conditions were proximately caused by the said accident and operation and continued until remedied by the second operation hereinafter described; that while the applicant returned to, and continued at, work for the greater part of the time from the date of his discharge by the first operating physician until the date of said second operation, a slight disability, consisting of said sinus and hernia, was present continually from the date of the first operation until the date of the second operation; that on the 3d day of April, 1916, the said John Henne was operated upon by the medical staff of the defendant Western Indemnity Company for the relief of said hernia and sinus, and that on the 10th day of April, 1916, the said John Henne died, his death being caused by peritonitis proximately resulting from the said sinus or from the said second operation for the removal of the said sinus and hernia; that said death was proximately caused by the said accident of March 21, 1914, and was not caused or influenced by the intervention of any extraneous cause or other accident or injury."

Petitioner insists with emphasis that the testimony wholly fails to substantiate that part of the finding to the effect that "a slight disability, consisting of said sinus and hernia, was present continually from the date of the first operation until the date of the second operation." Without reviewing the testimony at length it is sufficient to say that there is ample support for the finding. Petitioner properly lays stress upon the fact that Henne returned to work, after the last payment of indemnity in June, 1914; that all outward evidence of injury had disappeared as shown by the testimony of the patient's wife and the surgeon; and that in April, 1915, he made application to the baker's union for medical examination and admission to standing as one entitled to sick benefits in the future. In said application he represented that he was in good health, but the medical examiner of the union found that there was a hernia, and that a small amount of pus exuded from the site of the previous operation. Undoubtedly the fact that he returned to work, that there was no visible sign of continuing trouble with the surgical wound, and that he believed himself cured, were strong circumstances for the commissioners to consider in determining whether or not the condition present at the time of the second operation was a proximate result of the original injury. But disappearance of external signs does not preclude the existence of a wound, and the fact that this strong man was able to work part of the time does not necessarily prove that he was free from trouble with such a wound.

Dr. Ophuls, who performed the autopsy, was questioned at length regarding the probable connection between the original injury and the fatal result. The following quotation from his testimony illustrates his views and supports the finding of the commission:

> "Q. Taking a case of this man, where the operation had been performed in the first instance, and the concretion and the umbilicus entirely removed, where the wound had healed completely and the man had gone to work for a year, then he was examined by his physician and his physician reports on May 1st merely the presence of this umbilical hernia, and no evidence of any inflammation or discharge, and then a year after that, again, or two years from the first trouble, the inflammation develops in the same general region, peritonitis appears, sinus is found but not connected with the umbilicus, sinus that was removed, as I understand it—would you say that this last trouble from which he died was directly connected with the original trouble for which the first operation was had? A. I think very likely it was. Q. In your opinion, there was some infection dormant during that time? A. I think so. Q. Would it, in your opinion, become active in the two years, without some cause? A. Well, these infections that remain after operations of infected wounds, they often lie dormant for years, and then they come to light again. You have heard of people for instance with gunshot wounds, like that—people who have been wounded in battle, carrying these things around, and then years after it begins to trouble them, the infection lying dormant all the time."

Dr. Sewell, who performed the second operation, testified in part as follows:

> "Q. Do you connect the peritonitis with the sinus? A. Yes, can't connect it anywhere else. Some of the ramifications of the sinus were not seen. Q. Would the fact that he had peritonitis two years before in that region have anything to do with it? A. Have a great deal to do with it, from the fact that it caused a thickened peritoneum, and a peritoneum not so able to withstand infection, and a great deal of the serous part of the membrane being taken up by the scar tissue. Q. You found a hernia, a ventral hernia. Where was this hernia with reference to the operative wound to the principal previous operative wound? A. Right in the center of it."

It will thus be seen that from the location of the sinus found at the time of the second operation and from the other surrounding circumstances there was substantial support for the finding which petitioner attacks.

[2] It is argued that the claim of Mrs. Henne was barred by the provisions of section 16 of the Compensation Act. That section so far as it is material to the present inquiry is quoted by petitioner as follows:

> "Unless compensation is paid or an agreement for its payment is made, within the time limited in this section for the institution of proceedings for its collection, the right to institute such proceedings shall be wholly barred. * * *
> "(2) Proceedings for the collection of the death benefit provided by subsection (c) of said section 15 must be commenced within one year from the date of death, and in any event within two hundred forty weeks from the date of the injury, and can only be maintained when it appears that death ensued within one year from the date of the injury, or that the injury causing death also caused disability, which continued to the date of the death and for which a disability indemnity was paid, or an agreement for its payment made, or proceedings for its collection commenced within the time limited for the commencement of proceedings for the recovery of the disability indemnity." St. 1915, p. 1085, § 5.

The case comes within the last clause of subdivision 2 of section 16 above quoted; that is, the original injury to Henne, which eventually caused his death also, in the meantime caused a disability which continued to the date of his death, and for this disability he began proceedings for compensation within the time limited therefor by the act, and in pursuance thereof a disability indemnity was paid to him. In such a case, under the terms of the first part of subdivision 2, the proceeding can be maintained, although death ensues more than one year from the date of the injury, provided it is commenced within one year from the date of the death, and within 240 weeks from the date of the injury. This proceeding by the widow was begun within a short time after the death, and within less than 240 weeks from the date of the injury. Therefore, by the terms of said subdivision, it is not barred by the provisions of the section. The ability of the workman to perform the labor for which he is employed is not the sole measure of disability (Frankfort General Insurance Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 56, 159 Pac. 150) and therefore the fact that Henne went back to work does not necessarily contradict the finding of continuing disability. But petitioner insists that since there were two separate proceedings, one instituted by Henne and the other by his widow, the court erred in consolidating them and in treating the later as a part of the earlier one.

[3] It is true that the two proceedings—the one by the employé for the injury, and the other by the widow for his death—are separate ones, although the latter is supplementary to the former and allied to it by reason of the fact that the two compensable conditions, the injury and the death, arose out of the same casualty. The continuing jurisdiction given by section 25d is immaterial to the widow's application, and the order consolidating the two proceedings was a mere act of caution and without significance or effect being wholly unnecessary.

[4] The introduction in evidence of the findings and award made by the commission upon the original proceedings was not erroneous. These findings and award had the effect of a judgment binding upon the Western Indemnity Company in a matter pertinent to the inquiry regarding the cause of Henne's death. The fact that his widow and not Henne himself was the petitioner does not affect the admissibility of this evidence. But petitioner here insists that the testimony of the injured man given at the hearing on his own application was improperly admitted, and that subdivision 8 of section 1870, Code of Civil Procedure, is not any warrant for the reception of such evidence because the parties to the two proceedings differed. It is not necessary to consider this contention because Henne's testimony furnished merely the evidentiary basis for the findings of the commission in the original matter wherein Henne was himself the petitioner, and such findings and the award, as we have seen, were properly admitted. Therefore it makes no difference whether or not the testimony itself was properly admissible. Its reception, in any view of the case, was harmless.

[5] Petitioner quotes and seeks to apply to the proceedings before the commission the following language from the Ehrhart Case, 172 Cal. 621-626, 158 Pac. 193, 194:

> "But the order made in this proceeding upon the second hearing was just as foreign to the original one as if the commissioners had been dealing with a different individual."

The quoted passage may not be justly so applied. We were there discussing two proceedings of which the later one referred to an alleged injury having no possible connection with the other casualty which was the only one investigated by the Industrial Accident Commission at the original hearing. We held that the statute of limitations barred the second application which related to something having no possible causal connection with the accident originally reported to and investigated by the commission. It is undenied that the site of the inflammation which caused Henne's disability was about the same as the location of the trouble which produced his death. Therefore there is no proper application of the quoted passage to the proceeding which we are here reviewing. In the Ehrhart Case we were at pains to point out the rule with reference to a later disorder occurring at the same place as the earlier one and due to the same general causes, for we there said:

> "Let us suppose, by way of illustration, that after Salvatore's leg had healed and he had returned to work he should have suffered with necrosis of the bone in the vicinity of the fracture, it would have been perfectly proper for the Industrial Accident Commission to have investigated the second disability and to have determined the facts from the record made at the original hearing and the evidence adduced at the later inquiry, and, if justified by those facts, to have ordered a resumption of payment of an indemnity."

And if such power exists with reference to a later development causing compensable disability, it must also inhere in the commission when the ultimate effect of the injury is the workman's death.

No other matters presented by the briefs require comment or analysis.

The writ is dismissed, and the award affirmed.

McVITTY v. FLENTGE. (S. F. 8570.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1917.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑95—LEASE—"IMMEDIATELY"—"REASONABLE TIME"—CONDITIONS AS TO SALE—OPTIONS—TIME OF EXERCISE.

Under a lease providing that, if there be a sale of the land, the lessee is to be paid for all summer fallow, "providing purchaser wants possession immediately," a sale did not necessarily terminate the lease, whether or not there was any summer fallow, but the purchaser had an option and a reasonable time in which to exercise it, the word "immediately" in such cases not meaning instantly or without any appreciable lapse of time, but meaning a reasonable time dependent on the circumstances existing at the time of the sale and following presently thereafter, and involving the questions of waiver and estoppel.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action in unlawful detainer by Edward Q. McVitty against Obi Flentge. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed. Reversed by District Court of Appeal. Rehearing denied.

The following is the opinion of Richards, J., in the District Court of Appeal, concurred in by Lennon, P. J., and Kerrigan, J.:

This is an appeal from a judgment in the defendant's favor after motion for nonsuit granted.

The action was for unlawful detainer. The defendant was in possession of the premises in question under a lease for the term of three years commencing November 1, 1915, at an annual cash rental of $110, payable yearly in advance. The plaintiff is the successor in interest of one Otto L. Harden, the lessor of the premises, having purchased the same from him, the conveyance thereof being delivered to said plaintiff on January 22, 1917. The lease under which the defendant claims the right to hold possession for the remainder of its term contains the following provision: "If said land is sold before expiration of said lease, the party of the second part to be paid for all summer fallow at the going price per acre, providing purchaser wants possession immediately." The formal demand for possession on the part of plaintiff as grantee of the lessor was not made until April 6, 1917, and was then refused by the lessee, whereupon this action was begun.

Upon the trial it appeared by the pleadings and admissions of the parties that the land had not been summer-fallowed for the previous year. The sole question presented to the court upon the motion for nonsuit and to this court upon appeal is as to the proper construction to be placed upon the above-quoted clause in the defendant's lease, the latter contending that, the demand for possession on the part of the purchaser not having been made immediately upon the consummation of his purchase of the leased premises, the lessee is entitled to hold for the remainder of the term. The interpretation which we place upon the above-quoted clause does not lead us to sustain this view.

The clause in the lease in question was intended by the parties to it to be a reservation in favor of and for the benefit of the lessor, and is to be so interpreted. Civ. Code, § 1069; Diepenbrock v. Luiz, 159 Cal. 716, 115 Pac. 743, L. R. A. 1915C, 234, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1084. Thus interpreted, it expressed briefly and somewhat vaguely, it is true, the evident intent of the parties that the owner of the premises should have the right to transfer to his grantee the right to the possession thereof upon a sale, and thereby terminate the lease. The only limitation upon that right expressed in the clause conferring it had reference, not to the time when the lease should be terminated, but merely to the terms upon which the grantee of the premises might exercise his right to receive possession. If the land had been summer-fallowed, and if the purchaser desired to obtain the benefit arising from such cultivation in the way of resultant crop, he must have offered to pay the lessee the amount expended by him in summer-fallowing the land in order to obtain possession of the premises so as to receive the benefit of the crop, and he must do this immediately upon consummation of his purchase. But in the case at bar there had been no summer-fallowing of the land for the previous year, and hence there was no sum which the purchaser was bound to tender or which the lessee was entitled to receive as a condition of surrendering possession of the premises; and therefore there was no necessity for an immediate demand and payment on the part of the purchaser in order to retain his right to such possession. The fact that there happened to be a volunteer crop upon the land is a false quantity in the case, for the reason that the lease contained no reservation of any right in the lessee by which he was to be paid for such crop, or was to have any right to possession of the premises for the purpose of harvesting the same. His lease was terminated upon the transfer; and the only right retained by him was the right of being paid for the cost of summer-fallowing the land in case he had made such outlay previous to the sale. In such event only was he entitled to an immediate demand for possession and to the repayment of the amount of his outlay. Otherwise the purchaser was entitled to the possession of the property upon his proper demand therefor whenever made. Such demand was made on April 6, 1917; and in respect to both form and time was such as to have entitled the plaintiff to possession of the premises. This being so, we are of the opinion that the defendant's motion for a new trial was improperly granted, and that the judgment in the defendant's favor based thereon must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for appellant. Alex Webster and Chas. R. Nelson, both of Paso Robles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing is denied. It is necessary to say, however, that in our opinion the decision of that court as to the effect of the reservation in the lease is not exactly correct. A sale of the land by the vendor would not, of necessity, terminate the lease. The purchaser would, upon such sale, have the option to terminate the lease, pay the cost of summer-fallowing at the going price, if any had been done, and take possession of the land, or of allowing the tenant to hold possession during the term of the lease. The phrase "providing purchaser wants possession immediately" does not mean that the buyer must take possession forthwith after his purchase or not at all. The word "immediately," when it refers to something to be done after a preceding event, where the thing to be done involves further inquiry or the exercise of discretion or of an election, does not mean that the thing must be done instantly or without any appreciable lapse of time after the preceding event. In such cases it is almost universally construed to mean that the succeeding act must be done within a reasonable time after the preceding event. First National Bank v. Haug, 52 Iowa, 538, 3 N. W. 627; Cashau v. N. W. Nat. Ins. Co., 5 Fed. Cas. 270; Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Robertson, 136 Ala. 379, 412, 34 South. 933. The question what is a reasonable time would depend upon the circumstances existing at the time of the sale and following presently thereafter. The defendant in his answer alleged facts which, if true, would show that the option of the purchaser to take possession under the reservation was not exercised within a reasonable time after his purchase, and which would have the effect of a waiver on his part, or create an estoppel which would defeat his right to possession at the time this action was begun. But he did not avail himself of this defense, but saw fit to rest his case upon a motion for a nonsuit, upon the theory that the reservation in the lease required the purchaser to exercise his right to take possession without any delay whatever, and that by his delay in doing so from January 22d to April 6th of the same year the purchaser lost his right to take possession. Upon a new trial the defendant will have the opportunity of proving, as alleged in his second defense, that the plaintiff, shortly before his purchase, notified the defendant that he would not interfere with the defendant's possession until November 1, 1917, and that, relying upon said notice, defendant proceeded to cultivate a portion of the premises and to raise a crop thereon, which had partly matured at the time the defendant asserted his right to possession under the reservation. With this modification the defendant should have no difficulty in preserving such rights as he may have.

CARTER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF KERN COUNTY et al. (L. A. 5376.)

1. Costs 🔑124—Security for Costs—Nonresident Plaintiff—Statutes.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1036, providing that a nonresident plaintiff may be required to give security for costs, and that until an undertaking executed by two or more is filed with the clerk conditioned that "they" will pay such costs, the proceeding must be stayed, and section 1037, providing that after 30 days from the service of notice requiring security, and on proof that it has not been filed, the court may order a dismissal, and in view of section 1056, providing that a corporation qualified as required by law may be accepted as a sole and sufficient surety, an undertaking by a corporate surety is sufficient, and its qualification need not appear therein.

2. Costs 🔑121—Security for Costs—Sufficiency—Statute.

A surety company's undertaking on the part of a nonresident plaintiff that the "plaintiff" would pay costs, charges, etc., containing no express promise by the surety to pay any sum of money, was insufficient.

3. Costs 🔑137 — Nonresident Plaintiff — Failure to File Security—Jurisdiction.

Under such provisions, the failure to file such undertaking does not deprive the court of jurisdiction of the action, or operate as a dismissal thereof, though the court should grant a motion to dismiss in the absence of anything excusing the failure to file the security, but in the absence of a dismissal it retains jurisdiction, and the security may be filed at any time before dismissal.

4. Costs 🔑134 — Security for Costs — Filing—Discretion of Trial Court.

Even if the statute be construed to require the filing of such security within the statutory time, the trial court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, might permit a new security to be filed, and should do so where a party in good faith originally endeavors to comply with the statute by filing a defective undertaking.

5. Prohibition 🔑5(3) — Proceeding with Action — Failure to File Security for Costs.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1036, providing that a nonresident plaintiff shall give security for costs, and that all proceedings may be stayed until an undertaking executed by two or more is filed with the clerk to the effect that "they" will pay such costs, and where no such security was filed, prohibition will lie to prevent further proceedings pending the filing of the undertaking where the court has refused to dismiss, and is proceeding without any undertaking, as defendant has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law.

In Bank. Application for writ of prohibition by George D. Carter against the Superior Court of Kern County and Hon. Milton T. Farmer, Judge thereof. Peremptory writ to issue.

Charles W. Chase, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Muhleman & Crump, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Petitioner, Carter, is a defendant in an action pending in the superior court of Kern county, in which one Mary V. Douthit, a resident of the state of Oregon at and ever since the commencement of the action, is the plaintiff. He regularly made demand as provided by sections 1036 and 1037, Code of Civil Procedure, for security for the costs and charges which might be awarded against the plaintiff in the action. Within 30 days of such demand the plaintiff filed what is claimed to be a sufficient undertaking in the sum of $300 with the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York as sole surety. Claiming that no such undertaking as is required by the law had ever been filed, Carter, after the expiration of 30 days from the date of the demand, made a motion in the superior court that the action be dismissed. The superior court, apparently holding the undertaking sufficient, denied the motion, and is about to proceed with the trial of the case. Carter then instituted this proceeding in the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District to obtain a writ of prohibition restraining further proceedings in said action in the superior court. Judgment was therein given perpetually restraining all further proceedings in the superior court. On petition to this court, this judgment was vacated, and the matter ordered heard herein.

[1] Section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, when the plaintiff in an action or special proceeding resides out of the state, security for the costs and charges which may be awarded against him may be required by the defendant. It further provides:

> "When required, all proceedings in the action or special proceeding must be stayed until an undertaking, executed by two or more persons, is filed with the clerk, to the effect that they will pay such costs and charges as may be awarded against the plaintiff by judgment, or in the progress of the action, * * * not exceeding the sum of three hundred dollars."

Section 1037 provides that:

> "After the lapse of thirty days from the service of notice that security is required, * * * upon proof thereof, and that no undertaking as required has been filed, the court or judge may order the action or special proceeding to be dismissed."

Any suggestion that the undertaking filed is insufficient because executed by only one surety, instead of two or more, as provided in section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure, is answered by section 1056, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that a corporation qualified as required by law for that purpose may be accepted as sole and sufficient surety in all cases where an undertaking with any number of sureties is authorized or required. It is not claimed that the surety here was not in fact such a corporation; the only claim in that connection being that such fact does not appear from the undertaking itself. We do not consider it essential to the validity of the undertaking that such fact appear on its face. The statute makes no such requirement. The vital thing is that it is in fact qualified as provided by law.

[2] The remaining objection is more serious, and is the one upon which the learned District Court of Appeal based its conclusion that a sufficient undertaking had not been filed. As we have seen, section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure, requires that the undertaking must be to the effect "that they (the sureties) will pay such costs and charges," etc. The undertaking filed does not expressly so provide; the express undertaking and promise therein being simply one "on the part of the plaintiff that said plaintiff will pay all costs and charges which may be awarded against the plaintiff, * * * not exceeding the sum of $300." Nowhere therein does the surety expressly promise to pay any money or expressly declare itself bound in any sum of money. In view of the recent decision of this court in San Luis Obispo Co. v. Ryal et al., 165 Pac. 1, it is certainly at least very doubtful whether any recovery thereon could be had by Carter. However this may be, it is not the kind of undertaking prescribed by the statute, which calls for one in which the sureties themselves expressly promise to pay such costs and charges as may be awarded against the plaintiff, not exceeding the specified sum. We are of the opinion that a defendant demanding security for costs, etc., under section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure, has the right to insist upon an undertaking measuring fully up to the requirements of the section, and that in the particular under discussion this bond did not do so.

[3] It does not follow, however, that because of this failure on her part the superior court may be perpetually restrained from all further proceedings in the action. The failure to file such an undertaking within 30 days from the service of notice that security is required or at all does not deprive the court of jurisdiction of the action, or operate as a dismissal thereof. Certainly the statute does not so provide. There is no requirement in the statute that the undertaking must be filed within any specified time, and no requirement that the action must be dismissed if the required undertaking is not filed within a specified time. Section 1037, Code of Civil Procedure, the section relative to dismissal, simply provides that:

> "After the lapse of thirty days from the service of notice that security is required, * * * upon proof thereof and that no undertaking as required has been filed, the court or judge may order the action * * * to be dismissed."

In the connection in which it is used, there is no reasonable ground for reading the word "may" as "must." Doubtless the court should grant such a motion to dismiss in the absence of circumstances tending to excuse the failure to file the required undertaking, and perhaps, where the evidence is without conflict and tends to show no excuse, could be compelled to do so by mandate. But, whether it grants or denies the motion, it is acting in the exercise of its jurisdiction, and in the absence of a dismissal the court retains jurisdiction of the action. It seems clear also that the required undertaking may be filed at any time prior to dismissal.

[4] Even if the statute be so construed as to require such filing within the 30 days, there can be no doubt that the trial court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, could permit such filing, and should do so where it appears that a party in good faith has originally endeavored to comply with the statute by filing an undertaking which was defective. This has been expressly held in relation to the bond required in actions for libel and slander to secure the defendant as to costs and charges, where the statute expressly provided that "an action brought without filing the undertaking shall be dismissed." The decisions under this act fully sustain our views on the question of jurisdiction and the power of the court on motion for dismissal for failure to file bond. Dixon v. Allen, 69 Cal. 527, 11 Pac. 179; Stinson v. Carpenter, 78 Cal. 571, 21 Pac. 304; Becker v. Schmidlin, 153 Cal. 669, 671, 96 Pac. 280. In the last case cited, it was assumed by this court that the bond filed was in fact void. But it was apparent that counsel for the plaintiff was at least acting in good faith under a belief that it was valid, when he filed it. The order of the lower court refusing leave to plaintiff to file a new bond and dismissing the action was reversed. The court said:

> That the undertaking, as here, was intended to secure defendant in the costs and charges which might ultimately be awarded him, and that "the provision is for his sole benefit, and, this being true, the discretion vested in the court of permitting plaintiff to file a new undertaking which will afford a defendant all the protection the law intends should be exercised to effect that end."

In Dixon v. Allen, supra, no bond was filed, and the trial court denied a motion for dismissal, giving plaintiff leave to file such a bond, which was subsequently done. This court said:

> "The statute * * * does not deprive the superior court of jurisdiction in case the undertaking is not filed. The object of the statute is accomplished, if, when the objection is made, the undertaking is executed, and the defendant thus secured the costs and charges, which may be awarded to him."

See, also, Farmer v. Warner, 64 Kan. 878, 68 Pac. 1127.

In the recent case of Estate of Baker, 168 Pac. 881, 882, this court said, speaking of a supposed failure to comply with the requirements of the statute here involved (sections 1036 and 1037, Code Civ. Proc.):

> "It does not follow that the court is bound to dismiss it, or that, if it refuses to do so, its further proceedings therein are without jurisdiction and void."

The case of Meade County Bank v. Bailey, 137 Cal. 447, 70 Pac. 297, relied on by petitioner, is not in conflict with anything we have said. There the trial court dismissed the action because no proper bond was ever filed, and the matter came before this court on appeal from such order. The opinion does not suggest that any showing of excuse was made in the lower court or that there was any offer to file a proper bond therein, and it was held that the court did not err in dismissing the action.

[5] However, it is clear that proceedings in the action should be stayed pending the filing of the required undertaking. This much is expressly provided in section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure, and manifestly is essential to accomplish the object of the statute. Of this provision it was said in Meade County Bank v. Bailey, supra:

> "The statute vests in the defendant the right to have the bond, and the court cannot against his will deprive him of that right, or alter the amount or terms of the bond required. When the demand for security for costs is made in the proper case, the law itself enjoins further proceedings on the part of the plaintiff until the demand is complied with according to the provisions of the Code."

Will prohibition lie to prevent such further proceedings pending the filing of the undertaking? Where the court refuses to dismiss an action for failure to file the required undertaking, and is proceeding to try the cause without any undertaking being on file, manifestly the defendant has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. A similar situation was presented in Hayne v. Justices Court, 82 Cal. 284, 23 Pac. 125, 16 Am. St. Rep. 114, where the lower court was proceeding to try a case in disregard of the provisions of section 45 of the Insolvency Act, which plainly prohibited prosecution to final judgment of actions against the debtor until the question of his discharge was determined. This court there said:

> "This is a plain and direct prohibition against any further proceedings in the justice's court, and the petitioner, having brought himself within the statute, is entitled to the relief prayed for. * * * A court that proceeds in the trial of a cause against an express prohibition of a statute is exceeding its jurisdiction, and may be prevented by prohibition from this court."

It appears to us that in no other way could the petitioner here receive the protection that the statute guarantees, and the decision is certainly sufficient authority for the proposition that, seeking and insisting upon such protection, he is entitled to have proceedings stayed in the lower court, pending the filing of the required bond, by prohibition.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of prohibition issue prohibiting respondents from further proceedings in the action of Mary V. Douthit, Plaintiff, v. George D. Carter et al., Defendants, now pending in the superior court of Kern county, in so far as said defendant George D. Carter is concerned, pending the execution and filing by the plaintiff therein of the undertaking for costs and charges required by section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure, saving and excepting to respondents the right and power to entertain and determine any motion for dismissal of said action under the provisions of section 1037, Code of Civil Procedure, as well as the right and power to allow a proper bond to be filed in accord with the requirements of said section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure.

RAMAGE v. GOULD. (S. F. 8206.)

CORPORATIONS ⚷130—TRANSFER OF STOCK—ATTACHMENT.

An attachment upon corporate stock is merely a lien on the shares, and does not interfere with the right to transfer the title to the stock, and the corporate officers must issue a new certificate to an assignee or be liable to a penalty as provided by Civ. Code, § 324; attachment in such cases being regulated by Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 4, relating to attachment of corporate shares, and not by subdivision 5, relating to attachment of personal property not capable of manual delivery, and section 544, making persons having in their possession or under their control personal property belonging to the defendant liable to the plaintiff, does not apply.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Stanley Ramage against C. W. Gould. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. Judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal. On rehearing. Affirmed.

Fred L. Dreher, of San Francisco (Frederick J. Wichman, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Alfred J. Harwood, of San Francisco, for respondent. Heller, Powers & Ehrman, of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

SLOSS, J. This appeal was, in the first instance, heard in the District Court of Appeal for the First District, where the following opinion, prepared by Mr. Justice Richards, was filed:

"This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought against the defendant as the secretary of a corporation to recover the statutory penalty for refusing to transfer shares of stock of said corporation to the plaintiff upon his production of an assignment of the certificate of said stock and his demand for such transfer.

"The facts of the case are practically undisputed and are as follows: On February 15, 1915, one Andrew Ramage was the owner of 200 shares of the capital stock of the Growers' Co-operative Agency, a corporation. On that date an action was commenced against him in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco upon a debt, and an attachment was thereupon issued out of said court, which was straightway levied upon the said shares of stock of the defendant in said corporation. On March 15, 1915, said Andrew Ramage sold, indorsed and delivered to Stanley Ramage, the plaintiff herein, 199 shares of said stock, and delivered the certificate evidencing the same to him. The plaintiff immediately presented said certificate to the defendant herein, as the secretary of said corporation, and requested the issuance of a new certificate therefor to him. The defendant then informed the plaintiff and also Andrew Ramage, his assignor, of the fact of said attachment, and stated to the plaintiff that he would sign and issue said stock as soon as said attachment had been released. On August 5, 1915, the plaintiff renewed his demand on the defendant for the issuance to him of said stock. The action against Andrew Ramage was still pending and said attachment had not been discharged or released, and the defendant then stated that he was not at liberty to issue a new certificate for the attached stock, but that he would do so as soon as said attachment had been released. This action was thereupon instituted to recover from the defendant as liquidated damages the statutory penalty provided by section 324 of the Civil Code.

"The sole question presented for decision in this case is as to whether the officers of the corporation can refuse to transfer certificates of shares of stock in their corporation to a purchaser and holder thereof demanding such transfer, when a writ of attachment has been levied on the shares or interest of the original holder of such stock, the lien of which attachment has not been released, but is still subsisting at the time of such demand.

"We are unable to distinguish this case in principle from the case of Craig v. Hesperia Land & Water Co., 113 Cal. 7, 45 Pac. 10, 35 L. R. A. 306, 54 Am. St. Rep. 316. In that case the action was to recover damages for a conversion of the plaintiff's stock by the officers of the corporation through their failure or refusal to transfer said stock upon demand, the reason for such refusal consisting in the claim that the corporation had a lien on the stock for unpaid assessments. In upholding the plaintiff's contention in that case the Supreme Court says: 'The lien, however, is upon the shares, and not upon the certificate. The certificate is merely evidence of ownership of the shares. When an old certificate is surrendered, and a new one issued, the new certificate represents the same shares, but the shares themselves remain subject to any lien the corporation may have upon them, and the new owner takes subject to such lien.' It is, however, urged by the appellant that the above case is to be distinguished from the case at bar by the fact that in the case of a corporate lien for unpaid assessments the records of the corporation would disclose such lien and put subsequent transferees of the certificate of stock upon notice thereof; while in the instant case the lien created by the attachment would not become a matter of corporate record, and purchasers of the stock under attachment subsequent thereto would have no notice of the lien. This distinction, however, is not important, since shares of stock in a corporation are not negotiable but, like other kinds of personal property, have the doctrine of caveat emptor applied to their transfer.

"The appellant also seeks to derive some comfort from the language used by this court in deciding the case of Spangenberg v. Nesbitt, 22 Cal. App. 274, 134 Pac. 343, but that was a case of conflicting claims to the title of the particular stock in question; and while the court did suggest that under such conditions the officers of the corporation were entitled to a reasonable time to determine its duty in the premises, it also clearly indicated that there was one of two safe courses to be taken by such officers if they would avoid the penalty which the section of the Civil Code involved in this action imposes; they might either make an independent investigation as to where the rights of the parties lay; or they might institute an action for interpleader between the rival claimants, and relieve themselves of responsibility by depositing the stock in court. Neither of these courses was followed by the defendant in the case at bar, although five months elapsed between the plaintiff's first and second demand.

"We find no error, therefore, in the ruling of the trial court holding the defendant liable to the penalties of the statute under the circumstances of the present case.

"Judgment affirmed."

Thereafter, an order was made transferring the cause to this court for hearing and determination. The application for such transfer was supported by friends of the court, who attacked the judgment under review upon grounds differing somewhat from those advanced by the appellant himself. Our further examination of the case has satisfied us that neither petition shows any good ground for reversing or modifying the judgment appealed from. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal is adopted as embodying a satisfactory statement of the facts, and of the reasons for the conclusion reached. A few words may, however, be added, in view of the differing lines of attack made upon this conclusion.

The appellant himself takes the position that the plaintiff was not entitled to have a certificate issued to him so long as the attachment remained in force. This contention cannot be maintained, unless it find justification in the statutes relative to attachment. There is no such justification. An attachment is a mere lien upon the shares of stock. Such lien, like any other, is upon the shares themselves, rather than upon the certificate of stock. The identity of the shares is not altered by the issuance of a new certificate, and the lien, if valid in its creation, will persist, notwithstanding the surrender of the certificate and the issuance of a new one to some person other than the defendant in the attachment suit. To this extent the decision in Craig v. Hesperia L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 7, 45 Pac. 10, 35 L. R. A. 306, 54 Am. St. Rep. 316, is precisely in point. The levy of an attachment does not deprive the owner of the shares of his title. He still owns the stock, and may exercise all of the rights of ownership, subject to the lien of the attachment. He may sell and transfer the shares (always subject to the attachment), and vest in his transferee all the rights which he has. One of those rights, that of voting the shares, cannot be exercised except by one having the stock in his own name upon the books of the corporation. Civ. Code, § 312. The mode of attaching shares of stock of a corporation is defined by subdivision 4 of section 542 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Specific provision being thus made, the general language of subdivision 5 of the same section, prescribing the method of attaching debts and credits and other personal property not capable of manual delivery, must be restricted to forms of property other than corporate shares. Section 544, making persons "having in their possession, or under their control," personal property belonging to the defendant, liable to the plaintiff, unless the property be delivered up or transferred to the sheriff, is complementary to subdivision 5 of section 542, and has no application to attachments of shares under subdivision 4. Even if the officers of a corporation may be said to have the stockholder's shares in their possession or under their control, section 544 could not be applied to shares of corporate stock without holding that the officers of the corporation, upon being served with the writ, may issue a certificate to the sheriff. Manifestly the Code provisions do not contemplate this result.

There is, accordingly, no statutory provision authorizing the corporate officers to deny the stockholder or his assignee the rights incident to the holding and ownership of the shares attached. If, as is contended, this conclusion makes it possible for the owner of shares which have been attached to deceive others by inducing them to purchase shares in ignorance of the levy, the remedy lies with the Legislature. The courts would not be justified in attributing to an attachment an effect greater than that which the statute gives, or in depriving stockholders in corporations, or their transferees, of any of their legal rights.

All of this is virtually conceded by learned counsel who appear here as amici curiæ. They contend, however, that while the plaintiff, as purchaser of the shares and indorsee of the certificate, is entitled to have the shares transferred to his name on the corporate books, and to have a new certificate issued, the transfer should be made and the certificate issued subject to a notation that the shares have been attached. The claim is based upon Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 45 Pac. 329, 33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348, where it was held that a pledgee of stock is entitled to have the fact of the pledge entered upon the books of the corporation. Authority for this ruling was found in section 324 of the Civil Code, the court holding that "transfers by way of pledge" were included within the transfers which, under this section, may be entered upon the books of the corporation. It may well be doubted whether the levy of an attachment constitutes in any sense a transfer of the shares, or of any interest therein. It is not necessary, however, in this case to decide whether the corporate officers would be justified in refusing to issue to the transferee of a stockholder whose shares had been attached any certificate except one showing the fact of attachment. No such question was raised in this case, nor could it have been raised upon the record before us. The complaint alleged, and the court found, that the defendant had refused to issue any certificate to the plaintiff. The findings must be construed, if possible, so as to support the judgment. So construed, the finding that the defendant refused to issue any certificate should be taken to mean, not merely that he refused to issue a general, unrestricted form of certificate, but that he refused to recognize the right of the plaintiff to have a certificate in any form issued to him. This, too, is the necessary implication of the answer, which, in effect, declares that the defendant refused to issue a certificate so long as the attachment remained in force. It is apparent from the defendant's own pleading that a demand for a certificate, of whatever form, would have been unavailing. It does not, therefore, lie in the defendant's mouth to claim that the plaintiff did not ask for the particular kind of certificate to which he was entitled.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re MARSHALL'S ESTATE. (S. F. 8155.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 18, 1917. Rehearing Denied Jan. 17, 1918.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑151(2)—Right to Appeal—Interest—Parties Aggrieved.

Where parties appealing from a decree determining heirship merely attack the sufficiency of the evidence establishing the kinship of the respondent, without attempting to establish their own kinship, they had no standing as parties in interest, nor as parties aggrieved by the decree, and their appeal could not be considered.

2. Wills 🔑300 — Beneficiaries — Determination—Evidence.

Evidence held to sustain decree that a nephew was the sole heir of testatrix, who devised all her property to her own family.

3. Wills 🔑501 — Construction — Designation of Beneficiaries.

Civ. Code, § 1334, providing that a testamentary disposition to family, without any other words of qualification, vests the property in those who would be entitled to succeed in case of intestacy, and section 1386, subd. 8, providing that, where the property was community property, one-half thereof, on intestacy of a surviving spouse, goes to the heirs of the deceased spouse, do not apply where testatrix devised all her property "to my own family who I think are all in Mexico," and the husband's heirs, who were not in Mexico, were not entitled to participate.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Francisco County; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Proceedings in the estate of Juana B. Marshall, deceased, wherein a contest over the right of heirship arose between Jose Maria Beltran and Maria Refugio Chavez and others. From the decree rendered, Maria Refugio Chavez and others appeal. Affirmed.

J. J. Lermen, W. F. Postel, Karl C. Partridge, Frank J. Hennessy, and Frank W. Sawyer, all of San Francisco, for appellants. A. E. Bolton, Chas. S. Perry, and H. L. Bradford, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. [1] Juana B. Marshall died testate. By her will she declared that:

> "All that is left of my estate, after my just debts are paid, I leave to my own family who I think are all in Mexico."

Contest arose over the determination of the right of heirship and succession to her estate. The court found and decreed that Jose Maria Beltran was her nephew, and was the only one who had proved heirship. Separate appeals are taken by Maria Refugio Chavez and Maria Martiniana Ochoa, by Josephine L. Flores, and by the heirs of Joseph S. Marshall, deceased, formerly the husband of Juana B. Marshall, the testatrix. The appeal of Maria Chavez and Maria Ochoa contents itself with attacking the sufficiency of the evidence establishing the kinship of the respondent, without attempting to disclose evidence establishing the kinship of the appellants. Under such circumstances they neither stand as parties in interest nor as parties aggrieved by the decree, and for these reasons their appeal is not entitled to further consideration.

The appeal of Josephine L. Flores is based upon her own statement to the effect that she was a grandniece of the deceased, upon the testimony of Mrs. Stefan Ibera that she had heard the deceased speak of the contestant as her grandniece, and also the testimony of Mrs. Josephine Ybarra to the same effect, though the nature of the relationship was confused in the witness' mind, since in referring to this contestant the witness declares that the contestant's mother had been declared by the deceased to be her first cousin "and aunt and niece both."

The difficulty in securing more satisfactory evidence upon the question of heirship arose from two facts: First, that the deceased, Juana B. Marshall, had been an Indian girl who had come to California from Mexico in her extreme youth; the second, that because of the disturbed conditions existing in Mexico, it was difficult to procure depositions.

[2] On behalf of respondent it was shown by numerous witnesses that he had twice been an inmate of Mrs Marshall's home once during the lifetime of her husband, and once after his death; that upon both occasions she had publicly introduced him as her nephew. The court accepted this evidence, to the rejection of the asserted claims of the appellants, and it was justified in so doing.

[3] The last appeal, as has been said, is by the heirs of the husband of the testatrix. They base their right to inherit upon the language of the will above quoted, taken in connection with sections 1334 and 1386 of the Civil Code. By the first of these sections—

> "a testamentary disposition to * * * 'family' * * * without other words of qualification * * * vests the property in those who would be entitled to succeed to the property of such person, according to the provisions of the title on succession, in this Code."

By section 1386 (subd. 8) where, as here, the property was community property, acquired by the wife from her husband, then one-half of such common property so acquired upon the intestacy of the surviving spouse goes to the heirs of the other deceased spouse. The question then is whether the word "family" as employed in this will is so employed "without other words of qualification." Clearly we think it is not. She leaves her estate to her own family, and even if these words were not sufficient, as we think they be, to qualify the use of the word "family" so as to indicate that the testatrix meant heirs of her own blood, it is further qualified by the fact that she points out that the family she means are in her belief residents of Mexico, as the Marshall heirs were not.

The decree appealed from is therefore affirmed.

LEVEY v. HENDERSON et al. (L. A. 4059.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1917.)

1. Trial 🔑419—Waiver of Error—Motion for Nonsuit.
Where the defendant proceeds with his defense after his motion for a nonsuit is denied, and the evidence thereafter given by the other party supplies the defect or omission in the original evidence for the plaintiff, the ruling on the motion is not available as ground for the reversal of a judgment for the plaintiff.

2. Payment 🔑65(6)—Defense.
The defense of payment is affirmative matter, and requires proof by defendant.

3. Bills and Notes 🔑499—Payment—Presumption from Possession of Note.
Possession by a plaintiff of the note sued on, bearing no indorsement or other evidence of payment, raises a presumption that the note is wholly unpaid.

4. Appeal and Error 🔑1011(1)—Review—Conflicting Evidence—Finding.
A finding upon conflicting evidence cannot be interfered with on appeal.

5. Bills and Notes 🔑135—Collateral Security—Equities Between Principals.
Where all the makers of a note executed it as principals, that one of them gave his note to the holder of the first note, long after the first note had matured, as collateral security for its payment, created no equity in the other makers of the first note, which entitled them to object to the return of the collateral note by the holder of the first note.

6. Appeal and Error 🔑1170(7)—Reversal—Trivial Error—Exclusion of Evidence.
Exclusion of evidence, competent merely to furnish a reason why appellants called a certain individual as their witness, was of too slight importance to justify reversal, even if erroneous.

7. Bills and Notes 🔑437—Release of Principals.
Where makers of a note all signed as principals, and none were in fact sureties for any of the others, none of them were released by the withdrawal of stock originally pledged to secure the note.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by H. C. Levey against George W. Henderson and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Williams, Goudge & Chandler and Goudge, Robinson & Hughes, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. H. C. Millsap, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendants Henderson and Robinson appeal from the judgment. The action is upon a joint and several promissory note dated January 19, 1909, for $2,000, payable six months after date, executed to the Merchants' National Bank by F. E. Davis, Lester L. Robinson, M. O. Whelan, Geo. W. Henderson, and Geo. C. Peckham. M. O. Whelan died before the action was begun. F. E. Davis and Geo. C. Peckham made no defense and their default was entered. The present appeal involves only the defense made by Robinson and Henderson. The complaint alleges that about January 20, 1910, the Merchants' National Bank sold, assigned, and transferred the note to Frank G. Hogan, and indorsed thereon the words: "Without recourse on us. Merchants' National Bank, Los Angeles, Cal., by W. H. Holliday, President"—and that thereafter Frank G. Hogan assigned the note to the plaintiff. Robinson and Henderson, in separate answers, each denied the assignments and alleged that, prior to January 20, 1910, the said promissory note was fully paid by the defendant F. E. Davis to the said Merchants' National Bank.

[1] The appellants claim that the court erred in denying their motion for a nonsuit on the ground that the indorsement and transfer by the bank were not proven. Where the defendant proceeds with his defense after his motion for a nonsuit is denied, and the evidence thereafter given by the other party supplies the defect or omission in the original evidence for the plaintiff, the ruling on the motion is not available as ground for the reversal of a judgment for the plaintiff. Ringgold v. Haven, 1 Cal. 117; Smith v. Compton, 6 Cal. 24; Schlessinger v.

Mallard, 70 Cal. 334, 11 Pac. 728; Russell v. Pac. Can. Co., 116 Cal. 530, 48 Pac. 616; Scrivani v. Dondero, 128 Cal. 31, 60 Pac. 463; Lyon v. United Moderns, 148 Cal. 472, 83 Pac. 804, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 247, 113 Am. St. Rep. 291, 7 Ann. Cas. 672. This proposition disposes of the point. In the course of the trial thereafter there was ample evidence of the indorsement and transfer by the bank to Hogan. The finding on the subject of payment of the note is that no sum whatever has ever been paid thereon, and, specifically, that F. E. Davis did not at any time pay either the principal or the interest of the note. The appellants contend that this finding is contrary to the evidence.

[2-4] The defense of payment is affirmative matter and requires proof by the defendant to support and establish it, and possession by the plaintiff of the note itself, bearing no indorsement or other evidence of payment, raises a presumption that the note is wholly unpaid. Light v. Stevens, 159 Cal. 292, 113 Pac. 659. The claim of the plaintiff is that Davis paid the note. Davis testified that he had never paid the note or any part of it. Conceding that there was other evidence to the contrary, the result would merely be a finding against the defendants upon conflicting evidence. With such a finding we cannot interfere. So far as the defense of payment is concerned the contention of the defendants upon this appeal is therefore without support.

[5] The theory of the defendants appears to be that in some manner Davis himself became the owner of the note, and that proof of this fact controverts the finding of the court that the note had been signed and transferred to the plaintiff and had not been paid. There is evidence to the effect that in January, 1910, Davis executed a note to Hogan. As we understand the position of appellants, it is that this note was given to Hogan either as payment to Hogan of the note here sued on, which about that time was indorsed by the bank, or for a loan by Hogan to Davis for the purpose of enabling Davis to buy the note from the bank, and that the transfer by the bank, apparently to Hogan, was really for the benefit of Davis, the real purchaser. There was evidence, however, that the note executed by Davis to Hogan was given to Hogan merely as collateral security for the payment of the note in suit, that he had never been the owner of the note sued on, and that afterwards, in a settlement of other transactions and dealings between them, this collateral note was returned by Hogan to Davis. Davis testified to that effect. The claim of the appellants that we must disregard the testimony of Mr. Davis because of its inherent improbability deserves little consideration. The inherent improbability does not appear in the record, and the court below evidently gave it full credit. It was corroborated on the main points by the testimony of Jutten and by documentary evidence. The makers of the note executed it as principals, and consequently the giving of the collateral note by Davis directly to Hogan created no equity in the other makers which entitles them to object to the subsequent return thereof by Hogan to Davis. The collateral note was given long after the note sued on had matured; the other makers were not parties to the transaction, and they cannot complain of its rescission and the return of the Davis note. Giving the greatest effect possible to the evidence on which the appellants base their claims, it creates nothing more than a conflict of evidence, in which case this court cannot disturb the finding of the court below.

[6] The defendants proved that several months after the note was indorsed by the bank to Hogan, and before any transfer to plaintiff, Levey, Davis had delivered it to one Wilson and that Wilson had brought a suit upon it in his own name, which was afterwards dismissed. Claiming to be surprised by the testimony of Davis that he never had been the owner of the note and had not paid it, the defendants offered to prove that Davis, at the time he handed the note to Wilson, said to Wilson that the wife of Davis had the note and that Wilson could apply the proceeds of the collection on a debt owing by Davis to Wilson. The court refused to allow the evidence on the ground that Davis was the witness of the defendant, was himself a defendant, and that there was no evidence that he had any authority from Hogan to make such statements. The evidence thus sought to be elicited would not have been competent evidence against the plaintiff or Hogan, to prove that Davis or his wife, and not Hogan, then owned the note. It would serve merely to furnish a reason why the appellants had called Davis to testify as their witness. As evidence for that purpose its exclusion was of two slight importance to justify a reversal of the judgment, even if it were erroneous, which we do not decide.

[7] There is no force in the contention that the appellants were released by the withdrawal of a part of the stock which was originally pledged to secure payment of the note. The makers of the note all signed as principals, and it is not claimed that the appellants were in fact sureties for the others, or any of them. Nor is there any evidence to show that the stock was pledged by any one as principal debtor, or by whom it was pledged. The release of the stock would therefore not operate to release any of the makers of the note. Moreover, that defense was not pleaded. No other points are presented that are worthy of discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

MURRAY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(Sac. 2649.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 18, 1917.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑2—ORDERS APPEALABLE—MOTIONS FOR NEW TRIAL.

Where a motion for a new trial was pending when St. 1915, p. 209, abrogating appeals from orders denying new trials, went into effect, an order denying such motion will be reviewed.

2. NEGLIGENCE 🔑136(9)—TRIAL—QUESTIONS OF LAW AND FACT.

Even when there is no conflict in the evidence, negligence is a question of fact for the jury, if different conclusions upon the matter can rationally be drawn from the evidence; but, if only one conclusion can be drawn, it is a question of law for the court.

3. RAILROADS 🔑330(3) — ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The driver of an automobile damaged in a collision at a railroad crossing was negligent barring recovery in not getting out and looking up the track, although no whistle was blown nor bell rung, where he was driving on the left-hand side of the roadway, on which side a building obstructed his view of the track, and he was well acquainted with the dangerous conditions, and knew that several accidents had occurred there.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by J. A. Murray against the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appealed. Reversed by the District Court of Appeal. Opinion and judgment of the District Court of Appeal is adopted.

Hudson Grant, of Woodland, and Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for appellant. A. G. Bailey and A. C. Murray, both of Woodland, and Geo. Clark, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Before the Court of Appeal, which had original jurisdiction of this case, the following decision was rendered by Hart, J.:

This is an action for damages for injuries alleged to have resulted to an automobile owned by the plaintiff from the negligence of the defendant. The accident resulting in the alleged damage to the automobile occurred at Woodland, Yolo county, between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock in the morning of August 26, 1914. The complaint states that the automobile was a Westcott four-passenger machine of the value of $925, and alleges that on the day mentioned, "while said machine was in charge of and under the direction of the plaintiff's agent, and while said automobile was proceeding eastward, with due care, along Court street, in the city of Woodland, * * * across the [railroad] tracks of the said defendant, and which said tracks cross the east end of said Court street at right angles, the said defendant, without any care, and without ringing a bell or blowing a whistle, and without any warning whatever, and by reason of its negligence and the negligent operation of one of its locomotives, caused one of defendant's locomotives to come in collision with said automobile, thereby smashing, wrecking, and destroying said automobile, and thereby causing said automobile to be damaged, wrecked, and destroyed."

Judgment for the sum of $925, the alleged value of said machine, was prayed for.

The answer specifically denies the allegations of the complaint, and, furthermore, charges that the injuries resulting to the plaintiff's automobile were proximately caused wholly by the negligence of plaintiff's agent, in charge of and driving said machine at the time of the alleged collision, and further charges that the plaintiff's said agent, when at a point of safety, did not stop or look and listen for the approach of a train, nor exercise ordinary care in approaching said crossing; "that, had said agent stopped or looked or listened, he would have discovered and known of the approach of said locomotive which it is alleged caused the injury to plaintiff's automobile," etc.

The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict awarding the plaintiff damages in the sum of $300 returned. Judgment was entered accordingly. The defendant appeals from said judgment and the order denying it a new trial.

[1] The motion for a new trial was pending prior to August 8, 1915, the time at which the law abrogating appeals from orders denying new trials (Stat. 1915, p. 209) went into effect, and therefore the said order in this case may be reviewed upon the record upon which the motion for a new trial was made. Schmitt v. White, 172 Cal. 554, 158 Pac. 216.

The appellant complains here of the action of the trial court in admitting, over its objection, certain testimony and in reading to the jury certain instructions. It is also claimed that the evidence does not support the verdict, in that thereby it is made clearly to appear that the accident causing the damage to the plaintiff's automobile was brought about solely through the inexcusable and negligent conduct of the driver of the machine.

The testimony upon which the verdict was obviously principally founded was that given by Earl Murray, son of the plaintiff, and who was the driver of the machine when the accident happened. In fact, as to the immediate circumstances of the collision, his was the only testimony given for the plaintiff. We may therefore state in narrative form the facts as he detailed them to the jury. It will be the more orderly, however, first to describe the physical surroundings of the scene of the misadventure.

Court street is one of the principal streets of the city of Woodland, and runs in an easterly and westerly direction, and is crossed by the tracks of the defendant railroad company. The city proper or the business and principal portion thereof lies on the west side of said tracks. On the northwest corner of Court street and the railroad crossing is situated the building of the Woodland Grain & Milling Company. In said building, and on the east side thereof, there are two doors. One of these is situated at approximately 21 feet from the southeast corner of the building, and the other about 77 feet from said corner and north of the former. The west line of the main tracks of the defendant's railway is located about 44 feet east of the east line of said building. These tracks constitute a part of the main line of the California and Oregon division of the defendant's system, and are also used by the defendant for its traffic between local points in this state north of the city of Woodland and the cities of Sacramento and San Francisco.

A siding or switch track is located and runs along the east side of the mill building and at an average of 6½ feet from and along the east line thereof. This siding was apparently so located and is being so maintained for the special convenience of the business of the milling company as well as that of the defendant in the matter of the transportation of the former's freight.

Earl Murray, the driver of the automobile, was living, and for some six or seven years prior to the time of the accident had lived, at 947 Court street, which is about two blocks from the railroad crossing above referred to. He was familiar with the crossing and its surroundings. He knew (so he said) that it was a dangerous crossing, and that a number of accidents, some fatal to human life, had occurred to persons attempting to pass over it.

On the day the accident happened, which, as above stated, was the 26th day of August, 1914, and between the hours of 8 and 9 a. m., he started with the plaintiff's Westcott machine from his home to go to his ranch, which is situated about 5½ miles southeast of Woodland, traveling in an easterly direction and toward the railroad crossing. According to his story, upon approaching the crossing, he slackened the speed of the machine so that he was then traveling at the rate of between 2 and 3 miles per hour. When he reached a point in the street opposite the mill, he observed a freight engine on one of the main tracks going in a southerly direction. After this engine had passed him, he looked south to see whether it was going to return. Satisfying himself that it would not return he then looked in a northerly direction to see if there was another engine or a train coming from that direction. At this point of time—that is, when he turned his eyes to the north—the front end of his machine was about 6 feet from the west rail of the siding, and from where he sat in the machine the distance to the said west rail was from 15 to 18 feet; it being 6 feet from the front part of the seat to the front end of the machine. From this point he could not, on account of the mill, see further north than a distance of some 15 or 18 feet. He saw no cars or engine north of him. He heard from the north no warning of any kind, such as the blowing of a whistle or the ringing of a bell or escaping steam or the noise ordinarily made by a locomotive passing over a track, notwithstanding (so he declared) he "listened carefully." He did, however, hear a "rumbling noise" from and the ringing of the bell on the engine which had just passed him going southward. He proceeded on, and had just reached and was crossing the west rail of the side track when a locomotive, which, according to the testimony of the trainmen, had a few moments previously backed a freight car up to the north door of the mill, appeared at the south corner of the building, going south. Murray, then observing the engine for the first time, stopped his machine as quickly as he could and threw on the reverse. He had barely started to reverse when the engine struck about 2 feet of the front end of the automobile. The locomotive struck the machine with such force that the impact threw the rear end of the machine underneath the drivewheels of the engine. The machine was, of course, greatly damaged.

On cross-examination Earl Murray testified that from where he was sitting in the machine at the time he "slowed down" on approaching the crossing, which was a distance of approximately "15 or 16 feet from the tracks," he could not, when looking north past the south corner of the mill building, have seen the tender of the engine on the siding at a greater distance than from 20 to 25 feet beyond said corner. "I looked from that point and didn't see anything," he said. "It is not a fact that if I had stopped when the seat of my auto was just opposite the southeast corner of the mill building that my machine would have still cleared. It isn't a fact that I could have stopped 15 feet from the rail and still have seen more than 20 feet past the corner. I went down and tried it. The mill building obstructed my view. I knew the mill building was there when I looked. I knew it was there when I started towards the crossing. I didn't stop my machine." Further testifying on cross, he said: "I was watching a car going the other way because it had just crossed the crossing, and I wanted to see if it was coming back. * * * I was concerned with that engine. I looked to see if it was not going to run into me; it attracted my attention; I looked back that way the second time after I looked up—at the train that was a block and a half away—to see whether it was coming my way, and at the time I last saw it it was going the other way."

The witness Morse, an employé of the milling company, was in the building at the time of the collision. He saw the wrecked automobile from a window on the Court street side of the building immediately after the collision. He was then a distance of from 25 to 35 feet from the side track of the defendant. He testified that he did not hear a bell ringing at or immediately previous to that time. He said that he did not know "that there was an engine on that track."

The foregoing comprehends a statement, substantially, of the facts brought out by the plaintiff.

On the close of the plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a nonsuit, but the motion was denied.

We think the motion should have been granted, as, to our minds, it is clearly manifest that the plaintiff's agent, the driver of the automobile, did not, in attempting to make the crossing, exercise ordinary care.

It is proper at this point to state that no evidence was introduced by the defendant in any manner supplying proof of negligence by its agents or of the want of negligence on the part of the driver of the automobile. The plaintiff's case therefore rests wholly upon the testimony of the witness Earl Murray.

[2] The general rule applicable to negligence cases may be stated to be: That, even when there is no conflict in the evidence, negligence is a question of fact for the jury, if different conclusions upon the matter can rationally be drawn from the evidence (Fernandes v. Sacramento, etc., R. R. Co., 52 Cal. 45; McKeever v. Market St. R. R. Co., 59 Cal. 294; Chidester v. Consolidated D. Co., 59 Cal. 197; House v. Meyer, 100 Cal. 592, 35 Pac. 308); but, if but one conclusion can reasonably be reached from the evidence, it is a question of law for the court.

In this case the driver was, according to his own testimony, thoroughly familiar with the crossing and its surroundings. He knew that it was a dangerous place to pass over with an automobile or other vehicle. He knew of the existence of the switch track running alongside the mill building. Knowing these facts, he, upon approaching the crossing, slackened the speed of the automobile to the rate of between 2 and 3 miles an hour, and in this connection it may be observed that at that rate of speed he could easily have stopped his machine within a distance of 3 feet. But his fundamental fault lay in his not exercising proper or ordinary care in ascertaining whether there was an engine or train prepared for action on the side track north of and beyond the southeast corner of the building. He said that from the point at which he slackened the speed of the machine, some 15 or 18 feet of the crossing or the west rail of the side track, he could see no farther than 15 or 18 feet beyond the corner of the building north; that he then looked north, and that he saw no engine; that he proceeded on, and when about crossing the west rail of the siding he first saw the engine coming toward him, and then so near his machine that he was unable to reverse it so as to clear the rail before the engine reached him.

Either one of three different theories only upon which the accident may be accounted for may consistently be deduced from his testimony, viz.: (1) That he did not look north at all, his attention being wholly occupied by the locomotive which had just passed him going south, a theory which is to some extent supported by his statement during his testimony that he was concerned with the engine going south, and that twice he looked in that direction to see if that locomotive was returning or preparing to return toward the crossing; (2) that, if he did look north at the point where first he "slowed down" the machine, he was then so situated with reference to the mill building that his view was thereby so obstructed that he could not have seen the engine on the siding near the point where the north door of the building is situated, from which point it returned south; (3) that the first time he looked to the north, if at all, was when the locomotive was within a few feet of his machine at a point south of the corner of the building.

It is immaterial which of the three theories above suggested is the correct one, for in either the result is the same, the driver being himself entirely to blame for the mishap. But, in reaching our conclusion, we have assumed that he was correct in saying that he did look north from the point from which he said he could not see the siding a greater distance than 15 or 18 feet beyond the corner of the building. It was his duty, knowing what he did of the inherent dangers of the situation into which he was about to place himself, to first stop, look, and listen and so ascertain with certainty that there was no engine or train approaching or likely to approach while he was in the act of making the crossing. If the mill building obstructed a full view of the siding to the north end thereof from the point at which he said he looked north and beyond which he said he could not have moved his machine without being struck by the part of the engine projecting over and beyond the west rail, then he should have stopped his machine, alighted, and himself gone to a point from which he could have had an unobstructed view of the entire length of the siding north of the corner of the mill. This he failed to do, according to his own testimony, but proceeded on upon the assumption that, having seen no engine as far as he was able to see the siding beyond the corner of the mill building, there was none on the track. Under all the circumstances and conditions existing, and with which he was perfectly familiar, he had no right to so assume.

In Herbert v. S. P. Co., 121 Cal. 227, 230, 53 Pac. 651, it is said: "The railroad track of a steam railway must itself be regarded as a sign of danger, and one intending to cross must avail himself of every opportunity to look and to listen for approaching trains. What he must do in such a case will depend upon circumstances. If the view of the track is obstructed, he should take greater pains to listen. If, taking these precautions, he would have seen or heard the approaching train, the very fact of injury will raise a presumption that he did not take the required precautions."

In Green v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 138 Cal. 1, 70 Pac. 926, the court makes the following declaration, which is peculiarly applicable to the conduct of the plaintiff's agent here in proceeding to pass over the crossing without looking further north along the side track than the distance of 15 or 18 feet beyond which his view was obstructed by the mill: "The fact that they looked to the east as they passed the gate, or opening, further up the street, as above noted, which was of little benefit to them, is no excuse for not looking or listening at points near the track, where such looking would have been effective."

So here the fact that the agent of the plaintiff did not, because he could not on account of the building obstructing his view, look further up the side track beyond a distance of 15 or 18 feet from the corner of the building, is no excuse for his not having placed himself in a position from which he could have seen up to the extreme north end of said track, "where such looking [in this case] would have been effective."

In Griffin v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. R. Co., 170 Cal. 772, 151 Pac. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842, after stating the facts, the court said: "From these facts it is clear that Mr. Griffin neglected the simplest and plainest precautions for the safety of himself and the others in the automobile. It is the duty of a traveler on a highway approaching a railroad crossing to use ordinary care in selecting a time and place to look and listen for coming trains. He should stop for the purpose of making such observations when necessary. It is his duty to use all his faculties, and it is not enough if he merely listens, believing that the people in charge of any approaching engine will ring a bell or sound a whistle. * * * He [Mr. Griffin] had his car under perfect control. * * * He was running at a very low rate of speed, and it would have been easy for him to stop a short distance beyond the fence corner at a place of complete safety and one well suited to observation. Failing to do this amounts to contributory negligence on his part."

As above suggested, if in this case the plaintiff's agent could have gone no further toward the tracks than the point from which his view up the siding was limited to a distance of 15 or 18 feet without danger of getting so close to the track as to have been struck by the part of the engine extending beyond the rails, he should have stopped his machine, alighted, and taken a complete view of the situation. He had no right to assume in the face of the conditions existing in and about the crossing, and of which he had knowledge that if there was an engine out of his sight on the siding, the trainmen in charge of the engine would "ring a bell or sound a whistle."

It is, of course, true as was said by Mr. Justice Burnett in the very recent case of Thompson v. Southern Pacific Co., 31 Cal. App. 572, 161 Pac. 24, that the rule requiring the traveler to stop is not an absolute one. "If," continues the opinion in that case, "the view is entirely unobstructed, the traveler, while going toward a crossing, may see whether a train is approaching in dangerous proximity. Of course, in a case like that it would be idle to require the traveler to stop to find out something that he can ascertain just as well without stopping. He must, however, avail himself of the vision, and if he is exercising ordinary care, he need not stop except to allow an approaching train to pass so as to avoid a collision. But where the view is obstructed, he must place himself in a position where he can use his faculties of observation to advantage. In such case he stops, not primarily to avoid a collision, but to ascertain whether a collision is threatened. Whereas, if the view is unobstructed, if he stops, it is to allow the approaching train to pass."

[3] In this case, as has been shown, the driver of the machine, though confronted by an obstruction to such a view as would enable him to see and ascertain whether there was an approaching engine, did not stop, and thus by his own act of negligence failed to avail himself of a position where he could have used his "faculties of observation to advantage." And thus he failed to exercise ordinary care in attempting to cross the defendant's railroad tracks, and in so doing met with the accident and resultant injuries of which the plaintiff complains. Of course, under these circumstances the plaintiff has no legal ground for claiming compensatory damages, and cannot recover.

There are, as seen, some other points presented by the appellant; but, in view of the conclusion at which we have arrived, viz. that the plaintiff's own testimony shows that the injuries to his machine were entirely due to the culpable negligence of his agent, the driver of the automobile, said points need not be considered.

A hearing was granted by this court, principally because of the very urgent insistence of the respondent that the decision of the Court of Appeal was revolutionary and declared as an inflexible rule of law that the driver of a motor vehicle approaching a steam railroad crossing was negligent if, his vision being obstructed, he did not stop his vehicle, leave it, and go forward for purposes of observation. Such, of course, is not the adopted rule of law in this state, but a fair reading of the opinion of the court of appeal will disclose that it does not lay down this proposition as being the law. Its discussion is addressed to a motion for a nonsuit under the particular facts of the case before it, and it is held that the motion should have been granted because of the manifest contributory negligence of the driver of the motor vehicle in doing what he did. It is unnecessary in detail to recapitulate the facts as above set forth. But in brief the driver was approaching a crossing which he knew and declared to be an especially dangerous one. He was approaching the crossing upon the left-hand side of the roadway, on which side a building obstructed his view of the railroad track on his left hand. He would have had a larger and freer view had he been driving on the right side of the road. When he passed beyond the projection of the building so that he could see down the track, the space, by his own testimony, was so narrow that he had already put himself in a position of danger. Yet he did so drive, on the left side, without even stopping, and he did so place himself that the injury to the automobile was inevitable. It is in dealing with these facts that the language of the Court of Appeal is to be read, and, so read, that language is sound in law.

The opinion and judgment of the Court of Appeal is adopted, and for the reasons therein given the judgment is reversed.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment, and also in the opinion, except that portion thereof which appears to hold that, upon the facts of this case, the language of the District Court of Appeal to the effect that, if the view of the plaintiff was so obstructed by the mill building, he could not otherwise see the approaching engine in time, it was his duty, as matter of law, to alight from his machine and go on foot to a point where he would have an unobstructed view, is sound in law. To my mind the best that can be said upon this matter for defendant is that the question whether as a reasonably careful man he should have so done was one for the jury. However, this language is not essential to the conclusion that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, as is sufficiently shown by what is said in the opinion.

KLANN v. HOFFMAN et al. (L. A. 4073.)

1. New Trial 🔑118—Motion—Notice.

Where defendant obtained an order "granting him ten days in addition to the ten days required by law in which he may file his motion of intention to move for new trial," defendant's motion for new trial cannot be disregarded because the extension order used the word "motion" instead of "notice" of intention to move for a new trial; the error being an obvious misprision.

2. New Trial 🔑118 — Time for Filing — Notice.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, requiring a party intending to move for new trial to file with the clerk and serve on the adverse party notice of intention to move for new trial within ten days after receiving the notice of entry of judgment, prior to the amendment by St. 1915, p. 201, which forbade the extension of time by order or stipulation, an order allowing defendant ten days additional to the ten days provided by law in which to file his notice of intention to move for new trial extended, not only the time for filing the notice, but the time for serving the same.

3. Mechanics' Liens 🔑132(8)—Time of Filing—Extension of Time.

Where a subcontractor employed to construct chimneys and a brick porch for a house completed the laying of the brickwork in December, he could not, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, declaring that every lien claimant save the original contractor must file his lien within 30 days after he has ceased the labor or furnished materials, or within 30 days after the completion of the original contract, file his lien in the following August, on the theory that it was within 30 days after completing the work, even though the subcontractor in that month replaced a small ash-pit door in one of the chimneys, and it was his custom in such cases to leave some small insignificant portion of the work undone so that he could return every 30 days.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by John F. Klann against W. E. Hoffman, J. C. Le Claire, and C. C. Pitzer, copartners, doing business as the United States Investment Company, and others, and C. W. Bateman. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying his motion for new trial, the last-named defendant appeals. Reversed.

P. S. McNutt, of Los Angeles, for appellant. J. B. McLaughlin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Action to foreclose mechanic's lien. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant owner appeals.

[1, 2] The respondent makes a preliminary objection to the consideration of the statement on motion for new trial, or of the ruling denying such motion, upon the ground that notice of intention to move for a new trial was not filed and served within the time allowed. It appears that written notice of the entry of judgment was served upon the appellant on January 16, 1914. This started the running of the period of ten days within which he was required, if he desired to move for a new trial, to file with the clerk and serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention so to do. Code Civ. Proc. § 659. At the time of the proceedings here in question, the section just cited had not yet been amended so as to prohibit an extension of this time by order or stipulation. See Stats. 1915, p. 201. On January 21, 1914, the appellant obtained from the court an order granting him "ten days in addition to the ten days required by law in which he may file his motion of intention to move for a new trial in said cause." Within the time, as thus extended, he duly served and filed his notice of intention. It is objected that the order of extension was ineffectual for two reasons. The first objection, based upon the appearance in the order of the word "motion," instead of "notice," is not worthy of serious consideration. The use of this inappropriate term was manifestly the result of a mere clerical error, which could not mislead any one. The further point is that the order of court merely extended the time for filing, but not the time for serving, the notice; both steps being essential to the initiation of a proceeding for new trial. We are not disposed to give to the order so narrow and literal an interpretation. The appellant, in applying to the court, was doubtless seeking additional time within which to take the steps required to enable him to move for a new trial. It is hardly to be supposed that the court intended to give him ten days to file his notice, without at the same time extending his time to serve it. The rulings of the court heretofore have been in the direction of a liberal construction of orders of this kind. In Cottle v. Leitch, 43 Cal. 320, there was an order allowing the defendant 30 days "for preparing and filing motion for a new trial." This the court regarded as sufficient to extend the time for taking all of the steps required to give a valid notice of intention, i. e., both the filing and the service of such notice. In Burton v. Todd, 68 Cal. 485, 9 Pac. 663, it was held that section 1054 of the Code of Civil Procedure, when it permits the extension of time for the service of a notice, also authorizes the court to extend the time for filing such notice. In Bryant v. Sternfeld, 89 Cal. 611, 26 Pac. 1091, the plaintiffs had been granted an extension of time "to prepare their statement on motion for a new trial," and it was held that this carried with it the same extension of time to serve the statement. These decisions are in harmony with the general spirit of our practice, which favors the determination of causes on their merits, rather than upon technical niceties of procedure. We hold, accordingly, that the order extending time authorized not only the filing but the service of the notice within the additional time granted.

[3] The complaint alleges that J. C. Le Claire and C. C. Pitzer, copartners under the name of United States Investment Company, as contractors, made a contract with W. E. Hoffman, as owner, for the construction of a frame dwelling upon a lot in the city of Los Angeles. The plaintiff made a subcontract with Le Claire and Pitzer for the furnishing of all labor and materials necessary to construct two chimneys and one brick porch in said building, for $128, and the lien sought to be foreclosed is for this amount. Plaintiff alleges that he fully completed his said contract on the 29th day of August, 1912, and that he filed his claim of lien on the 30th day of August, 1912, within 30 days after said work was completed and said materials furnished by him. Appellant, Bateman, answered, alleging that he has succeeded to the interest of the true owner; and denying, among other things, that the plaintiff filed his lien within 30 days after the work and labor was completed, or the materials furnished, by said plaintiff. The answer contained other allegations and denials which need not here be stated. The findings were in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment was entered foreclosing the lien for the amount claimed.

The statement on motion for new trial specifies various particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. In particular, the finding that plaintiff filed his lien within 30 days after completing his work and labor is attacked. Under section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure every lien claimant, save the original contractor, must file his claim of lien within 30 days after he has ceased to labor or to furnish materials, or both, or, at his option, within 30 days after the completion of the original contract. By his complaint the plaintiff did not undertake to show a compliance with the latter alternative. His allegation was that he had filed his claim of lien within 30 days after ceasing to labor or furnish materials, and the judgment in his favor is based upon a finding of such filing. We think it clear that the finding is not sustained.

The plaintiff testified that the last work he did on his contract was to put a door in a chimney on August 29, 1912, the day before he filed his claim of lien. His further examination, however, left no room for doubt that, in reality, he had completed the entire work called for by his contract in December, 1911. The work that he was required to do was to construct two chimneys and a porch, and this consisted, in the main, of furnishing and setting brick. The brickwork was all completed in December, 1911. The door of which we have spoken was a small iron ash-pit door, eight by ten inches in size, at the base of one of the chimneys. It cost 75 cents, and was supplied to replace one which had been furnished before, but had been stolen. The plaintiff testified that it was his practice, when he was uncertain about payment on a job, to leave something undone, so that he could "come back every 30 days," and thus, as he thought, prevent such a completion of his work as would start the running of the time for filing a claim of lien. For several months, at least, prior to August, 1912, he had presented to the contractors bills calling for payment of the full sum agreed to be paid him.

The evidence which we have outlined shows clearly that the plaintiff had, in substance and in fact, completed his contract seven or eight months before he filed his claim of lien, and that he had himself treated the contract as completed. Passing the point that a door had once been furnished, the omission to supply this trivial item was, on plaintiff's own admission, a mere subterfuge to support the pretense that the work had not been completed. A lien claimant cannot by such means, clearly not employed in good faith, prolong indefinitely the statutory time for filing his claim.

It is unnecessary, in view of these conclusions, to consider any other point.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

HARMON v. DE TURK et al. (L. A. 4047.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1917.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑70(2)—Appealable Orders—Overruling Demurrer.
An appeal from an order on a demurrer is not authorized.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑870(5) — Appeal from Judgment—Matters Reviewable.
Rulings on demurrer are reviewable on appeal from final judgment.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑907(2), 934(2)—Review—Presumption—Judgment—Findings—Evidence.
Findings being waived, a judgment for plaintiff imports that the court found for him on all material issues, and where no evidence is brought up by the record, it will be assumed that the findings are fully supported.

4. Appeal and Error 🔑1078(3) — Waiver of Error.
Where the order sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to defendants' cross-complaint is not argued on appeal, it will not be reviewed.

5. Injunction 🔑46—Trespass on Land.
As a general rule injunction will not lie to restrain mere trespassing on land; an action at law ordinarily affording an adequate remedy.

6. Injunction 🔑49—Trespass—Adequate Remedy of Law.
It is not the usual practice of courts of equity to permit an injunction suit to be substituted for an action of ejectment, though an injunction may be granted to restore land where the threatened injuries will be irreparable and the legal remedy inadequate.

7. Injunction 🔑49 — Interference with Lessee's Possession — Adequate Remedy of Law.
Plaintiff, who had the exclusive right under a lease to remove rocks, sand, and gravel from the premises subject to the provision that he should have erected upon the premises a suitable plant within 90 days, was entitled to injunctive relief where he was excluded from the land by obstructions wrongfully erected, and was ordered not to enter for the purpose of carrying out the terms of the lease, as an action at law would not give possession in time to enable plaintiff to carry out his obligations under the lease.

8. Injunction 🔑49—Grounds for Relief—Prescriptive Rights.
That the acts of defendant, if allowed to continue, might ripen into a prescriptive right in itself, called for interposition of equity.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by N. O. Harmon against Martha H. De Turk and husband. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed

M. Randall, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Davis & Rush, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The purpose of this action was to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with the plaintiff in the free use and occupancy of a tract of land in the county of Los Angeles. The complaint alleged that on May 2, 1914, the defendant J. G. De Turk was the owner of said land; that on that day he executed and delivered to the plaintiff a written lease of said land for the term of one year, with the privilege of renewals. By said writing the lessee was given the exclusive right of excavating, grading, and removing sand, rock, and gravel from said land, subject to the proviso that within 90 days he should have erected upon the premises a suitable plant and equipment for the work, and that after said 90 days he should remove at least 1,000 cubic yards per month of said sand, rock, and gravel, paying the lessor at the rate of 10 cents for each cubic yard so removed. It is alleged that in order to carry out said agreement the plaintiff contracted for the purchase of machinery, lumber, and other materials to the value of several thousand dollars, in order to erect the required plant, and that he has made contracts with various persons for the delivery to them of sand, rock, and gravel to be taken from the premises. On or about June 9, 1914, the plaintiff attempted to enter the premises for the purpose of erecting and constructing the plant and carrying out the terms of his lease, but found the premises inclosed by a fence, and the entrance gate locked. He entered the premises, and was making measurements for the purpose of complying with his contract, when the defendant Martha H., wife of the lessor, ordered plaintiff off the premises, and stated that she had put the lock on said gate, that she would not permit plaintiff to enter for the purpose of carrying out the terms of said lease, or for any other purpose, and that she would prevent him from erecting any building on said premises, or from removing therefrom any sand, gravel, or rock. The complaint contains the usual allegations that said defendant wife will, unless restrained, carry out her threats and prevent plaintiff from entering the property, and from performing the terms of the lease on his part, and will prevent him from carrying out his obligations to persons with whom he has contracted to deliver sand, rock, and gravel, and with whom he has made contracts for the erection of a plant on said premises, "all to the great and irreparable damage of the plaintiff herein." It is also alleged that defendant Martha H. De Turk is insolvent and unable to respond in damages for any judgment that might be obtained against her. The demurrer of the defendant Martha H. De Turk having been overruled, she answered and filed a cross-complaint, in which she attacked the validity of the lease, asserting that she owned an interest in the land. J. G. De Turk filed a separate answer, in which he, in effect, joined in the request that plaintiff be granted an injunction against the defendant Martha H.

Plaintiff's demurrer to the cross-complaint having been sustained with leave to amend, and no amendment having been made, the cause came on for trial. Findings were waived, and the court entered judgment granting the plaintiff the relief for which he had prayed. The notice of appeal states that the defendant Martha H., "and for her husband, J. G. De Turk," appeals from the judgment and the order of the court overruling the demurrer of the defendants and the order of the court sustaining the demurrer of the plaintiff to the defendants' cross-complaint.

[1, 2] The only appeal that can be considered is that from the judgment, since our law does not authorize an appeal from an order overruling or sustaining a demurrer. The rulings on demurrer are, however, reviewable on the appeal from the judgment itself.

[3] The court in its judgment recites that it finds all of the allegations of the complaint to be true, and all of the allegations in the answer of the defendant Martha H. De Turk, claiming an interest in the property, to be untrue. Even without this, the judgment itself would, in view of the fact that findings were waived, import that the court had found in favor of the plaintiff on all material issues. No evidence being brought up in the record, we must assume that such findings are fully supported.

[4] The only question to be decided is whether the complaint states facts entitling the plaintiff to the relief sought. We are not called upon to consider the propriety of the ruling sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to the cross-complaint, since the appellants have not seen fit to argue this question.

The contention of the appellant wife is that on the facts alleged there is no such showing of irreparable injury to the plaintiff, or of inadequacy of a remedy at law, as to justify the interposition of a court of equity by means of an injunction.

[5, 6] It is, no doubt, the general rule that injunction will not lie to restrain mere trespasses on land, and this for the simple reason that an action at law will ordinarily afford an ample and adequate remedy for the wrong. Mechanics' Foundry v. Ryall, 75 Cal. 601, 17 Pac. 703; Cal. Nav. Co. v. Union Trans. Co., 122 Cal. 641, 55 Pac. 591; Randall v. Freed, 154 Cal. 299, 97 Pac. 669. And, on like grounds, it is not the usual practice of courts of equity to issue injunctions for the purpose of restoring land to a claimant out of possession—in other words, to permit an injunction suit to be substituted for an action of ejectment. 22 Cyc. 826. The injunction may, however, be granted, even in such cases, where the threatened injury would be irreparable, and the legal remedy inadequate. 22 Cyc. 827.

[7] These requisites are shown to exist in the case at bar. We have more here than a threat of repeated trespasses, or a bare withholding of possession. The plaintiff is entitled to enter under an agreement which authorizes him to remove the very substance of the land itself, and makes his right dependent upon the construction of improvements within a limited time and a continuing activity thereafter. He is excluded from the land by physical obstructions wrongfully erected and threatened to be maintained by the appellant Martha, who is, in fact, the only defendant complaining of the decree. An action at law would not give him an undisturbed possession in time to enable him to carry out his obligations under his lease. These facts, entirely apart from the allegations of insolvency, make out a case of irreparable damage sufficient to warrant relief by way of injunction.

[8] Furthermore, the acts of the defendant, if allowed to continue, might ripen into a prescriptive right, and this consideration, in itself, calls for the interposition of a court of equity. Moore v. Clear Lake Waterworks, 68 Cal. 146, 8 Pac. 816; Mendelson v. McCabe, 144 Cal. 230, 77 Pac. 915, 103 Am. St. Rep. 78.

The claim that Martha H. De Turk was improperly joined as a party defendant is obviously without merit.

The appeals from the orders overruling and sustaining demurrers are dismissed.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCHUH v. R. H. HERRON CO. (L. A. 4040.)

1. WITNESSES 🔑379(7) — CROSS-EXAMINATION—INCONSISTENT PLEADINGS.

Where plaintiff machinist, in action against his employer for injuries, in his last amended complaint and in his testimony stated that his hand was caught between the plies on defective belt, and his arm drawn down between the cone of the lathe and the body of the machine, whereas his previous complaints alleged his hand was drawn in between the belt of the lathe and the cone thereof, and did not allege his hand was caught between the plies of the belt, such prior pleadings were admissible in his cross-examination to show prior inconsistent statements.

2. EVIDENCE 🔑208(6) — ADMISSIONS — PRIOR PLEADINGS.

A pleading which has been superseded by an amendment can no longer perform any office as a pleading, and cannot be used on the trial as admissions to contradict an allegation in a subsequent amendment.

3. WITNESSES 🔑379(7) — CROSS-EXAMINATION—INCONSISTENT PLEADINGS.

Where the person who files and verifies a pleading subsequently amended is himself a witness on the trial, he may, on cross-examination, be questioned concerning the portions of his original pleadings which are inconsistent with the pleading upon which the trial is had, to show statements inconsistent with his testimony on the stand.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑274(7)—ACTION—EVIDENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In a machinist's action against his employer for injuries received while attempting to shift a moving belt claimed to be defective, evidence that defendant had posted notices expressly directing employés to examine tools before use, and report and not use them if defective, and not to shift belts while the shafting was in motion, which notices it was inferable plaintiff had seen and knew the contents of, was admissible on the issue of contributory negligence, since, if plaintiff had this knowledge, it would tend to show him negligent, first, in proceeding to use the defective belt without examination or without reporting it, and, second, in attempting to shift it while the shaft was in motion.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑171(3)—THEORY OF CASE BELOW.

An erroneous exclusion of evidence of contributory negligence could not be justified on appeal on the ground that the plea of contributory negligence was so defective as to raise no issue thereon, where no objection to the pleading was made below, and the trial proceeded as if such issue were made.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑228(1) — EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT.

The abolition of the defense of assumption of risk by the Employers' Liability Act (St. 1911, p. 796) did not destroy the defense of contributory negligence.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑247(5) — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

If an employé is ordered to examine a tool for defects and report the same, if any, before using it, and, failing to do so, is injured from a defect which ordinarily careful examination would have disclosed to him, his neglect of his duty to obey the order would be a contributing cause of his injury.

8. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑247(5) — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

If an employé, ordered not to shift a belt while the shafting is in motion, nevertheless does so and is injured thereby, he would be guilty of negligence contributing to his injury.

9. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑203(1) — "ASSUMPTION OF RISK."

The doctrine of assumption of risk means that the law implies, as a part of the contract of service, that the servant agrees to and assumes all the ordinary risks of personal injury incident to the business and not caused by the direct negligence of his employer.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assumption of Risk.]

10. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑217(13) — ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

If a servant goes to work in a place which he knows to be dangerous, he assumes the risk arising from such known dangers.

11. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑217(13) — ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

If a servant accepts for his use a tool furnished by the master knowing it to be defective, and that such defect makes it dangerous, he assumes the risk of injury that may be caused to him therefrom.

12. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑281(8) — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—CUSTOMARY METHOD OF WORK.

That it was not unusual in a certain machine shop for those using lathes to shift the belt by striking it with the bare hand did not establish that this method of shifting the belt was not negligent or dangerous.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by August Schuh against R. H. Herron Company. From judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gray, Barker & Bowen and Wm. Bowen, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. William C. Jenkins, Earle H. Smith and Wm. Coleman, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In an action for personal injuries the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant for damages. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, the latter having been taken before the law abolishing such appeals was enacted.

The defendant was carrying on a machine shop. It had therein a lathe, built on a steel table and fastened to a horizontal shaft turned by a belt from a countershaft above. For the purpose of changing the speed of the lathe the shaft and countershaft are each fitted with what are called "cones." A cone is a succession of pulleys, each slightly larger than the one before, with an approach or inclined plane connecting them so that the belt will easily pass from one to the other. The cone on the countershaft above increases in size from right to left; that on the lathe shaft was to the left of the lathe and increases in size from left to right. On the upper cone the belt is shifted by means of a stick or lever hanging down from a point above the cone and by the side of the belt. By pressing it against the belt the latter may be moved to another part of the upper cone. On the lower cone the belt may be moved sidewise by pressing against it with a stick or tool or with the bare hand. But in doing this when the belt is in motion it is necessary first to shift the belt on the upper cone to a smaller part thereof so as to loosen it.

In the complaint upon which the trial was had plaintiff alleged that he was in the service of the defendant, and was operating a lathe which was turned by means of a belt so arranged that it could be shifted along the shaft to make the lathe run faster or slower, as desired; that the power to operate the belt, and which ran the lathe, was controlled by a lever directly over and above the lathe; that the lathe was defective and unsafe; that the plies or layers of the belt had become unglued or split in certain places so that they would separate; that said lever was difficult to move and operate because it was improperly connected and adjusted, and its connections were rusty and old; that while plaintiff was operating said lathe he attempted to shift said belt, and by reason of its defective condition his left hand was caught between the plies of the belt, and thereby his left arm was drawn down between the cone of the lathe and the body of the machine or table, causing the arm to be cut and bruised and the bone fractured, for which injury the damages were claimed. The particulars concerning the manner in which the injury occurred were inserted in the complaint by an amendment made three days before the trial. This was the third amendment of this part of the complaint.

[1-3] The first error complained of is the ruling of the court below upon cross-examination of the plaintiff while testifying as a witness in his own behalf. His testimony in chief was that in shifting the belt he attempted to do so with his bare hand; that the belt was slack at that instant and the plies open wide enough to admit his fingers; that they were caught between the two plies, which immediately became taut, and drew his arm down between the cone of the lathe and the body or table of the machine. The original complaint alleged on this subject that the shifting arrangement and its connections, and the lever by which it was operated, were loose, rusty, and worn out, and were by reason thereof unsafe to operate, and "that by reason of said worn-out condition of said shifting arrangement, lever, and the belts connected thereto," the plaintiff's "left arm was pulled in under and between the belt and the cone of said lathe," instead of it having been caught in the plies and "drawn down in and between the said cone of said lathe and the body of said machine," as alleged in the final amendment. In another amendment thereto the plaintiff had alleged that the lathe was defective and unsafe and the shifting belt was torn, worn, patched, and split, and said lever difficult to move because it was improperly adjusted and connected, and its connections loose, rusty, and worn out, and that by reason of said defects, and while plaintiff was operating said lathe, his left arm "was caught between the shifting belt and the cone of said lathe," and thereby severely injured, as afterwards alleged. On the cross-examination he was first asked whether at any time prior to the filing of the last amendment to the complaint, filed a few days before, he had filed any pleading intimating that there was any opening in the plies of the belt. This was ruled out as not proper cross-examination. The evidence would perhaps have been incompetent, for the pleadings were the best evidence of their contents. But that was not the ground of the objection. Thereupon the original and amended complaint referred to were introduced in evidence. Later, however, the court ordered that said pleadings be stricken out, and instructed the jury that they should not be considered. It will be observed from the foregoing statement as to the pleadings that there was a distinct variance between the statements of the witness in his testimony and in his last amendment on the subject and his statement concerning it in the previous pleadings, in this, that in the last pleading and in his testimony he stated that his hand was drawn down between the cone of the lathe and the body of the machine, whereas in the previous pleadings he had alleged that it was drawn in between the belt of the lathe and the cone thereof. Also, in the first complaint he did not state that his hand or fingers were caught between the plies of the belt, or that the belt was defective by reason of the plies coming apart. The court erred in striking out the pleadings. It is true, as stated by the court in making its ruling, that a pleading which has been superseded by an amendment can no longer perform any office as a pleading, and cannot be used on the trial as admissions to contradict a fact alleged in a subsequent amendment. Mecham v. McKay, 37 Cal. 165. But this rule is not universal, and there is an exception in cases where the person who files and verifies the pleading is himself a witness on the trial. In such a case he may, on cross-examination, be questioned concerning the portions of his original pleadings which are inconsistent with the pleading upon which the trial is had, for the purpose of showing statements inconsistent with his testimony on the stand. Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 180, 3 Pac. 625; Estate of O'Connor, 118 Cal. 71, 50 Pac. 4. It was proper, therefore, for the jury to have before it the varying statements of the plaintiff on the subject of the exact manner in which he received his injury.

[4] Evidence was given that the defendant had posted notices in a number of conspicuous places in its machine shop entitled "Notice to Employés," wherein the employés were forbidden to use or work with any tools or machinery which through use had become defective, and were ordered to examine all tools before using, and if found defective to refrain from using them and report to the foreman or superintendent, and that belts should not be shifted except while the shafting was not in motion, and that if any employé violated these rules he did so at his own risk. It was further shown that the plaintiff had been a machinist and had known about the operation of lathes and the handling of pulleys and shifting levers for about 17 years; that for 10 years his special work had been in connection with lathes, and that he had been working in the defendant's shop on lathes and otherwise, as general machinist, for 6 or 7 months prior to the accident. Objection to this notice was made on the ground that it was immaterial, and that the defendant could not, by posting such notice, relieve itself of responsibility or liability for neglect. This objection was sustained and the evidence excluded. In this ruling the court erred. The evidence was of such a character that the jury might reasonably have inferred that the plaintiff had seen the notice and knew its contents. It expressly directed that employés should examine all tools before using them, and report them and not use them if defective, and that belts should not be shifted while the shafting was in motion. If the plaintiff had this knowledge, it would tend to show that he was negligent, first, in proceeding to use the defective belt without examination or without reporting the same; and, second, in attempting to shift it while the shaft was in motion, as the evidence shows that he did. The defendant was entitled to have this evidence go to the jury in order that they might determine the question whether or not the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

[5] The plaintiff contends that the ruling cannot be reviewed, because, as he claims, there was no issue on the subject of contributory negligence, pointing out that the only allegation thereof in the answer was that the injury to plaintiff "was solely and proximately caused by the failure of plaintiff to exercise ordinary care on his own behalf for his own safety"; and, further, that "the negligence of plaintiff and his failure to exercise ordinary care on his own behalf for his own safety contributed to any injury or damage suffered by plaintiff"; in support of which claim he refers to Crabbe v. Mammoth, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 505, 143 Pac. 714. In this case, however, the defense of contributory negligence was considered as properly pleaded throughout the trial. No objection was made at any time on the ground that it was not pleaded. A large part of the testimony on the trial was devoted to that subject, and the instructions of the court show that it was deemed a matter in issue to be submitted to the jury. Under these circumstances a defective plea cannot be made available in support of an erroneous ruling on the subject. Kelly v. Santa Barbara, etc., Co., 171 Cal. 421, 153 Pac. 903, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 67; Perry v. Angelus H. Ass'n, 172 Cal. 316, 156 Pac. 449.

[6-11] The injury occurred in 1913, after September 1, 1911, when the Employers' Liability Act of 1911 took effect, and before the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 279), was in force. The act of 1911 provides that, in any action by an employé against an employer for damages from an injury caused by the employer's neglect, "it shall not be a defense: (1) That the employé either expressly or impliedly assumed the risk of the hazard complained of." Stats. 1911, p. 796. The respondent argues that the only effect of the notice as evidence was to show that the plaintiff had assumed the risks incident to his employment, and that, as the above statute abolishes that defense, the notice was immaterial to the case. The court below apparently based its ruling upon that theory. It is obvious that the abolition of the defense of assumption of risk does not destroy the defense of contributory negligence. The act of 1911 itself recognizes this fact. The notice was offered as evidence of contributory negligence by plaintiff, and it had a direct tendency to prove such negligence, if, as the jury might have inferred, the plaintiff was aware of its contents. If the employé is ordered to examine a tool for defects, and report the same, if any, before using it, and, failing to do so, he is injured from a defect which an ordinarily careful examination would have disclosed to him, it is obvious that the order made it his duty to make the examination, that his failure to obey would be a neglect of that duty, and that this neglect would be a contributing cause of his injury. Likewise, if he is ordered not to shift the belt while the shafting is in motion, and nevertheless does so, and is injured thereby, it may be true that he assumes the risk of injury from so doing, but by the same act he would be guilty of negligence contributing to his injury. "Violation by an employé of a rule promulgated by his employer for his protection is an act of negligence per se, and, when it contributes to his own injury, precludes a recovery." Dallas Coal Co. v. Rotenberry, 85 Ark. 240, 107 S. W. 997. To the same effect see Shanny v. Androscoggin Mills, 66 Me. 420; Foley v. Boston, etc., Co., 198 Mass. 532, 84 N. E. 846; Haynes v. Penfield, 231 Pa. 329, 80 Atl. 565; Carlson v. Marston, 68 Minn. 400, 71 N. W. 398; Andrews v. Valley Ice Co., 167 Cal. 21, 138 Pac. 699; Thompson on Negligence, § 5395. The doctrine of assumption of risk means that the law implies, as a part of the contract of service, that the servant agrees to and assumes all the ordinary risks of personal injury incident to the business and not caused by the direct negligence of his employer. Beeson v. Green Mountain, etc., Co., 57 Cal. 29. If a servant goes to work in a place which he knows to be dangerous, he assumes the risk arising from such known dangers. So, if he accepts for his use a tool furnished by the master, knowing it to be defective, and that such defect makes it dangerous, he assumes the risk of injury that may be caused to him therefrom. This doctrine has no necessary relation to the doctrine of contributory negligence. If the doctrine of assumption of risk were not a part of the law of master and servant, as it has not been since the act of 1911, the law of contributory negligence would remain, and if the servant contributes to his own injury by negligent disregard of his master's orders, given to him for his own safety, he cannot recover, notwithstanding the abolition of the defense of assumption of risk.

[12] These errors were not trivial or unimportant. There was evidence that, while it was safer to shift the belt on the lower cone by means of a tool or other article, it was not unusual in the defendant's machine shop for those using such lathes to shift the belt below by striking it with the bare hand. There was evidence that this was the custom. This, however, does not of necessity establish the proposition that this method of shifting the belt was not negligent or dangerous. It might also be said to establish the proposition that the employés of the defendant, by constant exposure to danger, had grown careless of their own safety against such danger. It was for the jury to determine which was the correct theory. And in any event, if the defendant had positively forbidden the shifting of the belt while in motion, or the use of a defective tool without examination for defects, when such defects were easily discernible with ordinary care, the act of the servant in doing so would be negligent, and he could not recover for the consequent injury if, at the time of committing the act, he knew of the order forbidding him to do so. We cannot say that the defendant did not suffer substantial prejudice from these rulings. The judgment must therefore be reversed.

Numerous objections are made to the instructions given, and to the refusal to give instructions asked. We do not deem it necessary to consider these objections. For the most part the grounds of the criticisms are entirely removed by other parts of the instructions given, which complete the statement of the law on the subject, and the others are not of sufficient importance to justify consideration. The instructions upon another trial will probably not follow the exact verbiage of those given by the court upon the trial below. It is also unnecessary to consider the objection that the evidence does not sustain the verdict.

WEILE v. STURTEVANT, Superior Court Judge. (S. F. 8383.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 18, 1917.)

1. COSTS 🔑277(1)—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS — COMMON LAW.

Under the common law, a court of general jurisdiction had power to stay proceedings upon a second action or a retrial following a reversal on appeal, where the costs of the prior action or appeal had not been paid, on the ground of power to prevent a vexatious multiplicity of suits.

2. COSTS 🔑277(1)—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS—POWER OF SUPERIOR COURT—DISCRETION.

Such inherent power of courts of common law is vested in the superior courts of the state, the superior court may stay a retrial following a reversal on appeal if the costs of the appeal had not been paid, and, if the facts show oppression or hardship in the particular case, the mere nonpayment of costs not coupled with other circumstances not being a cause for a stay, but such power should be exercised with discretion.

In Bank. Mandamus by C. M. Weile against Geo. A. Sturtevant, as Judge of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco. Application denied.

See, also, 28 Cal. App. 676, 153 Pac. 960.

Howard Harron, of San Francisco, for appellant. Andros & Hengstler, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is a proceeding for a writ of mandate. J. M. Brown, Inc., a corporation, had recovered a judgment in the superior court in San Francisco against W. P. Fuller & Co. Thereafter, on appeal, the judgment was reversed and a new trial ordered. Subsequently J. M. Brown, Inc., having been adjudicated a bankrupt, the trustee sold the chose in action which the bankrupt had against W. P. Fuller & Co. to the petitioner, who then had the cause set for a retrial in the court below in the department presided over by the respondent. Before the day set for the retrial, W. P. Fuller & Co. filed its bill of costs on appeal and moved to stay all further proceedings in the cause until such costs be paid. This motion was granted by the respondent, who also denied petitioner's motion to vacate the order staying proceedings. The purpose of this proceeding is to secure a writ compelling the respondent to proceed with the retrial of the cause.

[1, 2] Respondent's contention, in answer to the alternative writ issued in this case, is that it is one of the inherent powers of a court of general jurisdiction to stay proceedings upon a retrial until costs of appeal have been paid; the exercise of such power to be within the sound discretion of the trial court, reviewable only for abuse of such discretion. The circumstances surrounding the making of the order staying proceedings are not before us, and the petitioner does not claim that if the power contended for does exist its exercise was not justified under the facts in this case. Petitioner's right to a writ of mandate rests solely on the determination of the question whether, under any conceivable set of facts, the superior court, before which a case is pending for retrial after a judgment for the plaintiff has been reversed on appeal, has the power to stay such retrial until the costs of the appeal have been paid. If in any case such a stay can be ordered, if such power is vested in the superior court, then its exercise in this instance must be deemed proper. The subject here involved is a matter of first impression in this state. It is nowhere touched upon in the statutes or decisions. We must therefore look to the practice at common law. If the power to stay proceedings as contended for by respondent was inherent in courts at common law, such power would still be vested in the superior courts of this state. Pol. Code, § 4468; Burns v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 1, 4, 73 Pac. 597; Lukens v. Nye, 156 Cal. 498, 508, 105 Pac. 593, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 244, 20 Ann. Cas. 158; Ex parte Karlson, 160 Cal. 378, 382, 117 Pac. 447, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1334. In the common-law courts of England it was the general practice to stay a second action in ejectment, one recovery not being res adjudicata, until the costs of the prior action had been paid. This was done "as a measure of just protection to the party who was thus subjected to repeated litigations over the same cause of action." Buckles v. C., M. & St. P. Ry. Co., [C. C.] 47 Fed. 424. See, also, Henderson v. Griffin, 5 Pet. 151, 158, 8 L. Ed. 79; 11 Cyc. 256. In time the same practice was extended to all classes of cases where the second action was between the same parties and involved the same subject-matter, the theory being that the court has inherent power to prevent a vexatious multiplication of suits. The rule is stated and the reasons for it are well summarized in Gerety v. Reading, 9 Phila. (Pa.) 153; the court saying:

> "The practice of courts in staying proceedings in a second action for the same cause between the same parties, where the plaintiff has failed in his first suit, until he shall have paid the costs of that suit, is a very beneficial one, and too well settled to admit of any doubt. It is founded upon the necessary control which courts of justice have over their own proceedings, and their duty to prevent them from being made the means of oppression and vexation. 3 Wilson. 149; 2 Wm. Bl. 741; 1 Tidd's Pr. 94; 2 T. R. 501, n; Beames on Costs, 209. It is a practice which, as has been well said, is convenient and just in all the aspects in which it can be viewed. Whatever may have been its origin, it is not confined to actions of ejectment, but applies equally to all forms of action. Nor is it confined to cases in which there has been a trial on the merits. It is applicable also to cases of nonsuits (Nevitt v. Lade, 3 Doug. 396); and to cases of discontinuance, non pros., and judgment on demurrer. Neither will a slight variation in the names of the parties make any difference (Lampley v. Sands, 1 Tidd's Pr. 539), or the fact that the first action was in another court."

Upon the same theory it has been held that a similar power exists in the case of a retrial following a reversal on appeal where the costs of appeal have not been paid. Such a stay was ordered in Jackson v. Schauber, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 216. Other jurisdictions have also affirmed the discretionary power of trial courts to stay a retrial until payment of costs on appeal. Clark v. Bay Circuit Judge, 154 Mich. 483, 117 N. W. 1051; McIntosh v. Hoben, 11 Wis. 400; Felt v. Amidon, 48 Wis. 66, 3 N. W. 825. In these cases the decision was put upon the same grounds as those stated in Gerety v. Reading, supra, as grounds for staying a new action for the same relief. In only one state where the matter has been before the court for decision has the power here contended for by respondent been denied. In Ex parte Matthews, 145 Ala. 505, 40 South. 78, relied upon by petitioner, the court recognizes and sanctions the practice of staying a second action until costs of the first have been paid, citing Alabama cases where this was done. The opinion further admits that:

> "The main theory upon which the courts exercise this right of staying the proceedings until the costs have been paid is founded upon the necessary control which courts have over their own proceedings, and their duty to prevent them being made the means of oppression and vexation," and that "the rule is well established that the proceedings in the second suit will be stayed until the costs in the prior case have been paid."

But the court can "see no good reason for extending the rule of staying proceedings," on the ground that a retrial is not like a second action, and would not be oppressive or vexatious or encourage a multiplication of suits. In fact, however, there is no real difference between a second action and a retrial in this particular. Either case will depend on the circumstances. Many instances may be imagined where to proceed with the retrial after a reversal would be just as oppressive and vexatious as to bring a second action. If such hardship is apparent in such a case, then we have as strong reason for a stay of proceedings as could be advanced for the stay of proceedings in a second action for the same cause. This does not mean that such a stay must be had or even may be had in every case where the costs of appeal have not been paid. There must be facts showing oppression or hardship, although what such facts are must be determined in the particular case. Mere nonpayment of costs, not coupled with any other circumstances, would not be cause for a stay. Felt v. Amidon, supra. The discretion vested in the court "should be exercised cautiously, ex æquo et bono, employing or declining the power as the right and justice of the particular case may seem to require." Buckles v. C., M. & St. P. Ry. Co., supra. Thus properly guarded against abuse, the power to stay proceedings is a most useful one to prevent the hardship to which the unlimited right of suit sometimes leads.

As already stated, we have in the case at bar no facts before us from which the propriety of the respondent's order can be determined. It must therefore be assumed that the discretion was properly exercised.

The conclusion reached makes it unnecessary to pass upon the point that the petition is barred by laches.

The application for a writ of mandate is denied.

GROSSETTI v. SWEASEY et al.

(S. F. 7557.)

1. Pleading 🔑8(17)—Conclusion—Negligence.

It is necessary only to allege negligence by general averment that defendant did the particular act which resulted in damage to plaintiff.

2. Street Railroads 🔑114(5)—Operation—Injuries to Persons — Negligence — Evidence.

Evidence held to sustain finding of negligence of motorman in charge of car which struck a surrey, injuring plaintiff.

3. Evidence 🔑539 — Expert Testimony — Admissibility.

Motormen skilled in the operation of street cars and the application of brakes may testify as experts regarding the adequacy of a brake.

4. Witnesses 🔑268(3)—Cross-Examination —Propriety.

In an action for personal injuries when street car struck the surrey in which plaintiff was riding, where a witness had testified that another witness had said that he would "bawl the company out" when he got on the witness stand, it was proper on cross-examination to ask him whether the other witness had said he would tell the condition of the cars, and in that manner bawl them out.

5. Appeal and Error 🔑1060(1)—Harmless Error—Conduct of Counsel.

Alleged misconduct of counsel in referring to a witness as the one who would not accept a subpœna was not injurious where the witness later admitted under oath that he had twice refused to accept a subpœna from a brother of the plaintiff.

6. Appeal and Error 🔑1060(1)—Harmless Error—Argument of Counsel.

In action for injuries when street car struck surrey in which plaintiff was riding, the statement in argument that the brakes were criminally insufficient, even if not justified by the evidence, was not of sufficient importance to require reversal, since the jurors knew that they were not trying any one for a crime.

7. Appeal and Error 🔑216(1)—Preservation of Grounds of Review—Misconduct of Counsel.

In the absence of request for instruction to disregard alleged misconduct of counsel, the appellant cannot complain of such misconduct.

8. Street Railroads 🔑113(3)—Personal Injuries—Evidence—Street Car Brakes.

In action for injuries when a street car struck a surrey in which plaintiff was riding, it was not error to admit evidence of the faulty condition of the brakes on the car by showing the condition before and after the accident by testimony by those who operated the brakes.

9. Evidence 🔑558(1)—Experts—Cross-Examination.

In an action for injuries when a street car struck a surrey in which plaintiff was riding, where plaintiff alleged that the brakes were in a defective condition, it was proper on cross-examination to ask an expert testifying as to defendant's custom regarding replacing brake shoes, whether defendant had not used brake shoes for so long a time that they wore thin, broke off, and dropped upon the streets.

10. Evidence 🔑558(1)—Experts—Cross-Examination.

In action for injuries when struck by a street car, where plaintiff alleged that the brakes were defective, and a witness was testifying as an expert regarding the life of brake shoes, it was proper for plaintiff to cross-examine him with reference to different sorts of shoes and their capacities for wear.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Geo. D. Murray, Judge.

Action by Valentine Grossetti against Richard Sweasey and the Humboldt Transit Company. There was a nonsuit as to Sweasey, and a judgment for plaintiff, and order denying motion for new trial against the other defendant, and the Transit Company appeals. Affirmed.

Coonan & Kehoe, of Eureka, for appellant.
Pierce H. Ryan, of Eureka, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. The Humboldt Transit Company appeals from a judgment against it in a suit for damages for personal injuries and from the order denying its motion for a new trial. The accident was due to the coming together in violent contact of one of the transit company's electric street cars and a carriage of the "surrey" type belonging to Richard Sweasey, the owner of a livery stable. Plaintiff was a passenger in the surrey. Sweasey was made a defendant, but a nonsuit as to him was granted by the court.

[1] Appellant demurred upon various grounds to each of the six causes of action pleaded. The first two causes of action charged negligence in the operation of the car in that it did "crash and run into the said surrey, thereby overturning said surrey and causing plaintiff to be thrown violently upon the ground," etc. The first two causes differ slightly as to their allegations regarding the exact means by which plaintiff met his injuries, whether by being struck by the car or run over by the surrey after being thrown from that vehicle. Without considering all of appellant's criticisms of these counts it is sufficient to call attention to the rule, frequently announced by this court, that it is necessary only to allege negligence by general averment that defendant did the particular act which resulted in the damage to plaintiff. Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. 254, 107 Pac. 309; Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 99, 27 Pac. 29. And the matter of pleading becomes unimportant when a case is fairly tried, as this one apparently was, upon the merits and under circumstances which indicate that nothing in the pleadings misled appellant to its injury. Stein v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663; Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234, 90 Pac. 936; Dow v. City of Oroville, 22 Cal. App. 215, 134 Pac. 197; Ingalls v. Monte Cristo Oil & Development Co., 167 Pac. 857.

The third cause of action charged that on the day upon which the accident occurred the appellant carelessly omitted to provide its car with any safe and suitable brake, but that it—

> "was provided with a brake known as a lever brake, operated by means of a hand lever, and with no other means or brake or appliance to stop the same; that * * * said lever brake was and is unsuitable and insufficient for the purpose of stopping said car promptly and readily, and was on said day in a defective and unsafe condition in this, that the same was so worn in its parts and so defective that motion was lost in the operation thereof, so that the brake blocks could not be readily and promptly applied to the wheels of said car, and that said brake was weakened, unserviceable, and inadequate, thereby rendering it impossible to stop said car promptly and readily by means thereof, all of which defendant then and there knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known."

Appellant's demurrer was based upon the specification that this count contains two causes of action not separately stated. At the trial, however, it was stipulated that plaintiff did not contend that a hand lever brake as such was unsuitable, but the complaint was directed to the condition of the brake upon the car at the time of the injury. Therefore appellant's objection to the third count is answered by the authorities last cited. The objections to the fourth cause of action in which the alleged inadequacy of the brake is also set forth may be in like manner disposed of. The other two causes of action so far as they apply to this appealing defendant sufficiently allege negligent failure on the part of the motorman to stop the car after he saw that the carriage in which plaintiff was a passenger was too near the track to admit of the passage of the car without striking the other vehicle. The appellant was not injured by the ruling on the demurrers.

The evidence shows that the car and the surrey were proceeding in the same direction on a public street in the city of Eureka. The rails of appellant's track are to the west of the center of said street, and other vehicles travel customarily a sufficient distance to the eastward on a well-defined roadway to permit the electric cars to pass without danger of striking them. Sweasey's surrey was behind a slow moving motor truck near the middle of the road. The driver turned his horses toward the track in an effort to pass the motor truck. He whipped the animals, and one of them became frightened and pranced. He made efforts to pass the motor truck two or three times, and then a collision between the car and the surrey took place. There is a conflict of testimony regarding the manner of the contact, the motorman saying that the frightened horses tipped the surrey against the car and then ran for some distance, drawing both the car and the surrey, because the latter had become entangled in the timbers of the open part of the car; and other witnesses testifying that the car struck the surrey with such force as to overturn it, spill the passengers, and push the vehicle and horses along the track for a number of yards. The story of the accident as related by the motorman fully supported the theory that he saw the imminence of a collision because the surrey was too near the track to permit the car to pass without impact with it; that he applied the brakes; that they proved utterly inadequate; and that if they had been suitable and proper brakes he could have accomplished his purpose. There was abundant evidence to justify respondent's theory that the car struck the surrey from behind; and there is support for the conclusion that the motorman saw the danger; that the driver of the surrey did not see it; and that the motorman was prevented from averting the collision by reason of the inadequate brakes.

[2] It is appellant's contention that respondent placed entire reliance upon the alleged insufficiency of the brakes, making no effort to show negligence on the part of the motorman, who testified on behalf of the plaintiff. There was evidence, however, to sustain an implied finding of negligence on the part of the motorman. For example, witness Porter testified that the surrey could be seen in dangerous proximity to the track when the car was 600 or 700 feet distant from it; that when almost that far away the car was running at a rate of about 20 miles an hour; and that the street was congested with vehicles. As was said in O'Connor v. United Railroads, 168 Cal. 43-47, 141 Pac. 809, 811, by Mr. Justice Lorigan in delivering the opinion of the court:

> "It must be apparent that in operating a street car over a public street a motorman cannot under ordinary circumstances run down a vehicle proceeding in the same direction without having been negligent in the operation of his car. The mere fact that he does so furnishes cogent evidence of negligence which is rarely capable of explanation. Richmond Traction Co. v. Clarke, 101 Va. 383 (43 S. E. 618); Vincent v. Norton, etc., Ry. Co., 180 Mass. 104 (61 N. E. 822); Thompson on Negligence, § 1404."

The failure of the brakes to perform their proper function was described by the motorman. Appellant insists that he was impeached by competent evidence and contradicted by other witnesses. But we may not weigh the evidence as the jury might weigh it in reaching a verdict and as the trial court in passing upon a motion for a new trial. Therefore the discussion of the credibility of this witness has no place in the briefs. He testified in part as follows:

> "When I noticed the buggy pulling down towards the track, at that time I could have passed it all right. I noticed when I got within 100 feet that I could not pass it. * * * Q. When you saw the carriage driving from the highway down towards the railroad track, what did you do? A. I started to throw on my brake. * * * I pulled the brake as far back as I could, way down like that (shows), and I kept that up until I got within 50 feet of the surrey, and then when the brakes would not stop it I started to apply the reverse, release the brake, and threw on the reverse; I tried throwing the power off the car, all the time, and the reverse would not hold it. Q. Would the brake hold it? A. No, sir."

He further testified that the switch blew out, and therefore the reverse did not operate; in other words, that both brakes and reverse were used without appreciable effect. There was other testimony that the brakes, partly from structural faults and partly from the condition of the brake shoes, were not in proper condition.

[3] Both the motorman who had charge of the car which was in collision with the surrey and another motorman named Henninger testified as experts regarding the inadequacy of the brake. Attack is made upon their testimony on the ground that the matters about which they spoke were not subjects of expert testimony, and in this behalf appellant cites such cases as Sappenfield v. Main, 91 Cal. 48–59, 27 Pac. 590, Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269–281, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124, Parkin v. Grayson Owen Co., 157 Cal. 41–43, 106 Pac. 210, and Lawyer v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 161 Cal. 53–59, 118 Pac. 237. Undoubtedly the courts do not permit the introduction, under the guise of expert evidence, of opinions upon matters not properly the subjects of explanation by persons of special skill. But the ordinary citizen does not know anything about the structure or operation of brakes on electric cars. Men skilled in the operation of cars may be examined upon such matters. For example, a witness properly qualified may testify regarding the distance within which a car going at a given speed may with proper care be stopped. Howland v. Oakland Consolidated Street Railway Co., 110 Cal. 513, at page 522, 42 Pac. at pages 983, 985, of that report the court used this language, which is peculiarly applicable to the case at bar and the testimony to which appellant objected:

> "The manner of running electric cars, their rate of speed, and the facility with which they can be stopped or handled, is not a matter of such common knowledge that the jury could judge as intelligently as one skilled in their use."

The same principle has been frequently stated as we might show by citation of numerous authorities. It is sufficient to refer further to the recent case of Vallejo & Northern R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545–570, 147 Pac. 238, and the cases cited therein upon this subject.

Appellant calls attention to several instances of alleged misconduct of counsel for respondent. Counsel referred to one of appellant's witnesses as "the same man who refused to answer a subpœna in this case." In argument to the jury counsel said that plaintiff claimed that the brake was "criminally" insufficient. Again, in commenting upon the offered proof that cars must be run at certain speed to maintain a proper schedule, he said:

> "If the cars would have to run over people to keep their schedule, they had better break their schedule first."

When appellant's counsel suggested to one of the witnesses that he measure the surrey respondent's counsel said he didn't think there was very much of it left—that it was "pretty badly demolished." The remark was withdrawn. Witness Morgan testified for the defense that witness Brown had said he would "bawl that company out, good and proper," when he should get on the witness stand. On cross-examination these questions, the asking of which is assigned as misconduct, were propounded to him:

> "Did he state to you that he would tell in a court of justice the condition in which they kept and maintained their cars on the streets of this city, and in that manner bawl them out, did he? * * * Did not he tell you that, did not you and he discuss at that time, Mr. Morgan, and did not you agree with him that the brakes on the cars of the Humboldt Transit Company were in a deplorable condition, and did he say further to you that he was going to testify to the fact, and in that manner bawl out the company?"

[4-7] None of these alleged instances of misconduct amounted to error which would justify a reversal. The questions propounded to the witness, who had testified regarding Brown's alleged slangy threat, were entirely proper cross-examination. The remark about the refusal of a witness to answer a subpœna was not injurious to appellant because the witness later admitted under oath that he had twice refused to accept a subpœna from a brother of the plaintiff. The statement in argument that the brakes were "criminally" insufficient, while possibly not justified by the evidence, was not of sufficient importance to require a reversal of the judgment. The jurors knew that they were not trying any one for a crime. It may be legitimate argument to call a jury's attention to the fact that very gross negligence may take the place of specific intent in a prosecution for certain crimes. The term "criminal negligence" is used to designate that sort of negligence. Pen. Code, § 20. Counsel was merely telling the jury that the negligence which he believed he had proven was of the sort that would have justified a conviction of the guilty person if death had resulted to a victim of the accident. No person hearing him could have understood that he was accusing the defendant corporation of crime. Without further discussion it is sufficient to say that in our opinion no harm resulted from the other instances of alleged misconduct. There was no request that the court instruct the jury to disregard the supposed misconduct. Therefore appellant is not now in a position effectively to complain regarding it. People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 154–159, 65 Pac. 295; People v. Mancuso, 23 Cal. App. 146, 137 Pac. 278; People v. Wing, 23 Cal. App. 53, 137 Pac. 48.

[8] There was no error in admitting evidence of the faulty condition of the brakes on the car which was in the collision. The condition before and after the accident was sought to be established by testimony of those who had operated the brakes. This was proper. Craven v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 72 Cal. 345, 13 Pac. 878; Dyas v. Southern Pacific Co., 140 Cal. 296–304, 73 Pac. 972; Dow v. Sunset Telephone & Telegraph Co., 157 Cal. 182–188, 106 Pac. 587; Brunger v. Pioneer Roll Paper Co., 6 Cal. App. 691–693, 92 Pac. 1043.

[9] One of appellant's witnesses testified as an expert generally with reference to brakes and particularly with regard to appellant's custom regarding inspection and replacing of worn brake shoes. He was asked on cross-examination if he had not known of the Humboldt Transit Company using brake shoes on their cars for so long a time that they wore thin and broke off and dropped upon the streets of the city. This was perfectly proper cross-examination entirely justified by the general character of the examination in chief.

[10] The same witness was asked on cross-examination about the relative merits of cast-iron brake shoes such as those used by appellant and brake shoes faced with steel. It is contended that this evidence was not within the issues because plaintiff had stipulated that the kind of brake used was not in itself and when in good condition an inadequate appliance. The witness was testifying as an expert regarding the life of brake shoes when in constant use. It was proper for plaintiff to examine him with reference to different sorts of shoes and their capacities for wear. We cannot see how appellant was injured by such cross-examination.

We have examined the instructions, and find that the jury was fully and fairly instructed, and that appellant's criticisms of the court's action in refusing certain charges and giving others are without substantial merit. No other alleged errors require discussion or analysis.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HARRINGTON v. TAYLOR et al. (two cases).
(S. F. 7530, 8057.)

1. ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS 🔑311 — CONSTRUCTION — POWERS OF TRUSTEES.

Where four brothers owning as tenants in common made a trust agreement followed by four separate trust deeds, each setting forth a schedule of the creditors and of their declared priority, and naming the trustees to manage the properties, and in event of default to sell them, divide the moneys, and pay the balance to the extinguishment of the debts, enjoining the trustees to sell the property in L. or S., or both, but to sell that in L. first, the net remainder to be divided into four portions, and out of the four respective residues the four sets of trustees to pay off each its set of lien creditors parties to its trust deeds, respectively, and in the order and rank provided for in said trust deeds, respectively, the trustees were not on sale of both properties required to prorate the moneys received, but the terms of the trust fairly contemplated that the property in L. should be sold alone if it would extinguish the indebtedness, and that the creditors could be paid in full from the proceeds thereof in the order of priority stated in the deeds, though some of them had no liens on the S. property.

2. MARSHALING ASSETS AND SECURITIES 🔑 1—PROPRIETY OF REMEDY.

The right to marshal is a mere equity which may never be invoked when its operation will accomplish inequity, and can only become a vested right by a due demand, and cannot be invoked long after sales of trust property and disbursements of the money.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Sarah E. Harrington against Henry W. Taylor and others, as trustees of Huff Trusts Nos. 3 and 4. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appealed, and moved for new trial, which was granted, and from the order granting new trial, plaintiff appeals. The appeals were heard together. Judgment reversed, and order granting new trial affirmed.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for appellants. Charles F. Hanlon, of San Francisco, for respondents. Edward Lande, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought her action against defendants as trustees, alleging that the trustees, without right, had refused to pay her moneys due her and in their possession as trustees, and demanded judgment accordingly. She recovered, and the trustees appealed. They moved for a new trial, which was granted, and from the order so doing plaintiff has appealed. These cross-appeals may with advantage be considered together.

Four brothers Huff owned as tenants in common land in the city of Los Angeles and land in the city and county of San Francisco. They were in debt to numbers of persons. While some of these persons were the creditors of all, others were creditors of individual brothers. They entered into a trust agreement, followed by four separate trust deeds, which trust deeds, saving for the list of creditors and the amounts due these creditors, were identical. Each trust deed set forth a schedule list of the creditors of the brother executing it, with declared priority of the liens of these creditors upon one or another, and in certain instances on both, of the real properties above mentioned. The trustees named were to manage the trust properties, and in the event of default to sell the properties, divide the moneys secured from the sales to the payment of charges arising under the trust, and to the extinguishment of the creditors' obligations, with balance over to the trustors. The trustees were enjoined to sell either the Los Angeles or the San Francisco properties, or both, if necessary, but to sell the Los Angeles property first. Out of the gross proceeds of each sale was to be paid charges and disbursements pertaining to the property sold. The net remainder was to be divided into four portions, and "out of the four respective residues the four sets of trustees shall pay off each its set of lien creditors parties to its trust deeds, respectively, and in the order and rank provided for in said trust deeds, respectively." The creditors' indebtednesses were evidenced respectively by promissory notes made to them, and it was further provided that the promissory notes, principal and interest, remaining unpaid at the time of sale, should be paid, "but in order as they rank as liens and charges as set forth in said notes and as provided for herein."

The list of creditors with the designated priority of their liens in the Claude Huff trust, known as trust No. 3, and the Bion Huff trust, known as trust No. 4, may thus be tabulated:

Claude Huff.

Time came when the trustees under their trust were obliged to sell the real estate. In conformity with the mandate of the trust they first sold the Los Angeles property, and devoted the net proceeds of the sale to the extinguishment of the trustors' indebtedness according to the indicated priority. Thereafter they sold the San Francisco property and made like disposition of the proceeds arising therefrom. This the trustees contend they were fully authorized to do under the terms and meaning of the trust agreement and the trust deeds, and herein it is said that the very purpose of the trust mandate that the Los Angeles property should be sold first was that this precise thing should be done; that no one could foresee at the time when the sale took place what would be the extent of the trustors' liabilities, and those liabilities might be wholly extinguished by the sale of one piece of property. Therefore the Los Angeles property was designated as the property first to be sold, and if the proceeds of that sale when applied to the extinguishment of the indebtedness was not sufficient to accomplish this end, a sale of the San Francisco property was to follow. This was the method they adopted, and it is the method of which plaintiff complains. In her complaint she urges and argues that she was entitled in the case of each of these trusts to a marshaling of the assets and to ratable and proportionate distribution among the lien claimants of the joint funds arising from both sales. Thus, to illustrate, assuming that under trust No. 4 the net proceeds of the Los Angeles property and the net proceeds of the San Francisco property amounted each to $14,000, there would be in the hands of the trustees $28,000; from each of these $14,000 funds should be taken one-half of $8,155, the amount of the Henry Meyer first lien, and one-half of $10,251.87, the amount of the Hanlon second lien; that this method would leave in the Los Angeles fund some $4,000 which could and should have been devoted to the extinguishment of the Adler debt, amounting to $1,125, and, next, to plaintiff's own debt, amounting to $1,375. The method in fact adopted by the trustees was to pay the Meyer first lien in full out of the sale of the Los Angeles property and the Hanlon second lien in so far as the funds were adequate for that purpose. Thus nothing was left to satisfy the Harrington lien, and funds were left, by the method which the trustees adopted, to serve in part extinguishment at least of the Reid third lien on the San Francisco property and the Hanlon fourth lien thereon.

Upon trial the court refused to admit in evidence the trust agreement upon the ground that the deeds of trust were complete and spoke for themselves. It found that the method of disbursement adopted by the trustees was arbitrary and in disregard of the just rights of the plaintiff. It found, "as a fact and conclusion of law, that under the terms of the said trust deeds it was provided that said trustees should pay the liens of Henry Meyer and Charles F. Hanlon out of the joint sums of money derived from the sales of both parcels of real estate, and that the proceeds from each parcel should contribute toward the payment of each of said liens of said Meyer and Hanlon, being the first and second liens, in the same proportion as the said two funds bore to each other in amount." The court found that Hanlon was not a necessary party in this marshaling of assets, notwithstanding the fact that by the method which the court proposed to adopt for the disposition of the trust funds his rights would be injuriously affected. It recognized that it would affect Mr. Hanlon injuriously, but found that it could be done "without impairing any rights of said Hanlon that should not be impaired." The judgment as above indicated followed these findings, necessarily to the detriment of Mr. Hanlon.

[1] It is unnecessary to discuss in detail the matters urged for and against the soundness of the order of the court in granting the new trial, the error in refusing admission to the declaration of trust, in denying to Mr. Hanlon the right to be joined in the action as a party in interest, and other similar considerations. The judgment of the court rests wholly upon its interpretation, which it declares to be one of mixed law and fact, that it became the duty of the trustees "under the terms of said trust deed to prorate the proceeds from each parcel of land sold." Clearly no such duty is imposed upon the trustees by the terms of the trust. The terms of the trust fairly contemplate that the Los Angeles property may be sold alone if its sale will extinguish the trustors' indebtedness, and in terms declares that the proceeds of the sale shall be used to extinguish the lien claims in order of their priorities.

[2] It can only be by what the trial court conceived to be the proper application of the equitable doctrine of marshaling of assets that the court reached the determination which it gave, and which, so far from being in accord with the language of the trust deed, is, if anything, in violation of it. We may here take for convenient illustration the tabulated list of the Bion Huff lien claimants as above set forth. The lands to which these liens respectively attach are specifically declared, their priorities enumerated with particularity. The right to marshal is a mere equity which may never be invoked when its operation will accomplish inequity. In its simplest form it is, as set forth by Judge Story (Eq. Jur. § 633) as follows:

> "If A. has a mortgage upon two different estates for the same debt, and B. has a mortgage upon one only of the estates for another debt, B. has a right to throw A. in the first instance, for satisfaction upon the security, which he (B.) cannot touch, at least where it will not prejudice A.'s rights, or improperly control his remedies."

See, also, Pom. Eq. Rem. § 867; Mack v. Shafer, 135 Cal. 114, 67 Pac. 40. But a lien claimant may invoke this equitable principle of marshaling assets only when it will benefit him without injuring others, and if this cannot be done, then equity will but follow the law. This familiar principle has been codified in sections 2899, 3433, Civil Code. Moreover, it is equally fundamental that equity will apply the doctrine only to conditions existing at the time when it is invoked. "It can only become a fixed right by taking proper steps to have it enforced, and until this is done it is subject to displacement and defeat by subsequently acquired liens upon the fund. This inchoate right or equity is not a lien, and is therefore subject to defeat at any time before it is attempted to be enforced." Richards v. Cowles, 105 Iowa, 734, 75 N. W. 648. In this case no demand was made upon the trustees. Equity's aid was not invoked until long after the sales and disbursements of the moneys by the trustees under the sales. But, of more consequence still, an inspection of the table above given will disclose that the method of distribution insisted upon by Mrs. Harrington, though to her advantage, could not be adopted without corresponding injury to the third lien claim on the San Francisco property held by Archibald Reid for $1,245.80 and to the fourth lien claim of Charles F. Hanlon upon the same property for $13,625.95. Therefore, as equity could not intervene for the advantage of one lien claimant without working proportionate injury to another, it must and will leave them where they have placed themselves under the law.

What is thus said of trust 4 has, of course, identical application to trust 3, and for the reasons given the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the order granting a new trial is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEPORI. (Civ. 2202.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 22, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 20, 1917.)

1. LARCENY 🔑23 — "GRAND LARCENY" — ELEMENTS.

Under Pen. Code, § 487, "grand larceny" is committed by taking property exceeding $50 in value, or taking from another's person, or when the property taken is a horse, cow, mule, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Grand Larceny.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑241—COMMITMENT—INFORMATION.

A commitment to answer merely for grand larceny is supported by an information charging grand larceny by taking from the person, under Pen. Code, § 872, requiring the commitment to state generally the nature of the offense.

3. BAIL 🔑58—LIABILITY ON BOND—GRAND LARCENY.

Under Pen. Code, § 1287, requiring bail bonds to state the offense generally, designating the offense as grand larceny, is sufficient, although the information charged grand larceny by taking from another's person.

4. ACKNOWLEDGMENT 🔑60—EFFECT.

Under Pen. Code, § 1287, requiring bail bonds to be acknowledged before the court, the certificate of acknowledgment is but prima facie evidence of the acknowledgment.

5. BAIL 🔑61—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

An acknowledgment is not part of a bail bond given in a criminal prosecution.

6. BAIL 🔑51—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—FIXING AMOUNT.

Under Pen. Code, § 1269, authorizing acceptance of bail for defendant's appearance, the superior court may adopt the amount fixed by a police court judge before filing of the information.

7. BAIL 🔑57—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—SUFFICIENCY.

A bail bond reciting that, an information having been filed, the signers undertook that accused would answer "the charge above mentioned," held not unduly onerous because requiring accused to answer the charge instead of the information, since "charge" is here equivalent to "information," and Pen. Code, § 985, authorizes bond for accused's appearance to answer the charge against him.

8. WORDS AND PHRASES—"CHARGE."

"Charge" may mean a formal complaint, information, or indictment.

Action by the People of the State of California against C. Lepori. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Application for rehearing in Supreme Court denied, 169 Pac. 694.

Stetson & Koford, of Oakland, for appellant. W. H. L. Hynes, Dist. Atty., and Wm. T. Satterwhite, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for the People.

LENNON, P. J. One Fassio was held to answer in the police court of the city of Oakland, on the 9th day of August, 1910, by a commitment reciting that: "It appearing * * * that the offense, felony, to wit, grand larceny, has been committed," etc. The complaint in the police court charged Fassio with grand larceny in stealing, taking, and carrying away personal property, to wit, $600.15. On the 23d day of August, 1910, the district attorney filed an information charging Fassio with stealing, taking, and carrying away from the person of one Giambattista personal property, to wit, $600.15. On the 24th day of August, 1910, the defendant in this case executed a bond obligating himself to pay to the people of the state of California the sum of $2,000 in case Fassio failed to appear and answer the crime of grand larceny, as charged in the information. Fassio failed to appear on the day set for trial, and the court ordered and declared the undertaking on bail forfeited. Subsequently judgment was entered in this action against the defendant, and the appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

Appellant urges to defeat the enforcement of the penalty of the bond that the information filed against Fassio is void because it charges the defaulting defendant with grand larceny under subdivision 2 of section 487 of the Penal Code, viz. larceny from the person, while he was held to answer for grand larceny without further description of the offense.

[1] Grand larceny is larceny committed in either of the following cases: (1) When the property taken is of a value exceeding $50; (2) when the property is taken from the person of another; (3) when the property taken is a horse, mare, gelding, cow, steer, bull, calf, mule, jack, or jenny. Pen. Code, § 487.

[2] Appellant's contention that the information charges a different offense than that for which defendant was held to answer, i. e., that grand larceny is something different from the offense defined in Penal Code, § 487, subd. 2, is untenable. Grand larceny is a general term designating the offense which the three subdivisions of section 487 of the Penal Code more particularly define. The commitment in the present case complied with the parenthetical injunctions of section 872, Penal Code, and held for the "offense according to the fact, stating generally the nature thereof," and the information charged the crime stated in the commitment, only stating it with greater particularity.

[3] Defendant cannot rightfully complain of the designation of the offense as "grand larceny" in the bond, for the Code merely provides that the bond "designate it generally." Pen. Code, § 1287. A designation of the offense as grand larceny in a bond under a statute declaring that it shall "state briefly the nature of the offense" has been held sufficient. State v. Birchim, 9 Nev. 95.

[4, 5] Appellant contends that the bond in suit was not acknowledged as required by statute, and bases his contention upon the absence of any certificate of acknowledgment. Section 1287 of the Penal Code merely provides that the undertaking be "acknowledged before the court." A certificate of acknowledgment is but a mode of proof, but prima facie evidence of a fact, and there is no indication in the statute of a purpose to make a certificate the exclusive evidence of the fact of acknowledgment. But, even if the statute did require a certificate of acknowledgment, a plea of its absence would not, we think, avail appellant. The Code provides that bail must in all cases justify by affidavit (Pen. Code, §§ 1280, 1288), and yet it has been held that the justification forms no part of the contract, and its absence will not permit a bondsman to escape his liability (Murdock v. Brooks, 38 Cal. 596, 602; Carpenter v. Furrey, 128 Cal. 665, 669, 61 Pac. 369). A parity of reasoning compels the conclusion that an acknowledgment is not a part of the contract.

[6] Appellant claims that the bond was not fixed by the proper magistrate, in that, no bail having been given before the filing of the information, its amount should have been fixed by the superior court. The fact that the superior court adopted the amount fixed by the judge of the police court is immaterial. The important fact is "the acceptance by a competent court or magistrate, of the undertaking of sufficient bail for the appearance of the defendant, according to the terms of the undertaking, or that the bail will pay to the people of this state a specified sum," and it is the acceptance that constitutes the taking of bail as defined by the Code. Pen. Code, § 1269.

The bond itself conformed to the requirements of section 1287 of the Penal Code, which gives the form of undertaking, and the record discloses that the bondsmen presented the bond in the superior court of Alameda county for the purpose of releasing Fassio from custody; that the superior judge accepted and approved the bond, and the bond was filed and became a matter of record in the superior court of that county.

[7] Appellant contends that the bond is more onerous than that prescribed by law, because the bond does not recite that the above-named Fassio will appear and answer the information above mentioned, but avers that he will appear and answer the charge above mentioned. In this behalf he argues that there is a difference between being required to answer to the charge and to answer to the information; that the word charge is more inclusive than the word information. The bond reads:

> "An information having been filed, * * * we * * * undertake that the above-named Alferdo Fassio will appear and answer the charge above mentioned."

[8] Charge may mean a "formal complaint, information, or indictment" (People v. Garnett, 129 Cal. 366, 61 Pac. 1114), and, as here used, cannot mean anything more or different than information. Furthermore, the Code itself is an authority for the form used. Pen. Code, § 985.

Judgment affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District is denied. We do not question in the slightest degree the correctness of the views expressed by that court in regard to the claim that no recovery can be had on the bond because, as is urged, the information charges a different offense from that for which the defendant in the criminal case was held to answer. We deem it proper to say, however, that even if the information did state a different offense as claimed, that fact would not be a good defense in an action on the bond. The information would not be void in such a case, but only subject to be set aside on proper motion (section 995, Pen. Code), and a bond given on release of the defendant from custody to secure his appearance as required during the pendency of the proceeding on the information filed would certainly be a valid obligation.

ROBINSON v. BAKER et al. (Civ. 1954.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 14, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 10, 1918.)

SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES ⚷118—LIABILITY FOR NEGLECT OR MISCONDUCT — LEVYING WRIT OF ATTACHMENT—STATUTE.

Under Pol. Code, § 4166, providing that no direction or authority by a party or his attorney to a sheriff in respect to the execution of any process or return, or of any act or omission relating thereto, will discharge the sheriff from liability for neglect or misconduct, unless it is contained in writing signed by the party or by his attorney, a sheriff who levied a writ of attachment upon certain realty, and who without such written consent released such attachment and placed it upon money in escrow payable to the defendant in attachment, in consequence of which plaintiff's judgment was not satisfied, could not prove oral instructions to release the realty, and was liable for the amount of the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Henry Robinson against T. A. Baker and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant Baker appeals. Order affirmed.

E. J. Emmons and R. J. Hudson, both of Bakersfield, for appellant. E. L. Foster and T. F. Allen, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This appeal is taken from an order denying a motion made in the superior court by defendant T. A. Baker for a new trial, after an adverse judgment had been entered against him.

At the times material to this controversy Baker was sheriff of the county of Kern. As such sheriff there had been placed in his hands a writ of attachment in an action brought by this plaintiff, Robinson, against one Valentine. Acting under written direction of Robinson's attorney, Baker caused a levy to be made upon certain real estate standing in the name of Valentine. It appears that, at the time this attachment was levied, negotiations were pending for the sale of the same real estate, and money had been deposited in escrow to an amount more than equaling the demand of Robinson in his suit against Valentine. The agent of the proposed purchasers discovered the existence of the lien of the attachment and made effort to have the property cleared. They interviewed Baker, the sheriff, and it was suggested that the real estate be released and the attachment be placed upon the money which had been deposited as before mentioned. Baker, after some talk with the attorney for Robinson, the plaintiff in the attachment suit, and possibly also with the plaintiff himself, released the real estate and levied, or attempted to levy, upon the money. For some reason the attachment did not hold as against the fund, and Robinson's claim was not satisfied after judgment. This action was then brought against the sheriff to recover the amount of that judgment, the claim made being that Robinson was deprived of the security which he had obtained by reason of the levying of the writ of attachment upon the real estate. It was alleged that the act of the sheriff in releasing the real estate was without the authority of the plaintiff. At the trial the defendant sought to prove that oral authorization had been given to the sheriff to release the real estate, and that the sheriff had acted under such authorization, which authorization the appellant contends was sufficient in law to protect the sheriff against the liability here sought to be enforced. The trial judge, after hearing the testimony as to the alleged oral instructions, ordered all of that testimony stricken out, holding that under the provisions of section 4166 of the Political Code the sheriff could only be protected in releasing an attachment, under the facts exhibited here, by justifying under written direction so to do made by the plaintiff or his attorney. A part of the testimony stricken out was that given by appellant Baker, as follows:

> "Well, the day that the release was made, I interviewed Mr. Foster (the attorney for Robinson) and asked him if he had any objections to me releasing the real estate and serving the attachment on $2,000 in cash that had been placed in Mr. McDonald's hands in escrow to purchase this land, and he said that he considered the money better than the land, and so far as he was concerned, he had no objections to making the release, but he didn't care to give me any written instructions, but he was willing to have me release the real estate and attach the money."

Section 4166 of the Political Code provides that:

> "No direction or authority by a party or his attorney to a sheriff, in respect to the execution of process or return thereof, or to any act or omission relating thereto, is available to discharge or excuse the sheriff from a liability for neglect or misconduct, unless it is contained in a writing, signed by the attorney of the party, or by the party, if he has no attorney."

The provisions of this section seem to us to be very clear and not reasonably susceptible of misconstruction. The section plainly advises sheriffs that they must have written authority in relinquishing liens acquired under process. Respondent has cited us to a number of decisions from eastern states, where like provisions of a law were considered, and the expressions in the opinions are quite uniform to the effect that the purpose of the law is to prevent disputes and contradictory proof being made where an attaching officer is being charged with a negligent act of omission or commission in connection with the service or handling of court process. We find that this statute has had a place in the law of this state for a great many years. It is incorporated, in practically the exact text now found in the Political Code, in an act of the Legislature passed in 1851, defining the duties of sheriffs. Stats. 1851, p. 196. In the case of Sanford v. Boring, Sheriff, 12 Cal. 539, the court gave consideration to the statute and held that evidence of parol instructions given by a plaintiff to the sheriff is not admissible. The case there is parallel with this one on the question involved. We quote from that opinion:

> "Nor did the court err in refusing to permit evidence of parol instructions from the plaintiff in execution to the sheriff, to permit the defendant to take or keep possession. The statute is express, that no direction or authority by a party or his attorney to a sheriff in respect to the execution of process, or the return thereof, or to any act in relation thereto, shall be available to discharge or excuse the sheriff for a liability for neglect or misconduct unless it be contained in writing, etc. The construction of appellant's counsel of this act is too narrow and technical. The evident meaning of the language embraces all acts done by the sheriff in respect to the execution of process, including, of course, the care and disposition of the property levied on—the most important of these acts."

While it is no doubt true that a party may always ratify an unauthorized act, we find no evidence in the record sufficient to warrant the conclusion that Robinson in any such manner bound himself in affirmation of the sheriff's act in releasing the real estate attachment. It may be remarked that the record shows that the attorney for Robinson testified that he refused to consent to allow the sheriff to release the real estate. However, the question of preponderance of evidence is not one to be considered here, for if the directions to release could be shown by parol, then the appellant would be correct in his contention that the court erred in striking out the testimony of such intent. We think that the trial court was right in its ruling, and that the order refusing to grant a new trial was properly made.

The order is affirmed.

BRANNIGAN v. MILLER. (Civ. 1949.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 13, 1917.)

Costs 🔑260(4)—Appeal Taken to Delay—Damages.

An appeal in conversion action for insufficiency of evidence to support certain findings, where defendant appellant asked reversal merely because of claimed preponderance of the evidence in his favor, although the findings were directly and substantially supported by other evidence, could not be regarded as having been made in good faith, and $50 damages, in addition to costs, would be awarded respondent; it appearing that the appeal was taken for purposes of delay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Samuel Brannigan against F. B. Miller. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cleveland Schultz, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Amend & Amend, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant on account of the unlawful conversion of personal property. The only foundation claimed for the appeal from the judgment is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain two of the findings made by the trial court. Both of these findings of fact are directly supported by the testimony of the plaintiff. Counsel for appellant asks us to take into consideration the fact that the testimony of the plaintiff was contradicted by the testimony of several witnesses introduced by the defendant. In other words, he asks us to reverse a judgment because of a claimed preponderance of the evidence in favor of the defendant, although the findings are directly and substantially supported by other evidence. The rulings against the contention of appellant are uniform and innumerable. Such an appeal cannot be regarded as having been made in good faith.

It appearing to the court that this appeal was taken for the purposes of delay, it is ordered that the judgment be affirmed, and that on account of such delay the respondent recover the sum of $50 damages, in addition to the costs.

PEOPLE v. TAMINAGO. (Cr. 558.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 8, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 7, 1918.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑938(3)—Newly Discovered Evidence—Time of Discovery.

In a trial for murder, where defendant's counsel addressed certain questions to a witness to show that defendant was weak-minded and simple-minded, but where no attempt was made to prove his insanity, evidence tending to establish his insanity was not newly discovered evidence within the meaning of that term.

2. Criminal Law 🔑1042—Appeal—Insanity—Action of Court Below.

In a trial for murder, where no attempt was made to prove defendant's insanity, but where between the verdict and the sentence defendant presented an affidavit of two examining physicians as to his sanity, and where defendant had said that he had no legal cause why judgment should not be pronounced, a claim of error in pronouncing judgment without having his sanity passed upon by the jury was not reviewable, as there was no action or order in the trial court presenting such question.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

T. Taminago was convicted of murder in the second degree, and from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Tom L. Johnston, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. The appellant was tried under an information charging him with the murder of one Watanabe, was convicted of murder in the second degree, and was sentenced to imprisonment for 20 years. The appeal is from the judgment and sentence, and from an order denying the appellant's motion for a new trial.

Both Taminago and Watanabe were Japanese, and were employed in the kitchen of a hospital in the city of Los Angeles. Under circumstances which need not now be detailed, the evidence shows, without dispute, that Taminago shot Watanabe to death at the place where they were employed. In support of appellant's motion for a new trial, which was made on the ground of newly discovered evidence, there was offered an affidavit made by two registered physicians of the state. The affidavit, which was uncontroverted, contained a lengthy statement of the symptoms and condition of Taminago, and also the following conclusions of the physicians:

> "We are unqualifiedly of the opinion that he is insane, and has been so for more than a year last past, that he is suffering from a prolonged state of depression, * * * and that he is in a condition of chronic melancholia and not responsible for his actions or statements."

[1] We cannot say there was error in denying the motion. Motions for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence are looked upon by the courts with distrust and disfavor, as public policy demands that a litigant should be compelled to exhaust every reasonable effort to produce all his evidence at his trial. People v. Byrne, 160 Cal. 217, 116 Pac. 521. That such an effort was not made in the present case is indicated by the fact that, at the trial, appellant's counsel addressed certain questions to witnesses "to show if there was any weakness of mind or anything of that sort" in the defendant and to show that he was "simpleminded." The questions were excluded by the court upon the statement of counsel that no attempt was being made to prove insanity. Appellant's counsel evidently knew, or believed, at the time of the trial, that appellant was not normally minded, to say the least; and that knowledge, or belief, should have been followed by an attempt to ascertain and present to the court evidence upon his condition of mind, if investigation in fact made it appear that he was insane. Under such circumstances it cannot be said that evidence tending to establish the insanity of the appellant was newly discovered, within the legal meaning of that term.

[2] The examination of the appellant by the two physicians was made, and their affidavit was presented to the trial court, between verdict and sentence. It is contended "that the court erred in pronouncing judgment and sentence upon this defendant without having his sanity passed upon by jury," in the face of the uncontroverted affidavit of the physicians; but there is nothing in the record upon which the presentation of the question can be predicated. The trial court was given no opportunity to pass upon the point. Before Taminago was sentenced, he was asked if he had any legal cause why judgment should not be pronounced against him, his counsel being present, and he responded that he had not. The purpose of an appeal from a trial court is to review some action of the court, and as there was no action in this instance, no order which involved the question now sought to be presented, there is nothing to review. If Taminago is in fact insane, the law furnishes ample opportunity for the determination of the question at any time, upon the taking of appropriate steps to that end.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PLATZ v. MARION. (Civ. 1750.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 9, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 7, 1918.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑90(2)—JURISDICTION—BARRATRY—JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

The crime of common barratry is a simple misdemeanor of which justices' courts have general jurisdiction.

2. FALSE IMPRISONMENT 🔑7(2) — ISSUING WARRANT ON DEFECTIVE COMPLAINT—LIABILITY OF JUSTICE OF PEACE.

A justice of the peace is not liable for damages for false imprisonment for in good faith issuing a warrant on a complaint which he believes to state an offense of which he has jurisdiction, although the complaint does not state the offense, under Pen. Code, §§ 1426, 1427, providing that a complaint must be filed, and that, if it states an offense, a warrant must issue; the determination of the sufficiency of the complaint being the exercise of judicial powers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Matthew S. Platz against A. W. Marion for false imprisonment. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Arnold and Matthew S. Platz, both of Bakersfield, for appellant. Emmons & Johnstone and Foster & Barnhart, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

HART, J. Plaintiff, an attorney at law, practicing in Kern county, brought the action against defendant, a justice of the peace in said county, to recover $25,300 for false imprisonment. A demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained, plaintiff failed further to amend, and judgment by default was entered against him, from which judgment he prosecutes this appeal.

It is alleged in the amended complaint that on or about March 9, 1915, defendant issued a warrant for the arrest of plaintiff for the crime of common barratry; that plaintiff was arrested under said warrant and was released upon bail; that on the 12th of March, 1915, plaintiff's bondsmen surrendered him into the custody of the sheriff, whereupon he secured another bail bond and was released; that on March 18th the bondsmen on said second bail bond surrendered plaintiff to the sheriff, and he was imprisoned in the county jail from that time until about noon of the 19th day of March, 1915; on said last-named date, plaintiff applied to the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus, which was granted, and plaintiff was released upon giving bail; that on the 5th day of April, 1915, the Supreme Court ordered the release of plaintiff "by reason of there not having been filed with said justice of the peace any complaint setting forth any facts showing that this plaintiff had been guilty of any public offense." It is then alleged "that defendant was wholly without jurisdiction to issue said warrant of arrest or to order this plaintiff held to bail or to be committed," and that said arrest and imprisonment were "without any right or authority so to do."

Attached to the amended complaint and made part thereof is a copy of the complaint filed with defendant as justice of the peace upon which said warrant of arrest was issued, which complaint, after the entitlement thereof, reads as follows:

"Personally appeared before me this 9th day of March, 1915, W. C. Dorris, of Bakersfield, county of Kern, state of California, who, being first duly sworn, complains and accuses Matthew S. Platz of the crime of common barratry, committed as follows: That the said Matthew S. Platz, on the dates hereinafter mentioned, at Bakersfield, and in said county of Kern, state of California, did willfully, unlawfully, and maliciously engage in the practice of exciting and did excite groundless judicial proceedings in the following manner and instances:

"(1) Said Matthew S. Platz, on or about the 9th day of April, 1914, did institute and excite a certain attempted appeal from a judgment of the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Kern, in an action entitled People of the State of California, on the relation of W. C. Dorris, Plaintiff, v. James McKamy, Defendant, being numbered therein as civil action No. 9036, which said appeal was attempted to be taken to the Supreme Court of the state of California, and was groundless and void, as the said Matthew S. Platz then and there well knew;

"(2) That thereafter, on or about the 7th day of October, 1914, the said Matthew S. Platz initiated and excited an attempted proceeding in the Supreme Court of the state of California against the state of California by James McKamy, petitioner, and against the superior court of the state of California, and sought to obtain in said proceeding last mentioned a writ of review of the proceedings and said action No. 9036 in the superior court of Kern county, which said application for said writ of review in said Supreme Court was then and there groundless, as the said Matthew S. Platz then and there well knew; that thereafter said writ of review was denied by an order of the Supreme Court of the state of California.

"(3) That thereafter, on or about the 14th day of February, 1915, the said Matthew S. Platz initiated and excited an attempted proceeding in the Supreme Court of the state of California, wherein and whereby the said Matthew S. Platz filed a petition to vacate the order entered by said Supreme Court refusing the writ of review, was then and there groundless, as the said Matthew S. Platz then and there well knew; that said petition was thereafter denied by said Supreme Court of the state of California.

"(4) That thereafter, on or about the 3d day of November, 1914, said Matthew S. Platz excited and caused to be instituted a certain proceeding in the District Court of Appeal of the State of California in and for the Second Appellate District, entitled, James McKamy v. W. V. Matlack et al., as Trustees of the City of Bakersfield, in which proceeding the said Matthew S. Platz sought to obtain and have issued out of said court a writ of prohibition directed to the defendants therein and prohibiting them from filling a vacancy in the office of the city marshal of the said city of Bakersfield, which said application was then and there groundless and void and vexatious, as the said Matthew S. Platz then and there well knew;

"And all of said proceedings above described were excited, instituted, and initiated with corrupt and malicious intent to vex and annoy the enforcement of the judgment in said action No. 9036 of said superior court of Kern county, and to vex and annoy the superior court of said county and the judges thereof and the city trustees of the city of Bakersfield; all of which said acts were instituted and commenced while the said Matthew S. Platz was an attorney at law duly and legally admitted to practice in the courts of the state of California—contrary," etc.

The demurrer interposed to said amended complaint was upon the general ground, and also upon the special ground that certain allegations thereof were uncertain.

The ruling of the court below on the demurrer raises the question whether an individual may maintain an action for damages against a public officer clothed with judicial powers when, in the purported exercise of such powers, such officer does or performs some act in excess thereof which results in injury to the complaining party.

As the complaint herein shows, an attempt was made to charge the plaintiff before the defendant, as a justice of the peace, with the crime of common barratry, as the same is defined by section 158 of the Penal Code. Said section reads:

> "Common barratry is the practice of exciting groundless judicial proceedings, and is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months and by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars."

Section 159 of the said Code provides:

> "No person can be convicted of common barratry except upon proof that he has excited suits or proceedings at law in at least three instances, and with a corrupt or malicious intent to vex and annoy."

The alleged complaint filed before the defendant, as a justice, against the plaintiff, wholly and, to the legal mind, quite obviously failed to state the offense denounced by section 158 or any offense known to the laws of this state. It will be observed that the document upon which the warrant authorizing the arrest of the plaintiff was issued and upon which the latter was in fact placed under arrest merely sets forth that in four different instances the plaintiff, as an attorney at law, unavailingly sought as many different legal remedies in a judicial adjudication against a client of his as to the same subject-matter. Manifestly it is no crime, nor, indeed, is it in contravention of the common ethics of the profession, for a lawyer to resort to and exhaust every available remedy known to the law to relieve a client of the consequences of any judgment recovered in a court against him, and the complaint filed in the justice's court and purporting to charge him with the violation of sections 158 and 159 of the Penal Code clearly discloses that he did no more than this in the matter as to which it was therein alleged that his professional activities brought him within the ban of said sections. The complaint here states, as we have seen, that the Supreme Court, in a proceeding upon habeas corpus, held that the complaint filed before the justice of the peace (the defendant) utterly failed to state any public offense against the plaintiff, and so ordered his discharge from arrest under the process issued upon said complaint, and we find, from a certified copy of the proceedings in that case before the Supreme Court, that the allegation of the complaint in that regard is correct. But, while all that has been said of the complaint is true, may it be held that the defendant, in a legal sense, exceeded the jurisdiction or powers with which the law clothes justices of the peace when he issued the warrant of arrest against the plaintiff under the circumstances disclosed by the complaint herein?

[1] The crime of common barratry, by reason of the nature and extent of the punishment prescribed therefor, is what may be and often is termed, in contradistinction to indictable misdemeanors, a simple misdemeanor, of which, it will, of course, be conceded, justices' courts have general jurisdiction. Pen. Code, § 1425; People v. Sacramento Butchers' Ass'n, 12 Cal. App. 471, 485, 486, 107 Pac. 712.

[2] Section 1426 of the Penal Code provides:

> "All proceedings and actions before a justice's or police court, for a public offense of which such courts have jurisdiction, must be commenced by complaint under oath, setting forth the offense charged," etc.

When, therefore, a complaint is filed before a justice of the peace charging or purporting to charge a person with a public offense of which the justice's court has jurisdiction, it then becomes the duty of the justice, in the exercise of the judicial powers with which he is clothed, to determine, upon an examination of the complaint, whether a public offense is therein stated against the party so sought to be charged. Upon the determination of this question rests the determination of the further question whether the justice is legally authorized upon the document filed as such complaint to issue his warrant for the arrest of the person of the party so charged or attempted to be charged. Since, then, he must pass upon the sufficiency of the complaint to state a public offense of which his court has jurisdiction for the purpose of determining whether he is by said complaint given the authority to issue a warrant of arrest, in doing so, as well as when issuing the warrant, if he concludes that a public offense cognizable in his court has been committed by the person named in the document as the accused, he necessarily exercises the judicial powers with which the law invests his court as fully and completely as when, in presiding at the trial of a charge of misdemeanor of which his court has jurisdiction, he rules upon questions involving the admissibility of evidence. The acts referred to are as much and as clearly within his judicial functions or powers as any act which the law gives him the authority to perform as a judicial officer. As in ruling upon questions of the admissibility of evidence at a trial, so in the case of determining whether a complaint filed with him and purporting to charge against some one a public offense triable in his court does or does not state the offense so sought to be charged, he may fall into error or arrive at an erroneous conclusion upon the legal propositions involved. While, as in this case, the purported complaint upon which he issued his warrant of arrest might have been in law no complaint at all, because of its utter failure to charge the offense thus attempted to be preferred against the defendant, yet it would or could hardly be said that, his court having general jurisdiction of the crime which was thus attempted to be stated, he was not acting within his powers as a judicial officer when performing the act of issuing the warrant of arrest, notwithstanding it subsequently developed that, through error of judgment, he issued the warrant upon a foundation insufficient in law to justify such action.

Section 1427 of the Penal Code provides, inter alia, that:

> "If the justice of the peace * * * is satisfied therefrom [the complaint filed] that the offense complained of has been committed, he must issue a warrant of arrest," etc.

This means, and can only mean, that if the justice honestly and in good faith believes and concludes, from the complaint as filed, that the offense thus charged or attempted to be charged, being an offense of which his court has general jurisdiction, has been committed, he must thereupon issue a warrant of arrest for the party named in the complaint as the accused; and where the justice so satisfies himself that the offense "complained of" has been committed—that is, where he thus makes up his mind, and thereupon issues the warrant of arrest honestly and in good faith or without being actuated therein by malicious or corrupt motives (and there is no such showing or even such claim made here)—then, as a matter of public policy and in the interest of the public service, he should not be held to be liable in civil damages because it transpires that, through mere error of judgment, he based the issuance of the warrant of arrest upon a complaint insufficient, in law to charge the offense thereby sought to be stated. We base this conclusion upon the obvious proposition that, if a judicial officer, whether of high or low degree in point of jurisdiction and dignity, were to be subject to the harassment incident to a civil action for damages by every suitor appearing as a litigant or as an accused in a criminal proceeding in his court, who has been disappointed over some ruling or judgment made or entered against him, the just and orderly administration of perhaps the most important department of the public service might be greatly handicapped and impaired, if, indeed, the ends thereof not wholly frustrated, and that public policy requires that no proceeding in law which might lead to such a situation should be countenanced or upheld.

It is true that in some of the early cases it seems to have been laid down that, while a civil action for damages for a wrongful act by a judicial officer, when purporting to be exercising the lawful jurisdiction of the court or tribunal of which he is the presiding judge, will not lie against a judge of a court of superior or general jurisdiction, even though such act may be shown to have been in excess of the jurisdiction of such judge, or done with malicious or corrupt motives, yet such an action will lie against a judge of an inferior court possessing special or limited jurisdiction if, in doing the act, such judge exceeds the powers expressly conferred upon him by law as such judge or upon the court of which he is the judge. See cases cited in Wyatt v. Arnot, 7 Cal. App. 221, 94 Pac. 86.

There are other cases, however, that hold that, upon principles of sound public policy, and to the end that the independence of the judiciary as a system shall always be maintained, the rule applicable to judges of courts of superior and general jurisdiction exempting such judges from liability to an action for damages at the hands of a suitor claiming to have been injuriously affected by acts done in excess of their judicial powers should be alike applicable to all judicial officers or public officers clothed with and whose duties require the exercise of judicial powers, including justices of the peace and like inferior judicial officers whose jurisdiction, as established by law, is special and limited. The early case of Grove v. Van Duyn, 44 N. J. Law, 654, 42 Am. Rep. 648, holds to this view. In that case, which, in its general aspect, resembles the case at bar, a justice of the peace had authorized the arrest of the plaintiff and held him to bail for unlawfully carrying away bundles of cornstalks, "under a statute which came no nearer to specifying such an offense than carrying away a stack of corn." It was held that the justice was not civilly liable. So much is said in the opinion in that case that is instructive and enlightening upon the question involved in the case before us that we feel justified in quoting therefrom in extenso. The court said:

> "Most of the general principles of law pertaining to that branch of this controversy which relates to the alleged liability of the defendant in this suit, who was a justice of the peace, are so completely settled as not to be open to discussion. The doctrine that an action will not lie against a judge for wrongful commitment, or for an erroneous judgment, or for any other act, made or done by him in his judicial capacity, is as thoroughly established as are any other of the primary maxims of the law. Such an exemption is absolutely essential to the very existence, in any valuable form, of the judicial office itself; for a judge could not be either respected or independent if his motives for his official actions or his conclusions, no matter how erroneous, could be put in question at the instance of every malignant or disappointed suitor. Hence we find this judicial immunity has been conferred by the laws of every civilized people. That it exists in this state in its fullest extent has been repeatedly declared by our own courts. Such was pronounced by the Supreme Court to be the admitted principle in the cases of Little v. Moore [4 N. J. Law] 1 South. 75 [7 Am. Dec. 574]; Taylor v. Doremus [16 N. J. Law] 1 Harr. 473; Mangold v. Thorpe [33 N. J. Law] 4 Vr. 137; and by this court in Loftus v. Fraz [43 N. J. Law] 14 Vr. 667. To this extent there is no uncertainty or difficulty whatever in the subject.
> "But the embarrassment arises where an attempt is made to express, with perfect definiteness, when it is that acts done by a judge, and which purport to be judicial acts, are such within the meaning of the rule to which reference has just been made. It is said everywhere in the text-books and decisions that the officer, in order to entitle himself to claim the immunity that belongs to judicial conduct, must restrict his action within the bounds of his jurisdiction, and jurisdiction has been defined to be 'the authority of the law to act officially in the particular matter in hand.' Cooley on Torts, 417. But these maxims, although true in a general way, are not sufficiently broad to embrace the principle of immunity that appertains to a court or judge exercising a general authority. Their defect is that they leave out of the account all those cases in which the officer, in the discharge of his public duty, is bound to decide whether or not a particular case, under the circumstances as presented to him, is within his jurisdiction, and he falls into error in arriving at his conclusion. In such instance the judge, in point of fact and law, has no jurisdiction, according to the definition just given, over 'the particular matter in hand,' and yet, in my opinion, plainly he is not responsible for the results that wait upon his mistake. And it is upon this precise point that we find confusion in the decisions.
> "There are certainly cases which hold that, if a magistrate, in the regular discharge of his functions, causes an arrest to be made under his warrant on a complaint which does not contain the charge of a crime cognizable by him, he is answerable in an action for the injury that has ensued. But I think these cases are deflections from the correct rule, [in that] they make no allowance for matters of doubt and difficulty. If the facts presented for the decision of the justice are of uncertain signification with respect to their legal effect, and he decides one way, and exercises a cognizance over the case, if the superior court in which the question arises in a suit against the justice differs with him on this close legal question, is he open by reason of his error to an attack by action? If the officer's exemption from liability is to depend on the question whether he had jurisdiction over the particular case, it is clear that such officer is often triable under such conditions, because the higher court, in deciding a doubtful point of law, may have declared that some element was wanting in the complaint which was essential to bring this case within the judicial competency of the magistrate."

In the case of Hayes v. Hutchinson & Shields et al., 81 Wash. 394, 142 Pac. 865, a justice of the peace was proceeded against in an action for damages for causing the arrest of the plaintiff on an alleged illegal warrant of arrest; the claim being that the complaint upon which said warrant was issued did not state a case against the plaintiff under the "arrest and bail" statute of the state of Washington. The Supreme Court of that state held that the action against the justice of the peace could not be maintained, and, in discussing the principles upon which cases of the character of the case at bar are to be decided and disposed of, uses the following language:

> "Public policy demands, and the better reasoned cases hold, that a judge of inferior and limited jurisdiction, such as a justice of the peace, is not liable in damages for an unlawful arrest upon process issued by him in the absence of malice—and no malice is alleged—in a case which is colorably though not really within his jurisdiction"—citing a large number of cases, among which is the Alabama case of Broom v.

Douglass, 175 Ala. 268, 57 South. 860, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) p. 164, in which the syllabus states the rule as declared therein as follows: "A judge of limited jurisdiction is not personally liable for issuing a warrant of arrest which he had no authority to do, in a case of which he had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, if some one apparently qualified to do so appeared before him and made the requisite complaint, stating some facts which enter into and may under some conditions, or in co-operation with unstated facts, constitute a criminal offense, or stating some fact or facts which bear general similitude to a fact or facts designated by law as constituting an offense."

There are many other cases to the same effect as the above cases, and among these the following may be mentioned: Feld v. Loftis, 240 Ill. 105, 88 N. E. 281; Brooks v. Mangan, 86 Mich. 576, 49 N. W. 633, 24 Am. St. Rep. 137; Bohri v. Barnett, 144 Fed. 389, 75 C. C. A. 327; Robertson v. Parker, 99 Wis. 652, 75 N. W. 423, 67 Am. St. Rep. 889; McIntosh v. Bullard, 95 Ark. 227, 129 S. W. 85.

The case of De Courcey v. Cox, 94 Cal. 665, 30 Pac. 95, cited and relied upon by the appellant, is, in the facts, wholly unlike the case at bar, and is therefore not in point. It appears from the opinion in that case that a complaint was made before the defendant, as justice of the peace, charging the plaintiff in the action for damages against said justice with refusing to return the sum of $20, alleged to have been overpaid said plaintiff by the El Cajon Vineyard Company; that the justice, upon the complaint so made, issued a warrant of arrest upon which the plaintiff was arrested and taken before the said justice of the peace, and required to and did plead to said charge; that after trial the justice rendered judgment that plaintiff restore said amount of $20, or be committed to the county jail for 20 days; and that, pursuant to the judgment so rendered, the justice issued a commitment and delivered it to an officer, who executed it by imprisoning and confining the plaintiff in the county jail for the period of three days. The Supreme Court held that the complaint stated a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant (the justice of the peace) for damages for false imprisonment. But readily it will be observed that absolutely no public offense whatever under the law was stated in the so-called complaint filed with the justice against the plaintiff. The justice had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the complaint, so far as a criminal charge was concerned. The complaint merely alleged that the plaintiff, by a mistake, had been overpaid, and there was no pretense, so far as the complaint disclosed, that he obtained or even retained the amount overpaid through any criminal act on his part. If the so-called complaint disclosed anything at all, it was merely a civil action for money had and received, and obviously the proceeding taken by the justice under the complaint was wholly and entirely coram non judice. It was not a case which called for the arrest of the person of the plaintiff. It was, as before suggested, in no sense a criminal case or a proceeding in which the plaintiff was accused of committing a public offense. The facts pleaded by the plaintiff in his action against the justice of the peace might therefore be held sufficient to raise the implication that malice characterized the acts of the justice of the peace in issuing the warrant for the arrest of and in committing the plaintiff to imprisonment.

In the present case, as we have shown, the offense attempted to be charged against the plaintiff is within the general jurisdiction of the justice's court and of the defendant, as a judge of such court. The subject-matter of the complaint, though not well pleaded, the defendant, as a justice, had jurisdiction of. His failure to acquire jurisdiction of the person of the plaintiff lay entirely in the failure to state in the complaint facts sufficient to show that such an offense had been committed. There is, as seen, no charge of malice or corrupt motives in the act of the defendant in issuing the warrant. Obviously, an attempt—a very crude attempt, it is true—was made to charge the crime of common barratry, and it will be admitted that some facts were stated in the complaint which, co-operating with other conceivable facts not stated, would constitute the crime which it was attempted to charge. As above stated, in passing upon the question of the sufficiency of the complaint to state the offense named therein, the defendant was only exercising the powers with which he was invested as a judicial officer, and, although to a trained lawyer the insufficiency of the facts stated in the complaint to state the offense thus sought to be charged would readily appear, still we must assume, in the absence of a showing of malice or other bad motives in the act of the defendant in issuing the warrant, that in so doing he acted in good faith and in the honest belief that the document upon which he issued the warrant was sufficient in law as a complaint to justify that act. And it may with no impropriety be added that, while there is no legal presumption that the average person selected to fill the office and discharge the duties of a justice of the peace is not a lawyer, still, as a matter of very common knowledge, we know that, generally speaking, laymen, without any previous education in the law, and who are not conversant with the technical rules of procedure whereby justice is required to be administered, are called to fill judicial positions of inferior and limited jurisdiction, and therefore it is not to be taken as a matter of astonishment that the law, substantive as well as procedural or adjective, is often administered in the inferior tribunals in a very primitive and irregular manner. Hence it may readily be apprehended that it might, and perhaps would, prove to be destructive of an efficient branch of our judicial system, as it now exists, if it were found necessary to promulgate a rule whereby a justice of the peace may be subjected to a civil suit for damages for a mere error of judgment in the doing of some act or the issuance of some process which is within the general scope of his judicial powers, such act not having been prompted by an evil motive, but done in perfect good faith and in an honest belief that he was legally warranted in doing it. Indeed, it is very doubtful whether a lawyer, much less a layman, would be willing to accept the office of justice of the peace if it were true, as a legal proposition, that he would be required to discharge his judicial duties or examine every legal document or proceeding filed or brought before him at the peril of an action for damages in case he, through error of judgment, did some act which, though within his general jurisdiction, was not authorized in the particular case in hand. Of course, in all such cases some one may suffer injury, of a more or less aggravated nature, from the illegal act of the justice; but this result is only one of a number of inconveniencies which are necessarily incident to a system, the product of the imperfect human mind, which has not attained, and, in the very nature of things, cannot attain to that degree of perfection which admits of no mistakes and the inconveniences or injuries following therefrom. But we may repeat, as the cases above mentioned with gratifying perspicacity explain, that, upon the soundest principles of public policy, injuries resulting from errors so committed are without a legal or any remedy, a situation necessary to the preservation, in all its essential features, of the very system itself established for the administration of the law.

For the reasons herein given, the judgment is affirmed.

WEBSTER v. BARTLETT ESTATE CO. et al. (Civ. 2243.)

1. CORPORATIONS 🔑181(1)—STOCKHOLDERS—INSPECTING BOOKS.
A stockholder has both a common law and statutory right to inspect the corporation's books.

2. MANDAMUS 🔑129—INSPECTING BOOKS—ENFORCEMENT.
A stockholder's right to inspect the corporate books may be enforced by a writ of mandate.

3. CORPORATIONS 🔑181(3)—INSPECTION OF BOOKS BY STOCKHOLDER—RETROACTIVE OPERATION OF STATUTE.
The 1917 amendment to Civ. Code, §§ 377, 378, restricting inspection of corporate books to bona fide stockholders, is inapplicable to a case arising before the amendment.

4. CORPORATIONS 🔑181(3)—STOCKHOLDERS—INSPECTION OF BOOKS—BENEFICIAL INTEREST.
A bona fide stockholder need not have a beneficial interest in the shares.

5. CORPORATIONS 🔑181(3), 282—STOCKHOLDERS—INSPECTION OF BOOKS—DIRECTORS.
Only corporate stockholders may be directors, and the fact that shares are transferred in order to qualify a person as a director fails to show that the holder is not a bona fide stockholder.

6. CORPORATIONS 🔑175—STOCKHOLDERS' LIABILITY.
A person holding corporate shares in his own name is personally liable for assessments, etc., although the stock is actually held in trust for other persons.

7. CORPORATIONS 🔑181(3)—STOCKHOLDERS—INSPECTING BOOKS.
Prior to its amendment in 1917, Civ. Code, §§ 377, 378, making corporate books subject to inspection by stockholders, authorized inspection by a person holding a share in her own name, though the share belonged to another and was transferred simply to qualify her as a director.

8. CORPORATIONS 🔑181(1)—STOCKHOLDERS—INSPECTING BOOKS.
Prior to 1917 amendment to Civ. Code, §§ 377, 378, authorizing an inspection of corporate books, and under Const. art. 12, § 14, requiring corporate books to be open for inspection, etc., inspection could not be denied because the stockholder intended to use the information to the corporation's injury.

Appeal from Superior Court; San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Petition for writ of mandate by Emily B. Webster against the Bartlett Estate Company, a corporation, and others. From a judgment denying her petition, she appeals. Reversed.

E. S. Torrance, Charles P. Pritchard, and Warren E. Libby, all of San Diego, for appellant. Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment denying her petition for a writ of mandate whereby it was sought to compel the defendants to permit the petitioner to inspect and examine the books, records, and journals of defendant corporation. The action was commenced on May 31, 1916, after demand for such inspection and examination, which demand was refused by the defendants. The judgment was entered on the 1st day of July, 1916, and appeal taken within 60 days thereafter.

On the 25th day of June, 1907, one share of stock of defendant corporation was issued to appellant, and at all times thereafter said share of stock was in her name on the books of the corporation. Said demand was made by appellant as a stockholder, and is based upon her alleged rights as a stockholder. The answer of defendants to the petition does not deny the facts above stated, but alleges that said share of stock, which was transferred to appellant by one E. Bartlett Webster, was transferred to and held by appellant solely for the purpose of qualifying her as a director of the corporation; that she paid no consideration therefor; and that she received said certificate upon the understanding and agreement between her and E. Bartlett Webster that the share of stock was the property of E. Bartlett Webster, and would be returned to him upon demand or upon her ceasing to be a director of defendant corporation. The answer further alleged that if petitioner had made her demand as director of the corporation and had claimed and admitted that she was such director, defendants would have accorded her such inspection and examination, and that her demand was refused because she based her claim of right solely upon the ground that she was a stockholder. The court in its findings of fact declared that said certificate of stock, although issued to and standing on the books of the corporation in the name of appellant, was in reality the property of E. Bartlett Webster, and was held by appellant for him upon the terms and conditions and for the purposes set out in the answer, as above stated; that appellant is not now and never has been, since on or about the 25th day of June, 1917, a bona fide stockholder or the owner or holder of any of the shares of the capital stock of the corporation, "and is not a stockholder of said defendant corporation, Bartlett Estate Company, so as to entitle her to demand or have the right to inspect and examine the books, records, and journals of said defendant corporation." No demand for the return or retransfer of the certificate was ever made by E. Bartlett Webster. At the trial the plaintiff duly made and preserved all legal objections to the evidence offered by the defendants and received by the court showing the conditions and circumstances under which the certificate of stock was issued to the plaintiff.

[1-4] It is not denied, and it may not successfully be denied, that a stockholder of a corporation has the right to inspect the books of the corporation. This is a common-law right which also is recognized by statute in this state and which may be enforced by writ of mandate. Hobbs v. Tom Reed Gold Min. Co., 164 Cal. 497, 129 Pac. 781, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1112. The contention of respondents is that this right is confined to bona fide stockholders; that one who is not the real and beneficial owner of stock is not a bona fide stockholder, even though he holds certificates of stock duly registered in his name on the books of the corporation; and that the corporation has the right to go behind the fact of apparent ownership as shown by the books and may refuse inspection of its books, if the demanding stockholder is not in fact the real and beneficial owner of the shares. Counsel for respondents have quoted to us and used in their argument sections 377 and 378 of the Civil Code, as amended in the current year 1917, whereby the right of inspection of corporation records theretofore prescribed as the right of any stockholder, is now given to any bona fide stockholder. Whatever the effect of these amendments may be, they can have no bearing upon this case, for all rights to be determined herein depend upon the law as it was before these amendments were adopted. Moreover, it is well-settled law that one may be a bona fide stockholder without having any beneficial interest in the shares. Royal Consolidated Mining Co. v. Royal Consolidated Mines Co., Ltd., 157 Cal. 737, 110 Pac. 123, 137 Am. St. Rep. 165.

[5] Since the defendants by their answer claim that appellant when she made her demand was a director of the corporation, they necessarily admit her status as a stockholder, since only stockholders of corporations may be directors thereof. The mere fact that shares of stock are transferred to a person in order to qualify him to be a director of the corporation does not tend to prove that he is not a bona fide stockholder. In 7 Ruling Case Law, section 413 of the title on Corporations, authorities are cited supporting the rule as stated in the text, as follows:

> "As a general rule, however, the statutes, charter, or by-laws governing the corporation provide that the directors shall be stockholders, and where such is the requirement it is essential to render a person eligible to the office of director that he be an owner of stock in fact; and while the courts are not disposed to construe such requirement so strictly as to inhibit the transfer of stock for the express and avowed purpose of qualifying the transferee for election to the office of director or trustee, yet such rule is limited to a transfer in good faith and does not apply to render eligible one to whom stock is transferred solely for the purpose of qualifying him, the stock being immediately assigned back to the true owner in blank, though his name remains on the corporate books as a stockholder."

[6] A person who holds shares of stock actually issued to him and duly registered in his name on the books of the corporation incurs definite liabilities to the corporation, as well as to its creditors, even though he in fact holds such stock in trust for other persons. Such stockholder is personally liable to the corporation on account of assessments levied upon the stock. La Habra Oil Co. v. Francis, 169 Pac. 401, decided by this court October 29, 1917. In Market St. Ry. Co. v. Hellman, 109 Cal. 571, 42 Pac. 225, it was declared that a trustee must be deemed the legal owner of the stock and "as against the corporation and all the world, except his cestui que trust, no inquiry may be made touching his actions in the premises."

According to the provisions of section 322, Civil Code, the creditors of a corporation may not proceed to enforce (under circumstances therein stated) the statutory stockholders' liability against pledgees or trustee, but are limited to proceeding against the equitable owner. But the rule so provided does not apply in favor of one who takes the stock and holds it unqualifiedly in his own name. In Hurlburt v. Arthur, 140 Cal. 103, 73 Pac. 734, 98

Am. St. Rep. 17, where consideration was given to the terms of section 322, Civil Code, it was held that so long as a stockholder appears as such on the books of the corporation, there being nothing shown thereon to indicate that he does not hold as owner, he is subject to the stockholders' liability to the creditors of the corporation.

[7, 8] Obligations and liabilities carry with them concurrent rights. Since a stockholder who holds stock as, according to the findings of the court, the plaintiff held her stock in this case, is liable to pay assessments and is liable to creditors for a proportionate share of debts of the corporation, such stockholder is reasonably and legitimately entitled to the right of inspection and examination of its books and business. The appellant having established her status as a stockholder, defendants were not entitled to impose upon her a condition having reference to another matter, such as that she admit that she was a director of the corporation and make her demand as such director.

By their answer defendants alleged that the plaintiff's demand was not made in good faith, and was made solely for the purpose of harassing the defendant corporation and said defendant E. Bartlett Webster, and in the hope that she might discover evidence which would be of use and benefit to her in other actions against them. No finding of fact concerning these allegations was made by the court. Counsel for respondents in their brief refer to evidence showing the existence of such adverse litigation, and insist that it tends to show that appellant is seeking to obtain information which she intends to use to the injury of the corporation. They refer us again to the amendment to section 377 of the Civil Code as adopted in 1917, where some provision is made for denial of the right of inspection, upon a satisfactory showing that the stockholder demands the same with intent to use the information to the injury of the corporation. As we have said before, statutory amendments of 1917 are not available for the purpose of this case, and the amendment mentioned would not protect the respondents here, even if the court had found that such satisfactory showing of injurious intent had been made. The indicated evidence could not properly be received or considered in aid of the claimed purpose of defendants. In Johnson v. Langdon, 135 Cal. 624, 67 Pac. 1050, 87 Am. St. Rep. 156, which was a proceeding like that in the case at bar, a similar affirmative defense was offered and the court struck from the answer said affirmative portion thereof. This ruling was sustained. The Supreme Court said that:

> "The great weight of the American authorities is to the effect that where the right is statutory it is not necessary for the petition to aver or show the purposes or object of the inspection. Neither is it any defense to allege that the objects and purposes are improper, and that the petitioner desires to injure the business of the corporation. The clear legal right given by the Constitution and the statute cannot be defeated by stopping to inquire into motives."

That decision was followed by this court in Poor v. Yarnell, 28 Cal. App. 714, 153 Pac. 976. Article 12, § 14, of the state Constitution requires that the corporation books be kept "for inspection by every person having an interest therein." While we have based our discussion entirely upon the status of appellant as a stockholder, it may here be worthy of note that immediately prior to the transfer of appellant of said one share of stock she transferred to E. Bartlett Webster 400 shares of stock of the same corporation; that part of the consideration therefor was paid by giving her his promissory note for $71,200, pledging the 400 shares to her as security for said note; that there is no evidence that said note has been paid or said pledge released. It does not appear, however, that the facts concerning such pledge are shown upon the books of the corporation.

The judgment is reversed.

HUFFAKER v. McVEY et al. (Civ. 2259.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 14, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 10, 1918.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑757(2)—Review—Sufficiency of Complaint.

To warrant an opinion on the nature of the first or the amended complaint, it is necessary that the whole of the complaints be set forth in the briefs, and mere fragments are not sufficient.

2. Libel and Slander 🔑70—Bond—Statute.

Where the original complaint stated an action for libel and slander, and the amended complaint, though possibly stating an action for malicious prosecution, alleged facts sufficient to constitute an action for libel and slander, it was incumbent upon plaintiff to file the bond required by St. 1871–72, p. 533.

3. Pleading 🔑352 — Striking Amended Complaint—Order.

An order dismissing an action for libel and slander after plaintiff's failure to file the statutory bond was not an order striking the amended complaint from the files, though it rendered such complaint ineffectual.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Donahue, Judge.

Action by E. Huffaker against John L. McVey and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rodolph Hatfield and E. Huffaker, both of Oakland, for appellant. John L. McVey, of Oakland, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. This appeal is from a judgment of dismissal of an action after refusal of the plaintiff and appellant to file a bond as required by the provisions of the libel and slander act.

The case, as presented in appellant's briefs does not contain sufficient printed extracts from the record to enable this court to determine the character of either the first or the amended complaint.

> "While the alternative method of appeal permits parties to file typewritten transcripts in lieu of printed judgment-rolls and bills of exceptions, such permission casts no burden upon the appellate courts to examine the typewritten documents in deciding the appeal." California Sav. & Comm. Bank v. Canne, 169 Pac. 295; Beecham v. Burns, 168 Pac. 1058.

[1] To warrant an opinion on the nature of the complaints in this case it is necessary that the whole of the complaints be set forth, and mere fragments are not sufficient.

[2] However, a cursory examination of the typewritten transcript discloses the following facts: The original complaint, while not a model pleading, is an attempt to set forth an action for libel and slander. The lower court so construed it and ordered the plaintiff to file the statutory bond. Cal. Stats. 1871–72, p. 533. Plaintiff failed to file a bond within the time allowed by the court, but the day after the order plaintiff filed an amended complaint, and two days later filed a motion to vacate the order on the ground that plaintiff had the right under the law to amend his complaint to set forth the nature and purpose of his action, and that the complaint was not one for either libel or slander. On the hearing of the motion an order and judgment was made dismissing the action on the ground that plaintiff had not filed the requisite bond.

In our opinion, the original complaint states an action for libel and slander, and the amended complaint, while it perhaps states an action for malicious prosecution, certainly alleges facts sufficient to constitute an action for libel and slander. It was therefore incumbent upon the plaintiff to file the bond as ordered.

[3] The contention that the court erred in denying plaintiff the right to file an amended complaint is not supported by the record. The record shows that an amended complaint was filed, and it nowhere appears from the record that the court made any order striking such amended complaint from the files. The only reference to such amended complaint is found in the order dismissing the action after the failure of the plaintiff to file a bond. That order does not strike the amended complaint from the files, although the effect of the order was to render such amended complaint ineffectual for any purpose.

Judgment affirmed.

FOLEY et al. v. HORNUNG. (Civ. 1744.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 14, 1917.)

1. NEGLIGENCE ⇨32(2)—INVITEE ON PREMISES—CARE REQUIRED.

Where a merchant invites a customer to follow him to his workshop at the back of his store to look at goods stored there, such customer is not a mere licensee, but the merchant must use all reasonable means to make that part of the store safe for one visiting it.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1048(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES—REPETITION.

An objection to questions asked on rebuttal that had been answered on the direct should be sustained; but where the answers are mere repetitions, they are not seriously prejudicial.

3. TRIAL ⇨29(2)—COMMENTS ON EVIDENCE BY COURT.

A remark by the court on overruling an objection to question that the matter is "probably of some importance" could not result in having attached additional significance to the answers, and especially will it be so held where counsel did not see fit to call the matter to the court's attention at the time.

4. TRIAL ⇨295(9)—INSTRUCTIONS CONSTRUED AS A WHOLE—NUMBER OF WITNESSES.

Part of an instruction preceded by a proper instruction, that the number of witnesses should not be considered was cured by another clause that where the evidence is contradictory no testimony should be disregarded, but circumstances, as in cases where the number of witnesses on each side is unequal, should be considered.

5. TRIAL ⇨315—VERDICT—"CHANCE."

Where jurors disagreeing as to amount of verdict arrive at a sum by the quotient method without agreeing to be bound by the result, and then after considering the result adopt approximately the same sum, the verdict is not one arrived at by chance within Code Civ. Proc. § 657, making such verdicts grounds for new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Chance.]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1015(5)—FINDINGS OF FACT—CONTRADICTORY AFFIDAVITS.

Where affidavits of some jurors would show that a verdict was arrived at by chance, and affidavits by others denied such, the finding of the court to sustain the verdict will not be disturbed, though Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 2, provides that such conduct may be proved by the affidavit of one juror.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by David Foley and Mary Foley against Paul Hornung. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Thomas Scott and Rowen Irwin, both of Bakersfield, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiffs are husband and wife, and the action is by plaintiff Mary Foley for injuries received by her through the alleged negligence of the defendant. It appears from the complaint that the defendant is a merchant conducting business in the city of Bakersfield in a building situated on Chester avenue. It is alleged that the place of defendant's business consisted of a building, on the ground floor of which his general merchandise business was conducted, and to which access was had at the entrance on Chester avenue; that there was a basement to the building about nine feet below the ground floor; that towards the rear of said ground floor there was a large hole or opening in which was an elevator used for the purpose of conveying goods to and from the basement to the ground floor, and was "so located that any one entering said store for the purpose of making a purchase therein would be liable to fall into said hole or opening, unless the same was properly provided with guards or the said opening was closed," and that the said hole was dangerous to persons trading in or walking in or about said store; that on June 3, 1912, the plaintiff Mary Foley entered said defendant's store for the purpose of purchasing a tent, and was met by defendant, "who directed her to the rear end of said store to look at some tents which defendants were offering for sale"; that while plaintiff was passing to the rear of said store for the purpose mentioned, and having no knowledge that there was an opening or trap in said floor, she stepped into and fell through said hole to the basement, thus receiving the injury complained of; that the said opening was by reason of the negligence of defendant wholly unprotected or closed. The complaint then set forth the nature of the injuries received, alleging that they "were not caused by reason of the negligence of the said plaintiff Mary Foley."

A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and defendant answered, denying specifically the averments of the complaint, except as to the general description of the building and the location of the opening mentioned in the complaint, and alleged "that the hole mentioned and described in said complaint was carefully guarded by a rope firmly suspended a distance of 2½ feet above the floor of the storeroom, and about 4 feet distant from the edge of the opening mentioned in the said complaint in a manner so that the same was plainly visible to the sight of any person proceeding towards the said opening, and that the same formed an effectual obstruction against a person attempting to proceed towards said hole or opening, and the said plaintiff entirely disregarded the said guard or rope and deliberately walked under or over the same, and through her own carelessness and negligence, caused herself to be precipitated into the basement of the said building"; that defendant's store mentioned in the complaint was divided into two departments, "the fore part of which was arranged for the reception of customers of said defendant and of displaying and dispensing merchandise to them, and the rear portion of the said store at said time was used by the said defendant for a workshop, in the manufacture and repair of harness and other leather goods, and also for storing merchandise of the said defendant in a loft suspended over said shop"; that the said opening mentioned in the complaint "was situated in the rear of said store and in that portion thereof so used by the said defendant as a workshop"; that on said date, defendant proceeded to the rear portion of the store for the purpose of procuring a tent to show to plaintiff "in the front portion of the said store, and before departing to procure the said tent, enjoined the said plaintiff to remain in the front portion of the said storeroom until the said defendant should return with the said tent," and that plaintiff disregarded the instructions of the defendant and "deliberately walked over or under the said rope and was proceeding toward that portion of the said storeroom used as a workshop by said defendant, when she precipitated herself into the said opening, and sustained the injuries alleged in her complaint." He alleged that at the said time, the said storeroom and that portion where the said opening was situated was well lighted, "and the said rope and opening were plainly visible to any person proceeding toward the same, and had the said plaintiff exercised ordinary care and caution she would have avoided falling into the said opening and sustaining the injury alleged in her complaint."

The cause was tried by the court with a jury, and plaintiffs had the verdict for damages in the sum of $2,000 on which judgment was accordingly entered. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. A reversal of the judgment and the order is asked on the grounds: (1) The insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; (2) errors of the court in admission of testimony and comment of the court upon such testimony; (3) the error of the court in refusing and giving instructions; (4) misconduct of the jury in reaching their verdict by resort to chance.

The account of the accident appears by the testimony of plaintiff Mary Foley, found in the record in narrative form. We quote as follows:

"On the 3d of June, 1912, I lived in Bealeville, Kern county. I came to Bakersfield the 3d of June to get a tent. I asked a gentleman where I could get a tent, and he says, 'Go over there, that store there; they have tents there.' I went over there, and he was standing at the door where I could see him before I went in, and the gentleman came out and says, 'What do you want?' I says, 'Do you sell tents here?' and he says, 'Yes, come in,' and I went right in. I went right after him, and I went in part way, and he went that way (pointing), and I went this way. I followed him up, and he went that way (pointing), and I went in the hole. I couldn't say how far I was behind him when following him. Both of us was walking; he was walking and I was walking after him. The distance between us, maybe two or three steps, I couldn't say. He walked in and I walked right after him. He went that way and I followed him. He turned that way, where the buggies were, the right hand. I couldn't tell you anything about what part of the store it was that he turned, only he turned that way, and the hole was right here, and the counter was right here, and when he went that way where the buggies was— The Court: What part of the store were you in when he turned? A. Just even with the counter, and he turned and it happened so quick—it happened so quick that I couldn't do any more. The hole was in the middle of the floor, quite a ways back in the building, near the counter. It was back near the end of the counter. It's quite a long store. I was about 3 or 4 feet from the counter when this man turned to the right. After he turned to the right I fell in the hole right there. The counter was on the left side of the building coming in. I couldn't tell where I fell, but it was a hole. That was all I know about it. It was a big dark place I fell in. I fell down and went to the bottom, wherever it was, about 10 or 12 feet, as far as I know. * * * There was no rope or guard or railing of any kind around this opening that I could see when I fell into it, and after I fell in it. There was nothing there to stop me from falling in there. I just stepped in there and went down. There was nothing there. I didn't see anything there. I had never been in the store before. I did not know there was an opening in the floor there. Nobody told me there was a hole there or said anything to me of any kind, to look out or be careful, or anything about it. I did not see any hole there. When I was brought up immediately after the fall and was sitting in the chair on the floor near the opening there was no rope there or guard around this hole to prevent me from falling into it. * * * A person coming along by the side of the counter, by the front counter towards the rear part of the store, would walk into the hole all right. The counter ended maybe 2, maybe a couple of feet from the hole. * * * It was about half past 8, or maybe quarter past 8, in the morning when I was hurt. Q. What was the condition of the light there, if you know, as to the place being light or dark? A. Well, it was so dark when I got back there, as far as that place—it was pretty dark when I got back there where I fell."

On her cross-examination, she testified:

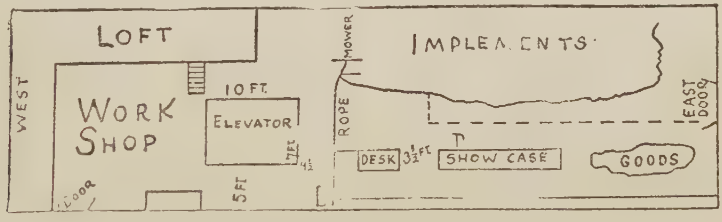
"I think I met Mr. Hornung. I thought it was the man that was running the place. I was looking in the door to see what I could see, to see if I could see what I wanted, and he came up and says, 'Is there anything you want?' and I says, 'Yes, I want a tent.' I met Mr. Hornung at the door; I am sure I met him at the door. I think it was Mr. Hornung; it was the front door of the store on Chester avenue. * * * I did not talk to him in the front of the store any time, only just that much. I went right in after talking to him. He says, 'Come right in.' I did not stop between the time I left the front door and the time I fell in the hole. I seen a counter in the store as I went along. He went in the store and I went in after him, and the counter was on the left side as you enter. * * * The man that met me turned to the right and I didn't turn at all. I followed him, and he went to the right, and I went into the hole. I didn't go to the left; I couldn't. I guess he knew the hole was there and he knew how to cross it. I don't know how close the buggies were to the hole. They were on the right side; I didn't pay much attention to them. * * * I didn't see any passage on the left side of the hole. I didn't see any before I fell on either side. I didn't know the hole was there at all. It wasn't dark altogether; it was sort of dark; it wasn't any way lightsome. I think there was some light in the back part of the store, a door or something. I couldn't tell you, to my best of belief there was. I walked in and he walked in before me. I walked in after him, and he went that way (pointing), and I was into the hole then. He turned to the right, and I went straight into the hole. It did not take half a second; I didn't take only one step, I guess."

Plaintiff David Foley testified that shortly after the injury he visited the store of defendant, and was asked to state what he observed in regard to the location of the said opening. He testified:

"Of course, when I went there, the hole was closed. I wanted them to open the hole so I could look down— Mr. Irwin: No, no; never mind that. Where was it? A. It was right at the end of the counter. You go right down along the counter, and it was right at the end of the counter. I should judge the edge of the hole was 2 or 3 feet from the end of the counter. It may be changed since. The size of the hole, when it took two men to lift the cover, it must be a pretty good size, maybe 2 or 3 or 4 feet."

The defendant Hornung testified to the circumstances attending the accident and submitted the following diagram which, he testified, illustrates the situation of the store interior and the arrangement on the ground floor of the building:

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT A



The evidence was that a counter extended from a point near the entrance on Chester avenue on the left hand in entering the store and continued back near the point where the diagram locates the rope. Defendant testified that he met the plaintiff at the door where the conversation took place substantially as testified to by plaintiff, and that defendant proceeded back towards the rear of the store, plaintiff following him to a point marked on the diagram as "P," near the showcase. He testified:

"I first had a conversation with her right there. I observed her coming into the store; she was alone when I first had a conversation with her; I was back of the counter and she was standing in front of the counter in the aisle. She wanted to know if I had tents. I asked her the question, I think, five or six times. I couldn't understand her, and walked around the showcase and stood close to her, and says, 'What is it you want?' and she says, 'I want a tent; you have got tents?' I says, 'Yes, ma'am.' I says, 'What size tent do you want?' She says, 'A pretty good size; 10x12 or 12x14.' I says, 'Stay right here, and I will get you one.' She was where this letter 'P' is on the plat. I then left the lady and walked back past the desk. I went through underneath, raised up the rope, went through the rope, walked around on the left side of the elevator and started up the stairway, about half way up, to get a tent for the lady. I did not go clear up into the gallery. Mr. Flack, a gentleman, happened to be there at the time, and he says, 'The lady fell in the elevator.' I then came down stairs, went down the stairway, and went right down in the basement. She was lying down in the southeast corner of the elevator, near the front. We picked the lady up and put her on a box, brought her up stairs, slid her through under the rope, and let her sit down on a chair outside of the office, a regular office chair. * * * This occurred, I should judge, about from a quarter after 8 to half past 8 in the morning, and at that time the sun was striking the front part of the building. The lights were burning in the basement because you can't work in the basement unless you have lights, and Mr. Mays was working there."

Defendant's statement of the facts was corroborated by the testimony of several witnesses, including employés of the defendant who were in the storeroom at the time. They stated in their testimony that they heard the defendant say to the plaintiff, "Stay right where you are," referring to the direction given by the defendant to plaintiff, and some of these witnesses, particularly employés of the defendant, testified that a rope was stretched across the room at the time substantially as shown on the diagram.

Conceding the rule where the evidence is conflicting, defendant urges that it would be unfair and unreasonable to apply the rule here in view of the fact, as is contended, that the implied findings of the jury must have rested alone upon the testimony of one witness, herself pecuniarily interested, whereas four or five witnesses corroborated portions of defendant's testimony—particularly as to whether the rope was in place when Mrs. Foley started to follow plaintiff, and whether or not he had told her to "stay right where you are" when he went back to get a tent. Three of these corroborating witnesses were working in and about the store. Two others were present who happened to be present and were apparently disinterested. Not all of these witnesses testified that the rope was in place, nor did all of them hear defendant say to plaintiff, "Stay right where you are and I will go out and get you a tent," or give similar directions. The jury were instructed in the language of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 2061, subd. 2, as to the number of witnesses.

[1] The conduct of Mrs. Foley on the occasion involved was not such as to suggest negligence on her part. It was the most natural thing for her to follow defendant, when told to do so, to the point where the tents were, thus avoiding the necessity of bringing forward for inspection a bulky and rather heavy article. She may not have heard defendant tell her to wait at the point "P" on the diagram; she testified she did not. Her testimony was that she followed close to defendant, passing along next to the counter, at the end of which was the elevator opening. She testified that defendant swerved to the right at this point and she took a step or two straight forward and went down into the hole. Defendant testified that he lifted up the rope and passed under. It was negligence on his part if the rope was in place to pass under it and give plaintiff no caution to avoid the elevator hole. He testified that he did not know whether she went under or over the rope. It seems to us he ought to have known her danger and should have cautioned her to avoid it. If the rope was stretched across the store as shown on the diagram, plaintiff could not have stepped over it or passed under it without stopping and noticing what was beyond. The more reasonable inference from the facts and circumstances as narrated by her is that she did precisely what she was invited to do and in the doing of which she, without fault or negligence on her part, fell into this hole in the floor.

We do not think it can reasonably be said, as is now urged, that plaintiff was a mere licensee in entering the back part of the store, "and as such licensee was bound to accept the premises in the condition in which she found them, and therefore took upon herself the peril and risk of approaching the elevator shaft." The jury accepted as true the testimony of plaintiff that she was invited by defendant to go to this part of the store, and it was clearly the defendant's duty to use all reasonable means to make that part of the store safe for one visiting it.

[2] At the close of defendant's evidence, plaintiff Mary Foley was recalled in rebuttal. The following took place:

"Mr. Scott: Q. Mrs. Foley, I will ask you to state whether at any time, on the 3d of June, last year, when you were in Mr. Hornung's store, that he told you to stay there, used the words to you, to 'Stay there,' that he would bring you, or show you the tent? Mr. Kaye: We object to that on the ground that it is leading, and on the ground that the conversation between the plaintiff and the defendant Hornung had been fully narrated by the plaintiff on her direct examination, in making out her case, and it is not rebuttal. The Court: The objection will be overruled. A. He didn't. He said, 'Come right along.' Mr. Scott: Q. Now, I will ask you to state whether or not on that morning, the 3d of June, 1912, you went under any rope stretched across the room, or over any rope? Mr. Kaye: We object to this on the ground that the same is not rebuttal; that the witness is sought by counsel to testify to matters that were fully answered by her in making out her case. The Court: I think she did testify to that upon the direct, but then I will overrule the objection. This is a matter that is probably of some importance. A. No, sir. Mr. Scott: Q. Did you come in contact with any rope at all, when you were going toward the rear end of the store that morning? A. No, sir."

It is urged that the court erred in making the remark:

"This is a matter that is probably of some importance."

[3] The objection that the question had been answered in making out the case in chief and hence was not proper rebuttal should have been sustained for the reason stated. The ruling can hardly be treated as seriously prejudicial. The answers were but repetitions of previous answers. It is, however, urged that the remark of the judge "constituted such grave error that the verdict should be set aside." We do not think that the remarks of the judge could have resulted in the jury's having attached additional significance to the answers by reason of such remarks. It seems to us if counsel had at the time regarded the remarks as prejudicial, they should, in fairness to the judge, have called attention thereto and asked to have the remarks stricken out. We doubt not the court would have granted such a motion.

The court gave the following instruction:

"That while in determining the preponderance of evidence you are not to take into consideration the number of witnesses produced by each party which testify to a particular fact, and while the evidence on an issue of fact is not necessarily balanced because the witnesses who testify on one side are directly contradicted by the same or a less number on the other side, yet in such a situation you are not authorized to arbitrarily disregard the testimony of any witness without some reason therefor, and other circumstances are to be considered, as in cases where the number of witnesses on each side is unequal. The intelligence, fairness, and means of observation and various other recognized factors in determining the weight of evidence should be taken into consideration, and also the reasonableness, truthfulness, disinterestedness, and credibility thereof."

[4] It is objected that the following part of the instruction is error:

"That while in determining the preponderance of evidence you are not to take into consideration the number of witnesses produced by each party which testify to a particular fact."

It is stated in the brief that:

"In giving this instruction the court modified instruction No. 6 requested by the defendant, and in so doing violated the well-established rule relating to disparity in the number of witnesses."

Literally read, the first part of the instruction would seem to be amenable to the objection for circumstances may exist under which the number of witnesses testifying to a particular fact or set of facts might determine where the preponderance of the evidence lay. Further along in the instruction, the court said that where there was a contradiction in the testimony, the jury "are not authorized to arbitrarily disregard the testimony of any witness without some reason therefor, and other circumstances are to be considered, as in cases where the number of witnesses on each side is unequal." The court then added that "the intelligence, fairness, and means of observation and various other recognized factors" should be taken into consideration.

The court instructed the jury, as indicated in another part of this opinion:

"That you are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses, which do not produce conviction in your minds, against a less number or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying your minds."

The court also instructed the jury:

"That preponderance of evidence simply means the greater weight of evidence, or evidence which is more credible and convincing to the mind, or evidence of such character and weight as carries conviction to the mind of the juror of the existence of facts sought to be proved."

It was immediately following this instruction that the court gave the instruction now complained of. We do not think that the court could have had in its mind or that it meant to convey to the jury an impression that they could not take into consideration the number of witnesses produced by a party, but that the thought in his mind and the thought which was conveyed was that the number of witnesses would not necessarily be the determining factor.

[5, 6] In support of the ground for a new trial under misconduct of the jury, the defendant filed the affidavits of certain of the jurors. Plaintiff filed counter affidavits of certain other jurors. The jurors who made affidavits at the request of the defendant stated as follows:

"That when the jury were deliberating upon the verdict to be rendered in the said action, they were unable to agree upon the amount that should be awarded to the plaintiff as damages, whereupon it was agreed that each juryman should place the amount for which he believed the verdict should be rendered upon a slip of paper, and the same should be cast as a secret ballot, and the sum of the various amounts so voted by the twelve jurymen should be divided by 12, and they should be governed by the quotient obtained by such division; that this quotient was the sum of $2,104 or thereabouts; that when it was found that the quotient was not a round sum, it was suggested that it would be better, under the previous agreement, to insert an even sum, to wit, the sum of $2,000 as their verdict, instead of such quotient, whereupon said suggestion was, without further consideration or discussion of the case, adopted, and the verdict was so rendered; that all of the jurors agreed to said proposition and to accept and abide by the result so obtained as the verdict in said action, and at least four of the said jurors did not believe the said quotient or the said sum of $2,000 to be a proper sum to be awarded the plaintiff, but did think that the said sum was too large, and they assented to said verdict solely by reason of the said agreement."

The jurors who made affidavits in support of the verdict deposed that when they commenced to deliberate upon the verdict they found that they were unable to agree as to the amount which plaintiff was entitled to recover, "but that each and every juror believed that plaintiff was entitled to recover some amount from said defendant"; that in order to determine the amount, the jurors agreed among themselves that each one would write on a piece of paper secretly the amount which plaintiff was entitled to recover, and that they then would put all the several amounts together and divide the sum by 12, "which they did, but they did not agree to be bound by the result. After each juror had placed on a slip of paper the amount which he believed that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, the 12 amounts were added together and divided by 12 and the result or quotient was in excess of $2,100; that after such result was obtained and made known, the jury then further considered the amount which plaintiff should recover, and each juror then and there agreed, after consultation among themselves, that they would not adopt the quotient or result so obtained, but after such consideration and discussion among themselves, they did agree among themselves that the plaintiff be awarded as damages the sum of $2,000, and that thereupon the said jury unanimously returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the said sum of $2,000." The contention of defendant is that the verdict was arrived at by chance and is forbidden by the provisions of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the misconduct of the jury calls for a new trial.

It will be noted that there is a very sharp conflict between the two sets of affidavits. The affidavit in support of the motion shows that the jury had not only agreed to the method by which the amount should be reached, but agreed to be governed by the quotient obtained by such a division. It also stated, after ascertaining the quotient, that they changed the amount to an even sum, and that they acted upon this suggestion and adopted said even sum of $2,000 without further consideration or discussion of the case. The other affidavits show that the jury, in order to determine the amount which the plaintiff should receive, agreed to write on a slip of paper, each one secretly, the amount, and these several amounts could be added together and divided by 12, but the affiants stated that the jurors did not agree to be bound by this result, and that after the result shown by such division was made known, they entered upon further deliberation of a verdict and finally reached a different conclusion from that shown by the division.

The question here then is, in view of the conflict, whether the order may be supported by the most favorable view of the facts presented to the court by the affidavits. The affidavits submitted in opposition to the motion for a new trial, when reduced to their essential and material elements, show that the jury agreed to the plan described for the purpose of ascertaining what an average amount would be when thus ascertained, but that there was no agreement to adopt this amount or to be governed by it, and that after having obtained this amount, they deliberated upon their verdict and finally reached the definite sum of $2,000, in which no element of chance can be said to have necessarily entered.

It is not unusual, nor is it objectionable, for each juryman to mark on a ballot the amount he thinks should be allowed, if any, and these ballots may subsequently be read by the jurymen. They thus get some idea of each other's views which may aid in reaching a concurrence of judgment. The misconduct of the jury for which a new trial may be granted arises "whenever any one or more of the jurors have been induced to assent to any general or special verdict, or to a finding on any question submitted to them by the court, by resort to the determination of chance," and the statute provides that "such misconduct may be proved by the affidavit of any one of the jurors." Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 2. It has been held that an average verdict arrived at by dividing the sum of the various amounts which each juror believed proper by the number of the jurors, under a prior agreement that such average verdict should be the verdict of the jury without further consultation, is a chance verdict and should be set aside. Dixon v. Pluns, 98 Cal. 384, 33 Pac. 268, 20 L. R. A. 698, 35 Am. St. Rep. 180; Weinburg v. Somps, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 10, 33 Pac. 341. But the verdict is not a chance verdict where the jurors agreed to divide the aggregate amount by 12, and where it was understood that they were not to be bound by the result, and after the amount was so ascertained, the jurors unanimously agreed to adopt it as the sum to be returned. Hunt v. Elliott, 77 Cal. 588, 20 Pac. 132; McDonnell v. Pescadero & San Mateo Stage Co., 120 Cal. 476, 52 Pac. 725; Dixon v. Pluns, supra.

We must assume that the trial court accepted the statements in the counter affidavits as true, and upon that assumption we think the verdict cannot be said to have been assented to "by resort to the determination of chance."

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

WHITE v. HENDLEY. (Civ. 1440.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 12, 1917.)

1. Appeal and Error ⚷607(1)—Record on Appeal—Requisites and Sufficiency.

Where appellant duly filed notice of intention and request for transcript as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, and the transcript was prepared and duly certified by the judge, the failure of the judge to order its preparation as required by section 953a was cured by the certification.

2. Appeal and Error ⚷870(6)—Orders Appealable—New Trial.

Although Code Civ. Proc. § 963, as amended August 8, 1915, deprives a party of a separate appeal from an order denying a motion for new trial, section 956, amended at the same time, makes such order reviewable on appeal from the judgment.

3. TRIAL 🔑396(2) — FINDINGS — PLEADING AND PROOF—VARIANCE.

No issue of fraud being tendered by pleadings in an action to cancel a deed and contract, a finding that defendant never intended to carry out the contract must be disregarded.

4. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑54(2)—CONSTRUCTION—"CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT."

A deed of a mining claim providing that "it is hereby mutually agreed" that the grantee will open and develop the property at his own expense, does not create a condition subsequent, but is a mere covenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Condition Subsequent.]

5. EVIDENCE 🔑448—ADMISSIBILITY—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING FINDINGS.

It was error to admit parol evidence in construing such clause whose language was plain and clear, being a matter of pure legal interpretation, whether it created a condition subsequent or a personal covenant.

6. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS 🔑43—ISSUES—DELIVERY OF DEED—"EXECUTION."

In suit to cancel deed which reserved possession in grantor for life, where the complaint alleged that plaintiff executed the deed, and no issue was tendered of grantor's intention that the deed should not take effect until his death, it could not be found that the deed was void as an ineffective testamentary disposition; the term "execution" including effective delivery.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Richard White, as executor of Joseph Hendley, deceased, against Joseph W. Hendley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

George F. Jones, of Oroville, for appellant. W. K. Hays, of Chico, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This appeal is from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action for the cancellation of a deed and contract executed by Joseph Hendley, now deceased, to defendant.

Joseph Hendley, having apparently become attached to his nephew, the defendant, on April 26, 1910, did—

"grant, bargain, sell, convey and confirm unto the party of the second part, and to his heirs and assigns, forever, all his right, title, and interest in and to all that real property situate in the said county of Butte, state of California, bounded and described as follows, to wit: * * * Together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in any wise appertaining, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues and profits thereof. To have and to hold all and singular the said premises together with the appurtenances unto the said party of the second part, and all his heirs and assigns forever. * * *"

It appears by the pleadings that the deed was properly executed, delivered, and recorded. On the same day the following contract was entered into between the parties:

"This agreement made and entered into this 26th day of April, 1910, by and between Joseph W. Hendley, of Peoria, state of Illinois, party of the first part, and Joseph Hendley, of the county of Butte, state of California, party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That whereas, the said party of the second part has this day granted and conveyed unto the said party of the first part by deed absolute and without condition all the real estate of said party of the second part situate in the county of Butte, state of California, consisting of all the right, title and interest of the party of the second part in and to that certain mining property situate in Morris ravine, in said Butte county, and commonly known as the 'Joe Hendley Mine and Mining Property'; and

"Whereas, it is understood that the said party of the second part shall during his lifetime occupy said premises as a place of residence, and shall obtain therefrom such income as may be necessary to afford him a comfortable livelihood and living in accordance with his desires and conditions in life, and that during his lifetime said property shall be advantageously developed in a proper and systematic manner as a mining claim for the benefit of said party of the first part, and also for the benefit of the party of the second part for the purposes hereinabove stated:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby mutually agreed that the party of the first part will undertake the opening up and developing of said property as a mining claim at his own expense and free of cost and expense to the party of the second part, and in case, either before or after the full development of said property as a mining claim, in the judgment of the party of the second part it shall be advantageous to sell and dispose of said property for a valuable consideration and at a sum in excess of the amount expended thereon by the party of the first part, then and in that event the party of the first part will consent to such sale and join in executing any conveyance necessary therefor, provided that in case of such sale said party of the first part shall be reimbursed from the proceeds thereof for all moneys expended by him or expenses which he may have incurred in connection with the development of said property and a reasonable rate of interest thereon, it being further understood and agreed that the party of the first part is to have and receive the whole of the proceeds from the sale of said property except such amount thereof as may be necessary to provide for the care and maintenance of said party of the second part during his lifetime.

"It is fully understood and agreed that the intention of the parties herein is to give to the party of the first part the full and entire benefit of all the property of the party of the second part this day conveyed, with the right to proceed with the opening up and development thereof, and to obtain the full benefit to be derived therefrom, save and except that the party of the second part is to be provided for during his lifetime.

"It is further understood and agreed that in case said party of the first part shall not survive the party of the second part, then and in that event the property described in said deed is to be reconveyed to the party of the second part, subject, however, to the reimbursement of the party of the first part for the amounts expended by him in the development of said property as hereinabove agreed. * * *

"Joseph W. Hendley. [Seal.]
"Joseph Hendley. [Seal.]"

The court found that the deed and contract constituted one instrument; that the intention of Joseph Hendley was to provide for the development of the mine, and that the development of the mine was the consideration for the grant; that Joseph W. Hendley failed to perform the conditions provided, and never intended to perform them, and hence, there being a failure of consideration and breach of condition subsequent, plaintiff was entitled to a cancellation of the deed. The court received in evidence the deposition of Joseph Hendley, in which is stated the intent with which he made the transfer, over the objection of defendant that it was parol evidence which tended to vary the terms of the written contract. Appellant contends that the court erred as a matter of law in construing the clauses in the contract as creating a condition subsequent, and in admitting evidence as to whether it was intended to create a mere covenant or condition subsequent.

[1] Before entering upon the discussion of these points we will briefly dispose of respondent's contention that there is no proper record on appeal before the court. It appears that in accordance with the provisions of section 953 (a) of the Code of Civil Procedure appellant filed, within the required time, a notice of intention and request for a transcript. The court, however, never ordered the reporter to prepare said transcript, as required by paragraph 2 of section 953 (a). Nevertheless the reporter and clerk did prepare a transcript which was presented to and properly certified by the judge. Respondent claims that this court cannot consider said record, since it was never directed to be prepared by the court. But it is apparent that the omission was cured by the due certification by the judge of the transcript which had been prepared.

[2] On August 6, 1915, appellant made his motion for a new trial, which was denied on August 30, 1915, and on September 1, 1915, appellant filed his notice of appeal from said order. On August 8, 1915, an order denying a motion for a new trial ceased to be an appealable order. Respondent, therefore, claims that the court cannot consider the record on such alleged appeal. But respondent overlooks section 956, Code Civ. Proc., which was amended at the same time, and which declares that any order on motion for a new trial may be reviewed on an appeal from a judgment. If the amendment to section 963 operated to deprive appellant of a separate appeal from the order denying his motion for a new trial, the amendment to section 956 operated equally to make such order reviewable on an appeal from the judgment, and as appellant appeals from the judgment, respondent's contention has little of merit to recommend it.

[3] The finding of the court that defendant never intended to carry out his contract, a finding virtually of fraud, must be disregarded, for no issue of fraud was tendered by the pleadings; the sole issue being the failure of consideration.

Appellant's contentions that the clause in the contract creates only a covenant and not a condition subsequent, and that parol evidence was improperly admitted, present a matter of considerably more difficulty. There is probably no subject of a legal nature involving more serious controversy than that of similar conditions in contracts. Though we find many distinctions drawn between conditions subsequent and covenants, and the rules for their distinction clearly stated, just whether the one or the other exists is a matter of construction in each particular case. We may notice certain positive rules of construction which have been laid down and established, and it is sufficient for this purpose to quote from Hawley v. Kafitz, 148 Cal. 393, 83 Pac. 248, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 741, 113 Am. St. Rep. 282, as follows:

> "Conditions subsequent are those which in terms operate upon an estate conveyed and render it liable to be defeated for breach of the conditions. Such conditions are not favored in law because they tend to destroy estates, and no provision in a deed relied on to create a condition subsequent will be so interpreted if the language of the provision will bear any other reasonable construction. While no precise form of words is necessary to create a condition subsequent, still it must be created by express terms or by clear implication. Merely reciting in a deed that it is in consideration of a certain sum, and that the grantee shall do other things specified therein, does not create an estate upon condition. There must be language used which is so clear as to leave no doubt that the grantor intended that an estate upon condition subsequent should be created—language which ex proprio vigore imports such a condition. Cullen v. Sprigg, 83 Cal. 64, 23 Pac. 222; Behlow v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 130 Cal. 19, 62 Pac. 295."

In that case the deed sought to be forfeited contained the following provision:

> "This deed is given by the parties of the first part, and accepted by the second party upon the express agreement of the second party to build, or cause to be built * * * within six (6) months * * * a dwelling house. * * *"

It was held, however, that said provision constituted a mere covenant, and not a condition subsequent. The same considerations are to be found reiterated in Womble v. Womble, 14 Cal. App. 739, 113 Pac. 353; Firth v. Los Angeles Pacific Land Co., 28 Cal. App. 399, 152 Pac. 935; Fitzgerald v. County of Modoc, 164 Cal. 493, 129 Pac. 794, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1229; Schott v. Schott, 168 Cal. 342, 143 Pac. 595; Victoria Hospital Association v. All Persons, 169 Cal. 455, 147 Pac. 124.

[4] Turning now to the instrument in question, it is difficult to find anything to support the position that a condition subsequent was intended. The deed and contract were the voluntary act of the grantor. There is no charge of fraud or mistake or want of good faith at the time the deed was given. There is nothing in the language of either instrument to suggest a condition subsequent, with that degree of clarity required by the decisions. To the contrary, the language used indicates the opposite. There is nothing whatever in the deed proper to suggest the condition, and the language relied upon to constitute the condition is in the contract, as follows:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby mutually agreed that the party of the first part will undertake the opening up and development of said property as a mining claim at his own expense and free of cost and expense to the party of the second part. * * *"

It will be seen that the language here used is very much like that employed in the Kafitz Case, supra, and we may well employ the language of that case in this connection:

"In the case at bar the provision which, it is claimed, created a condition subsequent contains no language which in terms declares such a condition, or which by necessary implication imports one. There is an entire absence of any of those apt or appropriate words or expressions which are usually employed for the purpose of creating a condition subsequent—technical terms which, if the condition subsequent is intended to be created, generally follow the granting clause of the deed, and declare that the estate conveyed is upon 'express condition' that certain things shall be done, or 'provided, however,' or 'in the event that' certain terms imposed are or are not complied with, the deed shall be void, and the estate granted shall be terminated or forfeited. * * * Not only is there no language which would create a condition subsequent, but the language actually employed, 'This deed is * * * upon the express agreement,' implies a personal covenant, and not a condition."

But the other language of the instrument leaves no doubt in our minds as to the soundness of the position here taken. In the first paragraphs of the contract it is declared:

"Whereas the said party of the second part has this day granted and conveyed unto the said party of the first part by deed absolute and without condition, * * * and whereas it is understood * * * that during his [grantor's, party of the second part] lifetime said property shall be advantageously developed in a proper and systematic manner as a mining claim for the benefit of said party of the first part."

Then follows the mutual agreement quoted above, followed by a clause giving the grantor a right to make a sale if he shall find it advantageous, and the instrument proceeds:

"It being further understood and agreed that the party of the first part is to have and receive the whole of the proceeds from the sale of said property except such amount thereof as may be necessary to provide for the care and maintenance of said party of the second part, during his lifetime."

The language here quoted leaves little to be said. It indicates positively an intention to transfer to the defendant free from condition the full interest and benefit of the property. But lest some doubt should arise as to its meaning, the following was added:

"It is fully understood and agreed that the intention of the parties herein is to give to the party of the first part the full and entire benefit of all the property of the party of the second part this day conveyed, with the right to proceed with the opening up and development thereof, and to obtain the full benefit to be derived therefrom, save and except that the party of the second part is to be provided for during his lifetime."

The intention was not to give defendant the property on the condition that he "proceed with the opening up and development thereof," but to transfer to him the full and beneficial right to do so. As in Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 126, 20 Pac. 382, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29, a case very like this in its facts:

"The plaintiff saw proper to accept the * * * promise of the defendant to do certain things without any agreement or understanding that the failure to do the acts as promised should be a condition, or in any way affect the validity of the deed, or entitle him to a reconveyance."

The case of Downing v. Rademacher, 133 Cal. 220, 65 Pac. 385, 85 Am. St. Rep. 160, much relied upon by respondent, is clearly distinguishable from the present case. The Downing Case concerns a deed which contemplated the working of mines on shares, a recognized exception to the general rule controlling the construction of conditions subsequent. 8 R. C. L. 1105. But even were it not so, the absence of such positive language declaratory of the intent of the parties as is to be found in the present case would deprive it of any weight as an authority here.

[5] The court fell into error in admitting parol evidence to ascertain the meaning of the parties. "The clause in the deed was in no wise ambiguous or equivocal. Its language was plain and clear, and whether the clause created a condition subsequent, as contended by plaintiffs, or a mere personal covenant, as insisted by defendant, was a matter of pure legal interpretation for the court. That neither evidence of the understanding of the plaintiffs nor the interpretation they desired to place upon the unambiguous language of the clause in their deed was admissible is so elementary that it is disposed of merely by stating it." Hawley v. Kafitz, supra. The declaration of intention incorporated into the contract clearly constitutes a "term" of said contract, and having been thus incorporated was not subject to be varied or contradicted by evidence extrinsic in nature.

[6] Another consideration urged in the brief of respondent is that the evidence showed that the intention of the grantor was that the deed should not take effect until his death, and therefore it was void as an ineffectual attempt to make a testamentary disposition of his property. The rule is, no doubt, that if there is no intention to pass the title until after the death of the grantor, the mere manual tradition of the deed does not constitute such delivery as will vest the title in the grantee. The test is whether in parting with the possession of the conveyance the grantor intended thereby to divest himself of title. If he did, there was an effective delivery. If not, there was no delivery, and this matter of intention is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court from a consideration of all the evidence bearing upon the question. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 Pac. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703. This intention may be shown by an express declaration to that effect or it may rest in a rational inference from the facts and circumstances of the case. It is further held in the Williams Case, supra, that "delivery" is a word of well-defined meaning in the law, and means the act, however evidenced, by which the instrument takes effect and title thereby passes, while "execution" includes effective delivery.

We are not prepared to say as to this phase of the controversy that it might not be held that there was no effective delivery of the deed within the contemplation of the foregoing statement of the law. And the court below was undoubtedly of the opinion that it was the intention of the grantor that such deed should not become operative until the death of the grantor, for we have this finding:

"That the said Joseph Hendley never intended to convey the said mining property by said deed to his said nephew, but was under the impression up to the time of his death that he retained the ownership of said property, and that the title thereto was not to vest in Joseph W. Hendley until after his death."

This is not an explicit finding that it was his intention that the title should not vest until his death, but it might answer the purpose if it were permitted under the pleadings. No such issue, however, was tendered by the complaint. Indeed, plaintiff alleged that on or about the 26th day of April, 1910, he "did execute to defendant a deed of conveyance of said described real property, a copy of which said deed, marked 'Exhibit A,' is hereto annexed and made a part hereof." The term "execution," as we have seen, includes "effective delivery," so that said finding, in so far as it contemplates the intention to make the delivery operative only at the time of the death of the grantor, is directly opposed to the allegation of the complaint, which allegation, it may also be said, is not denied by the answer.

It may be that by amendment to the complaint the difficulty could be obviated, but as the case is presented here, we think the decision cannot be upheld, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

NEUGEBAUER v. GLADDING, McBEAN & CO. (Civ. 1732.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District. California. Nov. 12, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 10, 1918.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑278(14)—DANGEROUS WORK—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.
In an action for damages by the widow of a deceased employé whose death was alleged to have resulted from his inhalation of the fumes of hydrofluoric acid which he was applying to the surface of terra cotta, evidence held to sustain a finding that his work was dangerous.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑276(2)—CAUSE OF DEATH—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.
In such action evidence held sufficient to justify the conclusion that the use of such acid in the course of his employment caused the employé's death.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑278(3, 20)—FATAL INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.
In such case evidence held sufficient to show the master's negligence in not warning deceased of his danger or in not furnishing him with proper appliances to protect him from breathing the noxious acid fumes.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑264(1) — ACTION FOR DAMAGES—WANTON NEGLIGENCE—ALLEGATION AND PROOF.
In such action the allegation of negligence was sufficient, and the additional allegation of wanton negligence might or might not be proved, and the failure to prove it would not affect the result of the proof of the master's negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by Mary Neugebauer, as administratrix of the estate of Frank Neugebauer, deceased, against Gladding, McBean & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

John M. Fulweiler, of Auburn, and Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, of San Francisco, for appellant. Braynard & Kimball, of Redding, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Appellant was engaged at Lincoln, Placer county, in the manufacture of architectural terra cotta and fire brick, terra cotta pipe, and roof tile. For about six years prior to May, 1913, Frank Neugebauer was employed as a laborer in the fitting department of appellant's factory, and in the work of cementing broken terra cotta. Until May, 1913, the corporation used a sand blast for the purpose of dulling the surface of the terra cotta which came from kilns too bright or lustrous to match other ware ordered for certain buildings. At the time just mentioned the corporation abandoned the use of the sand blast, and to accomplish said purpose introduced the use of hydrofluoric acid, and selected to apply the acid to the surface of the terra cotta, said Neugebauer, a Hungarian who could not read nor write the English language, and who spoke it imperfectly. At this time he was 39 years of age, and there is evidence that he was in good health. Hydrofluoric acid is composed of two elements, hydrogen and fluorine, and is next to prussic acid in its dangerous effects upon human life, and it appears that a few deep inhalations of the fumes of the acid 48 per cent. strong would be fatal. This was its strength as it was received by the corporation. The method pursued by Neugebauer in diluting the acid exposed him to this danger. It came in bottles about three and a half inches in diameter and five or six inches deep. Into a receptacle made of one of these bottles he would pour the acid, and then add the portion of water for dilution. Sometimes he put in the acid first, and sometimes the water. This dilution was usually accomplished by him in what was known as the south shed, which was a two-story building inclosed by walls and having a ground floor but no upper story, and there was no electric fan or other device provided in any of the rooms where he worked with the acid for the creation of an artificial draft to blow away any fumes that might arise from the acid. In applying the acid to the terra cotta he was also exposed to the danger of inhaling the fumes. He used a brush and applied the acid as though he were painting. The diluted acid, as used on the terra cotta, was so strong that it would burn a man's finger and would blacken wood, and its effect on the terra cotta could be observed with the naked eye. During all the time that Neugebauer was working with the acid he never wore a mask, sponge, respirator, or anything over his nose or mouth. He was put at this work May 23, 1913, and continued at it until about eight days before his death, which occurred October 25, 1913.

The action for damages instituted by the widow was grounded upon the position that said employment was an extremely dangerous one, as was well known to the defendant, and that it "negligently, recklessly, and wantonly failed at the time it so employed Frank Neugebauer to warn him or inform him in any way of the danger of said employment, and said defendant at all the times herein mentioned negligently omitted to warn the said Frank Neugebauer of said danger and carelessly and wantonly allowed him to remain in ignorance of the same. And during all of said last-mentioned employment of said Frank Neugebauer by said defendant the said defendant negligently, recklessly, and wantonly failed to provide the said Frank Neugebauer with any muzzle or device to prevent the fumes arising from the use of said hydrofluoric acid in washing said terra cotta from entering the nostrils and mouth of said Frank Neugebauer, or to prevent the said hydrofluoric acid from destroying the tissue and life of Frank Neugebauer as it was the duty of the said defendant to do." There is no controversy as to the legal principles involved in the case. The action of the court is not assailed except as to two rulings on the admissibility of evidence, and these are not insisted upon in the closing brief. They are, indeed, so manifestly free from error as not to require attention.

The questions in dispute are those of fact, and are presented by the denials of the answer that said acid "is a deadly poison destructive of human life or tissue"; that the death of Neugebauer was caused by the use of said acid; that his employment was a dangerous one, or that it was known to defendant or its superintendent to be dangerous; that it failed to warn or inform him of any danger, or allowed him to remain in ignorance of the same; that defendant failed to provide him with any muzzle or device to prevent the fumes from entering the mouth or nostrils, or to prevent the acid from destroying the tissue or life of said Frank Neugebauer. Contributory negligence was not pleaded, nor is there any discussion of the doctrine of "assumption of risk."

[1] Among the contentions of appellant as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the implied findings of the jury we think the least meritorious is the claim that it was not shown that the work in which deceased was engaged was a dangerous one.

Joseph B. De Gaylor, appellant's superintendent, testified:

> "I realized there was danger when handling this acid and applying it on terra cotta, and that there was danger from the inhalation of fumes arising from the application of the acid to the terra cotta, the same as any acid. I did not suppose that Neugebauer knew anything about the dangers of the use of the acid. I assumed right off that he knew nothing about its use. I did not discharge Neugebauer when I heard that he was using the acid without any mask or gloves, because I was not absolutely certain that he was not using the gloves or muzzle."

William Cox, who worked in the factory as a fitter, testified:

> "Between May and October, 1913, I would ordinarily see Neugebauer every day. * * * After he started to use the acid I noticed a change in his appearance with reference to health, and he looked like he was feeling kind of weakening."

Witness Thomas Ragle, who also worked as a fitter, testified:

> "Neugebauer started to use this acid on the Seattle job. Before the Seattle job I never knew anything of the use of this acid. Neugebauer seemed in normal health. No particular complaint. After he used this acid Neugebauer complained to me of a heavy nausea in the stomach, and pains in his back and along his loins, and used to say it bothered him getting up; he could not rest and could not eat anything."

Bryant S. Drake, a chemical engineer, who is a graduate of the University of California, and an expert, testified that hydrofluoric acid is a deadly poison, and that in the laboratory they use a hood in dealing with the acid, to prevent any possible danger.

Dr. John Manson, a physician of many years standing, testified that:

> "The death of Frank Neugebauer was caused by hydrofluoric acid poisoning induced by breathing the fumes of such acid. I went to the United States Dispensary, and I found that the breathing of fumes of the hydrofluoric acid produces all kinds of serious trouble—serious trouble in the lungs, liver, spleen, and terrible destruction of the red corpuscles. So that after he died I had no hesitation in signing the death certificate as I signed it."

The widow, Mrs. Mary Neugebauer, testified:

> "He was not sick at all before he started to work with the hydrofluoric acid. About a month thereafter he feel sick, he says, 'Too heavy here on breast'—all the time doing that way, with back sore, and he get yellow and skinny. He lost his appetite and no could sleep. He stopped work and came home at dinner time on October 18, 1913. I ask, 'How you feel?' Neugebauer answered, 'I feel very badly, I feel badly, burning inside, all same fire inside.' He feel that way all eight days until he die; nighttime and daytime. He said, 'All burn inside; all the same he burns with fire.'"

F. O. Andreas, an expert in the use of said acid, said he knew that it gives off a fume, and the acid as it is purchased is dangerous, and if the fumes are inhaled in the inside of a building there would be deleterious effects. There is other testimony to the same effect, but the foregoing should be sufficient to justify the inference that it was a dangerous business in which the deceased was employed. Indeed, it is rather strange that any contention to the contrary should be made, and this must have been the view of appellant on second thought since in the answer was set up the defense that appellant's superintendent and foreman warned deceased of the danger, and furnished him appliances for protection against injury from such use of the acid.

[2] There is scarcely more merit in the contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify the conclusion that the use of said acid in the course of his employment caused the death of Frank Neugebauer. From the testimony already detailed herein, it is a fair inference that the fumes from said acid were a contributory cause of such death. A careful reading of the testimony can hardly fail to produce the conviction in a disinterested mind not only that such finding is legally supported, but that there can hardly be any doubt that the death of Neugebauer was due to the manner in which he handled the acid. It may be unfortunate that no post mortem examination was had, as that probably would have clinched the matter, but the circumstance that no such examination was had does not derogate from the weight of the evidence which was introduced, nor does it affect our conviction that the verdict of the jury as to the cause of death finds ample support in the record. We are not concerned here with the testimony of certain witnesses that the deceased was in poor health at the time he began to work with the acid, as it was contradicted by the testimony of others, and the question of fact thereby controverted, together with the weight to be accorded to it, presented a consideration for the determination of the jury. Pigeon v. W. P. Fuller & Co., 156 Cal. 691, 105 Pac. 976.

[3] There is more room for argument as to the contention of appellant that the evidence is insufficient to show negligence on its part in either aspect claimed, namely, that it failed to warn deceased of his danger, or failed to furnish him with the proper appliances to protect him from breathing the noxious fumes of the acid.

We think, however, that it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that there is an entire absence of substantial support for the conclusion of the jury in that respect. In the first place, appellant denied under oath that the business in which Neugebauer was engaged was an extremely dangerous one, or that it was so known to the defendant or to its factory superintendent, and also denied that said use of the acid was liable to poison or kill said Neugebauer. We must assume that appellant made said denials in good faith. Thus believing, it would be unreasonable to suppose that appellant would perform the idle act of warning deceased, or of supplying him with a contrivance that was believed to be an incumbrance and not a protection.

Again, the fact that deceased did not use any shield is a circumstance of some moment in support of the theory that he was ignorant of the danger incident to the employment. The average man is supposed to have greater regard for his health and for his life than to recklessly expose himself thus to imminent danger. This circumstance involved, no doubt, one of the reasons that moved the jury to conclude that Neugebauer did not understand the situation, and that his ignorance of it was directly chargeable to his employer.

Again, the superintendent and foreman knew that Neugebauer was doing the work without using any mask or muzzle, and it seems improbable that they would not insist at the peril of losing his job that he should follow their direction as to protecting himself. Also, two of the employés who worked in the same room with deceased "never saw or heard of a mask or sponge or other device for covering the mouth or nose of the workmen in that department." They saw the superintendent and foreman pass through the room frequently, and heard the latter talking to Neugebauer about the extent to which the acid should be diluted, and heard the superintendent and foreman tell him to look out for burning, but nothing was said about any protection from the fumes. It is true that this evidence was of a negative character somewhat, but it was entitled to consideration.

Furthermore, the mask which it is claimed was furnished for the purpose was introduced in evidence, and there may have been something in its appearance that led the jury to discredit the testimony of the witnesses for appellant in reference to it. One of them said "it was not a new nozzle"; the superintendent testified that he "did not order any particular mask for the use of this acid because we had a mask in stock we have been using for years before we ever used the acid"; and it is suggested by respondent that "the fresh and very new appearance of the mask which was admitted in evidence may well have convinced the jury that all of defendant's testimony about supplying Neugebauer with a mask to protect him from the fumes of the acid was false and untrue." As to that, of course, we cannot say, as the record does not disclose the appearance of the mask. But it may have been so. It may be true also that there was something in the manner and appearance of the witnesses for appellant who testified as to the mask that furnished a reason for disbelieving their statements. Some other circumstances worthy of attention in this connection might be mentioned, but we think the foregoing is sufficient.

[4] There is no merit in the contention that it was incumbent upon respondent to prove that the conduct of appellant was wantonly negligent in order to justify a recovery. The allegation of negligence was sufficient, but the pleader introduced an additional element which might or might not be proved. The failure to prove it, however, would not affect the significance or result of the proof of negligence on the part of the defendant. Kramm v. Stockton Electric R. R. Co., 3 Cal. App. 606, 86 Pac. 738, 903.

We can perceive no legal ground for disturbing the action of the court below, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

SONOMA VALLEY WATER, LIGHT & POWER CO. v. O'BRIEN et al.

(Civ. 2231.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. October 23, 1917.)

New Trial 🔑71—Verdict—Conflicting Evidence.

In action to enjoin the taking of all the water in a creek, the issues arising over the amount of water defendants were entitled to divert, where the findings of the jury and the judgment of the court gave defendants all the waters, the court was justified in granting motion for new trial, where, the evidence being conflicting, he was not satisfied that the proofs showed that all of the water was necessary for the purposes to which it was applied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Sonoma Valley Water, Light & Power Company against Nellie O'Brien and others. From an order granting a new trial after judgments for defendants, they appeal. Affirmed.

J. T. Campbell and Ross Campbell, both of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal on the part of the defendants from an order granting a motion for a new trial after a verdict and judgment in their favor. The verdict of the jury was rendered upon special issues, and its findings thereon were adopted by the court as the basis of its judgment.

The action was instituted by the plaintiff, a corporation owning lands adjoining the lands of the defendants, to enjoin the latter from taking and using the whole of the water from a creek known as Lenox creek, which rose upon and flowed through their lands, emptying into Carriger creek, and thence over and across the lands of the plaintiff. The evidence showed that the defendants had appropriated all of the water of Lenox creek for their own uses, and in addition to using the same for irrigation, household and domestic purposes, ran the residue of its waters after these uses had been satisfied into a pool or lake near their residence. The issues in the case arose over the amount of water which the defendants were entitled to divert into this pool or lake. The findings of the jury and the judgment of the court gave the defendants all of these waters, but upon motion for a new trial the court granted the motion solely upon the ground that the defendants took more water from said Lenox creek than was necessary for the uses to which it was applied. The language of the court in its order granting the new trial was as follows:

> "The court has made a careful examination of the evidence, and it is not satisfied that there is not a useless waste of water. Indisputably the defendants are entitled to a sufficient quantity to answer every reasonable convenience or necessity, but it is not the law that water may be wasted while it may serve others. On this issue alone the court grants the motion for a new trial."

The contention of the appellants upon this appeal is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the court in granting the motion for a new trial upon this ground. We have examined the record with some degree of care, and are of the opinion that the evidence was sufficiently conflicting to have justified the court in granting the motion for a new trial if, as he stated, he was not satisfied that the proofs showed that all of the water was necessary for the purposes to which it was applied.

That being so, we think that the order of the trial court should be affirmed, and that will be the order.

BELL DEVELOPMENT CO. v. MARSHALL.

(Civ. 1958.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 16, 1917.)

Corporations 🔑90(5)—Unpaid Stock Subscriptions—Complaint.

A corporation's complaint in action on unpaid stock subscription alleging demand, held insufficient for failing to allege that the remedies given by Civ. Code, § 331 et seq., authorizing sale of stock, etc., have been exhausted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by the Bell Development Company against W. A. Marshall. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed with directions.

Childers & Bruce, of El Centro, for appellant. Herbert L. Iasigi, of El Centro, for respondent.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. This is an action for an unpaid subscription to the capital stock of respondent corporation. The appellant interposed a general demurrer to the second amended complaint, the demurrer was overruled, and, the appellant standing on the issue of law and refusing to answer, the respondent had judgment.

The pleading of the respondent alleges an ordinary demand for the payment of the subscription and the appellant's refusal to comply with the demand; but there is no allegation that the respondent has attempted to follow the provisions of section 331 of the Civil Code and those coming after it. In this state, where the contract of subscription for stock is silent as to the time and manner of payment, calls for unpaid subscriptions are placed in the same class with assessments upon paid-up shares, and the above-mentioned sections of the Code provide a complete scheme for the making of collections of each of the two kinds of obligations. Suits cannot be commenced until the procedure there laid down has been exhausted, and in such a suit, the complaint must show that the procedure has been followed. Los Angeles Athletic Club v. Spires, 166 Cal. 173, 135 Pac. 298; Imperial L. & S. Co. v. Oster, 168 Pac. 1159.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to sustain the demurrer.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 8, 1917.)

RAILROADS ⚷328(7)—CROSSING ACCIDENT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

That an automobile driver, familiar with a railroad crossing where the view was somewhat obstructed, could have stopped a safe distance from the track, stilled the noise of the automobile engine, and listened for an approaching train, but failed to do so, was, as matter of law, contributory negligence barring recovery for injury to the automobile.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by Bessie C. Rayhill against the Southern Pacific Company and another. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Henry T. Gage and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. George L. Greer, of Los Angeles, and Daley & Byrne, of San Bernardino (John W. Summerfield, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendant appealed from a judgment awarding damages to the plaintiff on account of the loss of an automobile which was struck by a train of the defendant. Appeal is also taken from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The evidence is presented by bill of exceptions, and it is claimed that the proof was insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury, and that the court should have granted the motion of defendant for judgment of nonsuit. The questions so presented depend for solution upon the proposition as to whether upon the evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiff or upon the whole evidence it should be concluded that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. In our opinion, the case presented is one where the plaintiff, measuring her acts by all of the testimony favorable to her case, failed to use such precautions for the safety of her property as is required of a reasonably prudent person under the circumstances shown. The plaintiff's automobile was wrecked at a point near the town of Claremont and while upon a roadway known as Ramona avenue which crosses the tracks of the defendant at right angles. These tracks at that point run in an easterly and westerly direction and in a straight line for several miles on either side of the point of accident. Plaintiff testified that about 1:15 in the afternoon on a "still" day she drove southerly along Ramona avenue and approached the crossing; that she was driving a four-cylinder automobile and traveling at the rate of approximately 10 miles per hour; that she could not see the railroad tracks to the eastward of the crossing, by reason of an orange orchard aligning the right of way and brush, cornstalks, and sunflowers upon the right of way, until she reached a point about opposite a crossing sign, which was there for the purpose of advising users of the highway of the proximity of the railroad, which signpost, she testified, was "about 12 or 13 feet from the crossing." She testified that from the place where she sat in her automobile the front of the machine would project about 7 feet ahead of her; that the engine of her automobile made some noise, and that she did not at any point, while coming down Ramona avenue, stop the automobile to listen for the approach of trains, and that she heard no train approaching, nor did she hear a whistle sounded or bell rung; that when she reached the crossing post she threw on her emergency brake, without stopping the engine of the automobile, and that she and two young lady passengers who were with her all jumped from the machine and were not injured; that the "overhang" of one of the engines of the heavy freight train caught the automobile and demolished it. She testified that this was a very long train of freight cars; that it was coming on a down grade at the rate of from 50 to 60 miles an hour, without using steam; that after striking the automobile the train ran by 20 or 30 car lengths before it stopped; that when she started to stop her automobile the car was about 13 feet from the track and the front engine about 200 feet away from her; that the train was about 60 cars long, having attached to it one engine in front and two engines on the rear. As to the ability of a person to see eastward along the track of the railway for a considerable distance while traveling along Ramona avenue and before the limits of the right of way were reached, there was testimony flatly contradictory to that given by the plaintiff, and there was also testimony that the bell on the engine had been ringing continuously from the time the train had left the last station up to the time the accident occurred. Considering the contentions, however, made by appellant as we have before stated them, we have recited the evidence of the plaintiff in its strongest aspect, realizing that wherever a conflict occurred the jury was entitled to give the greater credit and weight, if it so determined, to the evidence introduced by the plaintiff. As to its salient points, the evidence of the plaintiff was corroborated by that of the two ladies who were passengers in the automobile at the time of the accident. The amount of overhang of the engine was given without dispute by one of the engineers as being from 28 to 30 inches. It may be added that the plaintiff also testified that she was very familiar with the location of the crossing and its surroundings. She also knew that the track was being constantly used for the operation of trains by defendant company. It then appears that the plaintiff approached a dangerous railroad crossing where the conditions were such as to prevent persons from seeing an approaching train before it had arrived in close proximity to the junction with the highway; that she was driving an automobile in which was a moving engine which made some noise; and that she at no time took the precaution to stop and listen until it was too late to avoid injury. Upon her own testimony (and the fact was not disputed) the train which collided with the automobile was a long, heavy freight train, one which, while "coasting" or traveling without the use of steam, was bound to make a noise that would give notice of its approach for a considerable distance; especially on a "still" day, as the plaintiff testified the day in question was. The plaintiff having shown by her testimony that she could not be advised of the approach of a train until within about 13 feet of the track, by looking, on account of the obstructions which stood in the way, she shows a situation to have existed which would require of her more diligence in the use of her remaining faculties in order to act as a reasonably prudent person should. It seems to us that the inevitable conclusion must be drawn that, had the plaintiff, at a safe distance from the track, stopped her automobile, stilled the noise of its engine, and listened for the approach of a train, she could not have failed to have been warned of the danger; that under such facts it must be said as a matter of law that she was guilty of contributory negligence.

> "The railroad track of a steam railway must itself be regarded as a sign of danger, and one intending to cross must avail himself of every opportunity to look and to listen for approaching trains. What he must do in such a case will depend upon circumstances. If the view of the track is obstructed he should take greater pains to listen. If, taking these precautions, he would have seen or heard the approaching train, the very fact of injury will raise a presumption that he did not take the required precautions." Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651.

As is said in the case of Chrissinger v. Southern Pacific Co., 169 Cal. 619, 149 Pac. 175:

> "Undoubtedly the question of contributory negligence or freedom from it is ordinarily one for the jury, but * * * the standard of conduct is so obvious as to be applicable to all persons, and the plaintiff has failed to measure up to that standard under the circumstances shown, he is not entitled to have his case go to the jury."

We cite further as applicable to the proposition the cases of Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513; Martin v. Southern Pacific Co., 150 Cal. 124, 88 Pac. 701.

For the reasons stated, the judgment and order must be reversed.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. HUDSON. (Cr. 552.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 8, 1917.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⟹122(2)—VARIANCE BETWEEN COMPLAINT AND INFORMATION.

An information should not charge accused with an offense with which he was not charged in the complaint upon which he was examined by the committing magistrate; accused not being legally committed for such offense.

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⟹144—MOTION TO DISMISS.

Upon motion to dismiss an information as charging an offense for which accused had not been legally committed, the information may be set aside only in part, such as a single count, although Pen. Code, § 995, as to setting aside, does not expressly so provide.

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION ⟹122(2)—VARIANCE BETWEEN COMPLAINT AND INFORMATION.

Since, under Pen. Code, § 459, the intent with which a burglarious act is done is an essential part of the offense, an information charging burglarious entry with intent to rape did not charge the same offense as the complaint before the committing magistrate, which charged burglarious entry with intent to steal and murder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Milton T. Farmer, Judge.

Frank W. Hudson was prosecuted for burglary. From an order dismissing the information, the People appeal. Reversed, with direction.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., and J. R. Dorsey, Dist. Atty., and Wesley P. Grijalva, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Bakersfield, for the People. Emmons & Johnstone, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff appeals from an order dismissing an information which, in three counts, charged the defendant with the commission of the crime of burglary. The several counts refer to the same acts, differing only in the intent with which they were done. The intent described in the first count was to commit the crime of larceny; the second, murder; the third, rape. The complaint before the committing magistrate charged that the defendant entered the apartment of one Irma V. Meyer with intent "to commit the crime of larceny and then and there to kill and murder the said Irma V. Meyer." The defendant's motion to set aside the information was based upon the ground "that before the filing of said information said defendant has not been legally committed by a magistrate for the offenses set forth in the information." At the hearing of said motion on May 26, 1917, the superior court entered in its minutes an order "that the said motion to set aside the information be and the same is hereby denied. * * * It is now by the court ordered that the within matter be and the same is hereby continued for further discussion" until May 28, 1917.

The foregoing facts appear from the information and from the clerk's transcript, supplemented by the reporter's transcript of the proceedings of the hearing on the motion to dismiss. In the brief of counsel for the people statements are made purporting to show the order of commitment made by the committing magistrate. In the brief of counsel for defendant it is asserted that in the evidence taken at the preliminary examination there was no evidence that defendant entered said apartment with intent to commit the crime of rape. The transcripts give us no direct information concerning the contents of the commitment order, or concerning the evidence received at the preliminary examination. For the purpose of learning to what extent the proceedings before the magistrate were presented to the superior court, we may perhaps take cognizance of some of the statements made by the judge at the hearing of the motion and in ruling thereon. He said that he had read the information and the complaint on which the hearing was had in the magistrate's court, and the commitment; that the defendant was charged in the justice's court with burglary committed with two intents, whereas the information charged him in three counts with three separate intents. At the hearing on May 28th the judge announced his opinion that the count charging an intent not included in the charge before the committing magistrate should not have been in the information; that he would deny the motion, because the motion as made was directed generally to the entire information. Thereupon the defendant moved that the information as to the third count thereof be set aside, "upon the ground that before the information was filed the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate for the offense named therein, to wit, the offense of burglary and unlawfully entering the building with intent to commit rape." The district attorney objected to the consideration of this motion. This objection was based upon the ground that there is no provision of law for setting aside part of an information. Thereupon, after discussion by counsel, the court granted "the motion to dismiss the information on the ground that the defendant has never been legally committed by a magistrate on the charges embraced in the information." It is from this order that the people have appealed.

[1] It is contended by counsel for the people that it was the duty of the district attorney to draw the information in such form as would embrace the offense or offenses disclosed by the testimony taken before the magistrate, that no transcript of the testimony received by the committing magistrate was brought before the superior court, and that under the presumption that official duty was performed it must be assumed that the evidence before the committing magistrate tended to show that the crime of burglary, with intent to commit rape, had been committed by the defendant. In support of the rule thus invoked the attorney-general quotes the decision of the Supreme Court in People v. Vierra, 67 Cal. 231, 7 Pac. 640, and it must be admitted that that decision supports his contention. But the decision itself has been directly overruled in People v. Nogiri, 142 Cal. 596, 76 Pac. 490, where it is said that in the case of an examination held before a committing magistrate "it is not in contemplation of the law that the district attorney may substitute his judgment for that of the judicial officer and lay another charge against an offender other than that for which the magistrate * * * has decided that he should be put upon trial." In People v. Christian, 101 Cal. 471, 35 Pac. 1043, it is said that "whenever a defendant is informed against for an offense different from that charged in the complaint upon which he was examined, or not included therein, he has had no examination for that offense, and is entitled to have the information set aside upon the ground that he has not been legally committed."

[2] Appellant next suggests that, since the first and second counts of the information complied with all legal requirements, the order should have been at most only an order setting aside the third count. The only reply offered to this suggestion is that the law only provides for setting aside the information, and that no provision is made for setting aside a part of an information. Section 995 of the Penal Code provides that an information must be set aside if "before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate." We find no valid reason why an order to set aside a separate count of the information may not be made. In People v. Danford, 14 Cal. App. 442, 112 Pac. 474, this court discussed the same matter and stated that "to be effective the motion should, in our judgment, have been directed to the second count alone, and not to the entire information."

[3] The intent with which a burglarious act was done is an essential part of the offense. Pen. Code, § 459. Where the averment of ownership of the property as stated in the information was not the same as the averment of such ownership as stated in the complaint before the magistrate, it was held that there was such a variance between the two described offenses that the one could not be deemed the same as the other. People v. Wallace, 94 Cal. 497, 29 Pac. 950. In the present case the information charging entry of the defendant upon the described premises with intent to commit rape does not describe the same offense as does the complaint, which omitted the statement of any intent to commit rape.

The order is reversed, with the direction that the lower court set aside the information as to the third count thereof and refuse to dismiss the other counts thereof.

We concur: JAMES, J.; WORKS, Judge pro tem.

MAZITELLI v. CRANE et al. (Civ. 2234.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 12, 1917.)

1. CONTINUANCE 🔑12 — GROUNDS — SUFFICIENCY.

Where a case was called five years after defendant had filed his answer, it was no abuse of discretion to refuse a continuance at defendant's request, in the absence of an affidavit therefor, and at the request of a person not an attorney of record, who merely stated that continuance was desired because of illness of attorney of record.

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT 🔑60(2) — GROUND.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 583, providing that the court may on its own motion dismiss an action if not brought to trial within five years after defendant has filed his answer, plaintiff, when he has moved the case upon the calendar and caused it to be set for trial, has performed his duty, and is not in default if the case is not actually tried within five years after issue joined.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by V. Gamboni Mazitelli against Dennis F. Crane and others. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order refusing to set aside a default, defendants Sears appeal. Affirmed.

M. H. Hernan, of San Francisco, for appellants. H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the order denying the application of the defendants to set aside and vacate a judgment entered against them. The application was made under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is based upon certain affidavits. The application was denied, and the appeal is taken from the order of the court denying the application of the defendants for relief under that section.

The action was one to quiet title. The complaint was filed on May 9, 1908, and the answer of the defendants was filed on the 14th of November of that year. Some five years later the cause was upon the calendar of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, department 1. When called, an individual present, who was not the attorney of record in the case, arose and stated that Mr. Hernan, the attorney of record, was ill and unable to be present, and requested the trial of the case to be continued until a later day. He stated that he was unacquainted with the facts of the case and could not take up the trial. No affidavit for a continuance was filed. The court denied the application and ordered that the trial proceed. The cause was then tried in the absence of said defendants and their attorney, and a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff in the action. This was in the month of December, 1914. Several months thereafter the motion for relief from that judgment was made and denied.

The contention here is, first, that the court abused its discretion in the first place in denying the motion for a continuance; and the second point is made that it was the duty of the court of its own motion to dismiss the action, for the reason that the cause was not brought on for trial within five years after issue joined, and that the court abused its discretion in not dismissing the action.

In answer to the motion for relief under said section 473, affidavits were filed on behalf of the plaintiff in the action, to the effect that after the cause had come to an issue by the filing of the answer it had been set for trial upon plaintiff's motion at least three different times, and that upon each occasion the defendants had procured a continuance of the trial upon one ground or another; and it is urged that these facts were within the knowledge of the judge of said department of the court at the time the cause came on for trial on December 14, 1914, and influenced the court in refusing to grant a further continuance of the cause.

[1] We think it must be obvious that there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to grant a continuance of the cause, in the absence of any affidavit or other showing for a continuance than that which was presented by the person applying therefor, who was not the attorney of record, and who merely made his statement in court asking for a continuance on the ground of the illness of the attorney of record in the case.

[2] As to the second contention above stated, it is the rule in this state that while it is the duty of the plaintiff, under section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to bring the cause on for trial within five years after it is at issue, under penalty of having it dismissed for a failure to do so, the plaintiff has fully performed his duty to the court when he has moved the case upon the calendar and caused it to be set for trial, and is in court and ready to proceed to trial at the appointed time; and thereafter he is not in default if the case is not actually tried within the five years after issue joined. Section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the cases cited by appellant have no application to cases which have been moved upon the calendar and set for trial at the plaintiff's instance, and have thereafter been continued upon such calendar for trial from time to time by the court upon the defendant's motion and over the plaintiff's objection to such continuances.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

CAULFIELD et al. v. GUGLIELMETTI et al. (Civ. 1691.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 10, 1917.)

1. TRIAL 🔑396(3)—FINDINGS — CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS.

Where complaint alleged a contract, mutual rescission, and partial repayment, and sought recovery of the balance due, and the answer denied such contract, the court's finding that the sum due was less than alleged in complaint was not a departure.

2. TRIAL 🔑388(1)—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY.

It is the duty of the court to make findings on all material issues upon which testimony was given regardless of how or by whom such issues were introduced.

3. TRIAL 🔑396(4)—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT.

Evidence held to support findings responding to issues raised by original pleadings in action for balance due under agreement for rescission of contract.

4. TRIAL 🔑388(1) — FINDINGS — NECESSITY —EVIDENCE.

In an action for balance due under agreement for rescission of contract, evidence held so to support averments of cross-complaint as to require findings on the issues raised therein.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1071(1)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—FINDINGS.

In action for balance due under agreement for rescission of contract, error, if any, in finding amount due to be less than as alleged in complaint was without prejudice to defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

Action by William and Thomas Caulfield against W. Guglielmetti and another, copartners doing business under the firm name of W. & R. Guglielmetti. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Early, of Petaluma, and A. H. Crook, of San Francisco, for appellants. Gil P. Hall and E. J. Dole, both of Petaluma, for respondents.

HART, J. The first four paragraphs of the complaint in the action are also alleged, in practically the same language, in the cross-complaint of defendants. They are:

(1) That defendants are copartners, doing business as dairymen in the county of Sonoma, under the firm name and style of W. & R. Guglielmetti.

(2) "That on the 14th day of September, 1914, defendants and William Caulfield, for the benefit of himself and Thomas Caulfield, made their agreement in writing, in the words and figures as follows, to wit:

" 'Petaluma, Cal., Sept. 14/14.

" 'We agree to sell to Will Caulfield 71 cows, 18 heifers, 40 calves, for the sum of $6,300.00, and reserve the right to pick out any of the above stock, and either replace them with other as good cows or whatever they may be or pay cows that are short of the above number $59.14 each, heifers, $50.00 each, and calves, $30.00 each.

" '[Signed] Wm. Caulfield,
" 'W. and R. Guglielmetti,
" 'Per W. J. Guglielmetti.' "

(3) That at the time of the execution of the above agreement said William Caulfield, on behalf of himself and the said Thomas Caulfield, "and in pursuance to the provisions of said agreement, paid defendants the sum of $1,000."

(4) That the said Thomas Caulfield then and there became, and ever since has been, and is now the owner of an undivided one-half interest in and to said agreement (in the cross-complaint, "and the personalty therein described") "and all rights accruing therefrom, and in and to all claims mentioned in this complaint" (in the cross-complaint, "in and to all claims arising thereon").

Paragraph 5 of the complaint reads:

"That on or about October 1, 1914, defendants agreed to pay to plaintiffs the sum of $20 in lawful money and to return to plaintiffs all sums theretofore paid on account of said agreement, by plaintiffs, provided plaintiffs would surrender, release, and rescind said agreement; and said plaintiffs accepted said promise on the part of defendants as aforesaid, and pursuant thereto, and in consideration thereof, did surrender, release, and rescind said agreement, and thereafter defendants paid to plaintiffs the said sum of $20 and $580, and no more, and there now remains due and unpaid from defendants the sum of $420, no part of which has ever been paid, although demand therefor has been made."

In the answer the allegations of said paragraph 5 are denied, and it is alleged that on September 30, 1914, defendants were ready and willing to perform said contract, and tendered to plaintiffs said stock in pursuance of the terms of said contract; that plaintiffs unqualifiedly refused to accept said stock, "and did offer to said defendants the sum of $20 to rescind and cancel and annul said agreement," which was refused by defendants; "that pursuant to the terms of said agreement said plaintiffs were obligated to pay to said defendants for and on account of said stock the sum of $6,300, and by reason of the said refusal of said plaintiffs to comply with the terms of said agreement said defendants, in order to mitigate the damages they had sustained by reason thereof, were compelled to and did, after having notified said plaintiffs of their intention to so do, sell said stock for the sum of $5,900," the highest price they could receive; that defendants paid to plaintiffs $400, the difference between $6,300, which plaintiffs were obligated to pay, and $5,900, the sum defendants received.

The cross-complaint alleges the tender and refusal to accept said stock, as above set forth, and proceeds:

> "That said plaintiffs did refuse to pay the balance of the purchase price due, and for the period of 30 days thereafter continued to refuse to comply with the provisions of said agreement; that by reason of said refusal, defendants were compelled to and did furnish and provide for, for 30 days, the feed, keep, pasturage and care of said stock," the reasonable value of which was alleged to be $500.

The allegations of the cross-complaint are denied by plaintiffs.

The judgment was:

> That plaintiffs do have and recover from defendants "the sum of $400, the balance due on the purchase price of the stock mentioned in plaintiffs' complaint, together with interest on the sum of $1,000 from October 1, 1914, to April 26, 1915, and interest on the sum of $400 from April 26, 1915," together with costs.

The appeal is by the defendants from said judgment.

Appellants specify alleged errors of the court in rulings upon the admission of evidence and in failing to determine certain issues. Insufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment in several designated particulars is also relied upon.

The court found as follows: That the written agreement of September 14, 1914, was made and entered into by the parties; that on said date, and on said agreement, the plaintiffs paid to the defendants the sum of $1,000; that on October 1, 1914, the defendants agreed to return to the plaintiffs "all sums theretofore paid on account of said agreement by plaintiffs, provided plaintiffs would surrender, release, and rescind said agreement," and that the plaintiffs thereupon accepted that proposition, and, pursuant to said agreement of rescission, release, and surrender, the defendants paid to the plaintiffs the sum of $600, and no more, "and there now remains due and unpaid from the defendants to plaintiffs the sum of $400, no part of which has ever been paid," etc. No finding was made as to the bonus of $20 which the complaint alleges the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiffs as a part of the consideration for the rescission; but the court did make findings upon the issues, above briefly recapitulated, made by the cross-complaint of the defendants.

The appellants contend that the findings and conclusions of law are at variance with the issues raised by the pleadings and the essential theory of the case following the issues so made. In support of this position counsel say:

> "The complaint set up an express contract of surrender, release, and rescission based upon a consideration of $20, and the answer denies the same. The court finds that no such contract existed, and, although it is not alleged in the complaint that appellants violated their contract, nor that they agreed to sell to respondents a straight dairy (without the right to pick) for $6,300, and although in the trial of the case no such contention was made, and the case was not tried on any such issue, the court found contrary to the terms of the agreement, and without any evidence thereof: (1) That appellants agreed to sell a straight dairy for $6,300, without a right to pick; (2) that the appellants violated their agreement by demanding $6,500 for a straight dairy, without the right to pick; (3) that there was a rescission by mutual assent of the parties, although appellants did not agree to pay the respondents the sum of $20."

It is true, as counsel for the defendants assert, that the issues, and the only issues, tendered by the complaint of the plaintiffs and accepted by the answer were: (1) Whether the agreement of September 14, 1914, was, on the 1st day of October, 1914, rescinded by the mutual consent of the parties, and the plaintiffs thereby released from the obligations thereof; (2) whether there was still due the plaintiffs, under the agreement of rescission, the sum of $420. And, upon the issues so raised, it is clear that the findings (the first above referred to) support the conclusions of law and the judgment.

As seen, the court found substantially, that the parties agreed to rescind the agreement of September 14, 1914, upon the consideration that the defendants would take back the stock sold and would return to the plaintiffs all sums theretofore paid by them to the defendants on said contract of sale, and that in pursuance of the last-made agreement (the agreement to rescind) the defendants paid to the plaintiffs, of the sum of $1,000 found by the court to have been paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants at the time of the execution of the agreement of sale, the sum of $600, leaving as a balance due the plaintiffs from the defendants under the agreement of rescission the sum of $400.

[1] These findings clearly coincide with the issues as tendered by the complaint, save as to the averment that the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiffs for a rescission and surrender of the contract of sale a bonus of $20, that is, a sum in that amount in excess of the amount paid by the plaintiffs on the contract of sale; and it is equally clear that the conclusions of law and the judgment follow those findings. But it appears to be the theory of counsel for the appellants that, because the court failed to make any finding as to the allegation in the complaint that the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiffs for a rescission and surrender of the contract of sale the sum of $20 over and above "all sums theretofore paid" by the plaintiffs to the defendants under the contract of sale, the agreement of rescission found by the court is not the agreement of rescission set out in the complaint. In other words, as we understand counsel, the claim is that for the reason stated the cause of action stated in the complaint is wholly at variance with the cause of action on which the court has framed its findings; that is to say, that the finding as to the agreement of rescission made by the parties is so far different from the one pleaded by the plaintiffs that it involves a departure from the cause of action stated in the complaint. There is no force in this contention. The complaint declares upon a contract whereby (it is alleged) the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiffs a certain sum of money, and the action is no different from the ordinary suit upon a contract to recover money due thereunder. The answer denies that any such contract was made. There was, therefore, a clear and direct issue tendered and accepted upon these questions: Did the parties enter into such a contract as is described in the complaint, and, if so, is the amount alleged to be due the plaintiffs from the defendants or any sum under said contract still due, owing, and unpaid to the former? It was, of course, for the court to determine these questions from the evidence, and, if finding that such an agreement was entered into between the parties, how much, if anything, the evidence showed that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover thereunder; and the fact that the court found that the evidence disclosed that the sum due the plaintiffs from the defendants on the agreement was less than the sum alleged to be due could not have the effect of so varying or modifying or changing the agreement as pleaded as to constitute the finding as so made a departure from the cause of action stated in the complaint.

The criticism that the court made a number of findings which were wholly outside the issues raised by the complaint of the plaintiffs and the answer thereto is aimed at a number of findings which appear to have been made in response to issues raised by the cross-complaint of the defendants and the answer thereto by the plaintiffs. The case sought to be made by the cross-complaint was, as above shown, briefly this: That the contract of sale having been entered into between the parties and a payment of $1,000 thereon made by the plaintiffs, the latter thereafter, and for a period of 30 days, refused further to carry out their part of the contract, and that the defendants were therefore "compelled to and did furnish and provide for the period of, to wit, 30 days, feed, keep, pasturage, and care for said stock, that the reasonable value of said feed, keep, pasturage, and care of said stock is the sum of $500," and that the defendants have been damaged in said sum by reason of the refusal of the plaintiffs to comply with the terms and conditions of the said contract of sale.

The court made several distinct findings specifically finding that said allegations of the cross-complaint were untrue, and, as stated, it appears to be those findings that counsel claim were beyond the issues in the case.

[2] It was the duty of the court to make findings upon all the material issues raised in the case and upon which testimony was given, regardless of how or by whom those issues were introduced therein. And there was testimony introduced in support of the issues tendered by the cross-complaint, as we shall presently show. But, conceding for the purposes of the argument that the findings referred to involved matters entirely foreign to the issue, still the proposition remains that the findings first above referred to and which respond to the issues raised by the complaint of the plaintiffs and the answer thereto of the defendants are sufficient to support the judgment, and the findings criticized by counsel may therefore be wholly eliminated, without disturbing or affecting the stability of the judgment in the slightest degree.

There is no ground apparent from the record before us upon which the contention may be maintained that the findings responding to the issues made by the complaint and the answer thereto do not derive sufficient support from the evidence. In support of this statement we may here refer briefly to some of the testimony introduced by the plaintiffs, following which will likewise be presented the testimony given by the defendants, whereby they sought to sustain the allegations of their cross-complaint.

Thomas Caulfield (one of the plaintiffs), who had lived in Petaluma for about 37 years, and was associated with his son, William, in the cattle business, testified:

> "On September 14, 1914, my son agreed to purchase from Guglielmetti Bros. certain stock for the sum of $6,300, on which we paid on account $1,000. On or about October 1, 1914, we went for the cattle and to pay the balance of the money. We met William Guglielmetti and Robert Guglielmetti there. Mr. Maggetti came up there and wanted to buy the cattle, and I wanted the cattle to all go together; I would be willing to give a little bit to get them all; it was a good pick. I asked Guglielmetti to let them all go, the ones he had picked out, and he said 'No,' but he would for a certain sum of money, and I said 'No,' I would take $100 profit for the whole thing, if I had any. To that he said, 'Well, you will get $200, and more.' I said, 'No; I'll take $100;' and he said, 'You won't take $100;' and I said, 'Yes; I'll take > half of that;' and he said, 'You won't do anything of the kind;' and I says, 'I will, I'll take $20, but I don't want to take it from you boys, because that would look like backing out, but I'll take $20;' and he says, 'I will take them;' and I says, 'All right, they are yours; get your horses and pick them out.' We went home and left the stock there. Mr. Guglielmetti afterwards paid me $600. I did not read the contract signed by my son and Mr. Guglielmetti; the boy just told me what it was. I have been engaged in the cattle business about 30 years, and my son has been in business with me ever since he has been able to walk around."

The witness said that Mr. Maggetti was out there to buy the stock, but "when he looked over this stock he turned them down."

William Caulfield testified:

> "On the 14th of October, in company with my father and another man, I visited the Guglielmetti ranch to take away the cattle we bought there. When we reached the ranch we got into a little argument over some cows that were picked out, and my father said he would not stand for picking out that many cows, topping them off; and they said, 'Well, that will be all right; you will make $300 or $400 on them, anyhow;' and he said, 'No; I won't.' He says, 'I will take $100 for them.' Then he said, 'I will take $50;' and then he said, 'I will go better than that; I will take $20;' and Bob says, 'We will give you $20 on the deal;' and Father said, 'No; I wouldn't like to sell them to you; that would be too much like backing out;' and he said, 'No; it will not; we will give you that;' and he insisted on it, and my father said, 'All right, the cattle is yours,' and we went back to town. I paid $1,000 on the deal, and they returned $600 in April. I had made a demand for the return of the $1,000."

On cross-examination, the witness said:

> "I did not offer to sell the cattle back, nor did my father. He did not want to sell them back to him at all. Q. What did you do? A. We sold them back to him. Q. And when you sold them back you sold them back for $1,020, didn't you? A. Yes, sir. That was not in writing; it was an oral agreement. Mr. Maggetti came out there at our request to look at the cattle. He looked at them and refused to take them. It was then that I went back to give Mr. Guglielmetti a check for the balance and take the cattle, and he wanted $200 more. He topped off the top cows, picked the tops off, he picked them over and picked out the best stock. I prepared to sign a check at that time, and my father spoke and said something about straight dairy stock. He said he wanted them all straight; he did not want so many of them picked out. The Guglielmettis said they would turn them in straight for $6,500, and we told them to turn them in straight for $6,300, and we would give them a check and take them along, but the Guglielmettis would not accept that. My father told them, 'I could not get out at that price, with these cattle all topped off.' I do not know how many were picked out. We had a little kind of oral agreement that he would pick out five or six cows, and put in five or six more out of the dairy that looked just as good."

The witness was asked to explain what he meant by "straight dairy stock" and said:

> "Well, you know, when you pick cattle out, and put out all of the best lookers and your best cows, you know what you have got left; that is not straight dairy stock; straight dairy stock is where you leave the best lookers in. My father wanted straight dairy stock for $6,300."

C. J. Caulfield, a son of Thomas Caulfield, testified to making demand upon one of the Guglielmettis for the return of $1,020, and plaintiffs thereupon rested their case.

W. J. Guglielmetti testified that all the terms of the contract with plaintiffs were not contained in the written agreement; that the $1,000 payment and the time for removal of the cattle from the ranch were not in the contract; that the cattle were to be delivered not later than October 1st. Referring to the conversation on October 1st, the witness said that William Caulfield drove up and said, "Don't mix those cows before my father gets here; he wants a straight dairy;" that, when the father came along, he said he wanted a straight dairy, and the witness told him, "If you want straight dairy you will have to pay $6,500, or take them as the contract for $6,300." He said that the father replied: "I will pay $6,500; I will take straight dairy;" to which the witness said, "Very well." He continued:

> "And what brought about the $20 is, when I told Mr. Caulfield that he asked Mr. Maggetti too much money, he said something about $20, that he was willing to make a profit of $20, and that's about all that was said. There was no offer made to or accepted by us, and we didn't agree to pay him for that stock, or anything of the kind. I explained to Mr. Caulfield why they had to be delivered not later than October 1, 1914; that our lease was up on the last day of September; that on the 1st day of October Mr. Lanzi would take possession of the ranch, and we would have no more pasture for the cattle. No demand was made upon us for the payment of any money that day, and there was no suggestion made to us on that day to return to the Caulfields $1,000. It is not true that on or about the 1st day of October we entered into an agreement to pay the plaintiffs the sum of $20 in lawful money and return to them all sums of money theretofore paid on account of said agreement, provided they would surrender, release, and rescind our agreement."

The witness testified as to feeding the stock from the 1st of October to the 17th of November and as to the cost of such feed. On cross-examination the witness said that on the 1st of October he had taken 27 or 28 head from the herd and had put in an equal number of other stock, and that William Caulfield had agreed that that might be done.

R. P. Guglielmetti testified that he showed Will Caulfield the stock some time in September, and that he was present on October 1, 1914, and heard the conversation between the Caulfields and his brother. He said:

> "He said he would pay $6,500 for a straight dairy, or $6,300, take them the way the agreement called for. The old gentleman, Mr. Caulfield, said that."

On cross-examination the witness seemed somewhat confused as to the exact conversation on October 1st, but what he finally said was that his brother said he wanted $6,500 for a straight dairy stock, and that Thomas Caulfield said he would not pay it.

S. J. Guglielmetti, a brother of the defendants, testified that he was present and heard the conversation on October 1st. His version of it was as follows:

> "William Caulfield started to do some figuring, and he put down $6,300, or mentioned $6,- 300, that is, for the cows as they stood in the corral, and my brother says, 'No; the agreement was $6,500;' and Mr. Caulfield, the old man, says, 'I offered $6,500 if Maggetti would buy the cattle;' and then my brother Bill says, 'You probably held the price a little too high on Maggetti, or you would have sold the cattle;' and Mr. Caulfield said, 'No; I would be willing to sell those cattle at a profit of $20.' My brother told him $6,500 for straight dairy, or $6,300 for what they called the picked dairy. The plaintiffs would not pay $6,300 for the dairy as picked, and my brother insisted upon picking for the $6,300, or $6,500 for the straight dairy. There was no offer made by either of my brothers to purchase this stock for $20. My brothers did not say anything when Mr. Caulfield said that he would take $20 for his bargain on the cattle. Mr. Caulfield says to his father, 'You can't do that; you give the boys $100 for their trouble.'"

On rebuttal William Caulfield said that he did not make the remark last testified to.

[3, 4] It cannot be doubted that the foregoing shows: (1) That there is sufficient support to the findings responding to the issues raised by the original pleadings of the parties; (2) that there is some testimony addressed to the support of the averments of the cross-complaint, and that therefore the court was obliged to make findings as to the issues thus raised.

[5] If it may be said that the court erred by its failure to find as to that part of the agreement of rescission as it is alleged in the complaint to the effect that the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff the sum of $20, in addition to making a return of the money theretofore paid on the contract of sale by the plaintiffs, the reply is that the error, if error it is, is obviously without prejudice to the appellants.

There is no substantial merit in this appeal. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

35 Cal. App. 325

DUNN v. BARRY et al. (Civ. 1741.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 19, 1917.)

1. Mortgages 🔑408—Foreclosure—Conditions—Estoppel.

Under a note and mortgage providing that on default in any installment of interest both principal and interest should become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of the note, where the holder accepted the first two installments of interest only after protest against delay he would not be estopped for default in payment of third installment to advance the maturity of the principal without prior notice of his intention so to do; the true rule being that the holder has the right where he acts promptly to exercise his option upon default in any installment.

2. Mortgages 🔑401(2)—Foreclosure—Default—Options in Mortgage.

A provision in a mortgage giving the mortgagee the option to declare the entire amount due upon default in payment of any installment of interest will not be construed a penalty.

3. Mortgages 🔑408 — Foreclosure — Default—Estoppel.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage after exercise of option to declare entire amount due for failure to pay installments, held, under evidence, that the mortgagee had not lulled the mortgagor into security, but had acted in good faith in exercising his option.

4. Mortgages 🔑415(1) — Foreclosure—Default—Excuse.

That the mortgagor did not know the mortgagee's address would not excuse payment of installments when due in view of Civ. Code, § 1500, declaring that an obligation may be extinguished by a deposit in the name of a creditor.

5. Mortgages 🔑401(5)—Foreclosure—Tender After Default.

After the mortgagee had exercised his option to declare the whole amount due and payable, his right of foreclosure could not be defeated by a tender of all interest due; a tender of the full amount of the note being essential.

6. Costs 🔑260(4)—Frivolous Appeal—Imposition of Penalty.

Where some of the appellant's specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the court's findings are contrary to the express stipulations of the parties, or are addressed to matter entirely immaterial, while as to others respondent points out portions of the record justifying the court's conclusions, and answers every contention of appellant, who has failed to file a reply brief, and made no oral argument, a penalty will be imposed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by James L. Dunn against Robert Barry and others. From a decree for plaintiff, and from an order denying motion for new trial, defendant named and Ida M. Barry appeal. Affirmed, with $100 damages for frivolous appeal.

W. A. Martin, of Los Angeles, for appellants. C. W. Pendleton, Jr., and John W. Rankin, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for the foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure the payment of a promissory note for $10,000. The note and mortgage called for the payment of the interest quarterly, and provided that should default be made in the payment of any installment of interest when due, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of the note. The first quarterly installment of interest became due on June 23, 1914, but was not paid when due; $120 of such interest being paid by appellants on July 1, 1914, and the balance of said installment, to wit, $105, was paid about two weeks after said July 1st. The second quarterly installment of interest fell due on September 23, 1914, and was paid by appellants on October 16th, following. The third payment was due on December 23, 1914, and it not being paid, respondent on January 12, 1915, served upon appellants and each of them a notice of election, declaring the whole of said $10,000 note due and payable for the nonpayment of the quarterly installment of interest due December 23, 1914, and on January 18th following the complaint in foreclosure was filed. On January 22, 1915, appellant tendered to respondent in gold coin the sum of $225 in payment of the interest that was due on said December 23, 1914, and $5 additional, being the interest on said interest of $225 from December 23d to January 22d, and then and there offered to pay all costs incurred in said action by respondent and an attorney's fee of $50, which offer and tender was by respondent refused. The case went to judgment, and the court found that there was due plaintiff, in the aggregate, the sum of $11,024.71, and decreed a foreclosure in the usual form. From the judgment and the order denying a motion for a new trial, the appeal is taken.

[1] The first point made by appellants is:

> "The respondent accepted all prior payments from appellants after such payments were due, and he did so voluntarily without protest; therefore he is estopped to elect to advance the maturity of the principal, he not having served upon appellants any prior notice of his intention so to do."

But appellants are mistaken as to the fact and the principle of law or equity embodied in said proposition. As to the acceptance of said payments the court found:

> "That said Dunn accepted each of such payments only after protest at the delay, and that said plaintiff at all times prior to the commencement of this action urged and demanded that said defendants pay the interest due promptly when the same should become due, and never at any time consented to the same being paid tardily, but on the contrary on former occasions, when said defendants Barry did not pay to plaintiff interest due from them to him promptly when the same became due, that said plaintiff informed said defendants Barry that unless the same was paid promptly, he would foreclose his said mortgage."

We have examined the record, and ascertained that there is sufficient evidence to support said finding.

Moreover, it is not a proper case to invoke the principle of estoppel, as claimed by appellants. It does not follow that because the holder of the note after default in the payment of an installment of interest has elected to waive immediate payment and accept the compounding of interest as provided for, or has accepted the tardy payment of the same, and has failed to exercise his option to declare the whole amount of the claim due, he is bound to waive its exercise at all subsequent defaults, unless he give prior notice of his intention to make his election. The true and just rule is that while he exercises his option promptly he may do it at the maturity and upon default of any installment of the interest. Campbell v. West, 86 Cal. 197, 24 Pac. 1000; O'Connor v. Meskill (N. J. Ch.) 39 Atl. 1061.

[2] The mistake of appellants is, in the assumption that herein is involved a forfeiture, as did the cases cited by them. "Such a provision in a mortgage (i. e., a provision giving the mortgagee option to declare the entire amount due upon default in the payment of any installment of interest) is not construed a penalty, but an agreement as to the time when a debt shall become due, and enforceable according to its terms." Jones on Mortgages (7th Ed.) § 1181; Whitcher v. Webb, 44 Cal. 127; Bank, etc., et al. v. Mundy, 162 Ill. App. 138; Curran v. Houston, 201 Ill. 442, 66 N. E. 228. As said in the Whitcher Case, supra:

> "The contract was fair in its terms. There is certainly nothing contrary to equity or good conscience for parties to provide that interest as such shall be payable at stated periods of time, or to stipulate that a default in its payment at the day shall leave it optional with the creditor to insist upon the payment of the whole debt. * * * Nor do we see that the case presents any element of a forfeiture sought to be enforced, or falls within the application of any principle of equity upon which relief against a forfeiture is sometimes extended. The promise is an absolute one in the first instance to pay the interest when due, and conditional in the second instance that, failing in the first, the obligor will at once be bound, at the option of the creditor, to pay a larger sum, which larger sum is, however, nothing more than he really owes already, and must, under any circumstances, sooner or later be called on to pay."

[3] Nor is there any more merit in the contention of appellants that:

> "The respondent, as to the default in interest upon which the present foreclosure is predicated, expressly and specifically lulled appellants into a sense of security."

The finding as to that being adverse to the claim of appellants was to the effect that they were not lulled into security by any act or declaration of respondent, nor were they misled or deceived by anything done or said by respondent. In support of this finding it is sufficient to quote the following testimony of respondent:

> "When I saw Mr. Barry on December 23, 1914, and he said he would pay the interest in a few days, I did not say that was all right. I did not say anything at all similar to that. I said nothing to him about being willing to give him any additional time in which to pay his interest. I never intended to convey to Mr. Barry the belief that as a result of my failing to insist that he pay punctually the installment of interest which fell due December 23, 1914, I would not foreclose. On every occasion when the interest was falling due, I notified Mr. Barry ten days or so previous to it falling due asking that the interest be paid when it was due, and I often threatened Mr. Barry with foreclosure if he did not pay it promptly in the future. And I saw Mr. Barry, one of the defendants in this action, in Los Angeles on December 23, 1914. At that time I demanded payment of the interest due on the $10,000 mortgage."

Other circumstances are detailed by the witnesses that fortify the conclusion that he acted in perfect good faith, and that there existed no ground for just complaint on the part of appellants. The fact that he was quite indulgent in reference to the prior payments does not, of course, militate in the least against his right to foreclose for the third default.

[4] The third contention that appellants did not know where to send the interest, since respondent's letters came from different points in Northern California, is entirely destitute of merit. As to this the court found:

> "That it is true that at the time of the filing of the amended answer of the defendants Barry herein plaintiff was a resident of the city of Alameda. * * * That it is not true that the particular or specific address of said plaintiff in said city of Alameda was unknown to said defendants or to either of them, * * * but that it is on the contrary true that at all times subsequent to several months prior to the institution of this action said defendants Barry and each of them were informed by plaintiff and knew the exact and specific address of said plaintiff in the said city of Alameda and the number of the street of such address."

Dunn so testified, and there is circumstantial evidence to the same effect. But even if appellants had not known the specific address they could have made the payment as provided in section 1500 of the Civil Code.

[5] Manifestly the tender of all the interest due after plaintiff had exercised his option to advance the maturity of the note could not affect the right of respondent to bring suit, which right had already vested. If appellants had tendered the full amount due on the note, including the principal, they would then have met the obligation which they had incurred. In other words, when appellants, 15 days after receiving notice of respondent's election, made the tender they actually owed, according to their agreement, the sum of $10,000, with interest, and, of course, they could not by tendering $200 or $300 impair the right of respondent to maintain an action for the full amount due. The proposition is too plain for argument.

[6] There are many specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to support certain findings. Some of these specifications are contrary to the express stipulation of the parties, some of them are addressed to matters entirely immaterial, and as to the others, respondent points out portions of the record which entirely justify the court's conclusions. We can see no earthly good in noticing them specifically. Indeed, respondent has clearly and conclusively answered every contention of appellants, and the latter must have concluded that no plausible reply could be made as they filed no closing brief, nor have they made any oral argument. The fact is that one can hardly resist the conclusion that this appeal was taken for the purpose of delay. There is certainly less merit in the various contentions than usually characterizes the position of an appellant. We consider it a proper case to impose a penalty.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed, with $100 damages for a frivolous appeal.

JONES v. MANNING et al. (Civ. 1913.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 15, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 14, 1918.)

1. ELECTIONS ⚿53—ELECTION OFFICERS.
Election officers cannot recover more than $10 for services at an election either from the county or the supervisors, under Pol. Code, § 1072, so providing, even though the precincts contained more than 200 voters in violation of Pol. Code, § 1127, and the work required four days and nights.

2. ASSIGNMENTS ⚿24(2)—CAUSES OF ACTION—PERSONAL INJURIES.
Causes of action for damages for having to work without sleep for four nights and days, suffering mental and physical anguish and loss by absence from business, are not assignable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by M. C. Jones against C. D. Manning, Richard H. Norton, F. E. Woodley, W. E. Hinshaw, and R. W. Pridham. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. S. McNutt, of Los Angeles, for appellant. A. J. Hill, County Counsel, and David R. Faries, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. This action was commenced against the respondents, who were members of the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, to recover against them as individuals for certain alleged omissions on their part to perform duties which the appellant contends were enjoined upon them, as supervisors, by law. The appellant sued as assignor of several other persons. Demurrers to the amended complaint on behalf of each of the respondents were sustained without leave to amend, and judgment went accordingly. The appeal is from the judgment.

We learn from the amended complaint that appellant's assignors were appointed by the supervisors to serve as election officers in certain precincts in the city of Glendale, at the general election of November, 1914; that they served as such election officers, the period of service of each, including the time expended in the counting of the ballots cast at the election, being more than four days and nights; that each of the assignors presented his claim against the county at the rate of $3 for each eight hours of service; that the supervisors allowed each claim to the extent of $10, but rejected each for the excess; that there is due appellant certain specific amounts on the claim of each of his assignors, the amount alleged to be due in each instance being $10 less than the amount for which the claim was presented, thus showing the collection and acceptance from the county of the amount allowed each assignor by the supervisors; that all the claims were assigned to appellant before the complaint was filed; that the supervisors did not, before the election, as required by section 1127 of the Political Code, as in force at that time, divide Glendale into voting precincts containing not more than 200 voters; that in the precincts in which appellant's assignors served as election officers there were registered, at the time of the election, respectively, 1,029, 965, 1,099, and 873 voters, and the respondents knew the number in each precinct; that the votes actually cast in the same precincts were, respectively, 782, 774, 839, and 715; that, by reason of the failure of the respondents to establish precincts containing less than 200 voters each, the appellant's assignors were compelled to serve as election officers for the periods of time above mentioned; that by reason of this service, "and the consequent loss of sleep and the nervous strain," the plaintiff's assignors "suffered greatly both from mental and bodily fatigue, besides being deprived from pursuing their ordinary calling for a period of four days"; that each of the respondents is indebted to the appellant in the sum of $371.27, that being the total of the amounts previously alleged to be due each of the assignors, after deducting $10 from the amount originally charged at the rate of $3 for each eight hours of service. Judgment for $371.25 against each of the respondents is then prayed for.

There are several manifest uncertainties in the amended complaint, going to its very substance; but the demurrers were all general only, and they need not have been more to be effective.

[1] If we view the action as one for the services of appellant's assignors, the amended complaint is insufficient because it shows that they have been paid in full. Election officers, by express limitation contained in the statute, cannot be paid a greater compensation than $10 for each election during which they serve. Pol. Code, § 1072. The fact that the enactment applies to claims against the county treasury, while this action is against the supervisors as individuals, can make no difference. There was no contract, either express or implied, between the respondents and appellant's assignors. The latter have been paid the amount due them from the county treasury, the only source from which they could demand payment under the law.

[2] If the action be regarded as one to recover damages, the amended complaint is equally defective. The action cannot be maintained by the appellant for the reason that the claims, being strictly personal and unconnected with any injury to property, are not assignable. The demands arise from an alleged omission tortious in character, and the rule just stated is the general rule as to such demands. 4 Cyc. 24; Lawrence v. Martin, 22 Cal. 173; Archer v. Freeman, 124 Cal. 528, 532, 57 Pac. 474.

We need not take the time nor the space to mention other objections which respondents make to the sufficiency of appellant's pleading. It is enough to say that it appears not to present the semblance of an actionable controversy.

The judgment is affirmed.

35 Cal. App. 345

BAILEY v. MOSHIER. (Civ. 1745.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 20, 1917.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES 🔑527(1) — PAYMENT — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to sustain finding that certain special payments were made as alleged on a promissory note.

2. COSTS 🔑42(8)—EFFECT OF TENDER—APPROXIMATE AMOUNT.

Where there was a trifling balance due on a note and mortgage securing it, of the amount of which defendant was uncertain, his tender and deposit of the approximate amount to plaintiff's credit authorized award of costs to defendant.

3. WITNESSES 🔑159(2)—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENTS—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

In an action for balance due on note, where a payment had been made to plaintiff, which defendant claimed was to be applied on the note, and which plaintiff denied, it was proper on cross-examination to ask plaintiff from whom he received a check for the amount of such alleged part payment, although such check was made prior to his ownership of the note; such matter not being objectionable as relating to a transaction between defendant and the payee since deceased.

4. EVIDENCE ⚷271(4)—SELF-SERVING DECLARATIONS—PAYMENT.

In an action for balance due on note, defendant's testimony as to payments on the note before the original payee's death was not objectionable as a self-serving declaration under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1850–1853, 1870.

5. WITNESSES ⚷159(13) — TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT—PAYMENT.

Nor was such evidence inadmissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, prohibiting testimony of parties to action or proceeding against an executor on a claim or demand against the estate of the deceased, since such testimony did not relate to a claim or demand against the estate.

6. EVIDENCE ⚷450(10) — ADMISSIBILITY — PAROL EVIDENCE—EXPLAINING WRITINGS.

Defendant in action for balance due on note was properly allowed to explain instrument in terms: "Bakersfield, 14th Nov., 1911. Received from D. B. Moshier on account of note of $1500 made March, 1911, fifteen hundred. Received on the above note, one thousand dollars. John E. Bailey."

7. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷1051(6)—HARMLESS ERROR.

Error in permitting secondary evidence of contents of check was harmless, where counsel stipulated that it should be considered only to fix the date when the check was returned, which was shown by other evidence.

8. TRIAL ⚷62(2)—REBUTTAL EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In action for balance due on note, where defendant had made payments to the payee before the latter's death, and had testified that the note represented his only indebtedness to the payee, it was proper rebuttal to ask plaintiff what he knew of other indebtedness from the defendant to the payee; plaintiff claiming that the payments were on other indebtedness.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷1058(2)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Error in excluding proper rebuttal of defendant's evidence that the note was his only indebtedness to the payee was without prejudice, where the witness had already testified that there was another indebtedness on which the payments were made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Joseph L. Bailey against D. B. Moshier. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. L. Foster and Chas. A. Barnhart, both of Bakersfield, for appellant. S. Wyman Smith, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action is for the balance due on a promissory note and to foreclose a chattel mortgage given to secure the payment of the same.

The note and mortgage were executed by the defendant on March 21, 1911, to one J. E. Bailey for the sum of $2,500, with interest at 1 per cent. a month. J. E. Bailey died, and all his property was regularly distributed to one William Bailey, who assigned the note and mortgage in controversy to plaintiff, who is the nephew of said decedent. The complaint alleges that no part of said note was paid except the sum of $1,000, which was paid thereon on November 13, 1911, and that $1,500 and interest was still due. The answer sets up that in addition to said payment, in the month of October, 1911, the sum of $1,072.40 was paid on said note by the Western Water Company to John E. Bailey for and on behalf of the defendant, and that on or about the 17th day of November, 1911, the sum of $585 was paid to the said John E. Bailey by the Kern County Land Company for and on behalf of the defendant, and that on said last-mentioned date the sum of $35 was due, and that the defendant has tendered plaintiff the sum of $45, and that he has at all times been willing and able to pay plaintiff whatever sum might be found to be due.

[1] The principal controversy is as to the two additional payments claimed to have been made by respondent. It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court in accordance with the averments of the answer. We are at a loss to understand, however, why such contention should be made. It might be said, possibly, that a contrary finding would be supported, but to declare that there is no legal basis in the evidence for the court's conclusion as to these payments is to ignore the positive and unequivocal testimony of the defendant himself and others in whose statements we find nothing improbable or even suspicious. The plaintiff testified that on October 21, 1911, he received for his uncle a check from the Western Water Company for the sum of $1,072, that he took the check to his uncle John E. Bailey, who was sick at the time, that the latter indorsed it and plaintiff "turned it in to Mr. Mack at the Bank of Bakersfield and he turned it in on" the note held by one W. G. Collier against the said John E. Bailey, and said note was thereupon delivered to plaintiff. It may be said that it was a promissory note bearing 10 per cent. interest per annum. The defendant testified that on October 20, 1911, he gave this order to said Western Water Company:

> "Gentlemen: Pay J. E. Bailey the amount found to be due me from my September account and charge same to my account."

It appears without controversy that this order was made and honored, and that in accordance therewith said sum was paid as testified by plaintiff on October 21st. Thus far the situation is not open to dispute. The defendant testified further that the next payment was made by him in cash personally to John E. Bailey on November 12th or 13th at the First National Bank of Bakersfield and that the amount was $1,000 and as to this it may be said the defendant produced a receipt signed by the payee. We have then positive proof of the payment of $2,072.

On November 17th the defendant says he instructed the Kern County Land Company to make a payment to John E. Bailey of $585, and "I know of my own knowledge that the sum of $585 was paid to John E. Bailey through the Kern County Land Company." There can be no doubt about this as the receipt was introduced in evidence, and he was corroborated by the testimony of William Eardley, the superintendent of the milling department of said company, who said:

> "John E. Bailey came to my office in the milling department in the month of November, 1911, for the purpose of collecting some money which I had been authorized to pay him on account of D. B. Moshier. I paid John E. Bailey money at that time, to wit, $585. It was paid in a draft on the Kern County Land Company. John E. Bailey gave me a receipt at that time. He signed it in my presence and the receipt was made out November 16, 1911. That is the date on which the payment of $585 was made."

We have thus the evidence of the payment of $2,657 to John E. Bailey for and on account of respondent, and that these payments were made on the indebtedness evidenced by said note is the testimony of Moshier. Indeed, he testified that there was no other indebtedness from him to Bailey. Appellant calls attention to some apparent inconsistency in the statements of respondent, but it was explained, and no doubt to the satisfaction of the court, and we cannot say that he was not entitled to the fullest credit in his testimony that he had made these payments.

[2] There was a trifling balance due which the court was justified in believing that the defendant was willing to pay. It seems that he was uncertain as to the exact amount, and the tender and deposit were not made until after the complaint was filed. The deposit of the money to the credit of the plaintiff rendered a judgment for that amount unnecessary, and it was proper to award respondent his costs in view of the trivial sum.

Certain rulings are specified as erroneous, of which brief mention may be made.

[3] On cross-examination plaintiff was asked: "From whom did you receive that check for $1,072?" To which the objection was made: "It is prior to the time this witness became the owner of the note; that the transaction attempted to be proven is a transaction between Mr. Moshier and the late John E. Bailey." It is apparent that the objection was properly overruled. It is a fair inference from his testimony on the direct examination that no such payment had been made on the note, and the obvious purpose was to show that this payment was made on behalf of the defendant, and should have been credited upon the note. Besides he virtually answered it without objection, as shown by the following statement just preceding the question: "I received a check from the Western Water Company for $1,072 in October, 1911."

[4, 5] To this question asked of the defendant: "What was the first payment made by you on account of the note and mortgage in this case?" counsel for appellant made this objection: "To which I object on the ground that the defendant cannot testify to transactions with deceased persons, or make any declaration in his own favor, under the sections of the Code from 1850 to 1853 and 1870, Code of Civil Procedure. He cannot make any declaration or self-serving statement in his own favor." It is quite obvious that appellant's position in that respect is entirely untenable. The question did not call for any self-serving declaration, but for a fact, namely, the payment of a sum of money on a certain indebtedness. And it is no less admissible because the payee of the note was not living. None of the said sections of the Code precludes such testimony, nor did the question call for an answer within the inhibition of subdivision 3 of section 1880 of said Code. The testimony did not relate to a "claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person" within the contemplation of said language. The situation is covered and controlled by the decision in Stoddard v. Newhall, 1 Cal. App. 111, 81 Pac. 666. It is true that the death of the payee may place his successor in interest at a disadvantage, and it may even happen that the maker of the note may hesitate less to commit perjury, but such possibility cannot operate to change the established rules of evidence. It is to be presumed, moreover, that under such circumstances the trial court will scrutinize with even greater care the testimony of the payor.

[6, 7] There was no error in permitting the defendant to explain the receipt he received from Mr. Bailey on the payment of the $1,000. The receipt was in form as follows:

> "Bakersfield, 14th Nov., 1911. Received from D. B. Moshier on account of note of $1500 made March, 1911, fifteen hundred. Received on the above note, one thousand dollars. John E. Bailey."

The only intelligible statement therein contained is the recital of the receipt of $1,000. The other portion of the instrument was not understandable without explanation, which the witness was properly allowed to make. Besides, as we have already seen, the witness stated that he owed no other amount to Bailey, and to the force of this statement nothing was added by his explanation of the receipt. The court was probably in error in its rulings in relation to a certain check that was returned to the defendant by the clerk of the board of supervisors of Kern county. Secondary evidence of its contents was permitted without accounting for the loss of the instrument, but it was rendered harmless by the stipulation of counsel for respondent that it should be considered only to fix the date when said check was returned, and as to this fact the clerk referred to the minutes of said board kept by him. This circumstance was important to fix the time when respondent said he paid Bailey the $1,000.

[8, 9] Appellant in rebuttal was asked by his counsel this question: "Do you know whether or not Mr. Moshier had received any cash money from Mr. Bailey in his lifetime as a loan which was not evidenced by any promissory note, for the purpose of buying feed for taking care of the mules?" The other side objected on the general ground, and that "no proper foundation was laid for it." The court, in sustaining the objection, said: "That is not in rebuttal. I am not going into that anyhow." It clearly was in rebuttal. The defendant had testified that the promissory note represented his only indebtedness to Bailey, and this was a material circumstance in view of the controversy as to how the last payment of $585 should be applied; it being the contention of appellant that it was intended to repay money that was loaned for the feed of the mules. If it was so intended then manifestly it was improper to reduce by that sum the amount due on said note. Nor can it be said that "no foundation" was laid for it. An attempt was being made to lay the foundation by asking the witness whether he knew of such loan. But the ruling was absolutely without prejudice, for the reason that the witness had already testified that his uncle took that $585, but that it was "John E. Bailey's money. It was money John E. Bailey had advanced him for feed for the mules." The court, though, undoubtedly did not believe him, and it may be said that his testimony as a whole does not appear very consistent or persuasive. At any rate, the court had the legal right to accept and act upon the testimony to the contrary effect of the defendant and other witnesses.

There are some other minor points, but we do not deem it necessary to notice them specifically.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WAIT v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SACRAMENTO COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 1759.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 19, 1917.)

MANDAMUS ⚷16(1)—MOOT QUESTION—PETITION FOR MANDAMUS—DISMISSAL.

On petition for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court to grant petitioner's application to be allowed to prosecute his action in forma pauperis, where it appears that since the proceeding was commenced the lower court had granted a jury to petitioner in accordance with his application, the question is moot, and the petition will be dismissed.

Petition for writ of mandate by Charles T. Wait against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Sacramento and Hon. Chas. O. Busick, Judge. Petition dismissed.

G. H. P. Lichthardt, and Chester F. Gannon of Sacramento, for petitioner. Lester J. Hindale, of Sacramento, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner, Charles T. Wait, commenced an action in the superior court of the county of Sacramento against the Western Pacific Railroad Company for personal injuries received by him while in its employ.

After the commencement of said action petitioner sought leave of the court, by filing the proper affidavit, to be allowed to prosecute his action in forma pauperis. The court denied the application upon the ground that it knew of no method provided by law for the payment of the jury fees except by the party demanding said jury. Thereupon petitioner filed his petition in this court seeking by mandate to compel the superior court to grant his application.

Since the filing of this petition the precise question has been decided in accord with petitioner's contention by our Supreme Court in the case of Martin v. Superior Court, 168 Pac. 135. It is only necessary, therefore, to refer to that decision.

Since this proceeding was commenced in this court, it has been brought to our attention that the lower court has granted a jury to petitioner here in accordance with his application. The matter therefore becomes a moot question merely, and in view of this status of the case, it becomes proper to dismiss the petition.

The petition for the writ of mandate is therefore dismissed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 19, 1917.)

HABEAS CORPUS ⚷11—VOLUNTARY SUBMISSION TO IMPRISONMENT.

Where petitioner voluntarily submitted to imprisonment from which he seeks to be discharged for the purpose of presenting in the habeas corpus proceeding the question of the validity of an order holding him to answer, the petition will be dismissed.

In the matter of the application of B. Bernson for a writ of habeas corpus. Denied.

H. E. Johnstone and Emmons & Johnstone, all of Bakersfield, for petitioner. J. R. Dorsey, Dist. Atty., and W. P. Grijalva, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It appearing to the court that the imprisonment of the petitioner from which he seeks to be discharged was voluntarily submitted to by him for the purpose of presenting in this proceeding the question as to the validity of the order holding him to answer to the superior court for trial, and for that reason, the remedy by habeas corpus should not be available to him.

Upon the authority of In re Gow, 139 Cal. 242, 73 Pac. 145, Ex parte Schmitz, 150 Cal. 663, 89 Pac. 438, and Ex parte Ford, 160 Cal.

334, 116 Pac. 757, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 882, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1267, it is ordered that the proceeding be, and it is hereby, dismissed, and petitioner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

MACHADO v. ELLISON et al. (Civ. 2090.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 19, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 17, 1918.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑154(3)—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS—RIGHT TO NAME BENEFICIARIES.

Fraternal Act 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1320), limiting the class who may be beneficiaries under insurance policies, does not violate the Constitution, prohibiting laws impairing the obligation of contracts, though it regulates future designations of beneficiaries under certificates previously issued.

2. INSURANCE 🔑587 — BENEFIT SOCIETIES — BENEFICIARIES.

Fraternal Act 1911, limiting the class who may be beneficiaries, is constitutional, and applies to a designation, after it became effective, of a successor to a deceased beneficiary under a certificate issued before the enactment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William M. Finch, Judge.

Action by Antone Manuel Machado against the Conselho Supremo da Unuias Portugeza do Estado da California, in which W. H. Ellison and another were interpleaded. From a judgment for said Ellison, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Louis Gonsalves, of Oakland, and J. E. Pemberton, of San Francisco, for appellant. T. P. Wittschen, of Oakland, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was originally brought by the sole heir at law of one Theodore Silveira to recover from the Conselho Supremo da Unuias Portugeza do Estado da California, a fraternal and benefit society, the amount due under a certificate of insurance issued by it. The society admitted liability, but, being in doubt as to the person to whom the fund belonged, respondent and his codefendants were interpleaded, and on payment into court by the society of the sum of $1,200, the net amount due on said policy, it was discharged from liability as to all parties to the action.

The conflicting claims to the fund arose in the following manner: In November, 1894, Theodore Silveira became a member of the above-named society, and designated as his beneficiary one J. S. Neto. At that time there was no restriction upon the rights of a member to make such designation; there being no limitation, statutory or otherwise, as to the class of persons who could become beneficiaries under the policies issued by the society. In 1911 the Legislature passed an act for the regulation and control of fraternal benefit societies which, among other things, limited the class of persons who might be named as beneficiaries under a policy of insurance issued by them. Subsequent to the passage of this act, and on the 17th day of July, 1912, the beneficiary named in the policy died, and Silveira thereafter designated Jose R. Neto, a son of the original beneficiary, and the assignor of the respondent herein, as the beneficiary in said policy. In May, 1914, Silveira, the insured, died, and this action was brought by plaintiff as the sole heir at law of Silveira, claiming title as such to the proceeds of the policy.

Judgment was rendered in favor of the assignee of the beneficiary named, and from this judgment plaintiff appeals.

[1] The main question presented by the appeal is the effect of the Fraternal Act of 1911 upon the rights of a member of a benefit society whose policy was issued prior to the time the statute went into effect, to change his beneficiary after such time, contrary to and in contravention of the terms of the statute.

The contention of appellant is that, as the act limits the class of persons who can legally be designated, and the selected beneficiary having been nominated after the act became operative and admittedly one not within such class, that there was no legal designation by the insured, and the proceeds of the policy should be paid to plaintiff as the next of kin and only heir at law of the insured.

As opposed to this contention respondent argues in support of the judgment that, as there is no language in the act showing that it was intended to have a retroactive effect or operation, it should be construed prospectively so as not to restrict the vested right of unlimited selection possessed and enjoyed by members who had contracted with the society prior to its passage; that such right of unrestricted selection in the beneficiary that might be made in the future was one of the considerations entering into the contract; that it was a material and vested one, valid at its inception, and one that could not be destroyed or taken away by the Legislature, and any attempt so to do makes it violative of those sections both of the state and federal Constitutions, providing that the Legislature or Congress shall pass no laws impairing the obligations of a contract.

We do not think that the application of the statute to the contract of the insured has the effect claimed for it by the respondent. The principle involved is not an entirely new one in this state. In the case of Caldwell v. Grand Lodge, 148 Cal. 195, 82 Pac. 781, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 653, 113 Am. St. Rep. 219, 7 Ann. Cas. 356, it was held that, where an insured, on joining a beneficial society, agrees specifically to abide by and conform to the by-laws in force at the time, and also to those that might be subsequently enacted, upon the adoption of a by-law limiting his selection to a beneficiary of a designated class he was bound by the change, and had no right to name one other than in the class designated. See, also, Wist v. Grand Lodge, 22 Or. 271, 29 Pac. 610, 29 Am. St. Rep. 603. Here the insured agreed at the time he joined the society to so conform to its laws. True, the society did not by an express bylaw at any time impose any limitation or restriction upon the insured in the selection of his beneficiary. It is not contended, however, by respondent, nor could it be, that if the society had adopted a by-law in conformity with the statute the rule laid down in the Caldwell Case would not apply. The only distinction, therefore, between the case last cited and the instant one is that here the insured was restricted by the terms of a statute, whereas in the Caldwell Case he was limited by the adoption of a by-law.

Upon principle we see no difference between the two cases. If an insured is bound in the manner indicated in the Caldwell Case by reason of his express agreement, he is at least equally bound by a statutory enactment he is required to obey. The by-laws of a fraternal organization must conform to the Constitution and statutes of the state, and when the statute changes the by-laws must change with them. The statutes, of course, must be reasonable and within the law; but the statute here involved is beyond all question one of that nature, and its character is so declared to be in the Caldwell Case. The contract entered into by the insured was made up of his benefit certificate, the by-laws of the society, and the laws of the state. The statute became an integral part of the charter of the society, and was at least as binding upon the insured and other members when they attempted to change their beneficiaries after its passage as any by-laws that could have been adopted by the order. The fact that there was no limiting statute in existence at the time the insured joined the order can make no difference. The statute does not attempt to disturb members in their original selections; it only affects the issuing of certificates after its passage, and all designations so made must conform to it.

The conclusion we have reached finds support in authority of other jurisdictions. In Grand Lodge of McKinstry, 67 Mo. App. 82, under similar facts it was held that all changes in selection of beneficiaries must conform to a new law, as such change must be considered as an amendment to the charter of every such corporation, and that the right to take must be governed by it. To the same effect is Bush v. Modern Woodmen (Iowa) 152 N. W. 31, where it was contended, as here, that the law in force at the time the insured became a member, and at the time his first certificate was issued, governed the case, and that the right to freely name and change a beneficiary was a vested right of which he could not be deprived by the Legislature; and it was there held, citing the Caldwell Case, that the insured had no such vested right under his original contract which could not be affected by limitations imposed by a statute subsequently enacted requiring designations made thereafter to conform to its terms. And it is there further held that such a statute is not retroactive in its operation, but rather relates to and controls the action of the insured at the time of its exercise. We are aware that cases may be found holding a contrary doctrine, but they are not in harmony with the reasoning in the Caldwell Case.

[2] We conclude, therefore, that the act in question applies to all designations made after it went into effect, and that, the beneficiary here named by the insured not being one of the class named in the act, his selection was in contravention thereof, and therefore void, and that appellant, being the only heir at law of the insured, is entitled to the amount due under the policy.

In view of the conclusion we have reached, it becomes unnecessary to discuss other questions relied on for a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. BUTLER et al. (Cr. 401.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 21, 1917.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION 🔑110(15)—CHARGING IN WORDS OF STATUTES—FRAUD.

To charge in the words of the statute is insufficient for an indictment under Pen. Code, § 72, making it an offense for one, with intent to defraud, to present for allowance or payment to a state, county, or municipal board or officer authorized to allow or pay it, if genuine, a false or fraudulent claim; but the circumstances of the offense must be set out.

2. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑30—INDICTMENT—FRAUDULENT CLAIM TO OFFICERS—KNOWLEDGE.

It is not enough for an indictment under Pen. Code, § 72, for presenting to county supervisors a claim with intent to defraud, to allege the claim was fraudulent, but it must allege or show defendants knew it was fraudulent.

3. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑29—INDICTMENT—FRAUDULENT CLAIM TO OFFICERS—AUTHORITY TO ALLOW.

An indictment under Pen. Code, § 72, for presenting for allowance and payment to county supervisors, with intent to defraud, a claim for roadwork, fraudulent in that it claimed for more work than was done, should allege authority to do work on the road was given by one authorized to incur a claim against a county, to show that the claim, if genuine, was one the supervisors would be authorized to allow.

4. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑30—INDICTMENT—FALSE CLAIM—PARTIAL INVALIDITY.

An indictment under Pen. Code, § 72, for presenting to county supervisors with intent to defraud a claim for roadwork containing two items, one for work by defendant, the other for work by another, each for more days work than either had performed, is bad in toto, being bad as to the item of work by the other; defendant's knowledge of the falsity thereof not being alleged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Charles H. Butler and C. L. Patteson were indicted. Demurrer to the indictment was sustained, and the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People. J. R. Leppo, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendants were jointly indicted by the grand jury of Sonoma county for the violation of section 72 of the Penal Code. There are four separate counts in the indictment, and the charging matter or body of the indictment is substantially identical in each count, excepting the amounts therein named. The charging part of the indictment, as set forth in the first count, is as follows:

"That the said Charles H. Butler and C. L. Patteson on or about the 4th day of May, 1916, and in the said county of Sonoma, state of California, did willfully and unlawfully and feloniously, with intent to defraud, and with the intent to defraud Sonoma county, present for allowance and payment to the board of supervisors of Sonoma county, who were then and there duly authorized to allow and pay the same, if genuine, a false and fraudulent claim, bill, account, voucher, and writing, and which said claim was in writing, and was a demand of Charles H. Butler on the treasury of the county of Sonoma, state of California, for the sum of $124.50 for roadwork performed on the public roads in Mendocino road district in said Sonoma county during the month of April, 1916, and which said demand purported to be for roadwork upon the public roads in said road district performed at the request and pursuant to the direction therefor by Charles H. Butler, who was then and there, and at all times herein mentioned, the roadmaster of said road district and the employé, agent, and servant of said C. L. Patteson, as supervisor, and said Patteson was then and there and at all times herein mentioned the duly elected, qualified, and acting supervisor of the fourth supervisorial district of Sonoma county, in which said road district was and is located; that said claim and demand was itemized and gave names, dates, and services rendered, and character of work done, number of days engaged, and price per day of the services of each man employed in the performance of said roadwork for which said demand and bill was presented, and that said claim was duly verified to be correct by the affidavit of Charles H. Butler, and annexed thereto in writing, in and by which said oath said Charles H. Butler, after being first duly sworn, deposed and said that the work mentioned in said claim was of the nature and was performed by the persons and at the time specified therein in each case, and no part thereof had been paid, and that said labor was performed under his direction as timekeeper, and that the report thereof covered all work performed under his direction for the time covered by the said claim, and that each of the claims within said demand and claim was presented within one year after the last item thereof accrued, and which said oath was on the 4th day of May, 1916, duly subscribed and taken before the said C. L. Patteson, as such supervisor, who then and there attached his name thereto as said supervisor together with a statement that the said oath was subscribed and sworn to before him, the said C. L. Patteson, the 4th day of May, 1914.

"That in truth and in fact said claim which was then and there so presented to said board of supervisors was false and fraudulent in this, that it contained an item for nine days' labor by said Charles H. Butler with a team and wagon at the rate of $4.50 per day, at the price of $2.50 a day for the labor of said Charles H. Butler, and at the price of $2 a day for his team and wagon, when in truth and in fact said team and wagon were not, during the said month of April, employed in roadwork, and did not, during said time, perform any roadwork in said district as set forth in said claim or at all, and the charge of $2 a day for nine days for said team amounting to $18, and being a part of the total sum of $124.50 for which said claim was presented, was false and fraudulent, and, that said demand and claim also contained an item for six days' labor by L. Kelley and a wagon at the rate of $4 per day, amounting to $24, and which said item was false and fraudulent, in this, that in fact said L. Kelley was so employed by himself and team and wagon for four days only during the month of April. 1916, and that the said charge on account of the services of L. Kelley was for two days in excess of the amount of labor so performed by him and for the sum of $8 in excess of the amount due on account of labor and services performed by said L. Kelley.

"That said claim so made out was filed with the clerk of the board of supervisors three days prior to the time of the meeting of said board of supervisors, at which said board of supervisors was asked to allow the said claim, and the said claim was allowed by the said board of supervisors on the 9th day of May, 1916, at a regular meeting of said board, and ordered to be paid out of the road fund of the said Mendocino road district, and all work for which said demand and claim purported to be presented, purported to have been performed under the direction and supervision of the said Charles H. Butler, who was then and there the timekeeper and roadmaster of said road district; that said L. Kelley before the presentation and filing of said claim as aforesaid by an instrument in writing duly transferred and assigned and delivered to said Charles H. Butler his claim against Sonoma county for all services performed in Mendocino road district by him between the 1st day of April, 1916, and the 1st day of May, 1916, and appointed said Charles H. Butler as his attorney in fact to present his claim and to collect and receipt for the same—contrary to the form," etc.

Section 72 of the Penal Code is as follows:

"Every person who, with intent to defraud, presents for allowance or for payment to any state board or officer, or to any county, town, city, ward, or village board or officer, authorized to allow or pay the same if genuine, any false or fraudulent claim, bill, account, voucher, or writing, is guilty of felony."

The defendants interposed a demurrer to each count of the indictment on various grounds, general and specific, and on which it was alleged in the demurrer that the indictment does not specifically conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, 952, and 954 of the Penal Code, or to either of said sections; that the facts stated in said indictment do not constitute a public offense; that neither of said counts contains a statement of the acts constituting the alleged offense in ordinary and concise language or in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended thereby; nor is either of said counts direct or certain in its terms regarding the offense; nor is either of said counts certain or direct "as regards the particular circumstances of the offense." The demurrer also sets forth a number of matters alleged to be essential to a good indictment which are not stated or alleged in any of said counts. The demurrer also sets forth a number of matters and things as to which each count of the indictment is uncertain.

After argument and submission of the demurrer, the court made the following order:

> "It is the order of the court that the demurrer be sustained to each and every count of the indictment. The court directs the case to be submitted to the present grand jury. This matter has been a long drawn out affair, brought about by events over which no one had control. The court suggests that the grand jury be convened at once, and this matter presented to them in order that it may be determined."

[1-3] The district attorney took exception to the ruling of the court sustaining the demurrer "and the ruling made by the court in connection therewith," and gave notice of appeal therefrom. By request of the district attorney and order of the court, the phonographic reporter transcribed, among other documents, those portions of the notes taken of the oral opinion pronounced by the court "embodying the decision and opinion of said court sustaining the demurrer of defendants to the indictment." As we find ourselves in agreement with the learned trial judge, we take the liberty of quoting certain parts of his opinion:

> "The claim has been made that the indictment does not state a criminal offense. That is one matter that attracted my attention upon the first reading of the indictment, and that has been with the court a very grave question for consideration. Whatever ruling the court makes upon this indictment is not made upon technical grounds. It is based on what I understand to be broad and substantial grounds, as defined by the courts of California and of all of the states of the Union.
> "It is established beyond controversy, in the case of People against Mahony, 145 Cal. 104 [78 Pac. 354], that in an attempt to charge an offense under section 72 of the Penal Code of this state, it is not sufficient that you allege it in the language of the statute. Being in line with all cases in which fraud and deceit is involved, there must be a statement of the facts, and from such statement of facts an inference or a conclusion must be reached which is, of course, a question of law. In the case of People v. Carolan, 71 Cal. 195 [12 Pac. 52], our Supreme Court held it was sufficient to charge the offense in the language of the statute. In the later Mahony Case Justice Angellotti, writing the opinion, held that it was not sufficient to charge in the language of the statute, but that the circumstances of the offense must be set out. That, of course, has been the law ever since, and it is the law to-day.
> "The particular matter that suggested itself to the court as possibly being sufficient is this: 'That the said Charles H. Butler and C. L. Patteson on or about the 4th day of May, 1916, and in the said county of Sonoma, state of California, did willfully and unlawfully and feloniously, with intent to defraud, and with the intent to defraud Sonoma county'— To stop there would be pleading the offense in the language of the statute, but the pleader goes on and undertakes to set up the particular acts which constitute the crime. In the transaction is brought a man by the name of Kelley, and who, I presume or assume, was acting under authority of Mr. Patteson, the supervisor, although that is not positively alleged, that he was acting under authority and by direction of either Butler or Patteson, as supervisors. There is no allegation that Patteson or Butler knew the claims presented to the board of supervisors were false and fraudulent. That, in my judgment, is absolutely essential. I have taken notice of all of the indictments of all the states that I have examined where the language is very much like ours. In some states the statute includes the word 'knowingly.' In our statute the word 'knowingly' is not set out. In this indictment it is simply alleged that Patteson and Butler both presented a claim to the board of supervisors, which claim was fraudulent. That would not be an offense. They must have the knowledge of the fraudulency of the claim or demand. That is elementary, and that is the matter that has been uppermost in my mind since I first heard this indictment read about two weeks ago. I think that is fatal. I am satisfied it is fatal.
> "The next defect in the indictment is that this work was done on the public highway. Of course, it would not be any crime for a man to do work on the public highway in front of his house and present a claim to the board of supervisors and ask for the payment of that claim. The decisions have repeatedly held, and the statute itself is sufficient on the subject, that the claim must be such a claim as, if genuine, would be authorized to be paid under the law and be such a claim as the board of supervisors could pay. In other words, if I were to present a claim for bounty on squirrels, and there is no ordinance of the board of supervisors authorizing the payment of such bounty, that would not be a criminal offense under the statute. Some of these questions have been passed on so often that it is hardly necessary to enumerate them, but I do so in going through this matter briefly, if not as thoroughly as I would like to.
> "There should be an allegation in the indictment that Butler and Kelley, who also, it would seem, did work upon the highway, were acting under the authority of Patteson, who is the supervisor, and were authorized to incur a claim against the county. In my judgment, those two points are unanswerable and controlling in this case.
> "In reference to section 72 of the Penal Code, there have been but three cases that have gone to the Supreme Court of our state. One is The People against Carolan, in the 71st California. The next is People against Mahony, in the 145th California; and the next is People against Lantorman, 9th California Appellate, 675 [100 Pac. 720]. Dr. Lantorman was the coroner of the county of Los Angeles. That case was reversed after conviction. It was reversed on the ground of failure to state an offense. It was permissible under the law of the state for the coroner to collect his necessary traveling expenses when traveling without the county. He filed his claim for $8.40, which, I infer from the decision, was perhaps morally an illegal claim, and should have been disallowed. Whatever that particular fact may be, it is not important here. This was the point: He filed, as a private citizen, a claim for necessary traveling expenses without the county. He did not state, nor was it shown in the indictment, that he was the coroner of Los Angeles county. Justice Shaw, writing the decision for the Second Appellate District, held that that was a necessary allegation, and the board of supervisors could not legally pay the claim unless it was presented in the name of Dr. Lantorman as coroner of Los Angeles county, and the case was reversed after conviction.

"In the Mahony Case, the court sustained the demurrer to an indictment similar to this, and the people appealed. Justice Angellotti, writing the opinion of the court, affirmed the decision of the lower court, and held that the indictment did not conform to the rules, as they conceived them to be, governing questions of fraud. The Carolan decision was reversed; the court simply remarking that it was decided without full consideration."

[4] The court then takes up the question whether, under existing statutes, the indictment was amendable, and reaches the conclusion that it is not, and hence ordered the matter resubmitted to the grand jury. The court then renews the discussion of the subject as follows:

"There are other objections made to the indictment. I assume that the indictment was prepared, as many of them are, in haste. There are a number of allegations in the indictment that are stated rather by way of recital which should be positively averred. The clearest language should be selected. It should appear beyond question that an offense has been committed, and that the acts upon which the prosecution rely are clearly and positively stated. Otherwise they amount to nothing more than recitals. I appreciate that it is no easy matter to draw an indictment under section 72 of the Penal Code of this state. It is the most difficult section to comply with that can be found in all the Code. There cannot be any doubt about that. It is not so difficult to draw an indictment involving ordinary allegations of fraud, but to meet the objections and the rules and the decisions that we find flying in our faces, under this section, it is not an easy undertaking.

"There is a decision in which this section of the Code was discussed found in People v. Howard, 135 Cal. 266 [67 Pac. 148]. Instead of proceeding under section 72, the people there proceeded under the section defining false pretenses, section 532. It was a case of bounty on squirrels killed in Tulare county. The board of supervisors of Tulare county in the presentation of claims by its ordinance required that the claimant accompany his claim with the squirrels' tails. The defendant in that case, with another, presented a claim of 12,000 squirrels killed in Alameda county. Before the board paid the claim, the fraud was discovered. The point was made that the ordinance under which the board acted in authorizing the payment of a bounty on squirrels' tails was invalid. The same authorities here cited were invoked by the defendant in the bounty case, and it was insisted that those authorities applied to false pretenses. Justice Chipman distinguished the two, and said 'No.' He said the defendant, if he did present the squirrels' tails, was guilty of the offense with which he was charged. Why? Because it was an attempt to commit a fraud; it did not matter whether the ordinance was valid or not, if a man attempted to get money by a fraudulent transaction. He decided that the section was broad enough to cover the question of fraud, and the judgment was affirmed.

"But, when we come to section 72, then a different question arises, as is very evident from a reading of the section: 'Every person who, with intent to defraud, presents for allowance or for payment to any state board or officer, or to any county, town, city, ward, or village board or officer, authorized to allow or pay the same if genuine'—'to pay the same if genuine.' If the squirrel tail man had been arrested and proceeded against under section 72, he would have been acquitted because the ordinance was invalid; the board of supervisors would have been charged with the knowledge of its invalidity, and it would have been held to have been an improper claim in that case. Therefore he could not have been held under that section. The defendant was properly held under section 532, because he attempted to get money by fraud as defined by section 532, Penal Code.

"It will be noted, upon a reading of the indictment, so far as Kelley is concerned, that there is no allegation that Butler, under whom, presumably, he was working, knew that the claim handed to him (Butler) or made out by Kelley was false. For instance, I am working on the road; I go to the roadmaster, as we commonly call him—he is no longer roadmaster, however, but that is immaterial—and say, 'I have worked seven days;' I make affidavit to it, and do whatever else is necessary to collect the money; he takes it and he says, 'All right;' and he presents it to the county. As a matter of fact, I have only worked two days. He cannot be convicted, of course, without knowledge of such fraud; no one will contend otherwise; he is guilty of no offense unless he knew that I only worked two ways. It does not require a citation of authorities to establish such an elementary principle of law. It is but common sense.

"There is an allegation in the indictment that Butler himself put in a false claim, claiming to have worked more days than he actually worked. I think that would be a good allegation against Butler if the Kelley allegation was not there, for this reason: We are confronted with the well-recognized rule that, while Butler may be prosecuted for what he did, could you say under such an indictment, in the event of conviction, whether the conviction was had under the claim that he presented and which he knew was false because he presented it, or whether he was convicted for the presentation of the Kelley claim, of which he had no knowledge as to its falsity? This rule has been enunciated in this one case I have already cited as the leading case, in the 121 U. S. Supreme Court Reports, written by Justice Miller. That was a case where the Revised Statutes of the United States made it a high misdemeanor for any bank officer to make or cause to be made to the bank officers any false report, and so on and so forth, of its finances and standing, etc. The cashier of that bank made a false report. The very next section of the Revised Statutes required the officer of the bank, or the bank itself, to make a report to the Comptroller of Currency. It was made no crime to make a false report to the Comptroller of Currency. The indictment charged that the bank cashier made a false report to the officers and to the Comptroller of Currency. The court amended the indictment by striking out 'to the Comptroller of Currency,' and let it stand so far as the bank was concerned. The Supreme Court of the United States said the lower court could not do it. Of course, the United States procedure is by indictment only. The court said it could not tell which act he was convicted for; he was just as likely to have been convicted for making a false report to the Comptroller of Currency, which was not an offense, as for the commission of the actual offense."

In his points and authorities the Attorney General insists that he is supported by People v. Carolan, 71 Cal. 196, 12 Pac. 52, in his contention that an indictment charging the offense in the language of the statute is sufficient. In People v. Mahony, 145 Cal. 108, 78 Pac. 354, the court said:

"The Attorney General, in support of this indictment, relies almost entirely upon the decision of this court in department in People v. Carolan.

71 Cal. 195, 12 Pac. 52. The question here involved received little consideration in the opinion in that case, being disposed of by the simple statement that the indictment was sufficient, charging the offense, as it did, in the language of section 72 of the Penal Code. No authority was cited in support of this conclusion, and so much of the record of that case as is now accessible indicates that no authorities therein were cited to the court. The conclusion therein reached is so opposed to later decisions rendered by this court in bank, and also to fundamental principles recognized by the decisions generally, that it cannot be now accepted as authority."

The point urged by respondents is not that the indictment should charge that the claim was "knowingly" presented, but—

"that in pleading or charging actionable or criminal fraud it must appear that the accused knew that the alleged act or misrepresentation was false or fraudulent. This knowledge is always the very gist and essence of the crime charged, unless in those cases where the act or statement was done or made recklessly, and without any knowledge of its truth or falsity."

As to the necessity to good pleading to allege the facts constituting the fraud, the Supreme Court, in People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488, had this to say:

"In civil cases the rule is, as stated by Mr. Justice Temple, that the plaintiff is not required 'to allege with minuteness all the particulars and circumstances which constitute the evidence of the alleged fraud, but he must make the charge with sufficient distinctness to enable his adversary to come prepared with his evidence upon the general questions of fraud which will be raised.' * * * The question whether a thing has been done fraudulently is a matter of law, and an allegation of fraud in general terms presents no issuable fact. * * * Where no facts are averred, no facts are admitted. * * *

"It is said by Mr. Bishop that 'to charge simply in the statutory words that the thing was obtained by fraud and pretense is not adequate.' * * *

"Mr. Wharton says an information charging simply that the defendant obtained goods by false pretenses 'would be scouted out of court.' * * *

"As said in United States v. Watkins, 3 Cranch, C. C. 441 [Fed. Cas. No. 16,649]: 'Fraud is an inference of law from certain facts, and the indictment must aver all the facts which constitute the fraud; * * * to aver that an act was fraudulently done is, therefore, to aver a matter of law, and not * * * of fact.'

"It is a sound principle that an indictment charging fraud of any kind should aver with particularity the facts relied upon to show fraud."

Touching the argument of the Attorney General that the indictment sufficiently charges an offense in presenting a false claim, as distinguished from a "false and fraudulent claim," the Supreme Court, in People v. Mahony, supra, said:

"It is unnecessary to determine whether the allegation that the claim was 'false' as well as fraudulent adds anything to the indictment. The particular objection that we are considering is not that the indictment does not state facts constituting a public offense, but that it does not conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code, in that it does not sufficiently set forth 'the acts constituting the offense,' and 'the particular circumstances of the offense charged,' so as to enable the defendant to know what was the precise charge against him and to prepare his defense thereto.

"Being advised by the indictment that the people charge that the claim was fraudulent as well as false, even if there be any distinction between these terms as used in connection with a claim such as is set forth in such indictment, he is certainly entitled upon objection made by demurrer to know with reasonable certainty the facts relied upon by the people as constituting the alleged fraud."

In reply to the contention of the Attorney General that it was sufficient to charge that the defendant presented the claim "with intent to defraud," since, as is contended, the clause "with intent to defraud" is the equivalent of the omitted necessary allegation that the defendants had knowledge that the claims were false and fraudulent, respondents make what we regard as sufficient answer to this contention. Says the brief:

"There are two answers to this contention. The first is that in order to constitute fraud there must be both an intent to defraud and a knowledge of the false and fraudulent character of the act or statement, and the allegation of one will not supply the other. The second answer is that the Supreme Court held in the Mahony Case, in accordance with the general rule, that the presence of the 'intent to defraud' was not sufficient, and that the facts constituting the false and fraudulent character of the act charged must be alleged. It will be remembered that in the Mahony indictment it was charged that the defendants committed the act with 'intent to defraud,' and yet the indictment was held fatally defective. If the mere allegation that the alleged act was done with 'intent to defraud' was sufficient, it would be equivalent to holding that an indictment in the language of the statute is sufficient; and this our Supreme Court has declared is not sufficient."

The judgment is affirmed.

35 Cal. App. 350

PEOPLE v. BOJORQUEZ. (Cr. 392.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 21, 1917.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑1159(2)—Verdict—Conclusiveness.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, the jury were not bound to believe the testimony of defendant as to his intent to steal a horse and rig at the time he hired it; and where there was sufficient evidence to justify a finding that his intention to embezzle the property was formed after it came into his possession as bailee, the finding was conclusive.

2. Criminal Law 🔑1186(4) — Appeal — Harmless Error—Instructions.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, an instruction that, if defendant testified, his credibility was subject to the same test as that applied to other witnesses, and that in determining the credibility of a witness' testimony the jury might consider his interest in the result of prosecution, his demeanor and conduct while testifying, and that he had been contradicted, and might entirely disregard his testimony if he had testified falsely to any material fact, was not prejudicial, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, forbidding new trials, except for prejudicial error.

3. Criminal Law 🔑811(6)—Instruction—Consequences of Verdict.

An instruction that the jury should not be guided by the consequences of their verdict, but were to determine defendant's guilt or innocence according to the law and the evidence, was not objectionable as directing the jury's attention to the testimony of defendant, or requiring the jury to view it with caution.

4. Criminal Law 🔑782(1) — Instruction — Sympathy.

An instruction that, although the jury might sympathize with those who suffered, they were bound by oath to administer judgment according to the law and the evidence, and should not act upon their sympathies or sentiment, was not objectionable.

5. Criminal Law 🔑815(5) — Instruction — Intent.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, wherein defendant testified that he had formed the intent to steal the horse and rig before he hired it, instructions distinguishing between larceny and embezzlement were not objectionable as ignoring such defense.

6. Criminal Law 🔑1172(6)—Instruction—Effect of Intoxication.

Where there was some testimony as to defendant's sobriety at the time, an instruction upon intoxication as being no defense to the commission of crime, though not called for, was harmless.

7. Criminal Law 🔑829(1)—Requested Instruction—Given Instruction.

The striking out of parts of defendant's requested instruction was not error, where the court in a previous instruction had substantially covered the matter stricken.

8. Criminal Law 🔑1130(3) — Appeal — Assignment of Error—Sufficiency.

A brief calling attention to the cross-examination of defendant, and to the objections thereto contained on "pages 53," etc., mentioning consecutively the pages to 79, inclusive, was not sufficient to require consideration.

9. Witnesses 🔑337(1) — Impeachment — Predicate.

In a prosecution for embezzlement, wherein defendant testified that he intended to steal the horse and rig when he hired it, which, if believed, would have required an acquittal, it was proper for the prosecuting attorney to impeach defendant.

10. Criminal Law 🔑1137(5) — Evidence — Former Conviction.

Defendant, having invited proof as to whether he had been previously convicted of a felony, had no cause to complain of a question by the district attorney as to a former conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

William Bojorquez was convicted of embezzlement, and from the judgment of conviction, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Terry W. Ward and L. J. Schino, both of Merced, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of embezzlement. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. There is no dispute as to the principal facts in the case. The sole question presented as to the evidence is: Did it establish the crime of larceny and not that of embezzlement?

[1] Briefly, the evidence was that on the afternoon of December 14, 1916, defendant went to the livery stable of the prosecuting witness, one Silverose, in the city of Merced, and stated to him that his name was Miles and that he wanted to hire a horse and buggy to go to Atwater, a short distance from Merced. Silverose rented the rig to defendant, upon defendant's promise to return the property that evening, for the charge of $1.50. Not having returned the property as promised, Silverose began inquiry the next day, and on December 26, 1916, located it at the livery stable of one Watson, at Livingston, in the county of Merced, to whom defendant had sold it. Defendant testified that he conceived the intention of stealing the property before he went to Silverose's stable. It is stated in his brief:

> "He practically admitted the taking and carrying away of the outfit and the sale and disposition of the same to Watson, but contended exclusively that he had formed this original intent to secure the possession of the personal property prior and at the time of the removal of the same from the barn at Merced."

The jury were not bound to believe the testimony of defendant as to his intent at the time he rented the property. There was sufficient evidence from which the jury were justified in finding that defendant's intention was to embezzle the property, and was formed after it came into his possession under the agreement that it was rented, thereby making him simply a bailee. The implied finding of the jury upon this point is conclusive. People v. Crane, 168 Pac. 377.

[2] Prejudicial error is claimed of the following instruction:

> "You are instructed as a matter of law that when the defendant testifies as a witness in the case he becomes the same as any witness, and his credibility is to be tested by and subjected to the same test which legally applies to any other witness; and in determining the degree of credibility that shall be accorded to the testimony of any witness, you have a right to take into consideration the fact that he is interested in the result of the prosecution, as well as his demeanor and conduct upon the witness stand, and during the trial, and you may also take into consideration the fact, if such is the fact, that he has been contradicted by other witnesses; and if you find after considering all the evidence in this case that any witness has willfully and corruptly testified falsely to any material fact, you have a right to entirely disregard his testimony, excepting so far as his testimony is corroborated by other credible evidence."

An instruction of this character is commented upon in People v. Bartol, 24 Cal. App. 659, 666, 142 Pac. 510, and was held not prejudicial. We think the opinion in that case sufficiently disposes of the objection now urged. Section 4½, article 6, of the constitution, has materially restricted the power of the court to grant new trials since the decision in People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 262, 86 Pac. 187.

[3] An instruction was given which, in effect, told the jury that they were not to be guided in arriving at a verdict by "the consequences to ensue, should you arrive at a particular conclusion. You are to determine the fact of the guilt or innocence of the accused according to your deliberate conviction and the law has settled what the effect of that fact shall be." We do not think this instruction "directs the jury's attention to the testimony of the defendant * * * and to view his evidence with caution," etc., as is urged. The instruction bears no such construction.

[4] We discover no objection to the following instruction:

> "You are further instructed that, although as men you may sympathize with those who suffer, yet as honest men, bound by oath to administer judgment according to law and evidence, you should not act upon your sympathies without any proof; mercy does not belong to you. No question of mercy, sentiment, or anything else resides with you, except the question of whether or not you believe from the evidence, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant is guilty."

[5] The court gave the following instructions:

> "I instruct you that in the state of California embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted; also every person intrusted with property as a bailee who fraudulently converts the same or the proceeds thereof to his own use is guilty of embezzlement. I instruct you that if you find from all the evidence that the defendant hired the personal property described in the information from J. V. Silverose, that he thereupon became a bailee of the property thus hired.
> "The distinction between larceny and embezzlement is that in larceny the guilty party does not have the lawful possession of the property and in embezzlement the guilty party has the lawful possession of the property."

It is urged that these instructions do not correctly state the law as applicable to the evidence in this case, as they ignore the defense that defendant formed the intent to steal the property before he hired it or became bailee. Had the court failed to instruct the jury further upon the distinction between larceny and embezzlement as applicable to the evidence, and particularly the testimony of defendant that he intended to steal the property at the time when it was placed in his custody, the instruction would be open to criticism. A person may hire a horse and become a bailee, and at the same time all the facts taken into consideration, a case of larceny might be made out. People v. Smith, 23 Cal. 280. But the court, at defendant's request, we think made the point quite clear to the jury by the following instruction:

> "There is a crime known to the law as larceny. It is a crime very similar to embezzlement, yet it is entirely distinct and different from embezzlement. Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another. Embezzlement is the fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted. The difference between the crime of larceny and the crime of embezzlement is this: In larceny the person taking and driving away the property of another must have, at the time he takes and drives away such property, the intent then and there to steal such property. In embezzlement there must be no intent to steal at the time the person takes and drives away the property, but the person must have come into lawful possession of such property and thereafter formed the intent to fraudulently convert it to his own use. When a person intends from the beginning to steal, and does steal, the crime is larceny, and not embezzlement. Therefore I instruct you that if, in this case, the defendant had, at the very time he took and drove away the property described in the information, an intent to steal and did steal it, that he is not guilty of embezzlement, and your verdict in that event, and if you should find the fact so to be, should be not guilty."

[6] The court gave an instruction upon intoxication or drunkenness as forming no defense for the commission of crime. The objection seems to be that it was wholly unnecessary. There was some testimony as to defendant's condition in respect of sobriety at the time. We do not think that this feature of the case became material or called for an instruction. However, the instruction was harmless.

[7] At defendant's request, the court instructed the jury as follows:

> "A person accused of a crime is not compelled to testify at the trial of the case. The law permits him to remain silent, and if he does elect to remain silent, that circumstance cannot be used against him, nor alluded to upon the trial. However, in this case, the defendant has voluntarily gone upon the witness stand and has testified in his own behalf."

The court struck out what followed. This was not error, for the court had in a previous instruction substantially given an instruction covering the matter stricken out.

[8] Attention is called in defendant's brief to the cross-examination of defendant, and "to the several objections made to the questions propounded by the district attorney to the defendant while upon the witness stand in his own defense. They are contained," says the brief, "on pages 53," etc., mentioning consecutively the pages to page 79, inclusive. Such designation of alleged errors is not sufficient to require the reviewing court to consider them.

[9, 10] It is stated in the brief that:

> "The questions propounded by the district attorney as to whether or not the defendant had theretofore been convicted of a felony were highly improper and prejudicial to his substantial rights."

It is further suggested that the testimony given by the defendant was substantially the same as that given by the prosecuting witness, and, as there was no conflict, "there was no necessity for the impeachment of the defendant." As to this latter statement, defendant overlooks the fact that he testified to his intention to steal the property at the time he received it. If the jury had believed him, the verdict must have been not guilty. It was quite within the right, if it was not the duty, of the prosecuting attorney to meet this statement by the impeachment of the defendant. An examination of the record shows that most of the matters complained of in the pages mentioned are recorded on pages 63 to 69, and occurred out of the hearing of the jury and while they were temporarily excused. The jury being called into court, the defendant was asked as to whether or not he had been previously convicted of a felony, and admitted it to be a fact. It was also brought out upon the challenge of defendant's counsel that defendant had been convicted of a felony on more than one occasion. Defendant having invited the proof of a second felony, he has no cause for complaint. Besides, we see no reason why, for purposes of impeachment, the prosecuting attorney should be limited to inquiry as to one felony.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

I concur: BURNETT, J.

HART, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment and in all that is said in the opinion of the Presiding Justice, but I desire to reiterate disapproval of the instruction first considered, in which the court told the jury that, when a defendant testifies as a witness, the jury may, in determining the weight to be attached to his testimony take into consideration "the fact that he is interested in the result of the prosecution," etc. A similar instruction has been severely condemned by the courts of this state, and I think justly so. See People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 262, 86 Pac. 187; People v. Bartol, 24 Cal. App. 659, 666, 142 Pac. 510; People v. Borrego, 7 Cal. App. 613, 95 Pac. 381. And the instruction is no less objectionable now than prior to the adoption into the Constitution of the provision (section 4½, art. 6) that no judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on any of certain indicated grounds, "unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." While the instruction in this case is not quite as objectionable as the one denounced in the Maughs Case, its vice, as is pointed out in the Bartol Case, is "in calling particular attention to the testimony of the defendant," whose interest in the result of the prosecution is obviously more deep-seated than could be that of any ordinary witness. The danger lurking in such an instruction lies in the probability that the jury may infer that the judge, having, out of all the testimony received in the case, selected that of the defendant for such special consideration in his statement of the law to them, is of the opinion that whatever the defendant may testify to in support of his defense should, because of his position in the case, be viewed with suspicion. The instruction should never be given in any case.

The section of the Constitution above referred to has, since its adoption, rescued many cases from reversal; but it clearly never was designed to change or modify the rules of evidence, or to make good that which has always properly been held to be bad in instructions to juries as to the principles of law which are intended for their guidance in deciding questions of fact. There is, therefore, no less reason now for the strict observance of the rules of pleading, evidence, or instructions, or of any other of the requisites of procedural law in the trial of cases, than there was before the introduction of the provision mentioned into the organic law. Indeed, it is by no means inconceivable that criminal cases may arise which are found to be beyond the reach of the saving grace—the broad and comprehensive mercy—of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, for the sole reason that such an instruction as the one under consideration is given. In a very close case upon the facts, a reversal for the reason stated might be required.

Thus I have written, not so much because of the present case, which appears to have been, generally speaking, well and fairly tried, but mainly because I believe that, at least so far as criminal cases are concerned, the proposition cannot be too often stated that, while no case should be reversed for trivial, unsubstantial, technical errors, still the legal rights of an accused should be, in the trial, just as carefully guarded and preserved now (as the law intends they shall be) as they were prior to the adoption of the section of the Constitution above named, and that, therefore, the condemnation of instructions or rulings upon evidence by the courts of last resort should in the trial of such cases be no less heeded now than before said provision was adopted by the people.

HABEAS CORPUS 🔑38—USERS OF DRUGS—RELEASE FROM HOSPITAL—REMEDIES.

Pol. Code, § 2185c, relating to commitments of persons so far addicted to the intemperate use of narcotics as to have lost the power of self-control, provides that the court shall commit such person for a definite period, not to exceed two years, but provided that he may be paroled by the medical superintendent under the same rules and conditions that the insane are paroled, and that the state commission in lunacy shall be given the same power to discharge any person committed under this act as contained in section 2189 of the Political Code, upon the recommendation of the hospital superintendent, when satisfied that such person will not receive substantial benefit from further hospital treatment. Section 2189, as amended by St. 1915, p. 568, provides for discharge of insane persons whether the superintendent of the hospital so recommends or not, and authorizes, when he does not recommend, that insane person have a hearing before a jury as to the fact of his recovery. Held that, as section 2185c provides for release only on parol by the medical superintendent or by the lunacy commission on recommendation of the superintendent, no specific remedy is provided for one committed for excessive use of drugs when the superintendent does not recommend release, and therefore the writ of habeas corpus is open to such a person.

Habeas corpus on the application of Esther Goldie, wherein the Attorney General imposed a demurrer. Demurrer overruled.

E. L. Webber, of Napa, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robt. T. McKisick, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. It appears from the petition that petitioner was on June 21, 1917, committed to the Napa State Hospital for the insane for the term of one year upon the charge laid under section 2185c of the Political Code that she was at that time addicted to the use of narcotics and drugs. It is alleged that petitioner "has entirely recovered and been cured of the use of narcotics and drugs," and that she is now being held in said institution "because of the fact that she is suffering from some blood trouble which, even if true, would not entitle the said medical superintendent to detain or restrain said Esther Goldie of her liberty."

A general demurrer was filed by the Attorney General, as also a return to the petition. The point raised by the demurrer is that petitioner has failed to pursue the proper remedy provided by law, that the statute relating to matters of this kind provides a special procedure for the patient, which is the only remedy permitted her by statute to gain her freedom, and, not having followed those provisions, she is not entitled at this time to be heard in this court upon the petition now pending, and that petitioner must first exhaust the specific remedy prescribed by law before she can invoke the assistance of habeas corpus. Reliance is placed upon section 2189 of the Political Code as amended in 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 568).

Section 2189 deals exclusively with the insane, and provides the method by which persons committed for insanity may be discharged. Section 2185c relates entirely "to persons so far addicted to the intemperate use of narcotics or stimulants as to have lost the power of self-control or is subject to dipsomania or inebriety," etc. The concluding paragraph of section 2185c reads as follows:

> "The court shall commit such person for a definite period, not to exceed two years, but provided that he may be paroled by the medical superintendent under the same rules and conditions that the insane are paroled; and provided, further, that the state commission in lunacy shall be given the same power to discharge any person committed under this act as contained in section 2189 of the Political Code, upon the recommendation of the hospital superintendent, when satisfied that such person will not receive substantial benefit from further hospital treatment."

Turning to section 2189, we find provisions for the discharge of insane persons as well when the superintendent of the hospital is unwilling as when willing. When unwilling, the person insane may have a hearing before a jury as to the fact of his recovery. It provides for no other class of patients. It will be observed that the provisions of section 2189 are made applicable to cases arising under section 2185c only in two instances specifically mentioned: First, the person committed may be paroled by the medical superintendent under the same rules that the insane are paroled; second, the state lunacy commission is given the same power to discharge any person "committed under this act as contained in section 2189 of the Political Code, upon recommendation of the hospital superintendent."

Where, however, the patient claims to have recovered from his malady, and the superintendent is unwilling and refuses to discharge him, section 2185c does not specifically or by implication provide that he may proceed in the manner provided as in the case of an insane person claiming recovery under section 2189. The Legislature has either intentionally or inadvertently failed to provide that a person committed for excessive use of narcotics, when claiming to be recovered and is refused a discharge by the superintendent of the hospital, may have this question of fact determined by the method prescribed for the insane in section 2189. Because section 2185c refers to section 2189, and so to say carries the latter section into the former for certain specifically mentioned purposes, it by no means follows that all the provisions of section 2189 are carried into section 2185c, or that the method of procedure provided in section 2189 where an insane person, claiming to have recovered, may have the issue determined by a court sitting with a jury, is made applicable to persons mentioned in section 2185c. It seems to us quite clear that the court cannot extend the meaning of section 2185c beyond its express terms and read into it a method of procedure applicable only to persons committed under the charge of insanity.

It follows that, as the statute has given the petitioner no specific remedy for having the question of her recovery determined, the writ of habeas corpus is open to her. The demurrer therefore is overruled.

It is ordered that Thursday, at 11 o'clock a. m., on the 22d day of November, 1917, at the courtroom of this court be, and the same are, fixed as the time and place for the hearing of said matter on the issues of fact presented by the petition and return.

BEARD v. WEBB, County School Superintendent. (Civ. 1762.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 19, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 17, 1918.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑211—AUTHORITY OF SCHOOL BOARD—HEALTH OF PUPILS.

Under St. 1909, p. 908, § 1, authorizing a board of education to establish health and development supervision in the public schools, and to employ an examining staff and other employés necessary to carry on the work, and Pol. Code, § 1617, subd. 21, authorizing the board to give diligent care to the health and physical education of pupils, and to employ properly certified persons for such work, the board is not limited to employing an examining staff, with the qualifications prescribed for such staff, but may employ an optometrist, without adopting the entire scheme, keeping in view the necessities of the situation and the district's finances.

Petition by George F. Beard for writ of mandate to Caroline M. Webb, County Superintendent of Schools of Sacramento County. Writ issued.

Sheridan Downey and Arthur M. Seymour, both of Sacramento, for petitioner. Lee Gebhart, of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. It appears that petitioner is an optometrist duly qualified and licensed to practice as such under the laws of the state of California; that on March 17, 1916, the board of education of the city of Sacramento employed petitioner as such optometrist, at a salary of $1,600 a year, to examine pupils of the public schools of said city in order to discover any visual defects of said pupils in order that such defects, if existing, might be corrected; that petitioner ever since has been and now is so employed and has fully performed all services required of him by reason of such employment; that respondent during all of said time has been and is now the county superintendent of schools of Sacramento county; that on or about the 28th day of July, 1917, said board of education of the city of Sacramento made its order upon said Caroline M. Webb as such county superintendent to draw her requisition upon the county auditor of said county for the payment of the salary due petitioner for the month of July, 1917, for services performed under said employment, but respondent refused and ever since has refused to draw said requisition; that similar action was taken by said city board of education on August 30th, and September 30, 1917, but respondent likewise refused and still refuses to honor either of said orders for requisitions. The prayer is therefore for a writ of mandate to direct respondent to forthwith draw her requisition on the county auditor for the sum of $399.99 for payment of the salary due petitioner for services performed as such optometrist for the months of July, August, and September, 1917.

The facts are not in dispute. The whole controversy is as to the authority of the city board of education to employ an optometrist to perform such services. The solution of the question depends upon the construction of chapter 598 of the Statutes of 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 908), being "An act to provide for health and development supervision in the public schools of the state of California" considered in connection with subdivision 21 of section 1617 of the Political Code approved subsequent to the approval of said chapter 598. Section 1 of said act provides:

> "Boards of school trustees and city boards of education are hereby authorized to establish health and development supervision in the public schools of this state, and to employ an examining staff and other employés necessary to carry on said work and to fix the compensation for the same. Whenever practicable the examining staff for health and development supervision in the public schools of the state shall consist of both educators and physicians."

Section 2 enumerates the purposes of supervision, one of them being:

> "To secure the correction of developmental and acquired defects of both pupils and teachers which interfere with health, growth and efficiency, by complete physical examination. Said examinations shall occur annually or as often as may be determined by the board of school trustees or city board of education."

Section 3 provides for the qualifications of the examining staff. The said subdivision of the Political Code authorizes the boards of education "to give diligent care to the health and physical education of pupils and where sufficient funds are provided by district taxation, to employ properly certified persons for such work."

The contention of respondent seems to be: (1) That under said act of 1909 the board of education is empowered to employ only an examining staff consisting of educators and physicians and employés thereof, and that the board has no authority to employ any one else, independently of an educator or physician, to contribute to the health and development of the pupils and teachers of the public schools, although the special work for which such person is employed may be foreign to the services usually and properly performed by an educator or physician; and (2) that a board of education must carry out and execute all the purposes of health work as defined in said act or be precluded from doing any such work at the expense of the district.

In considering the first of these propositions it is to be observed that the statute provides not that "the board is hereby authorized to employ an examining staff and employés," but the adjective "other" precedes the word "employés." According to the established and accepted meaning of the word "other," used as an adjective, we must reach the conclusion that the "examining staff" are employés of the board in the same class as are the other employés contemplated by the statute. In other words, the board of education is not limited to the employment of an examining staff with the authority in that staff to employ assistants to aid in the work, but unless we are to depart from the plain significance of the language employed we must hold that the Legislature has authorized the board to employ an examining staff, and the same authority is conferred to employ other suitable persons to carry out the purposes of the statute. Discretion is vested in the board—and wisely so—to employ an examining staff and other suitable persons if needed or to employ simply an "examining staff" or other persons qualified to contribute to the health and development of the pupils. There is no language in the act, as we understand it, which compels the conclusion that no one can be employed by the board for such purpose except the examining staff. Nor is the employment of such staff an essential prerequisite to the employment of some other person for work which does not naturally fall within the province of an educator or physician. The Legislature has seen fit, it is true, to prescribe the qualifications of the examining board and has omitted to specify the qualifications of "other" persons who may be employed for health supervision. That circumstance, however, does not, we think, militate against the position of petitioner herein. It can readily be understood why some special qualifications might be required of an examining staff having general supervision of the whole range of physical and mental activity and development, and none be prescribed for other employés such as dentists and optometrists whose license under state authority and reputation in their profession would afford sufficient guarantee for faithful and efficient service.

The language of said section of the Political Code also favors the contention of petitioner herein. These acts of the Legislature must, of course, be construed together so as to give effect if possible to both. It was clearly the intention of the Legislature in the enactment of the later statute to provide for the employment of any professional man whose services might be needed to promote the health of the pupils. This statute certainly contemplates the employment of specialists such as dentists and optometrists. But if the qualifications of an examining staff as provided in the other act are to be required, it is easy to be seen that the primary purpose of the law might be defeated, for physicians and educators would not be qualified to do the particular work required for the health of the pupil. Petitioner quite aptly puts it this way:

> "Under respondent's contention if the board of education desires to employ a chemist to determine the purity of the water used in the public schools, a gymnasium instructor to oversee the exercises of the children, an architect to secure healthful ventilation, a janitor to attach a filter to a hydrant in the public school, a dentist to do dental work, or an optometrist to perform his duties, such board of education must restrict itself in choosing the individuals to perform such duties to those possessing the qualifications of an educator or physician as defined in said act."

We think the law is not subject to such reproach as thus indicated. The special statute and the general law may be completely harmonized if we keep in mind the purpose of the Legislature, and then there is no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the board of education when deemed advisable or necessary for the well-being of the school may employ suitable persons holding proper licenses from the state to do special work that may be required, as in the case before us. There may not be sufficient funds for the employment of an examining staff, or there may be no necessity for such outlay while the demand for dental or optometric attention may be quite urgent, and we think there is no good reason why the law may not be so construed as to meet such situation.

Probably what has been said is a sufficient answer to the second contention, which is closely allied to the first. That the board of education must engage in the whole scheme of health supervision and endeavor to carry out the entire purpose of health activity contemplated by the law or else be precluded from engaging in any health conservation whatever seems quite unreasonable, if not absurd. Of course, there is no provision in the law which requires the board of education to exercise all or none of the power thereby conferred. It must be true that where power is bestowed to perform certain enumerated acts for a certain purpose, and there is no clear intention to restrict the discretion of the agency intrusted with the authority, any of those acts may be performed with equal sanction of the law if it be properly related to the accomplishment of the purpose of the Legislature. It may be said, we think, that the Legislature has defined the limits within which the board of education must exercise authority for the promotion of the health and mental development of the pupils in the public schools, but it has not attempted the vain and foolish thing of providing that if the board is willing or able to do a portion of the work only it is powerless to act at all. The absurd results to which respondent's construction of the law would lead furnish a persuasive reason for rejecting it and adopting the rational view advocated by petitioner.

We think it may be epitomized in conclusion that while the law provides for the employment of an examining board and defines the qualifications of its members, it also authorizes the board of education to employ suitable persons licensed by the state to do special work for the purpose of promoting the health and efficiency of the pupils, that discretion is vested in the board of education to adopt the entire scheme provided in said law or only a portion of it, keeping in view the necessities of the situation and the financial ability of the district and the commendable and useful purpose of the law, and that nothing has been shown in the case at bar to indicate a violation by the board of education of any provision of the statute. We therefore conclude that respondent has refused to perform a plain ministerial duty, and the writ of mandate will issue requiring her to draw her requisition on the county auditor in favor of petitioner for the sum of $399.99.

It is so ordered.

LAUGHLIN v. PACIFIC COAST MOTOR CAR CO. (L. A. 4070.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 28, 1917.)

1. Exchange of Property 🔑13(1) — Complaint—Defect.

Complaint in an action on a contract for the exchange of automobiles held not defective because it stated the purchase price to have been $2,300 instead of $2,200.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑193(1)—Reservation of Exceptions—Demurrer.

Defects in a complaint as to the manner and form of the statement of facts, being susceptible to objection only by special demurrer, will not be considered on appeal, in the absence of such a demurrer.

3. Trial 🔑405(½) — Findings — Sufficiency.

Where the essential facts are incorporated in findings, such findings are not open to an objection that they do not sustain the judgment.

4. Trial 🔑396(1)—Findings—Sufficiency.

Where, to establish a counterclaim, it was necessary to make a tender of an automobile, a finding that no such tender was made is the only finding necessary in regard to the counterclaim.

5. Costs 🔑263 — Grounds for Appeal — Penalties.

Where an appeal is taken without cause, for the mere purpose of delay, the appellant may be fined under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 957, and such fine added to the damages.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Willis T. Morrison, Judge.

Action by Homer Laughlin, Jr., against Pacific Coast Motor Car Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stuart M. Salisbury, of Los Angeles, for appellant. E. E. Rogers, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The plaintiff and defendant made a contract whereby the defendant agreed to sell and deliver to the plaintiff, for a price stated, a Fiat automobile of a kind and style particularly described, and the plaintiff agreed to sell and deliver to the defendant a Mercer automobile at the price of $2,200, which was to be by the defendant credited upon the price of the said Fiat automobile sold by defendant to plaintiff. In pursuance of this contract, the plaintiff delivered the Mercer automobile to the defendant, who accepted the same, sold it, and converted the proceeds to its own use. The defendant failed to deliver to plaintiff the Fiat automobile as it agreed to do. Thereupon the plaintiff began this action to recover the sum of $2,200, fixed as the price of the Mercer machine he had delivered to the defendant.

[1-3] The complaint, while not well drawn, states, in substance, the facts essential to plaintiff's right to recover $2,200. The sum is erroneously stated therein to be $2,300, but this does not vitiate it as a statement of the cause of action. The defects pointed out by the appellant relate merely to the form and manner of the statement of the facts. They are objections which can be raised to a complaint only by a special demurrer. There was no demurrer to the complaint, general or special. Similar defects in the findings are not sufficient to support the claim that the findings do not sustain the judgment, where, as here, the essential facts are found.

[4] The answer, by way of counterclaim, alleged performance by defendant, and asked judgment for the balance of the price of the Fiat automobile. The counterclaim rested on the allegation that defendant had tendered to plaintiff a Fiat automobile of the kind and style it agreed to sell to him. The finding was that this was not true. No other finding regarding the defense was necessary, since, without such tender, the counterclaim could not have been established.

[5] These principles are well settled, and the appeal was without cause, unless for delay. It is a case for the imposition of damages under section 957 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which are fixed at $50.

It is therefore considered by the court that the judgment be affirmed, and that plaintiff recover of defendant the sum of $50 as damages.

WHITNEY v. WEST COAST LIFE INS. CO.

(S. F. 7553.)

1. INSURANCE 🔑646(3) — LIFE INSURANCE — INTENT TO DECEIVE—PRESUMPTION.

A presumption of applicant's intent to deceive is only raised when his statements are made with knowledge of their falsity.

2. INSURANCE 🔑292 — LIFE INSURANCE — STATEMENTS IN APPLICATION—FRAUD.

Where an applicant for life insurance answered in the negative the questions as to whether he had ever had shortness of breath or disease or palpitation of the heart, and stated that the only injury or illness or attendance of a physician within the past seven years was occasioned by a burn and named the physician consulted, and withheld information that he had consulted a physician who had diagnosed his trouble as myocarditis, of which he died, and that he had a few months before his application consulted another physician, which information would have probably prevented the issuance of the policy, he was guilty of fraud invalidating the policy.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Anna St. John Whitney against the West Coast Life Insurance Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Myrick & Deering, of San Francisco, (James Walter Scott, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Norman A. Eisner and T. C. Van Ness, Jr., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment for $10,000 on a policy of life insurance and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The defense was that Arthur L. Whitney, the assured, had made false representations in his application for the policy. The application was signed on the last day of the year 1913. By the terms of the policy all insurance thereunder was based upon the written and printed application therefor which by attached copy was made a part of the contract. Mr. Whitney died June 10, 1914, of acute myocarditis, a disease of the heart.

By his answers to questions contained in the application for insurance Mr. Whitney made, among others, the following representations:

> "Have you now or have you ever had * * * asthma or shortness of breath? Answer: No. Disease or palpitation of the heart? No. * * * Give particulars of any injury or illness or attendance of physician that may have occurred during the past seven years. Burn of arm and chest. Date 1911. Duration, one week. Physician consulted, Dr. Chidester."

The defendant introduced Dr. Cheney as a witness. He testified that Mr. Whitney had called upon him at his office about two years before the application for insurance was made. At the time of that visit Mr. Whitney had complained of a pain in his chest when he walked rapidly. He had noticed such pain under like circumstances about two years before he visited the doctor, but it had been growing more severe so that on walking a short distance the distress would come on. The patient said that the pain was always worse after eating. Dr. Cheney said, among other things:

> "After this physical examination that I gave Mr. Whitney and after his statement to me of his past history of his case, and of the symptoms, I came to the conclusion that he was suffering from myocarditis. That is weakness of the heart, degeneration of this muscle of the heart. I did tell that to Mr. Whitney at that time. I told him that he had, in my opinion, a weakness which we call myocarditis."

The doctor was testifying largely from his notes made at the time of Mr. Whitney's visit. Regarding the patient's reception of the physician's diagnosis, he said:

"I cannot tell you from my notes what Mr. Whitney replied. From my memory he told me that he had suspected that, because of the pain running down his arm, he knew the meaning of that symptom. That is my recollection of the conversation, although it is not so set down here. Other discussion upon this subject was simply the directions that followed for him to observe. I did give him directions. I advised him to curtail his diet, to curtail his tobacco, to exercise moderately, and to avoid extremely hot and cold baths, and I gave him a medicine to take containing digitalis, a heart stimulant. This was partly on the 22d and the 23d; I saw him two days in succeession. I saw him next on the 25th. These interviews took place in my office in the Shreve building. Mr. Whitney called there. I prescribed the digitalis for Mr. Whitney on the 25th. I next saw Mr. Whitney on February 9th, at my office. Mr. Whitney called there. He reported that he had had no appearance of his distress since. I made an examination of him on the 9th of February, 1912, merely to take his weight and to count his pulse. His pulse at that time was 76. His weight 159 pounds. I do not know what Mr. Whitney's height was; my notes do not show."

Dr. Cheney also testified:

"That condition which I found in Mr. Whitney in January and February, and June, that disintegration of his heart, was of such a character that it would be likely to continue up until June, 1914, if the diagnosis was correct; it is an incurable condition; it would persist as long as he lived. If Mr. Whitney died of myocarditis on June 10, 1914, that would convince me of the correctness of my diagnosis of January, 1912, and that it had never been cured."

It was also shown that Mr. Whitney had consulted his nephew, Dr. A. W. Hewlett of Michigan, who was visiting in San Francisco. Dr. Hewlett testified, in part, as follows:

"I told him that his physical condition, his general condition, was good, but nevertheless in my opinion he probably had weakness of his heart muscles. I gave him that as an opinion. Q. Did you explain to him the nature of any heart disorder that might not be visible by examination? A. No, I did not. Q. Did you say to him that his disorder was serious at all? Did you lay any serious stress upon it? A. I did not lay any serious stress, no. Q. Did you treat the matter lightly? A. I treated it quietly. I did not tell him there was nothing the matter with him, but I tried not to alarm him in any way, because I thought that would be bad for him. Q. Was he in any manner alarmed? A. He was not, no."

Dr. Hewlett's examination of Mr. Whitney was either in August or September of 1913, three or four months before the latter made application for insurance. Describing his visit to Mr. Whitney's office, Dr. Hewlett said:

"He asked me to come down and look him over. At that time he said that he had been told, or had reason to think, that he might possibly have some trouble with his heart, and he asked me to examine his heart. I don't remember any part of what was said in regard to what he had to state in regard to the reason for calling me down, but on questioning him I found that he said that he had become somewhat short of breath when he exerted himself, and that he noticed this particularly if he had been eating a large meal, and particularly that his stomach seemed full, and that by dieting—he had been placed on a diet by Dr. Cheney—by dieting he was more or less able to avoid this distress that he had."

In view of this evidence appellant insists that, as matter of law, Mr. Whitney was guilty of fraud in securing the policy of insurance in that he concealed from Dr. Hill, the defendant's medical examiner, the fact that he had consulted Drs. Cheney and Hewlett and the results of their examinations as reported to him. Appellant insists that in view of his false answers and the fraud thereby perpetrated the jury should have been instructed to find for the defendant, citing Westphall v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 27 Cal. App. 734, 151 Pac. 159; Madsen v. Maryland Casualty Co., 168 Cal. 204, 142 Pac. 51; Iverson v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 151 Cal. 746, 91 Pac. 609, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 866; McEwen v. New York Life Insurance Co., 23 Cal. App. 694, 139 Pac. 242; and John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Houpt (C. C.) 113 Fed. 572.

Respondent calls attention to the fact that the applicant for insurance was a man of active habits and athletic accomplishments. He was a manufacturer of salt, having his factory and his home in San Mateo county and his office in San Francisco. Up to a time within a month of his death it was his habit to arise at 5 o'clock in the morning, to walk about a mile to the salt works, and after spending half an hour there to take the train for San Francisco, arriving at his office before half past 8. He exercised much and was especially fond of walking. Up to ten days before his death he practiced that form of strenuous calisthenics known as "setting up exercises." None of the people who had most abundant opportunities to observe him—his wife, his son, his stenographer, nor his closest friends—had ever observed any abnormal shortness of breath nor had heard him complain of any ailment. Mrs. Whitney had been spending half a year in Europe, and her husband crossed the continent to meet her. Reaching Chicago on the return journey on May 28, 1914, Mr. Whitney had an attack of acute dysentery which continued, from time to time, until his death on June 10, 1914. On reaching San Francisco he consulted Dr. Chidester regarding dysentery and tonsilitis. The cause of death, as given by Dr. Chidester's certificate, was acute myocarditis and acute dilations of the heart. The certificate gave the date of the first symptoms of the fatal disease as about June 3d.

Under these circumstances, according to respondent's argument, the jurors were justified in concluding that any concealments or omissions to disclose facts about his past were made by Mr. Whitney without evil intention and were devoid of fraud. The burden was upon the defendant, says respondent, to show not only error in the applicant's statement, but willful error. O'Connor v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 146 Cal. 494, 80 Pac. 688. This burden, it is argued, was not met, and the evidence taken as a whole failed to show fraud on the part of the applicant for defendant's policy of insurance. Appellant bases its contentions largely upon the conclusion that Mr. Whitney was suffering from chronic myocarditis and that he knew it when he applied for insurance. It is true that Dr. Cheney diagnosed his case as one of chronic myocarditis, but it was in evidence that that disease is accompanied by sclerosis—hardening—of the arteries. Dr. Hill, who examined the applicant, found no sclerosis in the palpable arteries; nor had Dr. Cheney nor Dr. Hewlett discovered any. Dr. Charles Minor Cooper, the eminent specialist, who testified as an expert, said that it was very rare for one to have sclerosis of the internal arteries without the diagnostician being able to find some evidence of sclerosis in the palpable arteries. But there was testimony that sclerosis may exist altogether in the arteries inside the body.

It is suggested that, as the question answered by the applicant for insurance was whether or not he had suffered from "asthma or shortness of breath," it would be a natural conclusion by a person to whom such an interrogatory was propounded that the questioner meant shortness of breath of an asthmatic nature. In an answer to such a question, says respondent, failure to recall and confess shortness of breath following violent exercise or overeating or excitement would by no means be a conclusive evidence of fraud (citing Rupert v. Supreme Court U. O. F., 94 Minn. 293, 102 N. W. 715). So with the question, "Have you ever had disease or palpitation of the heart?" the argument is that the applicant might well have construed the examiner's question to mean, "Have you ever had disease involving palpitation of the heart?"

Respondent calls attention to the form of the question, which was, "Give particulars of any injury or illness or attendance of physician that may have occurred during the past seven years," and insists that there is a distinction, particularly to the understanding of a layman, between "consultation" and "attendance," that Mr. Whitney may well have apprehended the interrogatory as relating to those occasions when he had been confined to his home by illness or injury and had been there visited by a doctor or a surgeon. He had consulted Dr. Cheney at the physician's office, and his nephew had examined him at his own office in San Francisco. It is true that in Billings v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 70 Vt. 482, 41 Atl. 517, the court said:

> "A mere temporary indisposition, not serious in its nature, such as indicated by the evidence on the part of the defendant, other than measles, cannot be considered an illness, and the mere calling into a doctor's office for some medicine to relieve such temporary indisposition, or the calling at the home of the insured by the doctor for the same purpose, cannot be considered an attendance by a physician nor a consultation of a physician, within the meaning of the questions 3 and 7. 'Illness,' as used, means a disease or ailment of such a character as to affect the general soundness and healthfulness of the system seriously, and not a mere temporary indisposition which does not tend to undermine and weaken the constitution of the insured."

Commenting on a similar question similarly answered, the Illinois Appellate Court, said, in Federal Life Association v. Smith, 86 Ill. App. 431:

> "She was not asked whether she had consulted a physician or received treatment from one. Doubtless she understood the question as inquiring how long since a physician had waited on her in sickness at her home, and we think such understanding accords with the popular meaning of the expression."

[1, 2] But, having in mind all of these liberal rules which properly favor the upholding of verdicts of this sort, the fact remains that by the uncontradicted testimony of two physicians of standing Mr. Whitney is shown to have concealed facts about his condition and his consultations with medical men which could not have been unconsciously withheld. It is true that a presumption of intent to deceive, on the part of the applicant, is only raised when the statements are made with knowledge of their falsity. Ætna Life Insurance Co. v. Rehlaender, 68 Neb. 284, 94 N. W. 129, 4 Ann. Cas. 251; Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. Larson, 85 Ill. App. 143; Dolan v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, 173 Mass. 197, 53 N. E. 398; Royal Neighbors of America v. Wallace, 73 Neb. 409, 102 N. W. 1020. But there are cases where the knowledge suppressed is so important and obviously so well in the recollection of the applicant that merely withholding it clearly amounts to fraud, such as the failure to disclose deafness (Madsen v. Maryland Casualty Co., supra), or epilepsy (Westphall v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., supra), or a stroke of apoplexy (Iverson v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., supra), or a serious accident from the kick of an animal (McElwen v. New York Life Insurance Co., supra), or disease of the throat (John Hancock v. Mutual Life Insurance Co., supra). This is such a case.

It is impossible that Mr. Whitney could have forgotten so important an occasion as that on which he consulted his kinsman, Dr. Hewlett, a few months before he applied for insurance. Nor may we with reason believe that he could have lost all memory of his talks with Dr. Cheney and the course of diet and the medicine prescribed by that physician. To say that he might have understood the questions regarding medical attendance as having reference to visits to his home is to doubt the intelligence of a business man accustomed to accurate methods. To decide that he might have apprehended the interrogatory about "shortness of breath" as having relation to an asthmatic affection is to credit him with a guilelessness which is the possession of no man of his age and experience. He had been afflicted with a shortness of breath which seemed to him so alarming as to cause him to seek the advice of a physician. This had happened not more than four months prior to the time when he sought life insurance. One of his physicians had told him that he was suffering from "myocarditis," and, while this portentous polysyllable may mean nothing to the average person who sees it in print, it is safe to say that the doctor also told him in plain English that there was some sort of trouble with his heart. We are therefore forced to the conclusion that he consciously and intentionally withheld from the examining physician information which might have prevented, nay, probably would have prevented, the issuance to him of a policy of insurance.

Of course, we cannot tell what new evidence may be forthcoming if the cause be retried; but, unless some very positive proof be available to overcome the necessary deductions arising from the conduct of the assured, it would be the duty of the trial court to decline to submit the question of fact to a jury.

The judgment and order are reversed.

HOLLAND v. KELLY. (S. F. 7571.)

1. Jury 🔑14(9)—Trial 🔑374(2)—Right to Trial by Jury—Action to Quiet Title Involving Issues of Fraud.

In an action to set aside a deed declared to be fraudulent and to quiet plaintiff's title to the property, defendant was not entitled of right to a trial by jury, and the court was not bound by the jury's verdict.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑219(2)—Reservation of Grounds for Review—Estoppel to Raise Objections to Verdict—Failure to Object Below.

In an action to set aside a deed declared to be fraudulent, and to quiet plaintiff's title, though defendant made no special objection to the form of the jury's verdict, he was not estopped to raise the points, that there were no findings, and that no special issues were presented.

3. Trial 🔑388(2)—Equity Case—Necessity for Findings.

Unless waived, findings must be made in an equity case, whether tried with the aid of a jury or not, and whether or not either party specifically demands findings.

4. Trial 🔑388(2)—Failure to Find on Issues in Equity—Verdict by Jury.

In an equity case, a general verdict rendered by a jury is not determinative of the pleaded issues, and a failure to find upon them is error requiring reversal.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Patrick Holland against William A. Kelly, as executor of the last will and testament of Julia McCarthy, deceased. From a judgment for defendant's testate, plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed.

See, also, 158 Pac. 1045; 171 Pac. 421.

W. E. Cashman, of San Francisco, for appellant. William A. Kelly, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of Julia McCarthy, defendant's testate.

The suit was brought to obtain a judgment declaring a certain deed null and void, and decreeing that it be canceled. Plaintiff also asked that the court should make a decree declaring him to be the owner of the property described in the deed, quieting his title as against Julia McCarthy, and enjoining the latter from asserting any estate, right, or title to the land. There was also a prayer for general relief.

The deed in question was made by Mary Anne Holland, Patrick Holland's intestate, to Julia McCarthy, respondent herein. The complaint attacked this deed under four counts, declaring that it was void: (1) Because of the incompetency of the grantor; (2) because the deed was without consideration and not signed by the grantor; (3) because of the alleged nondelivery of the instrument; and (4) because of the asserted undue influence exerted by Julia McCarthy over the mind and volition of Mary Anne Holland, producing the execution of the alleged deed. Julia McCarthy answered denying the allegations of the complaint, and averring her own title to the property by virtue of the deed from Mrs. Holland. The cause was tried and submitted upon all of the alleged causes of action except the third. As to that count the court ordered a nonsuit. By their verdict the jury found a verdict "in favor of defendant and against the plaintiff upon counts 1, 2, and 4," and "in favor of plaintiff and against defendant upon counts none." Judgment was thereupon entered in favor of the defendant.

Appellant contends that this is a suit of which a court of equity has exclusive jurisdiction; that in such an action the verdict of the jury is merely advisory and intended to enlighten the conscience of the chancellor; that a trial by jury in chancery may only be had upon issues specially framed under the court's direction; that therefore the general verdict cannot support the judgment; and, finally, that the absence of findings necessitates a reversal. This matter has been before the court in an application for mandate to require the settling of a bill of exceptions. Holland v. Superior Court, 169 Cal. 361, 146 Pac. 878. In the opinion in that proceeding we said:

> "Apparently the judge of the trial court has acted in the matter of settling a bill of exceptions to be used on the plaintiff's appeal from the purported judgment of December 19, 1913, and has settled such a bill. We are of the opinion that the judge erred in allowing to be inserted therein the matters occurring subsequent to the date of such judgment, which are hereinbefore specified, viz.: An order made April 1, 1914, by the court, purporting to vacate and set aside the judgment of December 19, 1913, etc.; findings of fact and conclusions of law signed April 1, 1914; and a judgment made April 2, 1914, based on such findings. These things have nothing to do with the question of the correctness of the clerk's attempted judgment of December 19, 1913, and are absolutely immaterial considerations on the appeal therefrom. Being immaterial, their recital in the bill of exceptions cannot prejudice plaintiff, for they will be disregarded in the disposition of the appeal, and therefore plaintiff needs no relief in regard thereto. If on the appeal the clerk's judgment is determined to have been invalid, it will be reversed."

This is an appeal from the judgment entered on verdict.

[1] Respondent contends that the issues were of legal cognizance, and that in any view of the matter appellant is estopped to contend otherwise. In support of this theory respondent cites Reiner v. Schroeder, 146 Cal. 411, 80 Pac. 517. In that case it was held that where a plaintiff has been ousted from possession, and the question of ownership is in issue, the parties are entitled to a jury trial upon that issue, and no findings are required thereon. But in that case the only essential controversy was whether or not defendant had wrongfully ousted plaintiff from possession of certain mining property, and therefore the action was one for the recovery of specific real property. Section 592, Code Civ. Proc. The action at bar was very different. It was based upon matters of equitable cognizance. It was an action to set aside a deed declared to be fraudulent and to quiet plaintiff's title to the property described in such deed. In an action to quiet title a defendant is not entitled of right to a trial by jury, and a court is not bound by the verdict of a jury, even where issues of fraud are involved. Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 51 Pac. 630; Angus v. Craven, 132 Cal. 691-696, 64 Pac. 1091; Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 113 Pac. 147; Cobe v. Crane, 173 Cal. 116, 159 Pac. 587.

[2-4] Equally untenable is respondent's assumed position that appellant is estopped to raise the points that there were no findings, and that no special issues were presented to the jury. It is true that appellant made no specific objection to the form of the verdict, but it does not follow that thereby he assented to the theory that the cause on trial was a "law case." Even conceding that by his conduct he waived the absence of special interrogatories, there is nothing to indicate in any way that he consented to have judgment entered without findings by the court. Unless waived, findings must be made in an equity case whether it be tried with the aid of a jury or not, and whether either party specifically demands findings or is silent upon the subject. Haight v. Tryon, 112 Cal. 4, 44 Pac. 318. In an equity case a general verdict rendered by the jury is not determinative of the pleaded issues, and a failure to find upon such issues is error requiring reversal of the judgment. Learned v. Castle, 67 Cal. 41, 7 Pac. 34; Moore v. Copp, supra; Warring v. Freear, 64 Cal. 54, 28 Pac. 115; Vallejo, etc., R. R. v. Reed Orchard Co. et al., 169 Cal. 558, 147 Pac. 238.

Accordingly, the judgment is reversed.

EMPLOYÉ'S CREDIT CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al.

(S. F. 8406.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑382—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT — RELEASE — SUFFICIENCY.

A release not providing for full compensation, and which was not approved by the Industrial Accident Commission, was invalid, and no bar to an action by the employé for additional compensation, in view of Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) § 32, subd. "b," as amended by St. 1915, p. 1093, providing that no release shall be valid, unless it provides for payment of full compensation in accordance with the act.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑419—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—NOTICE OF ACCIDENT—FURTHER DISABILITY.

Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1089, requiring written notice of the accident within 30 days, does not apply to claims for further disability, under section 16, subd. "c," as amended by St. 1915, p. 1085, where compensation has been made for the original injury.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑419 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—FURTHER DISABILITY—TIME FOR FILING CLAIM.

In a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act, § 16, subd. "c," as amended by St. 1915, p. 1085, for compensation for further disability, evidence held sufficient to justify a finding of the commission that claimant's "further disability" had not existed for so long a time that a claim therefor was barred.

In Bank. Proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act by R. M. Rea, claimant, against the Employé's Credit Company, employer, and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, insurance carrier. Award for claimant, and the employer and insurance carrier file an application for a writ of review. Award affirmed.

Lloyd S. Ackerman, of San Francisco, for petitioners. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is a petition for the review of an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of Rose M. Rea.

On January 8, 1916, the applicant, while in the service of the Employé's Credit Company as assistant bookkeeper, received a gunshot wound through her right arm, inflicted by two negroes who were robbing her employer's place of business. Due notice thereof was given to the employer, and the other petitioner, as insurance carrier, paid her the sums required for disability indemnity and medical treatment by the Workmen's Compensation Act, from that time until February 17, 1916, at which time, the wound having healed, she was discharged from treatment and the payment of compensation ceased. Thereafter, on January 23, 1917, she applied to the Industrial Accident Commission for an award, on the ground that the injury received, as aforesaid, had caused a further disability entitling her to further compensation under the provisions of subdivision "c" of section 16 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. A hearing was had at which the defendants appeared and presented two defenses; first, that the applicant had released the employer and insurance carrier from all liability on account of the injury; second, that the application on January 23, 1917, was more than six months after the happening of the original injury, and more than six months from the time the further disability complained of was produced from the effects of that injury.

[1] It is sufficient to say with respect to this release that there was no evidence thereof given at the hearing before the commission. Our knowledge of it is derived solely from the allegations of the petition to this court for a review. It is to be added that it does not provide for payment of full compensation in accordance with the provisions of the act, and it has not been approved by the Industrial Accident Commission, and, consequently, that it would be invalid under the provisions of subdivision "b," § 32, of the act, and would have been unavailing even if it had been offered in evidence.

With regard to the defense that the application was made too late, the evidence is not conflicting, but the facts are somewhat peculiar. According to the testimony of the applicant, she felt that after giving the release referred to she had no right to further compensation, although she continued thereafter to have some pain in her arm and increasing nervousness. After she was discharged from treatment by the insurance carrier, she felt that she would be unable to keep a position if she should get one, and did not attempt to get work except on two occasions, and she was then so nervous that she was not accepted. Even a little housework affected her arm. The pains in her right arm grew more severe in character as time passed, after the treatment ceased in February, 1916. She consulted a physician in July, and received medical treatment for a short time, and again in September, on which occasion she was given a nerve sedative prescription. In October, 1916, her nervousness had increased to such an extent that she took advice about the matter of obtaining further compensation, and applied to the respondent insurance carrier therefor and was refused assistance. From about the 1st of October until the time of making the application in January she was wholly unable to do any work. By stipulation at the hearing a physician was appointed to make an examination of her condition. He reported that the only direct consequences of the wound were numbness and heaviness in the arm, with occasional pain in the wrist, elbow, and shoulder; that the principal ailment of the applicant was an extreme nervousness amounting to prostration, and apparently the result of the fright she received at the time of her injury from the robbers. All the evidence shows that her condition and disability is the direct result of the physical injury and of the mental shock she received at the time.

The commission found that the applicant was injured on January 8, 1916; that said injury caused a temporary total disability from that time until February 19, 1916, for which compensation had been paid in full, and that beginning on October 1, 1916, the applicant became afflicted with neurasthenia, arising from said injury, which constituted a further disability under section 16, subdivision "c," of the act. The award is for this further disability.

[2] Subdivision "c," above cited, provides that the injured employé may institute proceedings to collect compensation within 245 weeks after the date of the injury, upon the ground that the original injury has caused further disability. The first part of section 16 provides that proceedings for the collection of disability indemnity to an employé, under the act, must be begun within six months from the date of the injury, except as otherwise provided in the act. The provision referred to in subdivision "c" is one of the exceptions. The notice in writing which is required to be given to the employer by section 20 of the act is a notice of the original injury, and the section does not apply to the case of a further disability under subdivision "c," where compensation has been made for the original disability. On behalf of the commission it is conceded that the application, under subdivision "c," must be begun within six months after the occurrence of the further disability. Upon this theory the further disability must have occurred not earlier than

July 23, 1916, in order to bring the application within the period of six months.

[3] The term "further disability" is of somewhat indefinite meaning, especially as applied to a case such as this, where nervous prostration gradually increases to a positive disability. The question of the time when it reaches the state of disability is a question of fact for the commission to decide from the evidence. Miss Rea suffered from nervousness continuously from the time of signing the release mentioned, but the evidence justified the inference that she hoped and expected that it would disappear. Apparently she was not confined to her room or to her bed, or prevented from going about, and it was not until in the latter part of July, or later, that she began to fear that she was not improving, and that the nervousness was more serious than she had believed it to be; and it was not until some time about the 1st of October that it increased to such a degree as to disable her entirely from doing any work. While the proof of some of these statements is not direct, it is not unreasonable to infer them all from the testimony given. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that the commission was not justified in finding that the disability occurred on the 1st of October, 1916, and that her right was not barred at the time she filed her application.

The award is affirmed.

GRAHAM v. MIXON et al. (Sac. 2460.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 28, 1917.)

VENUE ⟹14—PLACE OF TRIAL—"INJURY TO PERSON."

Code Civ. Proc. § 395, providing that actions for injury to person must be tried in the county where the injury occurs or in the county wherein defendants reside, does not give to a person against whom an alleged libel is published in a newspaper a right to maintain his action against defendants' protest in any county in which the newspaper may circulate; a libel not being an "injury to person" contemplated by the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Personal Injury.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by Charles Graham against W. F. Mixon and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Mixon appeals from an order denying his motion for a change of venue. Order reversed, and cause remanded.

Arthur C. Huston and Hurst & Hurst, all of Woodland, for appellant. J. M. Inman and Ralph W. Smith, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff, who resides in Sacramento county, brought an action for libel against defendants, who live in Yolo county and there publish the Mail of Woodland. This newspaper, in which, according to the complaint, the alleged libel was published, is circulated and read in Sacramento county, according to the averments of said complaint. Defendants moved for a change of the place of trial to the county of their residence which, they say, is the only proper place of trial. If this contention be correct, they were entitled to the order which they sought. Section 397, Code Civ. Proc. The motion was denied upon the sole ground that an action for libel is one "for injury to person," and therefore, under the provisions of section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure as such section has stood since 1911, is triable in the county "where the injury occurs." The appeal is from the order denying defendants' motion.

In considering the meaning which the Legislature intended to impart to the words "injury to person," it is legitimate and proper for us to contemplate the consequences which would follow any certain construction of those words. If the legislators intended to include "libel" under the general designation "injury to person," it would follow that a man of state-wide reputation for good citizenship would be injured in his person in each county in which a libelous article regarding him would be circulated and might select any one of such counties as the place for the commencement of his action against the publisher. Each county would be, as to him, "the county where the injury occurs" within the purview of section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On the other hand, the man of local reputation might suffer detriment only in the county or counties in which the attack upon his character would amount to an injury. There can be little doubt that the Legislature contemplated no such result when using the expressions, "if it be an action for injury to person" and "in the county where the injury occurs."

Even if we say that the presumption of injury arises from the libelous publication and that therefore there is no difference between the man of local and the one of general reputation in the matter of available places for libel suits, we are confronted with another inequality in the operation of the statute which surely was not intended by the lawmakers. If libel be an "injury to person," the victim has a broader field of action against the owner of a newspaper of general circulation publishing the libel than would be available to him if he should receive serious bodily hurt from the negligent operation of an automobile owned by a resident of a county other than the one in which the accident might occur. In the former case he might have as many places for the commencement of his action as there are counties in the state, while in the latter he would be limited to the county in which the accident occurred or that in which the owner of the motor car resided at the time of the infliction of the injury. We can think of no good reason why the Legislature should so broaden the venue of civil actions for libel while the Constitution makes indictments found or informations laid for publications in newspapers triable only in the counties where the publication offices of the newspapers are situated or in the counties where the parties libeled reside. Article 1, § 9, Const. The purpose of this constitutional provision, as revealed by the debates of the constitutional convention, was, on the one hand, to prevent the dragging of a publisher the length of the state for trial on a charge of misdemeanor at the whim of the prosecutor, and, on the other, to permit a citizen who had been unjustly attacked by a newspaper to gain vindication in his own home. Older v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 770, 109 Pac. 478. The same reasons apply with only slightly diminished force to the proper venue of civil actions for damages on account of libel. Therefore we ought to hesitate, unless compelled by the unequivocal force and significance of the language used, to attribute to the Legislature the meaning for which respondent contends.

It is conceded by appellant (as indeed it must be) that an action such as the one prosecuted by plaintiff is one growing out of a violation of personal rights as distinguished from rights of property. Civil actions arise out of obligations or injuries. Section 25, Code Civ. Proc. An obligation is due to a contract or to operation of law. Section 26, Code Civ. Proc. Section 27, Code of Civil Procedure, describes injuries as of two kinds, to the person and to property. Section 28 defines injury to property, and section 29 classifies every other injury as "an injury to the person." This is a very concise and convenient classification and one conforming to our simplified form of action, but because it exists in one part of one of the Codes we are not therefore bound to say that wherever employed in any law the expression "injury to person" must be interpreted to mean every invasion of personal rights. In drawing statutes, legislators are sometimes unconsciously influenced by distinctions which prevailed under the highly technical practice of the common law; and at the common law, actions in tort were classified with reference to the physical or to the merely consequential injury to person or property. Prof. William Carey Jones, in volume 2 of Modern American Law, at page 10, uses the following language:

> "Modern procedure has abolished forms of action, and technical questions of procedure have lost their importance. Nevertheless the language of the old forms of action is still used, and the distinctions made therein are often useful, if not necessary, in determining the basis of liability in tort. It is therefore advisable to understand the distinction between the action of trespass and the action of trespass on the case, or, as it is more commonly called, case. Trespass was the action used for any wrongful and direct application of force, whether to the person or property. Case was a supplementary form of action, provided for all kinds of injury which did not amount to a trespass."

He also quotes a passage, to the same effect, from Leame v. Bray, 3 East, 593, and concludes the introduction to his article on torts with the following sentences:

> "Where there is no physical interference with the person or property, then the action in tort is not trespass but case. For example, in deceit, malicious prosecution, or libel, the action employed is case."

To the lawyer trained in the common law, therefore, there exists a distinction between actions for libel and those arising out of physical interference with the person. Perhaps this distinction was in the mind of the draughtsman of the statute before us, and perhaps for this reason he and his colleagues who voted for its adoption had no thought of including libel within the category of actions for injuries to persons to which it was intended that section 395, Code of Civil Procedure, should apply. Or it may be that the lawmakers employed the words "injury to person" according to the general and approved usage (section 13, Civ. Code), and not in a special and technical sense, and by that expression intended the ordinary meaning, namely "bodily injury." In either event, the true significance of the section would support appellant's contention. In discussing section 395, Code of Civil Procedure, this court has held it to be constitutional although it applied to bodily injuries and not to other invasions of personal rights, such as slander and libel. Gridley v. Fellows, 166 Cal. 765, 138 Pac. 355. The following quotations from the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Shaw clearly indicate the views of the court in this regard. At page 769 of 166 Cal., at page 357 of 138 Pac., the following language is used:

> "The sole question for consideration is whether causes of actions for bodily injury or for injuries to property are so like in all respects to other causes of action, such as actions for slander or libel or actions on contract at law or in equity, that no reasonable basis can be found for a provision allowing the former to be tried in the county where the injury occurred, which is not the residence of the defendant, which does not apply with equal force to the latter actions mentioned."

On the same page we find this language:

> "Actions to recover damages caused by bodily injuries, or by injuries to property, are well known as distinct classes of actions. They are each separately treated in the text-books of law. Each forms a distinct and well-known class, with attributes and qualities of its own, and each is or has been affected and controlled to some extent by distinct and different rules of law, evidence, and procedure. They are so clearly distinguished from other actions that there is no difficulty in recognizing and classifying them. We think they are sufficiently distinguished by the probable interests and convenience of the parties and by considerations of public convenience and policy, not applying so strongly to other actions, to justify the Legislature in providing, as it has, that the defendant shall not have the absolute right to demand that the cause be removed for trial to the county of his residence, in case it is not the county in which the injury occurred."

This decision strongly supports appellant's position, because, as his counsel contend in their brief, if respondent's view were the correct one this court would have held that the section did not violate the rule against special legislation because it embraced all personal actions, including libel. Instead, the holding was that it excluded libel and certain other actions, but was founded, nevertheless, upon a proper classification.

In the later case of Rains v. Diamond Match Co., 171 Cal. 326-328, 153 Pac. 239, 240, Mr. Justice Sloss, who wrote the opinion, said, regarding the amendment to section 395, Code of Civil Procedure, enacted in 1911:

> "The change in the law was designed to enlarge the rights of plaintiffs by giving them a choice of two counties, where theretofore the defendant had enjoyed the right of trial in the county of his residence."

It will thus be seen that this court has never regarded the section as one which applies, so far as actions for personal injuries are concerned, to any but those based upon physical lesions. It is also to be remembered that, although injuries are classified as injuries to property and injuries to the person (sections 28 and 29, Code Civ. Proc.), causes are more elaborately differentiated in designating the classes of actions which may be united. Those for "injuries to character" and "injuries to person" are separately enumerated. Section 427, Code Civ. Proc. It will thus be seen that in the Code itself the expression "injuries to person" is not always used with the same broad significance as respondent would have us give to it, following section 29 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

We conclude that section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure must be interpreted as not giving to a person against whom an alleged libel is published in a newspaper the right to maintain his action, against the defendant's protest, in any county in which the newspaper may circulate.

The order is reversed and the cause remanded for action by the superior court in accordance with the views expressed above.

In an action on a mortgage which had been assigned to insurance company which paid the mortgagee the amount of a loss under a policy on the mortgaged property, a finding that the mortgagors had not prior to the fire conveyed their right, title, and interest in the property without the consent of the insured, held contrary to the evidence.

3. INSURANCE 🔑399 — WAIVER OF FORFEITURE—PAYMENT OF LOSS.

Insured's failure to give notice or proof of loss as required by the contract were not waived by the insurance company's payment of the loss to a mortgagee, for whose benefit the insurance was taken.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by D. W. Clark against Frederick Casselman and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hindman & Yakey, of Los Angeles, for appellant. A. W. Sorenson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from the judgment. The action was prosecuted by plaintiff as the representative and trustee of the Northwestern National Insurance Company of Milwaukee, that corporation being the real party in interest, seeking foreclosure in an action on a note and mortgage. By the amended complaint it was alleged that Frederick A. and Lucile R. Casselman on March 17, 1911, executed a note for $1,200 payable to Lucien T. Swall three years after date, and that said note was supported by a mortgage on certain described real property. It was also averred that upon breach of conditions of the note or mortgage the mortgagee under the terms of the contract might elect to declare due and payable the whole sum specified in the note; that the buildings on the mortgaged premises were required to be kept insured for $1,200 at the mortgagor's expense; and that Frederick A. Casselman, on the 6th of May, 1911, delivered to Lucien Swall, the mortgagee, such a policy of the Northwestern National Insurance Company of Milwaukee. The terms of the policy are pleaded in the complaint, among them being the following paragraph:

> "Whenever this company shall pay the mortgagee (or trustee) any sum for loss or damage under this policy and shall claim that, as to the mortgagor or owner, no liability therefor existed, this company shall, to the extent of such payment, be thereupon legally subrogated to all the rights of the party to whom such payment shall be made, under all securities held as collateral to the mortgage debt, or may at its option, pay to the mortgagee (or trustee) the whole principal due or to grow due on the mortgage with interest, and shall thereupon receive a full assignment and transfer of the mortgage and of all such other securities; but no subrogation shall impair the right of the mortgagee (or trustee) to recover the full amount of his claim."

It was further set forth in the complaint that on February 27, 1912, a fire occurred which damaged a portion of the insured property; that prior to the fire the Casselmans had, without consent of the insurance company, bargained, sold, and conveyed their interest in said property to Walcott Earle Hill; that no proof of loss was made at any time as by the terms of the policy required; that on April 4, 1913, the Northwestern National Insurance Company claimed that as to the mortgagors or owners of the property insured no liability existed; that thereupon said corporation paid to Lucien Swall the full amount of the mortgage taking from him assignment of the mortgage and note in the name of plaintiff as its trustee; that no part of the note or interest had been paid save the interest due March 17, 1913; and that on January 23, 1914, plaintiff elected to declare the whole of the note due and notified defendants of said election.

The court found the execution of the note and mortgage by the Casselmans as pleaded; the procuring in accordance with the provisions of the mortgage of the policy in favor of the mortgagee (the policy with certain assignments being set forth in the findings); that on February 27, 1912, the buildings insured were totally destroyed, the loss amounting to $1,200; that no proof of loss was made as required by said policy; and that on April 4, 1913, the corporation paid Swall $1,200 in full satisfaction of the mortgage and took assignment of the note and mortgage to plaintiff for collection. There are further findings that there was no consideration paid for the assignment of the mortgage; that the note and mortgage had been fully paid and that there was nothing due from defendants to plaintiff; that plaintiff, as alleged in his complaint, elected to and did declare the whole of the note due and payable, but that it was not true "that the defendants, or either of them, failed to comply with the terms and conditions * * * of the note and mortgage"; and that none of the premiums on the insurance policy had been returned to Swall or to the defendants. Among the conclusions of law the court declared:

> "That the plaintiff having come into a court of equity for the purpose of enforcing its demands against the defendants herein must do equity, and it is not equitable for the plaintiff herein to claim a forfeiture on a fully paid policy of insurance and not having offered to return the premiums fully paid, and that it is not equitable for the plaintiff to refuse to waive forfeitures and limitations of time and under the facts as hereinabove found by this court, it is not equitable that plaintiff should recover herein."

Other conclusions were to the effect that the payment of $1,200 to Swall was in full satisfaction of the note and mortgage; that there was no consideration for the assignment of the said note and mortgage to the insurance company; that the debt evidenced by these documents was entirely extinguished by said payment; and that defendants were entitled to a decree that the note and mortgage be canceled and satisfied of record.

[1] Respondents insisted in their initial brief, and still insist, that the appellant's specifications were so vague as to put them upon no notice of any asserted errors. They called attention in their first brief to the fact that the specifications of insufficiency of evidence had been ordered stricken from the record by the trial court. Subsequently this court made an order reinserting the matters sought to be stricken out by the trial court. While these specifications are not very elaborate, they are sufficient clearly to raise the points involved and to advise respondents of the errors which appellant believed to have been committed. Owen v. Pomona Land & Water Co., 131 Cal. 530, 63 Pac. 850, 64 Pac. 253; Bell v. Staacke, 141 Cal. 186–191, 74 Pac. 774.

[2] It will not be necessary to review all of the specifications of error. It is the theory of the appellant that the Casselmans had no rights under the policy for two reasons: First, because they had parted with their interest in the property; and, second, because as no proofs of loss were furnished to the insurance company the policy was void as to them. Taking the second contention first, we read in the record a finding that no proof of loss was made to the insurance company at any time under the policy of insurance. By the terms of the policy such proof of loss was essential to the maintenance of any claim. The court did find that it was not true that prior to the fire the Casselmans without the consent of the insurance company conveyed their right, title, and interest in the property to Walcott Earle Hill. This finding is attacked as being contrary to the evidence, and we must sustain appellant in his contention in this behalf. Plaintiff introduced in evidence a deed by the Casselmans to Hill duly executed, which had been acknowledged October 19, 1911, and recorded on the 31st of the same month. Mr. Casselman testified that he conveyed the property to Walcott Earle Hill at the date indicated by the deed. The fire, as found by the court under the undisputed proof, occurred on or about the 27th day of February, 1912. On May 13, 1912, after more than the 60 days allowed under the policy for proofs of loss, the corporation denied its liability to the Casselmans under its policy of insurance, and more than a year after the fire it paid the mortgagee, Swall, the amount of the policy and took an assignment of the note and mortgage under the subrogation clause. The policy was not assigned until long after the fire, when on March 10, 1913, it was assigned to Hill, who assigned it to Ida Wildey; but appellant contends that this was because it covered and was in force as to other property not burned.

[3] It is apparent therefore that the judgment must be reversed because of the erroneous finding discussed above. As was held in the case of Hare v. Headley, 54 N. J. Eq. 545, 35 Atl. 445, forfeiture of the rights of the insured by reason of his failure to give notice or proofs of loss as required by the contract cannot be considered waived by the payment of loss to the mortgagee. And it was also held in that case that the insurer might be entitled to subrogation to the mortgagee's rights under a mortgage clause, although the contract between the insurance company and the mortgagee was an independent agreement and not, as in this case, part of the original policy.

The judgment is reversed.

PAYNE v. COMMERCIAL NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES. (L. A. 5290.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1917.)

1. EVIDENCE 🔑451 — AMBIGUITIES — EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE.

A check drawn for "$500.00 Five and no/100 dollars" is patently ambiguous, and evidence is not admissible to prove that $500 was intended, even if considered under Civ. Code, §§ 1635–1637, 1640, 1641, 1643, 1647, 1654, giving rules of construction of contracts, which rules apply only to "language used" and do not authorize evidence to clear up two different and entirely inconsistent statements.

2. PLEADING 🔑35—DENIAL OF SURPLUSAGE—ISSUES—STATUTES.

Where a complaint against a bank stated that defendant paid out $500 on a check reading "$500.00 Five and no/100 dollars," an allegation that the check was intended to be for $5 was mere surplusage, and an answer denying the same and setting up as additional such matter was immaterial, and did not make a material issue of fact, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, relating to mistakes or imperfection of the writings put in issue by the pleadings, does not apply.

3. PLEADING 🔑381(2)—ISSUES—SURPLUSAGE.

Where an allegation in a complaint is immaterial and surplusage, and no evidence is introduced to support it, the fact of its denial in the answer does not make a material issue of fact, and testimony in refutation was inadmissible.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1033(9) — HARMLESS ERROR—ERRORS FAVORING APPELLANT.

An appellant cannot complain that a judgment against him is for less than the other party was entitled to.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Action by D. C. Payne against the Commercial National Bank of Los Angeles. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Paul Burks and F. J. Heid, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an action by a depositor against a bank in which he had a commercial account to recover money claimed to have been improperly paid by the bank on a purported check drawn by him against the bank, in favor of one Russell, and improperly charged to his account. Russell was not made a party to the action. Plaintiff obtained judgment for the amount claimed ($495). This is an appeal by defendant from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The appeal is in this court by transfer hereto after decision of the district court of appeal of the second appellate district.

On May 7, 1914, the plaintiff drew and delivered to D. W. Russell, the payee therein named, the check here involved. It was in the following form:

Los Angeles, Cal., May 7, 1914. No. 379
Commercial National Bank of Los Angeles: 16–17
Pay to the order of D. W. Russell $500.00
Five and no/100 dollars. D. C. Payne.

On May 9, 1914, the check was presented to defendant bank for payment, and the bank, with full notice and knowledge of the variance in the check between the written and "marginal figures," refused to pay the same. On May 13, 1914, the check was again presented for payment, and the bank thereupon paid the sum of $500 thereon and charged plaintiff's account in said sum. At the time of said payment plaintiff had on deposit a sum exceeding $500. Upon these facts, alleged in the complaint, established by the evidence without conflict, and found by the trial court, judgment was given for plaintiff for $495.

Of course, the bank was authorized to pay out money on plaintiff's account only upon authorization from plaintiff so to do. Janin v. London & S. F. Bank, 92 Cal. 22, 27 Pac. 1100, 14 L. R. A. 320, 27 Am. St. Rep. 82. The check hereinbefore set forth is the only authorization relied on.

Clearly there is no rule of construction which would warrant this check being read as one for $500, rather than as one for only $5.

It might well be argued that it must be construed as a check for only $5. This argument might not be sustainable under the rule of such cases as Poorman v. Mills, 39 Cal. 345, 350, 2 Am. Rep. 451, to the effect that, if there is a difference in the sum stated in the body of the check or bill and that stated in figures in the margin or superscription, the words written in the body must control without regard to the figures in the margin or superscription. The idea underlying this rule appears to be that such a marginal note or superscription is but a memorandum, constituting no part of the body of the bill or check, and that what is clearly specified in the body must control. It is said with much force that this rule can have no application here for the reason that the figures "500.00" in this check do not constitute a marginal note or superscription, but are equally with the written words and figures "Five and no/100 dollars," a part of the body of the check. But there is a general rule of construction recognized by some of the authorities to the effect that where both written words and figures are used in a contract to express the same number, and there is a discrepancy between the two, the written words must prevail over the figures. See 2 Elliott on Contracts, § 1527; Bradshaw v. Bradbury, 64 Mo. 334; Gran v. Spangenburg, 53 Minn. 42, 54 N. W. 933; United Surety Co. v. Summers, 110 Md. 95, 72 Atl. 775. The theory is that a man is more apt to commit an error with his pen in writing a figure than in writing a word, and that the words ought to be deemed the better and more solemn statement, and therefore should govern. It is unnecessary to determine here whether such a rule obtains in this state. If such should be held to be our rule, the check would have to be construed as one for $5 only, and parol evidence would not be admissible to make it otherwise. This would necessarily compel an affirmance of the judgment and order. In passing it may be noted that the Legislature, at its last session, enacted certain rules of construction for negotiable instruments, one of which is that:

> "Where the sum payable is expressed in words and also in figures and there is a discrepancy between the two, the sum denoted by the words is the sum payable." Subdivision 1, § 3098, Civ. Code.

Purely for the purposes of this decision we shall assume that no such rule can be applied here, and that the case is as stated by learned counsel for defendant in the following language:

> "In the instant case, the written instrument set out in the complaint as constituting the basis of a recovery shows upon its face that there were incorporated therein with equal prominence two different and entirely inconsistent statements, as to the amount of money which appellant was thereby directed to pay."

The result, of course, would be that we have an instrument which, on its face, is apparently void for uncertainty. Unless the uncertainty could properly be removed by evidence aliunde, the judgment of the trial court cannot be disturbed.

[1] The principal claim of appellant bank is that the trial court erred in refusing to receive parol evidence of the transaction between the plaintiff and the payee named in the check, culminating in the giving of the check, for the purpose of showing the intention of plaintiff to give a check for $500 to the payee. It seems to be the theory of learned counsel for defendant that under various sections of our Civil Code (1635, 1636, 1637, 1640, 1641, 1643, 1647, 1654), which simply lay down well-settled rules for the construction of the language used in a contract, the ambiguity may be removed and the check treated as one for $500. This theory is without any support in the authorities. Rules provided for the construction of contracts are simply for the purpose of ascertaining the true intent and meaning of the language used therein. Under these rules parol evidence is admissible where it tends to show the correct interpretation of the language used, the purpose being to enable the court or jury to understand, in the light of the circumstances shown, what the words employed really mean, and to interpret those words, in so far as this can reasonably be done, in accord with the intention of the parties as the same may be shown by such circumstances. But no authority sustains the proposition that under the guise of construction or explanation a meaning can be given to the instrument which is not to be found in the instrument itself, but is based entirely upon direct evidence of intention independent of the instrument. It has been well said that in the admission of extrinsic evidence the line which separates evidence which aids the interpretation of what is in the instrument from direct evidence of intention independent of the instrument must be kept steadily in view, the duty of the court being to declare the meaning of what is written in the instrument, and not what was intended to be written. See 17 Cyc. 675. It is well settled that parol evidence is not admissible to explain such a patent ambiguity as we have in this case. It may not be correct to say that a prima facie patent ambiguity can never be explained by evidence aliunde, for it may be that such evidence will sometimes show that the apparent uncertainty in the language used does not in truth exist. But this cannot be true of such an ambiguity as we have here. Whatever parol evidence might be introduced in this case, we would still have the "two different and entirely inconsistent statements," each statement absolutely clear and unambiguous and capable of meaning only one thing. So far as the language of the instrument is concerned, the uncertainty would be just as hopeless as it was without the evidence, and the true intent could not be ascertained from the language of the instrument. No authority to which we have been referred or that we have found sustains the proposition that evidence aliunde is admissible to explain such an ambiguity. All appear to be directly opposed to any such view. See in this connection Brown on Parol Evidence, pp. 116–120; 2 Elliott on Contracts, §§ 1655–1658; 1 Beach on Modern Law of Contracts, § 742. This was recognized in the opinion of Poorman v. Mills, supra, where it was said by this court:

> "The most that can be claimed for this memorandum, in figures, is that its presence on the face of the certificate serves to create a patent ambiguity; but this cannot be helped by averment, or evidence aliunde."

See, also, Hall v. Bartlett, 158 Cal. 641, 112 Pac. 176; Brandon v. Leddy, 67 Cal. 43, 7 Pac. 33.

In the case at bar the proposed evidence was at best but mere evidence of intention in no degree assisting in the construction of the language used.

[2, 3] The complaint in this action contained an allegation as follows:

> "That by inadvertence and mistake of plaintiff herein plaintiff wrote the figures $500.00 on the margin of said check; that said marginal figure was intended to be the sum of $5.00."

This was in addition to the other allegations which, in accord with the views we have expressed, stated a complete cause of action against the bank. This allegation was denied by the answer, wherein the bank also set up the facts it relied on to show that the check should have been for $500. Plaintiff tendered no proof in support of this allegation, and the court made no finding thereon. It is claimed that, in view of the presence of this allegation and the attempted issue made thereon, the proposed evidence was admissible. In view of what we have said, it is clear that the allegation was altogether immaterial in so far as plaintiff's right to recover was concerned. His cause of action was complete without this allegation, which was mere surplusage, and the denial did not make a material issue of fact. Code Civ. Proc. § 590. "The fact that the answer alleged facts which were irrelevant, immaterial, or incompetent as a defense, gave no right to establish them by proof." Braun v. Woollacott, 129 Cal. 113, 61 Pac. 801.

What we have said makes it apparent that section 1856, Code of Civil Procedure, cannot be held to have application here. The case is not one in which "a mistake or imperfection of the writing is put in issue by the pleadings."

We are satisfied that the trial court did not err in excluding the proffered evidence.

[4] Of course, defendant is not in a position to complain that the judgment against it is for $5 less than the amount to which, it may be assumed, plaintiff was entitled.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

LYNN v. KNOB HILL IMPROVEMENT CO.

(L. A. 4105.)

1. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑349 — Action for Breach — Recovery of Increase in Value—Complaint.

Under Civ. Code, § 3306, declaring that the measure of damages for breach of contract to convey realty is the price paid and the expense of examining title, adding, in case of bad faith, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed at the time of the breach, and expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter on the land, where a purchaser's complaint did not allege the value of the land at the time of the breach, but alleged only that it had increased in value to the amount of $200 since the breach, the time of which was not alleged, the allegations were not sufficient to entitle him to judgment for the $200 increase in value, there being no foundation laid by which to compute the measure of damages.

2. Judgment 🔑101(1)—Judgment by Default—Support by Pleadings.

To support a judgment by default, the allegations of the complaint must state the facts necessary to entitle plaintiff to recover the sums included in the judgment.

3. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑349 — Recovery of Expenses in Preparing to Enter —Complaint—Statute.

Under Civ. Code, § 3306, declaring the measure of damages for breach of contract to convey realty is the price paid, etc., plus expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter, to entitle purchaser to such expenses his complaint must allege that they were properly made.

4. Specific Performance 🔑114(1) — General Allegation of Performance of Conditions Precedent—Statute.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 457, as to the pleading of conditions precedent, the general allegation that plaintiff, purchaser of realty, seeking specific performance, had duly and fully performed all the conditions of the contract devolving upon him, was a sufficient allegation of the performance of conditions precedent, and relieved the complaint of the defect that the payments alleged to have been indorsed on the contract amounted to $17 less than the balance of principal and interest due on the price at the time of last payment.

5. Specific Performance 🔑114(2) — Complaint — Showing of Just and Reasonable Character of Contract—Statute.

Under Civ. Code, § 3391, providing when specific performance cannot be enforced, a complaint for specific performance of a contract to convey realty must show that the price was in fair proportion to the value of the land, or was an adequate consideration for the contract, which was just and reasonable.

6. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑341(2) — Breach by Vendor—Recovery of Price by Purchaser—Pleading.

It is sufficient if the purchaser of land, seeking, after the vendor's breach, to recover payments made by him, alleges an offer by him to perform by paying the balance of the purchase money in full, a demand for deed upon such payment, and the refusal by the vendor to accept the price and to execute deed.

7. Appeal and Error 🔑1039(4)—Harmless Error—Immaterial Defects in Pleading.

Where judgment against the vendor of land, in favor of the purchaser, included no other relief than the recovery of the purchase money paid and damages, it cannot be held erroneous, as to the purchase money, because the complaint failed to allege, in so far as it attempted to declare for specific performance, that the contract was just and reasonable and the consideration adequate.

8. Action 🔑45(4)—Inconsistent Causes of Action — Specific Performance and Recovery of Purchase Money.

A complaint, by the purchaser of realty against his vendor, which alleges two causes of action, one for specific performance, the other for repayment of the purchase money paid, is defective in that the causes of action are inconsistent.

9. Pleading 🔑193(6) — Separate Statement of Causes of Action—Statute.

By Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subdiv. 5, providing when defendant may demur, the purchaser's two causes of action in the same complaint for specific performance and for repayment of the purchase money, not separated into paragraphs, were subject to demurrer, as not separately stated.

10. Appeal and Error 🔑193(3) — Reservation of Grounds of Review — Judgment by Default—Demurrer to Complaint.

On appeal from judgment by default, where there was no demurrer or answer filed, defendant cannot object that the complaint was subject to demurrer, as stating two causes of action together in one paragraph and not separately.

11. Appeal and Error 🔑957(1)—Judgment 🔑139 — Relief from Default — Discretion of Trial Court—Review.

Whether defendant shall be relieved from its default is a matter of discretion in the trial court, and its action will be sustained on appeal, unless the discretion is abused.

12. Judgment 🔑138(2)—Default—Opening —Denial of Motion.

Where the secretary of defendant corporation was negligent in failing sooner to inform its attorney of service of summons, and the attorney was negligent in failing to advise himself as to just how much time the corporation had to appear and demur or answer, the trial court's decision denying defendant corporation's motion to be relieved from default was within its discretion.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by S. H. Lynn against the Knob Hill Improvement Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying defendant's motion to set aside default, defendant appeals. Order refusing to open default affirmed, and judgment reversed.

Eugene C. Campbell, of Long Beach, for appellant. S. G. Barker, of Long Beach, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The default of the defendant for failing to answer or demur to the complaint within the time prescribed by law was duly entered on May 19, 1914. On the following day the defendant served on the plaintiff a notice of motion to be relieved from said default, on the ground that it was taken through his mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect. This motion was denied on October 1, 1914. On October 29, 1914, at the instance of plaintiff, the court entered judgment against said defendant for $678 and costs. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and also from the order denying its motion to set aside the default.

In support of the appeal from the judgment, the defendant claims that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The complaint alleges that on November 15, 1910, the plaintiff and defendant made an agreement in writing, whereby the defendant agreed to sell and convey to the plaintiff certain real property for the sum of $400, of which $50 was then paid, and the balance was to be paid in monthly payments of $10 a month, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, as evidenced by a certain note, a copy of which was incorporated into the contract. The note purports to be signed by the plaintiff, is dated December 15, 1910, and is for the sum of $350, with 7 per cent. interest from date, payable quarterly, and providing that, if the interest was not so paid, the whole sum should immediately become due and payable. It was not declared to be payable upon any date, but merely "after date." The complaint further alleged that—

"the following additional payments have been indorsed upon the back of said contract:

December 15, 1910	$ 10 00
December 29, 1910	200 00
August 27, 1913	140 00
November, 1913	10 00"

There is the further allegation that the plaintiff "has always been ready and willing to perform" and "has duly and fully performed all the conditions of the said contract devolving upon him to be performed," and has demanded performance thereof by the defendant, but that the defendant refused to comply with the contract or to execute to plaintiff a deed for the property, and that the defendant "never intended to convey said property to plaintiff, but used said contract for the purpose to cheat and defraud the plaintiff out of the money heretofore paid, as above set out, and then sell and again convey or have said property conveyed to other parties than the plaintiff herein"; and that "said property has increased in value in the sum of two hundred dollars since the breach of said contract by defendants herein"; and that plaintiff has paid out eighteen dollars in taxes on the land, and "has incurred expenses in preparing to enter said land in the sum of fifty dollars."

The prayer was for judgment requiring the defendant to execute a deed to the plaintiff and—

"(2) that in case defendants do not so convey said property as aforesaid, that the plaintiff be awarded damages as follows, to wit:

$ 410.00	for money paid out on said contract and interest thereon,
18.00	for taxes paid on said real property,
200.00	increase in value of said real estate,
600.00	punitive damages, and
50.00	expenses.
$1,278.00	total."

The judgment was for $678, and it included all of the above sums, except the item of $600 for punitive damages.

[1] The allegations of the complaint were not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to judgment for the $200 alleged to have been the increase in the value of the real estate, or for the $50 for expenses in preparing to enter said land. Sections 3306 of the Civil Code declares that the measure of damages for breach of contract to convey real estate is the price paid, and the expenses of examining title, "but adding thereto, in case of bad faith, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, at the time of the breach, and the expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter upon the land."

The complaint does not allege the value of the land "at the time of the breach," but alleges only that it has increased in value to the amount of $200 "since the breach." The time of the breach is not alleged. There is no presumption that there was an increase in value before the breach. It must be alleged. There is therefore no foundation laid by which to compute the measure of damages on this ground, and the complaint fails to show such damage.

[2, 3] With respect to the expenses aforesaid, the provision of the Code is that recovery may be had for the "expenses properly" incurred in preparing to enter the land. There is no allegation that any expenses were properly incurred. The allegation is merely that $18 was expended in preparing to enter the land. Whether it was properly expended or not does not appear. Upon appeal from a judgment taken by default, the allegations of the complaint must state the facts necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover the sums included in the judgment. In order to entitle the plaintiff to the expenses, the complaint must allege that the expenses were properly made. It may be that this must be shown by setting forth the things for which the expenses were incurred, so that the propriety of the expenses will appear from the facts, but, whether this be so or not, a complaint is insufficient, on appeal, to justify such recovery, where it does not appear that such expenses were properly incurred.

[4] The defendant further claims that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for specific performance, and in particular that it does not allege that the plaintiff, before beginning the action, tendered payment in full of the purchase price. The payments alleged to have been indorsed on the contract amount to some $17 less than the balance of principal and interest due upon the price at the time of the last payment. There is no direct allegation that these sums, or any part thereof, have ever been paid on the contract. There is no specific allegation of a tender of the balance, assuming that the allegations as to payment would be sufficient in the absence of a demurrer, but the general allegation that the plaintiff "has duly and fully performed all the conditions of the said contract devolving upon him to be performed" is a sufficient allegation of the performance of the conditions precedent, and relieves the complaint of this particular defect. Code Civ. Proc. § 457.

[5] As a complaint for specific performance it is defective in another particular, which the appellant does not mention. There is no allegation as to the value of the land, or of any facts showing that the price is in fair proportion to the value, or that it was an adequate consideration for the contract, or that the contract is just and reasonable, as required by section 3391 of the Civil Code. This is necessary to constitute a good cause of action for specific performance. White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 614, 87 Pac. 193; Herzog v. Atchison, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 501, 95 Pac. 898, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428; Estate of Wickersham, 153 Cal. 607, 96 Pac. 311; Kaiser v. Barron, 153 Cal. 790, 96 Pac. 806. So far as the prayer for specific performance is concerned, the complaint is insufficient.

[6-10] But with respect to the prayer for recovery of the purchase money, a different rule prevails. In order to obtain that relief a resort to equity is not necessary. Such payments may be recovered by action for money had and received, if the facts justify such recovery. It is sufficient if the plaintiff alleges an offer by him to perform by paying the balance of the purchase money in full, a demand for a deed upon such payment, and a refusal by the vendor to accept the balance of the purchase price, and execute the deed required by the contract. Where this appears the plaintiff has laid a sufficient foundation for the recovery of the purchase money already paid upon the sale. As the judgment included no other relief except the recovery of purchase money and damages, it cannot be held erroneous as to the purchase money, because of the failure of the complaint to allege that the contract was just and reasonable and the consideration adequate. The complaint is defective, in that it alleges two causes of action—one for specific performance by a conveyance of property; the other for the payment of the purchase money. These causes of action are inconsistent with each other; the plaintiff could not prevail on both. Furthermore, they are not separated into paragraphs and would have been subject to demurrer on the ground that the two causes of action were not separately stated. Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 5. But these objections cannot be made on appeal from a judgment by default where there was no demurrer or answer filed. It is enough if there are allegations in the complaint which support the judgment given.

[11-12] We perceive no error in the ruling of the court denying the motion of the defendant to be relieved from its default. The giving of relief of this kind is a matter of discretion in the trial court, and unless the discretion is abused its action will be sustained on appeal. The appellant makes the common mistake of citing to us cases where orders granting such motion have been sustained on appeal, and endeavoring to apply those precedents to the present case, where the relief is denied. The matter being discretionary and reviewable only for abuse, it may well be that this court would sustain an order denying such relief in one case and deny it in another, where the facts presented to the lower court were precisely the same in both, because this court could not say there was an abuse of discretion in either event. The summons was served on the secretary of the defendant on May 8, 1914. The attorney for the defendant and the secretary both resided and had their offices in the city of Long Beach. From that time until May 18 the secretary several times endeavored to communicate with said attorney by telephone, but could not reach him in that way. On May 18 he again endeavored several times to speak to him by telephone, but again failed because of the absence of the attorney from that city, until 5:30 o'clock in the afternoon. The attorney then informed the secretary that service on May 8 entitled the defendant to the whole of May 19 within which to appear and demur or answer. Believing this to be the case himself, the attorney made no effort to appear in the case or serve or file a demurrer until the following day, when he was informed by the plaintiff's attorney that the default was already taken, it having been taken on the morning of May 19. It cannot be disputed that these facts show great neglect, both on the part of the secretary in failing sooner to inform the attorney, and on the part of the attorney in failing to advise himself, as he could readily have done from numerous decisions on the subject, that 10 days do not mean 11 days. Under these circumstances we cannot interfere with the discretion of the court below in denying the motion.

The order refusing to open the default is affirmed and the judgment is reversed.

LAUX et al. v. BEKINS VAN & STORAGE CO. (L. A. 4088.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 26, 1917.)

1. Warehousemen 🔑34(9) — Burning of Goods—Actions—Question for Jury.

Evidence that defendant warehouseman advertised and represented its storage facilities to be fireproof, that plaintiff relied thereon, that goods were burned, etc., held to sustain a denial of defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

2. Warehousemen 🔑34(4) — Burning of Goods — Actions — Admissibility of Evidence.

Defendant warehouseman's advertisements regarding its fireproof building held properly admitted in an action for the burning of goods, where the advertisement raised the inference that the warehouse belonged to defendant and no motion to strike was made after contrary evidence was introduced.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑1056(2)—Harmless Error—Excluding Evidence.

In an action against a warehouseman, erroneously excluding evidence regarding a conversation between plaintiff and defendant's employé was not prejudicial, where it would have proved no disputed issue.

4. Evidence 🔑354(18) — Book Entries — Persons Bound by.

In an action against a warehouseman for the burning of goods, excluding evidence of entries by defendant alleged to be inconsistent with a fireproof storage agreement was not erroneous, where plaintiff did not claim the agreement was made until after and without knowledge of, such entries.

5. Evidence 🔑111 — Customary Conduct of Business.

In an action against a warehouseman for burning of goods, testimony regarding defendant's customary answers to prospective customers held inadmissible when not connected with plaintiff.

6. Appeal and Error 🔑1056(4)—Harmless Error—Excluding Evidence.

In an action against a warehouseman for burning of goods, the excluding of defendant's evidence on negligence issue is harmless, where such issue was determined in its favor.

7. Appeal and Error 🔑692(1)—Record—Inclusion of Evidence Excluded.

In an action against a warehouseman for burning of goods, excluding the warehouse receipt cannot be declared error, where not contained in the record and there was no dispute over the fact that the storage was for hire.

8. Witnesses 🔑245—Examination—Repetition.

In an action against a warehouseman for burning of goods, the sustaining of an objection to a question whether defendant's employé had any conversation with plaintiff agreeing to furnish fireproof storage is proper, where the witness had previously testified that he had had no conversation whatever with plaintiff.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Richard Laux and Blanche G. Laux against the Bekins Van & Storage Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Richard T. Lightfoot, of Los Angeles, for appellant. T. R. Archer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The plaintiffs delivered to defendant for storage certain household goods, to be stored in defendant's warehouse. A fire occurred in the warehouse while the goods were stored there and the goods were destroyed thereby. This action is for the recovery from the defendant of the value of the goods.

The complaint is in three counts. On the third count, charging negligence of defendant in failing to keep a watchman in the warehouse at night, the court below decided for the defendant, and that point is therefore not involved. The first count alleges that the plaintiffs and defendant made an agreement, by which the defendant was to store the goods in a fireproof depository; that the goods were delivered to defendant for storage in pursuance of said agreement, and were stored by it in a warehouse not fireproof; and that while there stored they were totally destroyed by fire, by reason of the neglect of defendant to store them in a warehouse that was fireproof. The second count is the same as the first, excepting that, instead of alleging a positive agreement that defendant should store the goods in a fireproof depository, it is alleged that, in order to induce the plaintiffs to intrust the goods to the defendant for storage, the defendant represented to plaintiff that the warehouse of defendant, wherein the goods would be stored, if intrusted to it for storage, was fireproof; that plaintiffs, relying on said representations, and induced solely thereby, delivered the goods to defendant for storage. The court found in favor of plaintiffs on both of these counts.

[1] The motion for a nonsuit was properly denied. There was evidence to the effect that the defendant was in the business of storing household goods for hire; that it had extensively and conspicuously advertised that it furnished "fireproof storage"; that the plaintiff Blanche G. Laux, who acted for the plaintiffs in the matter, had seen these advertisements and was induced thereby to apply to the defendant for storage of the goods; that for that purpose she went to the main office of the defendant and said to the man at the desk therein that she wanted to store these goods and to be sure that they were absolutely safe; that they would be ready in a few days, and asked him the question, "Is your warehouse absolutely fireproof?" to which he answered, "Oh, certainly"; that she thereupon gave him the address where the goods could be had; that he directed her to telephone to the office when they were ready, and defendant would then send a wagon, get the goods, and store them for her as requested; that in a few days she telephoned accordingly, and defendant got the goods, stored them in one of its warehouses that was not fireproof; and that thereafter the goods were destroyed by a fire which occurred in said warehouse. There was proof of the value of the goods. This evidence was sufficient proof of the agreement to store the goods in a fireproof warehouse, and also of the representations alleged, the reliance of the plaintiffs thereon, and of the placing of the goods in storage upon that reliance. It was not necessary that such an agreement should have been proven to have been made by express words or declarations. Actions and words from which it could reasonably be implied will suffice.

[2] The court ruled correctly in admitting in evidence the advertisements above referred to. They had been seen by Mrs. Laux before she applied for the storage, she relied on them, they were issued by the defendant, and the inference is clear that they were made in order to attract custom, and with the intent by the defendant that such customers should see and believe the statements therein, and, relying thereon, apply for the storage of goods, upon the understanding that they would be stored in a place that was fireproof. They had therefore a direct tendency to prove the contract, as well as the representations alleged. On one of them, a six-page folder, there was a city map on one side, and on the other several advertisements of Bekins Van & Storage Company, and on one page a picture of a large building showing the words "Bekins Fireproof Storage," in huge letters painted on it, and vans backed up on the street in front of it bearing the words "Bekins Van & Storage Company," and immediately below it the words "Bekins Fireproof Storage, 1335 So. Figueroa St." After the plaintiffs had rested their case, evidence was given on behalf of the defendants tending to show that the warehouse on Figueroa street did not belong to the defendant company, but was the property of another company known as "Bekins Fireproof Storage Company." The defendant now makes the objection that the folder, so far as it shows this building, was incompetent and inadmissible to show representations by the defendant to the effect that it owned this warehouse. The objection made to the introduction of the folder in evidence at the time it was admitted did not include any statement that this warehouse did not belong to the defendant. The point was not mentioned. Upon its face the matter in the folder would raise the inference that the warehouse pictured was the property of the defendant. Nothing appearing to the contrary, the court ruled properly in admitting the folder without any limitation regarding this particular part of it. No motion was made, upon the proof of the defendant coming in, to strike it out or to limit its effect. Furthermore, it clearly appears that it was an advertisement of the defendant and that its contents would lead any one to believe that the defendant did own the said warehouse. This being the case, the defendant is responsible for the belief thus produced by its own advertisement, whether the statements therein are true or not, and the same would be evidence against it.

[3] The testimony for the plaintiff showed that Mrs. Laux telephoned to the office of the defendant and informed the shipping clerk that the goods were ready, and asked that they be taken away on the following Thursday. The defendant called the shipping clerk as its witness, and asked her to testify to the conversation over the telephone with Mrs. Laux. She said that she was able to refresh her memory from the memorandum of the transaction made in the books of the company at the time by another employé. The court apparently understood her to say that she had no recollection of the transaction and knew only what the books disclosed, and thereupon it excluded her testimony as to the conversation. This ruling was erroneous, but we do not think it was prejudicial. It was not claimed by the plaintiff that any conversation with her over the telephone related to an agreement to store the goods in a fireproof warehouse, but merely that information was given of the time when the goods would be ready. It was not claimed by the defendant that the shipping clerk would testify that anything was said in her conversation with Mrs. Laux about the character of storage, whether in a fireproof place or not. There was no dispute over the fact that the information was given that the goods were ready, and that in consequence of that information the defendant sent out its van, got the goods, and took them to its warehouse. It is obvious that the mere repetition by the defendant's witness of the notification which led the company to get the goods would add nothing to the defense. As there was no proposal to prove anything by that witness contrary to the statements of the plaintiff, the exclusion of her testimony was harmless.

[4-6] The court excluded evidence of the entries made in the books of the company at the time of the telephone conversation aforesaid. It was proposed to show thereby that the words "pack and store" were inserted in the memorandum on the books, and that if the order had been for fireproof storage a different entry would have been made. There was no error in this ruling. It is not contended that any conversation took place between the plaintiffs and the shipping clerk at the time of the telephone order, regarding the character of the storage, or that any entry was made in its books except at that time, nor did the defendant propose to show that the plaintiffs, or either of them, had any knowledge whatever of the entries made in the defendant's books. This being so, evidence of such entries would be inadmissible against the plaintiffs. In another ruling the court excluded testimony concerning the answers that the defendant's employés customarily gave to persons who made inquiries concerning the storage, packing, or shipping of goods. We cannot perceive that this evidence was admissible for any purpose unless brought home to the plaintiffs. The defendant did not offer to connect it with the plaintiffs in any manner. Inasmuch as the court found in favor of the defendant on the charge of negligence, the exclusion of evidence relating to that issue, even if erroneous, would not injure the defendant in any respect.

[7, 8] The defendant offered in evidence the warehouse receipt issued by the defendant after the goods had been received for storage. The court excluded the evidence. The receipt is not set forth in the record, and we have no means of knowing its contents, or determining whether it would have been material to any issue or not. It is not claimed in the argument that it contained anything to the effect that the goods were not to be stored in a fireproof warehouse, or anything whatever on the subject of the character of the storage. Hence we cannot say that the ruling was erroneous. There was no issue or dispute over the proposition that the storage was for hire and that the defendant was to be paid reasonable charges therefor. If the receipt was intended to prove that fact it was unnecessary. The defendant's order clerk was asked the question whether he ever had any conversation in which he agreed to store any property of the plaintiffs in fireproof storage, or accepted an order from plaintiffs to store their goods in a fireproof warehouse. The objection to the question was sustained. It would have been proper, of course, to have allowed the employés of the defendant in charge of its office at the time the contract was made, to testify in contradiction of the evidence of Mrs. Laux on the subject. This witness, however, immediately prior to the asking of the question aforesaid, testified, in answer to other questions on the subject, that he never had any conversation with the plaintiff. It was useless, after this statement, to ask him to state that he had not had a particular conversation with the plaintiff. The general statement covered the whole subject. These comprise all the points urged in the briefs as cause for reversal.

As we find no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment and order are affirmed.

HENSHALL v. COBURN et al. (S. F. 7555.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 24, 1917.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT 🔑166(2) — EVIDENCE OF EMPLOYMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

In a suit by plaintiff attorney for the value of professional services, evidence held to show an employment of plaintiff by defendants.

2. EVIDENCE 🔑220(5) — ADMISSIONS — ACQUIESCENCE IN ORAL STATEMENTS.

In a suit for services rendered by an attorney in proceedings to restore defendant to capacity, evidence of declarations of defendant, while being cross-examined in such proceeding, to the effect that a Mr. T. was his only lawyer, was inadmissible, though made in presence of plaintiff and not disputed by him at the time; the obvious purpose of the cross-examination being to show that defendant's memory was so weak that he did not recognize his own counsel.

3. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT 🔑166(2)—TERMS OF EMPLOYMENT—ADMISSION BY AGENT.

Where a witness had testified that he had been authorized to employ plaintiff as attorney for defendants, it was proper for the purpose of bringing out the terms of the employment to ask plaintiff what such witness said to him on the occasion of the employment.

4. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT 🔑194(3)—RATIFICATION—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that, if an alleged agent, assuming authority as defendants' agent, employed plaintiff, attorney, and defendants accepted and retained the benefits of plaintiff's services, the jury could find for plaintiff on the principle of ratification, clearly stated the general rule, and, when read together with other instructions, to the effect that mere acceptance of services would not amount to ratification of an unauthorized employment, fairly set forth the principles applicable to the case.

5. WITNESSES 🔑201(1) — PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION—ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.

In suit by an attorney for professional services, the attorney who employed plaintiff for defendants could testify as to declarations made by defendants concerning employment of plaintiff.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Richard P. Henshall against Loren Coburn and another. From the original judgment for plaintiff and from a modified judgment and motion denying new trial, defendants appeal. Appeal from original judgment dismissed, and modified judgment and order denying new trial affirmed.

See, also, 165 Cal. 202, 131 Pac. 352.

Sullivan & Sullivan, Theo. J. Roche, and Cullinan & Hickey, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Richard P. Henshall and Bert Schlesinger, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendants, Loren Coburn and Sarah Satira Coburn, his wife, appeal from a judgment against them, from a modified judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff, an attorney and counselor at law, sued for $19,450 alleged to be due for the value of professional services performed by him for defendants jointly. After issue joined the case was tried before a jury, and a verdict for $10,450 was returned. Defendants moved for a new trial, and the court made a conditional order that, if within 20 days plaintiff should consent to remit all over $5,000, the motion would be denied. Within the indicated period plaintiff filed his consent to the suggested modification of the judgment, after which the court made and entered a modified judgment in plaintiff's favor for $5,000 and costs.

The services of Mr. Henshall were performed in an effort to secure a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States in the proceeding by which Mr. Coburn had been declared an incompetent person (In the Matter of Coburn, 165 Cal. 202, 131 Pac. 352), and he also appeared in the trials of two proceedings for the restoration of Loren Coburn to capacity, in the second of which the petitioner was successful. There is no contention that the award for the value of services is exorbitant, but appellants insist that the evidence fails to show an employment of plaintiff by them. Their contention is that the evidence, properly considered, proves that Mr. Archibald J. Treat, senior counsel for Mr. Coburn, employed Mr. Henshall to assist him, with the understanding that plaintiff was to be compensated, not by the Coburns, or either of them, but by Mr. Treat himself. Appellants insist that there is no real conflict of testimony, and that there is an entire absence of evidence to support any verdict against them, or either of them.

[1] Without reviewing the testimony at length, it is sufficient to say that the record furnishes abundant support for the verdict. Mr. Treat testified that both Mr. and Mrs. Coburn authorized him to employ Mr. Henshall. The plaintiff testified that he was employed by both defendants, and his statement was corroborated by those of Mr. Treat and Mr. J. Early Craig. Mrs. Coburn stated under oath that she had, she thought, first heard of Mr. Henshall in connection with her husband's business after his return from Washington, where he had gone to ask for a writ to the Supreme Court of the United States, but a letter written by her to Mr. Treat before Mr. Henshall's departure contained this sentence:

> "You are to have Mr. Henshall as you told us, and we thought he would be away by this time, as it was arranged to that effect."

The letter admittedly was signed by Mrs. Coburn, and was entirely in her own handwriting. Plaintiff also introduced in evidence a notice signed by Mrs. Coburn and directed to Mr. Hynes, who was at the time guardian of Mr. Coburn's person and estate. In it she referred to Messrs. A. J. Treat, Gavin McNab, and R. P. Henshall "as her attorneys," and the notice specified that they were thereby "authorized and empowered to appear for her in all matters and things referred to in said notice." At the hearings of the proceedings for restoration Mr. Henshall was in constant attendance and was in frequent consultation with Mr. and Mrs. Coburn. It is suggested that Mrs. Coburn had no personal interest in the litigation, and therefore could not be charged with responsibility for the payment of Mr. Henshall's fee, but as a matter of fact she was a party to the petition for restoration. However, that is immaterial. Whether her interest was monetary or merely sentimental, she had an undoubted right to join with her husband in a contract for the employment of counsel. The same witnesses who described Mrs. Coburn's participation in the employment of Mr. Henshall also positively stated that Mr. Coburn had joined in the contract of employment and had accepted the services of the plaintiff.

[2] The court properly refused to admit in evidence a transcript of part of the proceedings in the trial of the application for restoration wherein it was shown that Mr. Coburn when on the witness stand stated that Mr. Treat was the only lawyer who had been employed by him. The theory upon which this testimony was offered was that the declaration of Mr. Coburn made in the presence of Mr. Henshall called for a denial from the latter of his alleged client's statement. But

Mr. Henshall was under no obligation to assert his right to compensation as one of Mr. Coburn's counsel when the testimony of the latter was given in the other proceeding. The obvious purpose of the examination of Mr. Coburn was to test the memory of the witness, and the cross-examiner was trying to show that Mr. Coburn's memory was so weak that he was unable to recognize his own counsel. The matter then at bar did not involve the exact status of Mr. Henshall nor his right to compensation. There was nothing which called for a denial on his part. In order that one may be affected by conversations or declarations held in his presence, they must be made to him in such manner as requires him to deny or by his acquiescence to admit them. Wilkins v. Stidger, 22 Cal. 231, 83 Am. Dec. 64; Porter v. Elizalde, 125 Cal. 204, 57 Pac. 899.

[3] Mr. Henshall was asked, while on the witness stand, what Mr. Treat said to him on an occasion when in company with Mr. Craig Mr. Treat visited him. Counsel for defendants objected on the ground that agency could not be shown by Mr. Treat's declarations. The objection was properly overruled. The evident purpose of the question was to bring out the terms of the contract of employment. Mr. Treat had positively testified that he had been authorized to employ Mr. Henshall. Therefore there was direct testimony of Mr. Treat's authority to hire respondent.

[4] One of the instructions was to the effect that if, assuming an authority as agent for the defendants, which in fact he did not have, Mr. Treat employed plaintiff, and defendants accepted and retained the benefits of plaintiff's professional services, then the duty of the jury would be to find in favor of plaintiff on the principle of ratification. This instruction is attacked as being opposed to the principles announced in Porter v. Elizalde, 125 Cal. 204, 57 Pac. 899, but in reality it is not in conflict with that authority. The rule of the Elizalde Case may be summarized in one sentence of the opinion, which is as follows:

> "The mere silence of the party will not be held to constitute such assent or acquiescence in the acts of the agent as to amount to a ratification or adoption of these acts, without also considering the circumstances under which the silence existed."

By the instruction here attacked the court did not tell the jury that mere silence on the part of the Coburns would amount to ratification of any unauthorized contract made by Mr. Treat. But the jurors were told that, if the services were rendered and the defendants "accepted and retained the benefit of said services," they thereby ratified the employment. Undoubtedly that is the general rule. Instructions must be read together, and the jurors were told in other instructions that mere acceptance of services would not amount to ratification of an unauthorized contract of employment. Taken together, the instructions fairly set forth the principles applicable to the case presented.

[5] Appellants make the further objection that Mr. Treat was bound by his obligation as an attorney not to testify to declarations made by the Coburns concerning the employment of Mr. Henshall. There is no merit in this point.

> "The rule as to privileged communications does not exclude evidence as to the instructions or authority given by the client to his attorney to be acted upon by the latter." 40 Cyc. 2374.

This is the rule in California. Ruiz v. Dow, 113 Cal. 490, 45 Pac. 867; Hager v. Shindler, 29 Cal. 47–63. In discussing the reason for the rule the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in Koeber v. Somers, 108 Wis. 497, 84 N. W. 991, 52 L. R. A. 513, said:

> "The proposition advanced by respondent and adopted by the trial court, that one, after fully authorizing his attorney, as his agent, to enter into a contract with a third party, and after such authority has been executed and relied on, may effectively nullify his own and his duly authorized agent's act by closing the attorney's mouth as to the giving of such authority, is most startling. A perilous facility of fraud and wrong, both upon the attorney and the third party, would result. The attorney who, on his client's authority, contracts in his behalf, pledges his reputation and integrity that he binds his client. The third party may well rely on the assurance of a reputable lawyer that he has authority in fact, though such assurance be given only by implication from the doing of the act itself. It is with gratification, therefore, that we find overwhelming weight of authority against the position assumed by the court below, both in states where the privilege protecting communications with attorneys is still regulated by the common law and in those where it is controlled by statute."

Finally it is contended that there was a variance between the contract as pleaded and that which respondent endeavored to prove. Appellants insist that, instead of one joint contract, the evidence, if it tends to support any meeting of minds, establishes separate contracts with the two defendants made at different times. The evidence, however, fairly supports the pleading of respondent. He declared on a contract between him and both defendants made within two years whereby he was retained as their legal adviser, and he asked for the reasonable value of the services rendered pursuant to that agreement. The evidence tended to show that the contract of employment was made April 23, 1913, at a conference held at Mr. Craig's office, and that both Loren Coburn and his wife participated in the transaction.

The modified judgment for $5,000 and costs and the order denying a new trial are affirmed. As the original judgment, or rather verdict, for $10,450 and costs, was merged in the judgment as finally given, the attempted appeal from it is dismissed.

I concur: HENSHAW, J.

SHAW, J. I concur. I wish to add, however, that nothing in the opinion is to be taken as an intimation that one who is present in the courtroom when another person is testifying as a witness must deny statements made by such witness in his testimony, at the peril of having his silence taken as an admission that such statements of the witness are true, or that such statements can ever be given in evidence against the person so standing silent.

WOLF et al. v. GALL et al. (two cases). (S. F. 7592.)

1. Quieting Title 🔑43—Issues.
In an action to quiet title, plaintiffs must show in the action itself, the invalidity of a deed presented by defendants, and cannot sue in another action to set aside the deed.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑1071(6)—Harmless Error—Immaterial Findings.
In an action to quiet title, where the court found that defendants had the record title, plaintiff cannot complain that the court did not make a finding as to a defense of prescription set up by defendants.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑1011(1)—Conflicting Evidence—Findings by the Court.
Where there is clear and substantial evidence to support a finding by the court, the Supreme Court cannot interfere because the evidence is conflicting.

4. Deeds 🔑211(4)—Undue Influence—Sufficiency of Evidence.
In an action to quiet title, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that a deed was executed and delivered without fraud or undue influence by plaintiffs' ancestor to defendants.

5. Evidence 🔑511 — Writing Experts — Marks.
It was not error to refuse to allow a writing expert to testify as to whether a mark was made by a certain person who could not write.

6. Evidence 🔑511 — "Handwriting" — Typewriting—Statutes.
Typewriting is not "handwriting" within Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 9, allowing experts' opinions as to who executed a writing.
[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Handwriting.]

7. Deeds 🔑203—Fraud—Drawing up Deed —Admissibility of Evidence.
Where fraud was claimed in the execution of a deed, it was not error to exclude evidence to show that one of the defendants, a son of the grantor, had typewritten the deed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Arturo Wolf and Maria Julia Wolf against Charles Funkenstein Gall, Rebecca Funkenstein Gall, Edward Funkenstein, and Sarah Funkenstein. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a motion for a new trial, the plaintiffs respectively appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 170 Cal. 594, 150 Pac. 987, 162 Pac. 115; 32 Cal. App. 286, 163 Pac. 346, 350.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiffs brought their action to quiet title to one undivided tenth each in certain real property in the city and county of San Francisco. Their asserted title rested upon their claim of heirship as children of a deceased child of Tobe Funkenstein, their paternal grandmother, their father being Newman Wolf, a son of the said Tobe, who predeceased her. The defendants are the four surviving children of Tobe Funkenstein, issue of her second marriage. They answered to the same effect. They asserted prior ownership in the property in their mother, and alleged that on December 21, 1907, she made and executed to them her deed of grant, conveying the property in question to them, her four children, as tenants in common. They denied the asserted ownership of the plaintiffs in and to any part of the realty, and finally pleaded prescriptive title. Trial was had, resulting in findings and judgment in favor of the defendants. Plaintiff Arturo Wolf appeals from the judgment (S. F. No. 7592). Plaintiff Maria Julia Wolf appeals from the order denying her motion for a new trial (S. F. No. 7617). In its findings the court declared that prior to, at the time of, and subsequent to the making of the deed to her four children, respondents herein, Tobe Funkenstein, though aged in years, possessed all her mental faculties, and was at all times mentally competent, and that at the time of and in the making of the deed she "was of sound mind and memory, and not acting under mistake, duress, fraud, menace, or undue influence of any kind." The principal grievance urged upon our attention on the appeal from the judgment is over the findings above quoted, and this means simply that these appellants are unwilling to be foreclosed by the judgment in this action which they brought from further litigating issues of fraud presented by them and determined against them in the action. Nor yet are they willing that the judgment restraining and enjoining them from further litigation against these defendants over the titles to these properties should be allowed to stand.

[1] Yet what are the facts? The defendants set forth their title by deed from their mother. The law gave the plaintiffs a replication without pleading to this asserted title. They were before the court. To prevail, they must establish the infirmity and insufficiency of this written instrument. It was not only their right, but it was their duty, so to do. In evidence and in argument they attack the deed in every conceivable way—nonexecution, nondelivery, fraud in its procurement, forgery by implication, undue influence. Under what circumstances was this evidence addressed to and admitted by the trial court? It is shown by the record as follows:

> "Mr. Lezinsky: In order to get this record straight, your honor, I think if your honor please, we are entitled to introduce now in evidence in this cause any evidence which will show that this deed was not signed, any evidence which will show that this deed was procured by fraud, any evidence which will show that this deed was procured by menace, undue influence or misrepresentation.
> "The Court: Unquestionably so—granted.
> "Mr. Lezinsky: Also any evidence which would show what the intention was, or if there was any intention whatever on the part of Tobe Funkenstein to make any deed to these defendants at any time whatever.
> "The Court: Granted."

There is scarcely a page of the voluminous brief presented to this court on the appeal from the order refusing to grant a new trial that does not contain either some direct argument as to the fraud of these defendants and their witnesses in procuring the deed, or some innuendo to the same effect.

In another branch of this litigation where, notwithstanding the injunctive order against so doing, Arturo Wolf attempted by a new action to litigate the questions of fraud, and was cited, therefore, in contempt of the injunction in this case, this court said in relation thereto:

> "Furthermore, the injunction here granted was not in fact incidental to the main relief sought. It was a substantial and inherent part of the relief. The plaintiffs and defendants were seeking to have title quieted against each other." Wolf v. Gall, 162 Pac. 115.

At that hearing the same contention was made as is here advanced, that the findings of the court were without the issues, and the decision is determinative against the contention. It is abundantly settled that under issues framed as here the plaintiffs could, as their attorney represented to the court, overcome the effect of the deed, and so destroy its validity upon either equitable or legal ground. Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 436, 51 Pac. 630; Johnson v. Taylor, 150 Cal. 201, 88 Pac. 903, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, 119 Am. St. Rep. 181; Hermosa Beach, etc., Co. v. Law Credit Co., 166 Pac. 22. Here, as in those cases, these defendants sought a decree determining that the plaintiffs had no right or claim in or to the property or any part thereof, establishing full and complete title in themselves, and enjoining the plaintiffs from ever asserting any further claim thereto.

[2] It is finally urged that the court fell into error in failing to find upon the question of title by prescription tendered by defendants' answer. Manifestly that failure in no wise injures this appellant if the finding of record title in the defendants and the decree establishing the same are good. Smith v. Smith, 173 Cal. 725, 161 Pac. 495. To this consideration we pass in the appeal No. 7592.

Tobe Funkenstein, a widow, and the mother of plaintiffs' father, married Julius Funkenstein, and the four defendants are the issues of that marriage. The Funkensteins lived in San Francisco, where the father and his eldest son, Edward, engaged in the real estate business under the firm name of J. Funkenstein & Son. Tobe Funkenstein brought no property to the matrimonial community. The firm of Funkenstein & Son prospered. The father bought real property, and when he died this property had been conveyed to his widow. The four children were adults and were all living under the parental roof. They continued so to live after the death of their father. Mrs. Funkenstein was uneducated and unversed in business. Her activities were in the home. During her husband's life he and his son Edward had managed all of the business affairs. After her husband's death her son Edward continued to do so and to conduct business under the original firm name. The bank account in the name of J. Funkenstein & Son was the only bank account which was ever maintained in the lifetime of the father, and was the only one maintained after the father's death. The son attended to all of the business affairs—renting, leasing, insurance, mortgages, etc. About two months after the father's death the mother executed the deed in controversy to the four children, resident under her roof. The circumstances of its execution are in brief as follows: William H. Sharp and his son, William B. Sharp, attorneys at law, had been the attorneys of the father in his lifetime. William H. Sharp had died. William B. Sharp continued in the practice of the law. Mrs. Funkenstein knew him and his father before him. She sent for him and told him what disposition she desired to make of her property; that she desired to give it to her four children, respondents herein. Under her instructions he prepared the deed. She had known him from childhood and called him "Willie"; trusted him as the family had trusted his father before him. He prepared the deed expressly as she directed. The nature of this deed of gift was fully explained to her by Mr. Sharp, that to make it effective she must part with title by delivery of the deed, and that in so parting with title she would lose ownership, management, and control of the property, and would have nothing further to say in regard thereto, and Mrs. Funkenstein replied that her husband was dead, she knew nothing about business matters, and did not care to have any bother with the management and control of the property. Mrs. Funkenstein could not write. She made her mark, a court commissioner, Judge Joachimsen, also a personal friend, taking her acknowledgment and writing her name, to which she affixed her mark. Judge Joachimsen bears testimony to Mrs. Funkenstein's full understanding of her act. The deed thus signed and acknowledged was handed to her, and she in turn gave it to her son Edward, saying to him, "Now, Ed, the property is yours." Newman Wolf, her son by the former marriage, had proved at least improvident, if not dissolute. In reference to that son Mrs. Funkenstein said to Mr. Sharp that she proposed to continue to supply her son Newman's wants, but, if she should die before he did, to impress upon her son Edward that he should carry out the same arrangements for Newman's support. The son Edward took and kept possession of the deed and continued in the management and control of the properties. The family lived as before. Mrs. Funkenstein's monetary needs were not large. They embraced her charitable donations, her gifts to her son Newman, and a small amount for pin money, all of which she received. While the deed was not placed of record, no concealment of its existence was made, and in some instances the children joined in the mortgage or mortgage notes given on the property.

It would unduly and uselessly prolong this discussion, it would extend this opinion into the lengths of the briefs, to discuss as appellant seeks to have us do, the asserted conflicts in the evidence, to analyze the inferences of unfair dealings, fraud, and forgery which we are asked to draw.

[3, 4] Our province as a court of review is ended when it is shown that there is clear and substantial evidence to support a finding which the trial judge has made, and such evidence, as has been indicated in the foregoing outline, is abundantly present in this case. Giving the utmost weight to all that can be justly claimed touching the acts, disclosures, or nondisclosures of these defendants, and in especial to the argument that the course of conduct of these defendants in relation to the property was at variance with their contention that they were the owners thereof, all this, at most, raises but a conflict in the evidence, and is not sufficient to overcome the finding of due execution, transfer, and delivery of the deed by which Mrs. Funkenstein conveyed to her children all of her title in her property. Follmer v. Rohrer, 158 Cal. 757, 112 Pac. 544; Smith v. Smith, 173 Cal. 730, 161 Pac. 495; Gernon v. Sisson, 21 Cal. App. 123, 131 Pac. 85. The record is replete with exceptions to the rulings of the court upon evidentiary matters. It would be a fruitless labor to review them all. But few of these matters call for specific attention.

[5] A writing expert was being interrogated in the apparent effort to bring forth from his examination of the cross made by Mrs. Funkenstein in attestation of the genuiness of her signature that the mark was made by somebody else, or that somebody else directed the pen. We do not perceive, nor are we told, how an expert in handwriting could bear evidence upon the matter, and can quite understand the court's remark in ruling upon it:

> "Whether or no somebody else held the pen, I draw the line there; I can't stand for it."

[6, 7] An effort was directed to show by expert testimony that one of the defendants, Charles F. Gall, had prepared the deed, which was typewritten, and it was sought to show by a purported expert on typewriting, not that the deed had been typed on a particular kind of machine, but that it had been typed upon a particular kind of machine by the defendant Charles F. Gall. Of course, typewriting is not handwriting. Estate of Dreyfus, 165 Pac. 941. Expert testimony is allowed under our Code concerning the handwriting of a person. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 9. But in addition to this it was immaterial whether or not Charles F. Gall did type the deed, and, assuming for the moment that there are characteristics in typewriting which would enable an expert to say who had or had not done a given piece of work, the inquiry was unimportant to the case. A great number of these objections are based upon the court's asserted refusal to admit evidence declared to be admissible in Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 Pac. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703. The complaint is not well founded. The trial court opened the door wide to all legitimate evidence bearing upon the declarations and conduct of Mrs. Funkenstein in reference to the properties before and after the making of the deed, and also to the acts, conduct, and declarations of the respondents in relation thereto.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

3650, requiring the address if known to be entered on the assessment roll, evidence establishing a residence of the last-assessed owner, apart from any knowledge officially chargeable upon the tax collector, will not be permitted to establish illegal failure to mail the notice.

5. Taxation 🔑659—Notice of Tax Sale—Mailing.

Under such statute, the tax collector is not required to resort to any other source of information to learn the address of the last-assessed owner than that given by the assessment book.

6. Taxation 🔑734(9) — Notice of Tax Sale—Mailing.

Pol. Code, § 3897, requires published or posted notice of tax sale, and mailing by the tax collector of a copy of the notice, by registered mail, to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale, at his last known post office address. Section 3650 requires the address, if known, to be entered on the assessment roll. Section 3651 requires the keeping of an index, showing the name of the taxpayer, but does not require the index to show the address. On an assessment roll there appeared, with reference to certain property, a name with an address "687 Burlington avenue." Under the index appeared in reference to the same property the same name with same address "687 Burlington street, L. A." The tax collector sent no notice to the person named in the assessment roll and index. It appeared that the Los Angeles post office would not have received for registration a letter with the address "687 Burlington avenue," no city or town of destination being thereon given. Held that, since the tax collector could not have registered and mailed the notice, his failure to do so for lack of official knowledge of the residence was justifiable in point of law and did not invalidate the tax deed of the property.

7. Taxation 🔑773 — Conclusiveness of Recitals in Tax Deed.

Where recitals in tax deed to the state are sufficient, they are conclusive.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by George W. Crouch and another against Sevelin E. Shafer and others. From order denying new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed as to named defendant, and reversed as to certain other defendants.

Walter J. Horgan and Sam B. Dannis, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. Crouch & Crouch, of Los Angeles, for respondents. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., amicus curiæ.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant Shafer held the record title to the real property, ownership of which is here in controversy. Plaintiffs' title rests upon a sheriff's deed made after foreclosure of the lien of a street assessment upon this property, in which action the predecessor in interest of defendant Shafer was impleaded and served as a party defendant, suffered default and an adverse judgment. Defendants Campbell and Smith deraign title through a tax deed from the state antedating the lien of the street assessment.

[1] Appellant Shafer's contentions may be disposed of with brevity. His attack upon plaintiff's title, in which he is joined by his fellow defendants, amounts to but a collateral attack upon a judgment rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the person of the defendant and the subject-matter of the action. The judgment is neither void nor invalid upon its face, and such a collateral attack will not be listened to. Wood v. Jordan, 125 Cal. 261, 57 Pac. 997; Brush v. Smith, 141 Cal. 466, 75 Pac. 55; Emery v. Kipp, 154 Cal. 83, 97 Pac. 17, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, 129 Am. St. Rep. 141, 16 Ann. Cas. 792; Crouch v. Miller, 169 Cal. 341, 146 Pac. 880.

[2] As between plaintiffs and defendants Campbell and Smith, the controversy is over the validity of the tax deed through which the latter deraign title. The court found with the contentions of the plaintiffs that it was invalid. The principal irregularities amounting to illegalities urged against the validity of the tax deed are two. Section 3897 of the Political Code at the time of the proceedings required the tax collector about to sell the property to "give notice of such sale by first publishing a notice for at least three successive weeks in some newspaper published in the county, or city and county, or if there be no newspaper published therein, then by posting a notice in three conspicuous places in the county, * * * one of which shall be at the United States post office nearest the land, in addition to a notice conspicuously posted on the land itself for the same period." Still further, that "it shall be the duty of the tax collector to mail * * * a copy of said notice, postage thereon prepaid and registered, to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale, at his last known post office address." Pol. Code, § 3897. The notice in this instance was by publication, but in addition to publication the tax collector did not post a notice conspicuously on the land. Smith v. Furlong, 160 Cal. 522, 117 Pac. 527, upon which reliance is placed to support the holding that the posting of such notice upon the land is required, even when publication is had, has been misunderstood in this respect. The language quoted and relied upon from page 524 of 160 Cal., 117 Pac. 527, of the decision in Smith v. Furlong, was not addressed to an analysis of the section touching the requirements of the posting of notices. It was a mere skeletonized summarization of the section, designed only to illustrate the proposition which this court then had under consideration, which was the requirement as to the mailing of the notice, and this is clearly established by the context. However inartificial it may be thought that the language of section 3897 is, nevertheless it clearly appears that the notice which is to be kept conspicuously posted upon the land is required only when the method of notice by posting is adopted.

[3-6] Section 3650 of the Political Code requires that the address, if known, shall be entered on the assessment roll. In this case it is shown that on the assessment roll appeared the name of "Mary B. Scott, 687 Burlington Avenue." Under the index required to be kept by law (section 3651) appeared in reference to the same property "Mary B. Scott, 687 Burlington Street, L. A." The law does not require the index to show the address. Mary B. Scott was the person to whom the land was last assessed and to whom notice should have been sent, if her address was known to the tax collector. He sent no notice, and the question is whether the information before him was such as to call for the mailing of the notice as matter of law. This consideration is not at all affected by the decision of this court in Campbell v. Shafer, 162 Cal. 206, 121 Pac. 737, though in that case the same tax title to the same land was involved. These plaintiffs were not parties to that action, nor, as manifestly appears from the opinion, were the facts there before this court the same as the admitted facts here presented. In the former case all that was shown as to the residence of the defendant was from evidence resting in parol that Mary B. Scott had in fact resided in Los Angeles for a number of years, and of course evidence establishing a residence apart from any knowledge officially chargeable upon the tax collector will not be permitted to establish an illegal failure to mail the notice. Krotzer v. Douglas, 163 Cal. 49, 124 Pac. 722. Nor yet was it the legal duty of the tax collector to resort to any other source of information to learn this address than that given by the assessment book. Kehlet v. Bergman, 162 Cal. 217, 121 Pac. 918; Krotzer v. Douglas, supra. Our law touching the mailing of these notices is peculiar, in that it requires that the notice mailed shall be registered. It might well be held, without this requirement of registration, that the information contained upon the assessment book "Mary B. Scott, 687 Burlington Avenue" made it the duty of the tax collector to send out his notice by mail to that address, whether complete or incomplete, whether or not the mailed notice would reach its destination. But a different element is imported into the case by the requirement of registration, and it is in evidence from the deputy postmaster of Los Angeles that his office would not have received for registration a letter with the address as above indicated, no city or town of destination being thereon given. The unescapable conclusion is that the tax collector could not have registered and mailed the notice, and his failure to do so for lack of official knowledge of residence was therefore a justifiable failure in point of law.

[7] The further objections of respondents to the deed of the tax collector to the state are without force. The recitals in that deed are made conclusive. Krotzer v. Douglas, supra. Those recitals are sufficient, and respondents' attempts to show certain technical informalities in the recitals are without avail. It follows herefrom that defendant Shafer is without title in that his predecessor in interest, while the owner of the property, was divested of ownership by virtue of the tax deed; second, that the tax deed to defendant from the state was sufficient to vest title of the property in Campbell and his successors in interest; third, that, the title by tax deed being good, it admittedly follows that plaintiffs' title, resting upon a sheriff's deed under foreclosure against Shafer, at a time when Campbell held title, is invalid.

Wherefore the order denying a new trial is affirmed as to appellant Shafer, and reversed as to appellants Campbell and Smith.

HAACK et al. v. SAN FERNANDO MISSION LAND CO. et al. (L. A. 4123.)

1. Waters and Water Courses 🔑89 — "Wash" of Stream.

The "wash" of a stream is that part of its cone, formed where a mountain stream debouches onto the level lands, which has remained desert.

2. Waters and Water Courses 🔑89—Bed of Stream—Construction of Call—Center Line of Creek or Wash.

The call of a deed, "the center line of said P. creek or wash," calls for the center line of the creek channel where the creek had a defined channel, and for the center line of the wash if a well-defined channel did not exist.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑1011(1)—Review—Finding of Fact.

Finding on conflicting evidence, as to location at a prior time, of a creek channel, is not reviewable.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Peter Haack and others against the San Fernando Mission Land Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Tanner, O'Dell & O'Dell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Avery & French and R. M. Widney, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. In an action to quiet title brought by plaintiffs against defendants the real controversy was over the boundary line between their respective land holdings. Plaintiffs prevailed in their contention as to the location of this boundary line, and defendants have appealed. The call in the deed to plaintiffs' land which gives rise to this controversy is "the center line of said Pacoima creek or wash as the same existed on the 14th day of June, 1882." It is conceded that plaintiffs own the land to the east of that line wherever it may be located.

[1] The word "wash" employed in the description belongs neither to the terminology of geology nor of law. It is, however, a word in popular usage in the southern part of the state, and as used is quite capable of definition. The streams in the southern part of the state rising in the mountains flow through narrow and often deep channels with sharp grades until they debouch onto the level lands below. They are torrential in character, carrying great quantities of water during the heavy rains in winter and becoming partially or wholly dry during the rainless season. At times, cloud-bursts or long-continued heavy rains in the mountains cause these streams to overflow their banks in the valley lands below and flood the neighboring country. In the torrential season these streams bring down from the mountains, and for centuries have brought down, boulders, smaller stones, gravel, and sand, and as the velocity of the waters so moving and carrying these earthy matters is arrested upon entering the plains, they begin, under familiar laws, to deposit, first, the heavy boulders at and near the mouth of the canyon, or mountain passes, down which they have descended; next the smaller rocks, next the gravel, and finally the sands. Naturally, the greatest of these deposits is below and near to the canyon mouth, and they spread out fanwise, lessening in depth and thickness until finally they feather out into nothingness. Geologically, the whole area of land thus affected, being built up of these deposits, is known as the "cone" of the stream. The "wash," though bearing relation to the cone, is not synonymous with it. As these conditions of increased winter flow occur every year, and as each year is brought down and deposited débris of the character described, it results in creating upon the lower reaches of the stream, always at the point where the waters first flow onto the level land, and at times in other parts of the river bottom, rocky, gravelly, and sandy stretches of waste lands, desolate to the eye and nourishing little or no vegetation; in brief, a tiny desert. It is this sandy, rocky, gravelly, boulder-bestrewn part of the river bottom which is known as the wash. The wash is not, of course, conterminous with the cone. It frequently happens that in the lapse of centuries the outer portions of the cone have accumulated sufficient humus to create a fertile and fruitful soil raised above the danger of ordinary flooding. Through the wash the waters of the stream find their way. Under the conditions outlined it is quite apparent that the channel of the stream will move about in this wash. An impediment at the head of the old channel may cause a diversion; an obstruction at the lower part of the old channel will cause its rapid filling with débris, and so in time force the stream to leave it and make for itself a new way. Frequently then, the channel of the stream shifts in the wash, and sometimes for no small distances a well-defined channel is entirely lost, the waters wandering over the surface of the wash in small rivulets, seeping through the gravels, and coming together within banks and boundaries at some lower point. Usually, however, somewhere through the wash runs a well-defined channel.

[2, 3] The court construed the language of the deed above quoted as calling for the center line of the creek channel where the creek had a defined channel and for the center line of the wash if a well-defined channel did not exist. In this the trial court was unquestionably right, and under this construction evidence was adduced by the plaintiffs to show, first, that this creek had a well-defined channel through the wash, and, second, the location of this well-defined channel at the time called for in the deed. Of course, their evidence in this behalf was met by counter and conflicting evidence upon the part of the defendants and appellants. The creek channel as fixed by plaintiffs and respondents was much further to the west, and therefore gave them more land than the channel as the defendants and appellants would have the court declare it to have existed, for the channel of 1882 is not at all the present day channel. The court's finding thus made cannot here be disturbed.

Another contention of appellants is that in 1882 Pacoima creek had no well-defined channel through the wash, and therefore the center line of the wash should have been fixed by the court as the true line. But we think the construction put upon the call was the true one and as Pacoima creek, so the court found, did have a channel through the wash, the center line of that channel fixed and controlled the question of the boundary. Another contention of appellants is that a line substantially the center line of the wash had been accepted as the true boundary line by all the litigants either in person or by their predecessors in interest. But touching this matter it is sufficient to refer to the testimony of but one witness, himself one of the plaintiffs, Mr. Widney. This testimony is to the effect that Mr. Porter, one of the predecessors in interest of the defendants, employed an engineer to survey and delimit the boundary line, instructing him to fix the boundary line as the center line of the wash; that the surveyor so advised Mr. Widney and said that he would give him a copy of the map when completed if he desired it. Mr. Widney declined even to see the map, saying that surveys of that kind were worthless, did not interest him, and he did not care to be bothered with it.

This appeal is based wholly upon the contention of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. We have sufficiently indicated what the supporting evidence is, and that it is ample to uphold the findings which the court made.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

McCALEB v. McCALEB. (L. A. 3977.)

1. DIVORCE 🔑219—ALIMONY—FINAL JUDGMENTS—MATTERS ADJUDICATED.

A final judgment on the merits in a divorce action terminates alimony granted pendente lite; hence the inclusion in a judgment of an order discontinuing such alimony is without effect, and the striking of such matter on motion does not revive the alimony, but on proceedings for a new trial a new application for alimony must be made.

2. CONTEMPT 🔑20—ORDERS TO PAY MONEY—CLARITY OF ORDER.

One who is ordered by a court to pay money to another, on pain of imprisonment if he fails, is entitled to a formal expression by the court of such order, stated clearly enough to enable a person of ordinary intelligence to know what he is to do, and he should not be obliged to resort to inferences or implication to ascertain a duty or obligation of that character.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Effie G. McCaleb against William H. McCaleb. Judgment for defendant. From an order denying a motion for an order directing the issuance of an execution for alleged delinquent alimony, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also (App.) 163 Pac. 1045.

Canfield & Starbuck and Eugene W. Squier, all of Santa Barbara, for appellant. Benjamin F. Thomas, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

SHAW, J. On September 29, 1910, the court below duly made an order in this action requiring the defendant to pay to the plaintiff "in advance, as alimony while this action is pending, the sum of $10 a week commencing on the date hereof, to enable said plaintiff to support herself."

The cause was tried in November, 1910, and on December 27, 1910, the court rendered its judgment denying the plaintiff's prayer for divorce and for the custody of the children and declaring "that the allowance of $10 per week to said plaintiff for alimony pendente lite be, and the same is hereby, discontinued from the date of the announcement of this decision from the bench, to wit, December 27, 1910."

For some unexplained reason this judgment was not entered until January 27, 1912. Proceedings by motion were then immediately begun by the plaintiff, apparently under section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate this judgment and enter upon the findings another and different judgment, particularly a different judgment regarding the custody of the children and discontinuance of the alimony. This motion was denied as to the custody of the children and granted as to the discontinuance of the alimony, and thereupon the previous judgment was set aside, and another judgment was entered precisely in the words of the first judgment, except that the above-quoted passage declaring that the allowance for alimony be discontinued was entirely omitted. This second judgment was entered on March 27, 1912. Thus, as finally entered, the judgment was silent on the subject of alimony and maintenance.

Plaintiff then instituted proceedings for a new trial of the cause, in pursuance whereof, on March 26, 1913, her motion for new trial was granted. No new or additional order relating to alimony was made. There was another trial in July or August, 1913, upon which another judgment against the plaintiff was made and entered. Thereupon she moved the court for an order directing the issuance of an execution for the collection of the alimony which she claimed had accrued under the original order from January 22, 1912, to July 21, 1913, a period of 79 weeks, including the week beginning on the last-named date, and amounting to $790. It is not claimed that any payments were made thereon during that period. This motion was denied on April 18, 1914, whereupon the present appeal was taken from the order denying the same.

The plaintiff contends that the order for alimony, by its terms, was to continue in force after the judgment on the merits until all proceedings for new trial or appeal were disposed of by a final decision on appeal, or by the expiration of the time for appeal or motion, if no appeal were taken and no proceeding for such motion were instituted. This, it is claimed, is the effect of the words "while this action is pending," inserted in the order.

[1] The usual purpose of an order of this character is to make provision for the wife's support until the decision of the cause on the merits. Upon the trial on the merits the court will receive full knowledge of the condition, abilities, and circumstances of the respective parties, and may then advisedly adjudge what is lawful and just to each of them with respect to the right to the divorce and the right of the wife to alimony, if a divorce is granted, or to maintenance if a divorce is denied. Such final adjudication is the ultimate object of the action and it is for that purpose that the trial is had. It is therefore to be presumed that the court will terminate the case and the litigation, after hearing the evidence, by the proper judgment disposing of all matters in controversy and directly or indirectly put in issue. It is within the power of the court to reserve the question of property and alimony for further consideration after the entry of a judgment for divorce, and if it orders the payment at stated periods of sums of money as permanent alimony to the wife, it may thereafter, under the Code, modify such order. Civ. Code, §§ 137, 139. But, if no express reservation of the question of alimony is made, and the judgment is silent on the subject, it will be presumed that the matter has been determined and, in legal effect, it will be a judgment denying the wife's application for alimony and terminating all right thereto. In Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 47, 37 Pac. 770, 43 Am. St. Rep. 70, a decree of divorce was made in favor of the wife and giving to her the community property, but not mentioning alimony. The complaint contained no allegations concerning alimony and no prayer therefor. Thereafter she applied for an order in the action requiring the husband to pay her alimony. This court decided that this could not be allowed, saying that section 139 of the Civil Code "clearly contemplates that the right to alimony, as well as other financial and property rights, shall have been presented and litigated in the action for divorce and established by the judgment." It was therefore held that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain such subsequent application for alimony, and that the right to alimony was litigated and concluded by the judgment. If this would be true where the complaint did not ask for alimony, the presumption would be stronger in a case like the present, where alimony was asked and the judgment does not award any, nor reserve the question, but is silent on the subject.

The judgment of January 27, 1912, declared that the divorce should be denied, and that the allowance for alimony pendente lite should be discontinued. It made no provision for maintenance, as might have been done under section 136 of the Civil Code. Under the rule above stated, this ended the right of the wife to maintenance, by reason of its silence on the subject. In express terms it ended all right under the order for temporary alimony, and by its legal effect it concluded the plaintiff with regard to any claim for permanent alimony.

Plaintiff claims that the vacation of that judgment and the entry of the second judgment on the same findings, which judgment omitted the statement that the alimony pendente lite be discontinued, leaving the judgment wholly silent both as to alimony and maintenance, constituted an implied revivor of the alimony order. The argument is that the court struck out the order discontinuing the alimony because it was of the opinion that the plaintiff should continue to receive alimony notwithstanding the final judgment against her on the merits, believing that the original order would remain in force after the final judgment. But, if the court was so minded, its opinion to that effect was not expressed, and the imputed intent is inconsistent with the judgment as entered, which, as we have shown, constituted a final determination of all rights in controversy, including the right of the plaintiff to alimony or maintenance. The judgment is presumed to be intended to end the controversy in that court, and to speak with reference to that object; it is no part of the function of an ordinary judgment to make provision for a continuation of the litigation. If that is within the contemplation of the nisi prius court, it should give voice to its design by express words on the subject. It is as reasonable an interpretation of the court's action to conclude that it was advised of the effect of the doctrine followed in Howell v. Howell, supra, and concluded that the judgment on the merits would terminate the right of the wife to alimony without any express language to that effect, and that the order for temporary alimony would be merged in the final judgment on the merits.

Under a proper method of entering the proceedings, orders, and judgments of a court of record, the order discontinuing the order for alimony pendente lite should not have been a part of the judgment of January 27, 1912. That order was made, as the judgment as first entered shows, on December 27, 1910, at the time the decision was announced from the bench. It was then intended as an order to take effect at once and before the entry of judgment. The proper place for the entry of such an order was on the minutes of the court, not in the judgment. As we have seen, the mere silence of the judgment would in effect thenceforth terminate the original order for alimony. A previous termination thereof should regularly have been shown by entry on the minutes. The record before us does not include the minutes of the proceedings at the time the decision was announced, and hence we are not advised whether they contain such order or not. The entry thereof in the judgment, being in terms retroactive, operated to discontinue the order from and after December 27, 1910, in the same manner as if a minute order had been made at that date. It was equivalent to a vacation of the original order, which neither the amended judgment nor the order for a new trial would, by implication, revive.

The conclusions heretofore stated need cause no hardship to the wife. If she desires to press her cause further by motion for a new trial, or by appeal, she alone will know it, and the court will be open to her to apply at once for a new order for alimony for her support during the subsequent proceedings. The court cannot foresee the future course of the parties. If alimony for her support during such continuation of the litigation by her, or expense money therefor, is necessary, the better policy would be to require her to ask for orders requiring the husband to furnish her with the money required for such purposes.

On the other hand, if we should hold that a temporary order of that nature continues in force after a final judgment which is silent on the subject, until the action is finally determined as provided in section 1049 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by a final decision on appeal or the expiration of the time therefor, complications would necessarily arise. The court, as we have stated, could not foresee that the defeated wife or a defeated husband would pursue the action further. The right to an appeal does not expire, under the present statute, for 60 days. Under the statute as it existed at the time the provisions concerning temporary and permanent alimony were enacted, the period of appeal was one year. The intention of the lawmakers must be considered upon the theory that this prolonged time for appeal was in existence and in their minds when framing the provisions for temporary alimony. It is unreasonable to suppose that it was intended that a husband should continue to pay temporary alimony upon an order of this character for one year after a final judgment had been rendered in his favor denying all relief to the wife, upon the theory that she may, before the end of that period, take an appeal, or that the design was that she should have the right to temporary alimony for one year after final judgment if she failed to appeal and after all her rights were adjudicated. The general theory of the law is that the rights of the parties are determined with the final judgment, and that all preliminary proceedings are merged therein, unless expressly reserved by some provision in the judgment itself. Interlocutory injunctions cease upon the entry of the judgment on the merits. No one would suppose that a right of this character would continue during the period of appeal from the judgment on the merits deciding that no basis for such right existed. If the theory of the plaintiff is correct, defendant would be subject to punishment for contempt if, after judgment on the merits, he failed to make the payments provided for in an order for temporary alimony made at the beginning of the action. The pendency of the action provided for in section 1049 is not for all purposes. For the purpose of execution it is final at once, and the judgment may at once be enforced, unless stayed by special order or by appeal. It is not pending for the purpose of continuing in force provisional orders pendente lite.

The same reasons of policy apply to such a case where the wife, after judgment against her, succeeds in obtaining an order from the trial court granting her a new trial. The court will generally be more fully advised then as to the needs and abilities of the parties than it could have been at the time of making the original order at the beginning of the action. In the interval between the judgment and the order granting a new trial, no alimony will be payable under the original order. If the order for a new trial revives it, the result, unless some special order to the contrary is made, will be that it will have been in force during the interval, and the husband will have been delinquent without being aware of it, which may cause hardship to him. A new application should therefore be required in such a case, and the court may then adjust the matter in the light of its added knowledge on the subject. Thus hardship or injustice to either party will be the better avoided.

[2] One who is ordered by a court to pay money to another, on pain of imprisonment if he fails, is entitled to a formal expression by the court of such order, stated clearly enough to enable a person of ordinary intelligence to know what he is to do. He should not be obliged to resort to inferences or implication to ascertain a duty or obligation of that character.

Our conclusion is that the judgment of March 27, 1912, determining the rights of the parties under the pleadings in the case without mentioning the subject of maintenance or alimony or reserving the same for further disposition, terminated the life of the original order for temporary alimony and justified the court in denying the plaintiff's motion. If the plaintiff desired or needed further support, she should have renewed her application therefor by notice and motion.

The order is affirmed.

SANTA BARBARA COUNTY v. JANSSENS et al. (L. A. 5217.)

1. OFFICERS 🔑100(1) — COMPENSATION —INCREASE DURING TERM—"DESIGNATE"—"APPOINT."

Pol. Code, § 4246, subd. 2, as amended in 1909 (St. 1909, p. 462), fixed the salary of the sheriff of Santa Barbara county at $6,000 a year. Section 4290 provides that the salary and fees provided in that title shall be in full for all services rendered by the officers named, their deputies, and assistants, and that all deputies employed shall be paid by their principals out of the salaries therein provided, unless otherwise provided therein. Section 4157, subd. 6, requires the sheriff to take charge of and keep the county jail and the prisoners therein; and section 4163 makes him liable for the escape of prisoners in his charge. Pen. Code, § 1598, subd. 4, and section 1599, provides for the separation of male and female prisoners in the county jail. Section 1616, as added by Act April 15, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 924), provides that when any female prisoners are confined in any county jail, and no regular jail matron has been appointed, the sheriff shall designate some suitable woman to have immediate care of such prisoners, and that it shall be unlawful for any male officer or jailer to search such prisoners or enter the room or cell occupied by them except in the company of such matron. Held, that this last-mentioned section, if construed as placing on the county the burden of paying the woman so designated by a sheriff in office at the time that section was enacted, would increase his compensation during his term of office in violation of Const. art. 11, § 9; since while the duties of an office may be transferred to another officer the statute does not create an independent office, and the woman so designated is an assistant of the sheriff performing a part of the duties imposed by law upon him, as the word "designate" gives the statute no different meaning than it would have had if the word "appoint" had been used.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series Appoint; Designate.]

2. Sheriffs and Constables 🔑65—Compensation — Services of Deputies and Assistants.

As Pen. Code, § 1616, as added by Act April 15, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 924), made no provision respecting the compensation of the person whom sheriffs are thereby directed to designate to have charge of female prisoners, it could not be assumed that the Legislature intended, even if it had constitutional power to do so, to take the case out of the operation of Pol. Code, § 4290, providing that a sheriff's salary shall be in full compensation for all services rendered by him, his deputies, and assistants.

3. Sheriffs and Constables 🔑76—Compensation—Recovery of Money Paid.

Pol. Code, § 4005b, provides that when any board of supervisors shall, without authority, order any money paid and it shall have been actually paid, or whenever any county officer has drawn any warrant in favor of any person without authority and it shall have been paid, the district attorney shall institute suit against such person or persons to recover the money so paid. Held, that where a woman designated by a sheriff to have charge of female prisoners was paid out of the county treasury, though the sheriff approved her claim and requested the board of supervisors to allow it, the money so paid could only be recovered from her and not from the sheriff, to whom it was not paid.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Samuel E. Crow, Judge.

Action by the County of Santa Barbara against Domenica L. Janssens and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Ulysses S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Eugene W. Squier, Dist. Atty., Fred H. Schauer, Deputy Dist. Atty., and George H. Gould, all of Santa Barbara, for appellant. Canfield & Starbuck, of Santa Barbara, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Demurrers to the complaint as amended having been sustained, and the plaintiff declining to further amend, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The facts alleged, taken in connection with certain statutory provisions, present this situation: The defendant Nat Stewart was sheriff of the county of Santa Barbara for a term commencing on the 2d day of January, 1912. The defendant the Title Guaranty & Surety Company was the surety on Stewart's official bond. When Stewart took office his salary as sheriff was fixed by the Political Code at $6,000 per annum. Section 4246, subd. 2, amended 1909. Section 4290 of the same Code provided that:

> "The salaries and fees provided in this title shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers named in this title, * * * their deputies and assistants, * * * and all deputies employed shall be paid by their principals out of the salaries provided in this title, unless in this title otherwise provided."

There was no provision for payment by the county of any compensation to the deputies or assistants of the sheriff.

Section 1616 was added to the Penal Code by act approved April 15, 1911, after the commencement of Stewart's term. This section reads:

> "Whenever any female prisoner or prisoners are confined in any county jail in this state, and no regular jail matron has been appointed, there shall be designated by the sheriff some suitable woman who shall have immediate care of such female prisoner or prisoners. Such female prisoners shall be so kept that they cannot see or be seen by, or converse with, any male prisoners confined in said jail, and it shall be unlawful for any male officer or jailer to search the person of any female prisoner, or to enter into the room or cell occupied by any female prisoner, except in the company of such matron or woman having the care of such female prisoner."

During the years 1912, 1913, and 1914, there were female prisoners confined in the county jail of said county, and no regular jail matron had been appointed to have care of them. The defendant Stewart, as sheriff, designated the defendant Domenica L. Janssens to have the immediate care of said female prisoners, and she performed the required duties in reference to the female prisoners so confined. Thereafter she presented for payment claims against the county for her services, and said claims, which aggregated $1,249, were passed and allowed by the board of supervisors. Warrants for the amount of such claims were drawn by the auditor of said county, and the amounts paid by the treasurer to Mrs. Janssens. Each of the claims was indorsed "O. K., R. D. Smith," or "O. K., R. D. Smith, undersheriff." It is alleged that Stewart, as sheriff, requested the board of supervisors to allow the claims, and that R. D. Smith was a deputy of Stewart, and as such deputy approved in writing the claims as correct.

By the prayer of its complaint, the county seeks judgment against the defendants for $1,249, the aggregate of such demands, together with 20 per cent. damages for the use of said money, and for costs. Pol. Code, § 4005b.

[1] We think the appellant is right in its contention that Mrs. Janssens had no valid claim against the county for the services rendered by her. The question turns, primarily, upon a determination of the legislative intent in enacting Penal Code, § 1616, but a glance at some of our decisions touching the effect of article 11, section 9, of the Constitution, may be of aid in the task of interpretation. The constitutional provision is that:

> "The compensation of any county * * * officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office."

Where, as in the case of the sheriff of Santa Barbara county, the law allows a fixed salary, which shall be in full compensation for all services rendered by the officer, and provides that all deputies employed shall be paid by the principal out of such salary, a statute authorizing the appointment of a new deputy to be paid out of the county funds works an increase of the principal's compensation. Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601, 28 Pac. 834, 29 Pac. 1092, 16 L. R. A. 161; County of Calaveras v. Poe, 167 Cal. 519, 140 Pac. 23. Such an increase would, it seems clear, be effected by section 1616, if that section had undertaken to put upon the county the burden of paying for the services of the woman to be designated. We may concede, as is claimed by the respondents, that the Constitution does not prohibit the diminution of the duties of any county officer, and the transfer of a part of such duties to some other officer. But nothing of the kind was contemplated by section 1616. The statute does not create an independent office, whose incumbent performs functions separate and distinct from those imposed upon the sheriff. The law had always provided that it was the duty of the sheriff, among other things, to "take charge of and keep the county jail, and the prisoners therein" (Pol. Code, § 4157, subd. 6), and that the sheriff is liable for the escape of prisoners in his charge (Pol. Code, § 4163). We cannot believe that the Legislature intended to affect this duty or this liability by providing—as in substance it did provide—that actual contact between female prisoners and jailers should be through, or in the presence of, a woman. The policy of segregating female prisoners had found expression at the time the Codes were first enacted. Pen. Code, § 1598, subd. 4, § 1599. Section 1616 gave further protection to such prisoners, and was based upon considerations of propriety and decency too obvious to require explanation. The statute did not, however, assume to take such prisoners out of the custody of the sheriff. It merely regulated the manner in which he should perform that part of his duties which had to do with the care of females. We perceive no force in the argument of respondents based on the fact that the section provides that the sheriff shall "designate" some suitable woman. No different meaning could be given to the statute if it declared that the sheriff should "appoint" a woman. Whether "designated" or "appointed," the woman named is an assistant of the sheriff, performing a part of the duties imposed by law upon him.

[2] Section 1616, as it read at the time of the transactions under consideration, was silent with respect to the compensation of the person thus put in charge of female prisoners. We cannot therefore assume that the Legislature intended, if it had the constitutional power so to do, to take the case out of the operation of the statute (Pol. Code, § 4290) providing that the sheriff's salary shall be in full compensation of all services rendered by him, his deputies, and assistants. By an amendment recently made to section 1616 of the Penal Code (Stats. 1917, p. 240), it is provided that the woman designated shall be paid out of the general fund of the county. We are not called upon in the present proceeding to consider whether this amendment has any validity. It follows that the payments made to Mrs. Janssens were without authority of law, and that they may be recovered by the county in this action.

[3] We think, however, that the complaint does not state a cause of action against the sheriff or his surety. Section 4005b of the Political Code, on which this suit is founded, authorizes the district attorney of the county to bring an action against the person or persons to whom money shall have been paid without authority of law. The payments set forth in the complaint were made to Mrs. Janssens. They were not made to the sheriff. It is alleged that the sheriff approved the claims, and requested the board of supervisors to allow them. But this is a very different thing from saying that he received the money. The opinion in County of Calaveras v. Poe, supra, does contain an intimation that money thus paid to an assistant might be regarded as paid to the principal. The statement was not, however, made positively, and was not the ground upon which the decision was, in fact, based. The recovery in the case cited was held to be authorized by other provisions of law. If there was no liability on the part of the sheriff, it goes without saying that no cause of action was alleged against the surety.

The judgment in favor of the defendants Nat Stewart and the Title Guaranty & Surety Company is affirmed. The judgment in favor of the defendant Janssens is reversed.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY FLOOD CONTROL DIST. v. HAMILTON (ANDREWS et al., Interveners). (L. A. 5201.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1917.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑290(3) — DUE PROCESS OF LAW—POWERS OF LEGISLATURE —FLOOD DISTRICTS.

Due process of law does not require that landowners be accorded hearing on question of inclusion of their land within the flood protection district when the Legislature has determined the benefit.

2. DRAINS 🔑67—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—AD VALOREM BASIS.

The Legislature may apply the ad valorem method of assessment on a flood protection project without any judicial inquiry into, or determination of, extent of benefits.

3. DRAINS 🔑67—FLOOD PROTECTION PROJECTS — FINDING OF BENEFITS — PRESUMPTIONS.

Mere passage of St. 1915, p. 1502, creating Los Angeles county flood control district, was an effective finding by the Legislature that the proposed work would answer a public purpose and benefit the land so as to warrant imposition of cost as in the act provided.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑68(1)—LEGISLATIVE FUNCTIONS—IMPROVEMENT DISTRICTS —POWERS OF COURTS.

Fixing district to bear expense of local improvement and the mode of distribution of expenses are, primarily, legislative questions, with which the courts will not ordinarily interfere.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑48 — CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT—PRESUMPTIONS.

In determining power of Legislature to enact St. 1915, p. 1502, creating Los Angeles county flood control district, the court must view the act with every presumption favorable to its constitutionality, and can consider only such facts as appear on the face of the statute with those which are matters of judicial cognizance.

6. DRAINS 🔑2(1) — ESTABLISHMENT — STATUTES—VALIDITY.

St. 1915, p. 1502, § 2, declaring purpose of Los Angeles county flood control district to be to provide for control of storm waters, conserve such waters for use, and protect from damage from such waters the harbors, waterways, public highways, and property in the district, cannot be declared invalid as embracing lands not subject to overflow; the purpose of the district being broad enough to include and benefit all the lands within it.

7. DRAINS 🔑2(1) — DRAINAGE DISTRICTS — BOUNDARIES.

The mere fact that boundaries of Los Angeles county flood control district created by St. 1915, p. 1502, largely coincided with boundaries of Los Angeles county, did not establish arbitrary and accidental determination of boundaries.

8. DRAINS 🔑2(1)—FLOOD CONTROL DISTRICT —STATUTE—VALIDITY.

Mere fact that St. 1915, p. 1502, creating Los Angeles county flood control district, excepted lands within municipalities from its operation if the city so desired, did not affect the validity of the act.

9. DRAINS 🔑67 — SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS — "TAX."

While a tax levied on all land for flood protection would be unconstitutional, the word "tax" may include special assessments, and as used in St. 1915, p. 1502, creating Los Angeles county flood control district, must be taken to mean special assessments so that the act is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Tax.]

10. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑434(1) — SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—EXEMPTION.

In the absence of constitutional restriction, the Legislature's power to exempt property from taxation includes power to exempt from special assessments.

11. DRAINS 🔑18 — DRAINAGE DISTRICT — PROCEEDINGS—LEGALIZING ACTS.

If proceedings under St. 1915, p. 1502, creating Los Angeles county flood control district, were defective by reason of insufficient engineers' reports and insufficient preliminary steps to hold an election, the defects were removed by St. 1917, p. 239, ratifying and legalizing the bonds and all acts and proceedings leading up to their issuance.

12. DRAINS 🔑18 — DRAINAGE DISTRICT — CREATION.

An election on the question of issuing bonds for Los Angeles county flood control district, created by St. 1915, p. 1502, not being required by Constitution, the Legislature might have provided for the issuance of the bonds without election, and therefore St. 1917, p. 239, legalizing all acts leading up to execution of bonds, cured any defect in the election.

In Bank. Petition for writ of mandate by the Los Angeles County Flood Control District against John J. Hamilton, as Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles County, ex officio the Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles County Flood Control District, and as Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of said Los Angeles County Flood Control District, wherein Otis Andrews and others intervene. Peremptory writ ordered.

A. J. Hill, County Counsel, Roy V. Reppy, Assistant County Counsel, Hewlings Mumper, O'Melveney, Milliken & Tuller, and Sayre Macneil, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Wm. M. Hiatt, of Los Angeles, for respondent. Frederick Baker, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ. Charles La Verne Larzelere and Edward Winterer, both of Los Angeles, for interveners.

SLOSS, J. Los Angeles county flood control district was created by an act of the Legislature, approved June 12, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1502), and known as the "Los Angeles County Flood Control Act." Steps were taken looking to the issuance of bonds under this act, and the present proceeding is one in mandate to compel the chairman of the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, as chairman of the board of supervisors of said district, to sign one of such bonds. An alternative writ was issued. The return of the respondent was made by demurrer to the petition. Andrews and others intervened, and filed an answer in opposition to the granting of the relief sought by the petition. The facts are undisputed, the proceeding being submitted upon questions of law alone. The grounds of opposition to the granting of the relief sought may fairly be grouped under two heads. It is contended, in the first place, that the act creating the district is unconstitutional and void, and second, if the validity of the legislation be upheld, that the steps prescribed as prerequisites to the issuance of bonds were not regularly taken.

The act creates a flood control district to be called "Los Angeles County Flood Control District," comprising all of the county of Los Angeles lying south of the north line of township 5 north, San Bernardino base, except the islands off the coast included in Los Angeles county. The objects and purposes of the act, as stated in section 2, are "to provide for the control of the flood and storm waters of said district, and to conserve such waters for beneficial and useful purposes by spreading, storing, retaining or causing to percolate into the soil within said district, or to save or conserve in any manner, all or any of such waters, and to protect from damage from such flood or storm waters the harbors, waterways, public highways and property in said district." The district is declared a body corporate and politic, and is given a number of powers usually conferred upon public corporations. One of the powers so granted is "to cause taxes to be levied and collected for the purpose of paying any obligation of the district in the manner hereinafter provided." By section 3 the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county is designated as ex officio the board of supervisors of the district. The various county officers are made ex officio officers of the flood control district, and are directed to perform without additional compensation the same duties for said district as for the county of Los Angeles. The board of supervisors is given jurisdiction and power, and it is made their duty to employ by resolution "a competent engineer or engineers to investigate carefully the best plan to" carry out the purposes declared in section 2. It is provided that such resolution shall direct such engineer or engineers to make and file a report with the board of supervisors, which shall show a general description of the work to be done, with plans and specifications, a description of the property to be taken or injured, a map showing the proposed work, and an estimate of the cost of such work, of the property to be taken or injured, and of all incidental expenses, stating also the total amount of bonds necessary to be issued to pay for the same. After the filing of this report, the board shall consider the same, adopt it as made or as modified to its satisfaction, stating the amount of the entire estimated cost for which bonds are to be voted. The finding in said resolution as to the sufficiency of the report, and that the same complies with all of the requirements of the act, shall be final and conclusive against all persons except the state.

After the adoption of the report, the board is required to call without delay a special election, and submit to the qualified electors of the district the proposition of incurring a bonded debt in the amount and for the purposes stated in the report. The manner of calling the election is prescribed in detail by the act. If a majority of the votes cast are in favor of incurring such bonded indebtedness, bonds of the district "shall be issued and sold as in this act provided." The bonds are to be signed by the chairman of the board of supervisors, and countersigned by the auditor of Los Angeles county. The act provides for the sale of the bonds at not less than par. Any bonds so issued are declared to be "a lien upon the property of the district," and it is provided that such bonds and the interest thereon shall be paid "by revenue derived from an annual tax upon the real property within said district, and all the real property in the district shall be and remain liable to be taxed for such payments as hereinafter provided." By section 10, the board of supervisors is required to levy a tax each year upon the taxable real property in the district sufficient to pay the interest on said bonds for that year, and such portion of the principal as is to become due before the time for making the next general tax levy, the taxes to be levied and collected at the time and in the same manner as the general taxes levied for county purposes. The board of supervisors is given power, in any year, to levy in like manner a tax upon the taxable real property of the district to carry out any of the objects of the act, such taxes not to exceed 10 cents on each $100 of the assessed valuation of the real property of the district, exclusive of taxes levied to meet principal and interest of bonds. The act then goes on to provide for the doing of work under the act, and declares that the plans and specifications for any work to be done in any municipality must first be approved by the legislative body of such municipality before the commencement of such work, or the letting of any contract therefor. In case such approval is withheld for 30 days, the board of supervisors shall omit the doing of such work within such municipality, "and such omission shall not affect the validity of its proceedings," and the funds which were to be expended in the municipality may be expended elsewhere by the board of supervisors.

There are further provisions which it is not necessary, for present purposes, to set forth.

[1] Of the various objections to the validity of this act, the one urged with the greatest vigor is that the statute violates the provisions of the federal and the state Constitutions prohibiting the taking of property without due process of law. Reduced to its final terms, this claim is founded on the assertion that the boundaries of the district include considerable property which will not and cannot receive any benefit from the contemplated improvement. The scheme of the act is one of local improvement. The warrant and justification for charging the cost of such improvement upon designated lands is to be found, in theory at least, in the benefit to be derived by the lands assessed from the contemplated work. Reclamation Dist. v. Birks, 159 Cal. 233, 241, 113 Pac. 170. Where, as in the act before us, the boundaries of the district are determined by the Legislature itself, the constitutional guaranty of due process does not require that the landowners shall be accorded a hearing on the question of the inclusion of their land within the district. "The Legislature has power to fix such a district for itself without any hearing as to benefits, for the purpose of assessing upon the lands within the district the cost of a local, public improvement. The Legislature, when it fixes the district itself, is supposed to have made proper inquiry, and to have finally and conclusively determined the fact of benefits to the land included in the district, and the citizen has no constitutional right to any other or further hearing upon that question." Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 174, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369; Recl. Dist. v. Phillips, 108 Cal. 306, 314, 39 Pac. 630, 41 Pac. 335; People v. Sacramento Drainage Dist., 155 Cal. 373, 386, 103 Pac. 207; Brookes v. City of Oakland, 160 Cal. 423, 117 Pac. 433.

[2] In addition to defining the limits of the district, the Legislature by the act itself prescribed the mode of distributing the burden by assessing the lands in proportion to their value. It is thoroughly settled that the Legislature may apply the ad valorem method of assessment, without any judicial inquiry into, or determination of, the extent of benefits. Recognizing that absolute equality cannot be attained under any system of taxation or assessment, the courts hold that constitutional requirements are satisfied by that approximation to equality which may fairly be thought to result from an assessment of the cost upon the property benefited in proportion to its ascertained value. Burnett v. Mayor, etc., of Sac'to, 12 Cal. 76, 84, 73 Am. Dec. 518; In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106; Thomas v. Pridham, 171 Cal. 98, 104, 153 Pac. 933; Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, supra.

[3, 4] The mere passage of the act, then, must be taken to import a finding by the Legislature that the proposed work will answer a public purpose, and that its execution will benefit the land within the district to such an extent as to warrant the imposition upon such land of the cost in the manner provided. The findings thus implied are as fully effective as if declared in express terms in the act itself. San Christina Inv. Co. v. San Francisco, 167 Cal. 762, 769, 141 Pac. 384, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 676. The fixing of the district which is to bear the expense of a local improvement, and the mode in which such expense is to be borne and distributed, are, primarily, legislative questions. Hadley v. Dague, 130 Cal. 207, 220, 62 Pac. 500; Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 21, 25, 81 Pac. 225. Ordinarily the courts will feel themselves bound by the legislative body's determination of these questions. Indeed, there are not a few decisions containing expressions to the effect that the legislative determination that certain land will be benefited, and that the cost of the work should be assessed upon it according to a given plan, is conclusive. But since the imposition of such costs finds its ground of sanction in the benefits conferred upon the lands charged, it may well be that the legislative conclusion should not be upheld where the court can see that it is contrary to any rational view of the facts, and that lands have been included that "plainly could not by any fair or proper view of the facts be benefited." Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, supra; Myles Salt Co. v. Iberia Drainage Dist., 239 U. S. 478, 36 Sup. Ct. 204, 60 L. Ed. 392.

[5] It must, however, be remembered that, in inquiring whether a given act of the Legislature creating a local improvement district does thus transcend the limits of legislative power, we are governed by the rules applicable to any judicial examination of the validity of a statute. Not only must the court view the act in the light of every presumption and intendment favorable to its constitutionality, but it must limit itself to a consideration of such facts as appear upon the face of the enactment, together with such others as are matters of judicial cognizance. Neither allegation nor proof of further facts can be considered. Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 27 Pac. 1089, 14 L. R. A. 459, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230; People v. Sacramento Drainage Dist., supra; San Christina Inv. Co. v. San Francisco, supra.

[6] We need not enter into a discussion of the extent to which the court may take judicial notice of the topography of the territory covered by the act. The substance of the claims made by the respondent and the interveners is that the district contains several separate and unconnected watersheds, that it comprises a considerable area of mountainous land, much of which lies above the plane of any flood waters that are to be anticipated, and that a good deal of other land is beyond the area of possible floods. Much of the argument against the validity of the act seems to proceed on the assumption that the one object sought by the creation of the district is the protection of lands from direct invasion by flood waters. A reference to section 2 of the act, which we have, in part, quoted, will show that the purposes are much broader. In addition to the purpose just stated, the act was designed to conserve the flood waters for beneficial and useful purposes by storing them, or otherwise, and to protect from damage by flood the harbors, waterways, and public highways in the district. To say, therefore, that any given parcel or tract of land is not directly subject to overflow is not to say that it cannot be benefited by the carrying out of the proposed plan. Even if the scope of the act were much narrower than it is, we should, under the decisions, be required to hold that the benefit which would justify the inclusion of land within the district need not be so direct and immediate as is assumed in the argument of counsel opposing the validity of the act. Thus, an incorporated city may be embraced within the boundaries of an irrigation district, although much of the land in the city does not require, and could not use, irrigation. Board of Directors v. Tregea, 88 Cal. 334, 26 Pac. 237; In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 343, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106; Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, supra. Similarly, in other jurisdictions, it has been held that the inclusion in a drainage district of high lands not subject to inundation does not conclusively show a lack of benefit to such lands. In re Mingo Drainage Dist., 267 Mo. 268, 183 S. W. 611; Mittman v. Farmer, 162 Iowa, 364, 142 N. W. 991, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1; Butler v. Fourche Drainage Dist., 99 Ark. 100, 137 S. W. 251; Memphis L. & T. Co. v. Levee Dist., 64 Ark. 258, 42 S. W. 763; Miami County v. City of Dayton, 92 Ohio St. 215, 110 N. E. 726. An examination of these cases will show that the courts have regarded an incidental or indirect benefit as sufficient to justify the imposition of a part of the burden of the improvement. Such indirect benefit may result from the improvement of neighboring and surrounding land, and the consequent increase in the value of all land within the district. But, as above indicated, we see in this act other purposes than that of the mere protection of lands privately owned from overflow. So far as the court can know, the flood waters to be stored and conserved may be beneficially applied to lands not themselves subject to inundation. The proper maintenance of the harbors by protecting them from flood damage, the preservation of the means of communication between the different parts of the district by guarding against damage to highways and bridges—these are purposes whose execution may well be of substantial and immediate benefit to all of the lands included within the district. At least, it is impossible, in the light of the facts of which we may take judicial knowledge, to say that the Legislature could not fairly so determine. The mere fact that several watersheds are included within the boundaries of the district does not necessarily require a conclusion that the scheme of protection could not properly be taken up as a unit. In People v. Sacramento Drainage District, supra, the court dealt at some length with the considerations which might properly lead the Legislature to substitute for the ineffective action of numerous small improvement districts a general plan covering a large area whose safety and development are threatened by a common danger. Similar considerations apply here. Certainly, this court cannot say that the protection of this district from the various evils incident to floods could not best be accomplished by a single comprehensive plan. Apart from any other consideration, the protection of the roads in any one of the watersheds, and the maintenance of communication with the others, might be a matter of very direct concern to all of the land embraced within the district. Whether the work could best be done as a whole, or should be committed to the direction of separate districts, is, in reality, a question of engineering, rather than one of constitutional law. It is therefore a question for legislative determination.

[7] Much is made of the fact that, except on its northern line, the boundaries of the district are those of the county of Los Angeles. From this it is argued that the action of the Legislature in fixing the boundaries was founded upon an arbitrary and accidental basis, rather than upon a consideration of the benefits to be derived from the work. But the conclusion does not follow. There is nothing in the nature of things making it inconceivable that the limits of a district specially benefited by a proposed improvement should, in whole or in part, coincide with those of an existing political subdivision.

[8] Before leaving this branch of the discussion, it may be well to say a word about the provision authorizing the board to omit the doing of work within a municipality withholding its approval thereof, and to make expenditure elsewhere. The purpose obviously is to give to the municipalities within the district a certain measure of control over the doing of work within their boundaries. We do not see how the provision affects the validity of the act. The right to impose an assessment upon land within an improvement district is, of course, not dependent upon the doing of work upon or near the land in question. The act contemplates that the board shall expend the money in such manner as to carry into effect a plan which shall benefit the district as a whole. If the plan originally adopted contemplates work within a municipality, and, on account of the objection of the municipal authorities, this particular work cannot be done, it must be presumed that the board, in applying the money elsewhere, will expend it in such manner as to further the general purpose of promoting the advantage of the entire district. In effect, the provision under consideration merely provides for the modification, under certain conditions, of the adopted plan of improvement.

[9] It is next contended that the act is void because it provides for the raising of funds to pay for the work by means of a tax instead of by a special assessment. If such be the case, the act is a palpable violation of the provision of the state Constitution, requiring that all property be taxed in proportion to its value. Article 13, § 1. Since the act charges only the real, and not the personal, property in the district, it clearly violates this fundamental mandate, if the burden is a tax, strictly speaking. The interveners point to the fact that the Legislature has used the word "tax" throughout the act, and does not anywhere refer to the charge as an assessment. Furthermore, such "tax" is to be levied and collected in the same manner, by the same machinery, and at the same time as general taxes. These facts are not, however, conclusive. The word "tax" is used, with equal propriety, in two distinct senses. In its broad meaning the word includes both general taxes and special assessments. Chicago G. W. Ry. Co. v. Kans. City N. W. Ry., 75 Kan. 167, 88 Pac. 1085, 12 Ann. Cas. 588; 1 Page & Jones on Taxation by Assessment, § 40. See, also, In re Madera Irr. Dist., supra. Taking, as, under the settled rule of constitutional law, we must, that construction which will uphold the act, we conclude that the Legislature must have intended to use the meaning which would admit of the charge being construed as a special assessment. "The very fact that personal property is excluded from bearing the cost of the improvement and that the word 'property' is held to mean by the terms of the act to be real property, forces us to the conclusion that it was the intention of the Legislature to provide for the cost of the improvement by way of assessment, as in other drainage cases." Miami County v. Dayton, 92 Ohio St. 215, 110 N. E. 726. In Doyle v. Austin, 47 Cal. 353, an act (Stats. 1871-72, p. 911), providing for the opening of Montgomery avenue, in the city of San Francisco, was assailed upon the ground, among others, that it imposed a "tax" in a special improvement district without following the provisions of the Constitution with reference to the assessment and levy of taxes. The court answered the contention in these words:

> "It sufficiently appears on the face of the act that the whole scheme contemplates an assessment and not a tax. The two are essentially different in their nature, and designating as a tax that which in its elements is an assessment, can have no effect in determining whether it is one or the other. The question must be decided by the nature of the imposition, and not by the mere name by which it is called."

There are many other instances where the word "tax" has been used to designate a special assessment. Wagner v. Baltimore, 239 U. S. 207, 36 Sup. Ct. 66, 60 L. Ed. 230; Yeatman v. Crandall, 11 La. Ann. 220; Daily v. Swope, 47 Miss. 367. It is true that local improvements may be provided for by means of a tax, instead of an assessment upon the lands benefited. People v. Whyler, 41 Cal. 351; S. P. Co. v. Levee Dist., 172 Cal. 345, 156 Pac. 502. But, in the cases just cited, and others like them, where the charge has been held to be a tax, it has been a burden imposed on personal as well as real property.

[10] It is argued, in this connection, that if the act provides for an assessment, it is open to the objection that it exempts some of the lands which will receive benefits. The argument is that only land subject to general taxation is to be assessed, and that the exemptions from such taxation will relieve certain lands which should be charged. On the other hand, the petitioner contends that the act, properly construed, does not contemplate the exemption of any benefited property (except, perhaps, that devoted to a public use). The proper time to decide this question of interpretation will arrive when the question arises in a case involving the right to assess particular property. There is no occasion to decide it now. It is thoroughly settled that, in the absence of constitutional restriction, the legislative power to exempt property from taxation extends to every form of the taxing power, including special assessments as well as general taxes. 28 Cyc. 1131; 12 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 314; Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) 343; Dyker Meadow Land, etc., Co. v. Cook, 3 App. Div. 164, 38 N. Y. Supp. 222; Milwaukee El., etc., Co. v. Milwaukee, 95 Wis. 42, 69 N. W. 796. See, also, Doyle v. Austin, supra. As was said in the Wisconsin case just cited:

> "Assessments are special taxes, and the power to exempt particular classes or kinds of property from assessments stands on as clear and undoubted ground as the power to make exemptions, in such cases, from general taxation."

The act is also attacked on the ground that it violates subdivision 28 of section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution of California, in that it creates offices by special legislation, and also imposes duties on county officers by special act. In answer to this objection, it is unnecessary to do more than cite the cases of People v. Sacramento Drainage District, supra, and Matter of Bonds of S. J. I. District, 161 Cal. 345, 119 Pac. 198, where similar statutory provisions were under consideration.

Other constitutional objections to the act are urged. Without specifying them, we think it sufficient to say that they are met by the foregoing discussion and citations of authority.

[11] The attack on the proceedings designed to authorize the issuance of the bonds is put, in the main, on two grounds. It is claimed: First, that the report of the engineers was not sufficiently specific to give the board jurisdiction to proceed; and, second, that the necessary steps preliminary to the holding of an election were not taken. If the proceedings were defective in either or both of these respects, the force of the objections has been removed by an act of the Legislature, approved May 15, 1917. Stats. 1917, p. 239. This act, which became effective July 27, 1917, provides that the bonds in question "and all the acts and proceedings of said district, leading up to and including the authorizing and issuance of said bonds, are hereby legalized, ratified, confirmed and declared valid to all intents and purposes," and that the finding of the board of supervisors in favor of the validity of the bond election should be final and conclusive against all persons except the state of California, which could question the proceedings by suit by the Attorney General within 30 days after the act became effective. This curative act wiped away whatever mistakes there may have been in the procedure attacked by the interveners.

[12] It is said by the interveners that the holding of the election is, by the terms of the flood control act, made jurisdictional. But it is not a step required by any constitutional provision. No election need have been authorized in the first instance. The Legislature might have provided for the issuance of the bonds without giving any voice in the matter to the residents of the district. In re Bonds of San Joaquin Irr. Dist., 161 Cal. 345, 119 Pac. 198; State v. Monahan, 72 Kan. 492, 84 Pac. 130, 115 Am. St. Rep. 224, 7 Ann. Cas. 661. This being so, the Legislature could, by the subsequent act, do away with the necessity of such procedural steps, or with the effect of failure to take them properly. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81; Sacramento v. Adams, 171 Cal. 464, 153 Pac. 908; Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irr. Dist., 173 Cal. 660, 161 Pac. 113.

Other points are raised which, in view of what has already been said, we do not deem it necessary to mention.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed.

MORTGAGE SECURITIES CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. PFAFFMANN. (L. A. 5320.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1917.)

1. Bailment 🔑18(2)—Common-Law Liens—Repairing Personalty.

Persons making, altering, or repairing personal property had a lien for services rendered at common law.

2. Chattel Mortgages 🔑138(1)—Priority—Lien for Repairs.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3051, 3052, giving persons repairing personalty possessory liens, with right of sale, and despite section 2897, giving liens priority according to the time of their creation, with certain exceptions, a possessory lien for automobile repairs is superior to a previous chattel mortgage, although such mortgage had been breached when the automobile was delivered to the repairman.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by the Mortgage Securities Company of California against F. W. Pfaffmann. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Tobias R. Archer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The Chatts, husband and wife, executed to plaintiff a chattel mortgage on their automobile, the mortgagors retaining the possession and use thereof. They delivered their automobile to defendant to have repair work done thereon. He did this work and held possession of the automobile until payment for it was made. The Chatts violated the terms of their chattel mortgage contract with plaintiff. For this violation plaintiff was entitled to take possession of the automobile and to sell it. Its endeavor to do so was met by the refusal of the defendant to deliver the automobile until payment of his bill; he contending for his possessory lien on account of the work performed. This action was brought to determine the respective rights of the parties and the priorities of their liens. The trial court decreed that the possessory lien of the repairer was subordinate to the chattel mortgage lien of the plaintiff, and gave judgment accordingly. From that judgment this appeal has followed.

[1, 2] No question arises over the validity of the chattel mortgage as such, or over the constructive notice by recordation which that recordation gave to the world. The controlling sections of our Code upon the subject-matter are Civil Code, § 3051, which declares:

> "A person who makes, alters, or repairs any article of personal property, at the request of the owner, or legal possessor of the property, has a lien on the same for his reasonable charges for the balance due for such work done and materials furnished, and * * * may retain possession of the same until the charges are paid."

Here it may be said that this consideration is not complicated, as respondent urges, by the fact that the Chatts were in default under their chattel mortgage at the time they delivered the automobile to defendant for repairs. They were still the legal possessors of the automobile, and their possession continued to be legal until the plaintiff exercised its rights under its mortgage and took unto itself that possession. Section 3052 authorizes a sale in due course of the property held under possessory lien. Section 2897 declares that:

> "Other things being equal, different liens upon the same property have priority according to the time of their creation, except in cases of bottomry and respondentia."

The trial court and the Court of Appeal, not without warrant, held that the lien of the chattel mortgage had priority over the possessory lien of the repairer. Not without warrant, we say, for Wilson v. Donaldson, 121 Cal. 8, 53 Pac. 404, 43 L. R. A. 524, 66 Am. St. Rep. 17, lends strong support to this view. It was because this court was not satisfied with the reasoning and conclusion of Wilson v. Donaldson that a hearing before it was ordered. At the time when Wilson v. Donaldson was decided, the law with which we are concerned was identically the same as it now is, the difference being that section 3051 at the time of the decision in Wilson v. Donaldson dealt only with the first class of lienholders, those "who, while lawfully in possession of an article of personal property, render any service to the owner thereof, by labor or skill, employed for the protection, improvement, safe keeping, or carriage thereof," while section 3052 dealt with the second class of lien claimants, those "who make, alter, or improve any article of personal property, at the request of the owner, or legal possessor of the property." The change that has been made has only been to group both these classes with others in section 3051, and to provide in section 3052 for the identified enforcement of the liens of all of the classes described in 3051. Wilson v. Donaldson, however, cites both sections 3051 and 3052, though the lien which was there declared to exist was a lien of the first of the designated classes; that is to say, a lien depending upon possession, and owned by one lawfully in possession who had bestowed labor for the improvement of personal property, the labor there being the harvesting of grain, the grain itself being subject to the lien of a chattel mortgage prior in time. But while our law to-day, in substance, gives every member of the two classes an identical possessory lien for the value of the service rendered or the work performed, and gives them likewise identical remedies in the matter of the foreclosure of the lien, no such identity of origin exists in the case of the liens themselves. The latter class, those "who make, alter, or repair any article of personal property," always, and in the absence of statute or even in the absence of agreement, at common law had their lien.

> "By the general law, in the absence of any specific agreement, whenever a party has expended labor and skill in the improvement of a chattel bailed to him, he has a lien upon it." Jackson v. Cummins, 5 M. & W. 342.

The reasoning, and, indeed, the quotation, relied on in Wilson v. Donaldson has to do with an agistor's lien, though it was not an agistor's lien the court had before it in Wilson v. Donaldson. But an agistor, in the absence of a special agreement, had no lien at common law, and this is very clearly pointed out in the case cited, supra, where it is further said:

> "Now the case of an agistment does not fall within that principle [the principle of improving personal property] inasmuch as the agistor does not confer any additional value upon the article, either by the exercise of any skill of his own or indirectly by means of any instrument in his possession."

Yet, obviously, this reasoning, perfectly sound in itself, has no application to the facts presented in Wilson v. Donaldson, where the lien by the court conceded to exist was not an agistor's lien at all, but was clearly based upon the "improvement" of the personal property, if with propriety the harvesting of grain can be said to be an improvement. Therefore, under statutes creating agistor's liens, where questions of priority arose, all the reasoning which, as we shall see, goes to support the priority of the repairer's lien was wholly absent. Thus it was said in supporting the superiority of the chattel mortgage lien over the agistor's that it was not in the contemplation of the mortgagee that the mortgagor would put the horse or the cow into an agistor's hands. Further, that when he did so the agistor by his service did not better or improve the chattel, and that as it was not therefore within the contemplation of the mortgagee that his mortgagor should do this thing, and as the agistor had done nothing to improve the chattel, and as the general rule touching liens is that preference goes with priority, and as the mortgagor could not by any contract of his own with the agistor impair the mortgagee's rights, such liens when created by statute, unless the statute itself spoke clearly to the contrary, were to be held subordinate to a pre-existing chattel mortgage lien. But even upon this there is a conflict in authority, some courts holding that it must have been within the contemplation of the mortgagee that the mortgagor would do whatever was necessary to preserve the chattel, and that when in the matter of its preservation it was given to an agistor it would be construed as being within the contemplation of the parties to the mortgage that the agistor, so long as he held the property, did so under a preferential lien. Case v. Allen, 21 Kan. 217, 30 Am. Rep. 425, cited in Wilson v. Donaldson as being a well-considered case upon the subject, is a case dealing only with such an agistor's lien. It is one of the cases in which the rule of construction last enunciated is declared. An examination of the authorities cited in support of the reasoning in Wilson v. Donaldson will disclose that all saving one were cases having to do with agistors' liens. The one exception is that of Storms v. Smith, 137 Mass. 201, where household goods under chattel mortgage were stored by the mortgagor, and the holding of the court was that the mortgagee, in permitting the mortgagor to retain possession of the goods, contemplated only the use of those goods by the mortgagor and not his storage of them, therein distinguishing Hammond v. Danielson, 126 Mass. 294, where a hack under chattel mortgage, permitted by the mortgagee to be used in a livery business, was declared to be subject to the repairer's subsequent lien upon the ground that the mortgagee must have contemplated that the hack would be kept in reasonable condition for use, and Lynde v. Parker, 155 Mass. 481, 30 N. E. 74, treating of an agistor's lien upon a horse under chattel mortgage, where it is held that even in the case of such a lien "all the circumstances surrounding the transaction" may show that it is superior to that of the earlier chattel mortgage.

All this has been said only in illustration of the fact that this important question received inadequate consideration in Wilson v. Donaldson. It remains to be added that the question of priority is wholly controlled by our statutory law. If by the fair intendment of that law these classes now enumerated in section 3051 of the Civil Code are given a preferential lien over the holder of an earlier chattel mortgage, we are not embarrassed in so declaring.

We are well convinced that our law does with intention make the possessory lien of the improver and of the repairer superior to the lien of the pre-existing chattel mortgage. True, it is said in Wilson v. Donaldson that if the Legislature had desired to give such lien claimants priority over chattel mortgage liens it was an easy thing to have said so, but our conviction is that it has said so, and that its declaration has the support of reason and justice. Did the Legislature mean that every artisan and mechanic to whom might be delivered a chattel for improvement and repair must search the records to discover whether that article had been mortgaged, and, failing so to do, be at the peril of the impairment or total destruction of his lien, or did it mean that the money lender who took for security a chattel mortgage should take it with the understanding as part of his contract that improvements and repairs placed upon the article should be subject to a preferential possessory lien? Without hesitation we answer that the second alternative is sustainable as a just interpretation of the legislative enactments. Under the language of the two sections it seems most manifest that such is the true construction. Instancing but one consideration alone, and that the right and power of the possessory lien claimant to sell the property, that right absolute is given him, and he may exercise it so far as the statute reads, without regard to the existence of the chattel mortgage, and without regard to whether or not the chattel mortgage is foreclosable. One would certainly look to see some limiting language in the law if these provisions as to the right of sale and disposition of the proceeds of the sale were to be subordinated to a preferential right on the part of the holder of a chattel mortgage, and it certainly makes more for the protection of society and for the conduct of its business to say that all of these classes of men who preserve, improve, or repair personal property should, like mechanics and artisans under the mechanic's lien law, have their liens declared preferential. Concerning the money lender who holds the chattel mortgage, two suggestions may be briefly advanced; one, that the possessory lien claimant has preserved, improved, or repaired the property upon which he has a lien, and, consequently, has added a value to the security commensurate with his just charge, the other, that the money lender desiring to take the security of a chattel mortgage can with much more readiness reduce the amount of his loan to protect himself against the possible liability of a possessory lien than can the workaday artisan take the time to inspect the records to see whether such chattel mortgage exists against the property.

Besides reason, there is no lack of authority to support this construction of our law. The law of Wisconsin is identical with our own, and in Jesse Smith v. Kaestner, 164 Wis. 205, 159 N. W. 738, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin declares the same construction, and supports it with abundant authority.

The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed.

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⚿156(8)—EXTENT OF RIGHT UNDER EASEMENT.

Where the servitude imposed on defendant's land by the grant was for the carrying of water only for lot No. 5, and not at all for lot No. 4, the right to have the ditch, conveying the water, enlarged would arise only when more water was needed for lot No. 5, in view of Civ. Code, § 806, providing that the extent of a servitude is determined by the terms of the grant, or the nature of the enjoyment by which it was acquired.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⚿156(8) — EXTENT OF RIGHT UNDER EASEMENT.

Increasing the capacity of a ditch would be within the purview of a grant giving the right to transport over defendant's land such water as might be necessary for use on the lot specified.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by the C. F. Lott Land Company against Eliza Hegan, as administratrix of the estate of James Hegan, deceased, successor of James Hegan. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

L. G. Faulkner, of Chico, for appellant. W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff claimed a right of way for a ditch across the land of defendant, and the additional right to carry therein 2,500 inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure, for use upon its lands. Defendant denied that her intestate's lands were under the burden of the servitude for such a ditch, denied the capacity of the ditch to carry 2,500 inches of water under 4-inch pressure, and asserted that its maximum capacity was 500 inches. Affirmatively, defendant asserted that the ditch was jointly constructed and was jointly owned by the predecessors in interest of plaintiff and of defendant, and the defendant's intestate's right is to all the water flowing in the ditch which may be needed or desired in connection with his land, for the purpose of irrigation, for watering stock, and for domestic use. The court found the ownership of the ditch in plaintiff and the ownership and right to carry therein for use upon its lands 2,500 inches of water. It found further that the right of way for this ditch was approximately 30 feet in width, and as a part of this right of way was the right to enter upon all the lands traversed by the ditch for the purpose of repairing and operating it. It found that plaintiff's predecessor in interest had alone constructed the ditch, and as to defendant's intestate held that he had no right to the use of any of the waters; but with the knowledge of and without objection upon the part of plaintiff and its predecessor in interest there had been taken from the ditch by defendant's intestate 10 inches of water for irrigation, and, excepting for this permissive use, defendant's intestate had no right to any of the waters. It further found that the reasonable value of this 10 inches of water was $1 per acre for the 20 acres upon which it was utilized, or $2 per miner's inch for the 10 inches so taken. The judgment followed these findings. Upon appeal the principal contention is that the findings are not supported.

To these facts it is necessary for an understanding of the controversy to add that the lands now owned by plaintiff were formerly the lands of C. F. Lott, who appeared as plaintiff's principal witness upon the trial. Big Butte creek, from which these waters are taken, flows southwesterly. All of the lands affected by this litigation were originally held in single ownership. They were divided for the most part into lots and may be numbered for convenience in designation. To the north lay lot 1, riparian to Big Butte creek, purchased and owned by C. F. Lott. To the southward lay lots 2, 3, and 4, and below that an unnumbered tract which for convenience we may call lot 5. This was nonriparian to the stream, and was also purchased by Mr. Lott. With that purchase ran the grant of a perpetual right of way for a water ditch to carry Big Butte creek water across the intervening lots 2, 3, and 4. Subsequently C. F. Lott purchased lot 4, thus leaving between his holdings of lot 1 to the north and lot 4 to the south lots 2 and 3 traversed by the water ditch. The ditch as originally constructed took the water from Butte creek at the northerly end of lot 1, carried it southwesterly roughly paralleling the line of the creek across lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, and onto the unnumbered lot which we have called 5. Unquestionably the easement conferred on lot 5 by this grant and the servitude placed upon lots 2, 3, and 4 were for the construction of a ditch and the carriage of water therein sufficient for the purposes of unnumbered lot 5. This ditch was also used to supply water to the northern lot 1, and of this, of course, defendant cannot and does not complain. But Mr. Lott was not given a right of way over lots 2 and 3 to convey water by this ditch to lot 4 which he acquired after his grant with the easement of a right of way for unnumbered lot 5. The defendant's intestate owned 118 acres of land in lot 2 or 3. It is conceded that this land was traversed by the ditch. In substance the testimony of Mr. Lott is that he exclusively and for his own private use constructed this ditch, aided in the work by certain tenants of his lands, and perhaps —though of this he did not know—by other landowners who were volunteers, but that he always had asserted and maintained his rights as sole private owner. When the ditch carried water, as it frequently did, beyond the needs of his land, he made no objection to his neighbors using this excess water on their own lands, but they never had used such water of right, and he always stopped any undue interference with his exclusive proprietary rights. He estimated that he used and needed for the irrigation of his lands 2,500 miner's inches of water, and in fact had enlarged the old ditch so as to carry that amount.

[1] Appellant contends that the ditch as originally built and as it crossed her land, and as it continued to exist until at or shortly prior to the commencement of this action, was a small ditch incapable of carrying 2,500 inches of water, and in support of this points out the evidence that before the water in this ditch could reach the Hegan lands it had to pass through an iron pipe laid under a public highway, and that the maximum capacity of this pipe was only 500 miner's inches. Still further, that the servitude imposed upon defendant's lands was for the carrying of water only for unnumbered lot 5 and not at all for lot 4, which, it will be remembered, was acquired by Mr. Lott after the date of the grant to him of the right of way for a water ditch for the use of unnumbered lot 5. Consequently, as there is no evidence to show that unnumbered lot 5 ever has needed or used 2,500 inches of water, it is the imposition of an unjust and unwarranted servitude upon the Hegan lands to decree a right of way for a ditch of that capacity with right of free access and entry upon a strip of appellant's land 30 feet in width. No answer to this is attempted by respondent, other than what is contained in the general statement that plaintiff's evidence was as to the use and need of 2,500 inches of water. It does appear that in 1911, about the time this action was brought, the ditch crossing the Hegan land was enlarged to a capacity of 2,500 inches, but it is not shown that the ditch ever carried that amount of water, and it is affirmatively shown that the pipe above referred to, whose carrying capacity was only 500 inches of water, remained unchanged. Appellant's position in this respect is well founded in the present state of the record. The extent of the servitude imposed upon the Hegan lands is measured by the terms of the grant. Civ. Code, § 806. Under the conditions shown to exist, since respondent's claim of title rests upon grant, and as that grant went only to the use of water and a right of way therefor upon unnumbered lot 5 (not herein including the subsequently acquired lot 4), before the court could justly find and decree a ditch right to 2,500 inches of water, evidence must be given to show the need of this amount for the purposes of unnumbered lot 5.

[2] Appellant relies upon Winslow v. City of Vallejo, 148 Cal. 723, 84 Pac. 191, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 851, 113 Am. St. Rep. 349, 7 Ann. Cas. 851, to support the contention that plaintiff's predecessor having selected a right of way and constructed and maintained a ditch of a given size, the servitude upon the Hegan land has thus been defined, without right of respondent to increase the servitude by changing the conditions. But having regard to the nature of the grant, while it may well be that the course of the ditch having been once fixed by its construction, respondent would not be allowed to change its route, yet the grant contemplates the right to transport over the lands such water as may be necessary for the use of unnumbered lot 5, and if the quantity needed by the development of the land should be increased it would be quite within the purview of the grant that the capacity of the ditch should be correspondingly increased.

In the complaint the allegation merely is of ownership of the ditch and its water. The court finds in accordance with the allegation. But the evidence was all directed to an ownership under grant. In the present state of the record it cannot be said that respondent relied upon any other title. It is true that it appears that plaintiff and its predecessor after the acquisition of lot 4 used the water carried by the ditch upon lot 4. But as it appears that at this time the ditch had a carrying capacity of 500 inches, and that the construction and maintenance of this ditch had been acquiesced in by the owners of the land on lots 2 and 3 traversed by it, it became a matter of indifference to them what was done with the water after it passed their lands. A different question is presented when a decree is sought for a ditch with the carrying capacity of 2,500 inches with a right of way 30 feet in width therefor.

Complaint is made of the finding of the court to the effect that appellant had no right to the use of any of the water carried by the ditch for the purposes of the Hegan land, and to the finding that the use which had actually been made of 10 inches of water was permissive merely. But upon this it need only be said that there is a sharp conflict of evidence; the testimony on behalf of plaintiff being that such use was permissively allowed as a neighborly act, and that it was not in the exercise of an asserted right. Complaint also is made of the finding of the court decreeing a permissive right to the use of 10 inches of water at a fixed charge. But, of course, appellant's grievance lies in the fact that she was not decreed this water as a matter of right. Respondent, rather than appellant, is injured by the decree granting a continuance of the use upon payment of the amount named. Appellant is not injured thereby, since there is no obligation upon her or her successors to take any of the waters.

For the reasons given, the judgment appealed from is reversed.

EYMANN v. WRIGHT et al. (L. A. 4083.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1917.)

PUBLIC LANDS 🔑135(1)—DESERT LAND ENTRY—CONTRACT TO CONVEY AFTER PATENT.

While Desert Land Act (Act March 3, 1877, c. 107, 19 Stat. 377 [U. S. Comp. St. 1916, §§ 4674–4678]) allows an assignment of an entry thereunder, contract of entrymen to convey after obtaining patent is against public policy, as allowing nullification of provision as to amount one can hold before patent.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Dorothea H. Eymann against Charles D. Wright and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant. Collier & Clark, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff's action was to recover against the defendants for violation of their contract with her; she being protected by an indemnity bond. The gravamen of the action is this: By their contract defendants made to plaintiff an executory assignment of their rights under desert land entries, agreeing to do all things necessary under such entries to perfect them and entitle defendants to patent for those lands, and on issuance of such patents the titles so granted to them were in turn to be conveyed to plaintiff. The complaint charged in several counts, but all to this effect. A general demurrer to it was interposed and sustained, and from the judgment which followed plaintiff has appealed. In argument it is contended that the Desert Land Act expressly permits the entryman to assign his entry. This is true. Still further, it is argued that, if such an executed assignment is valid, an executory agreement to assign is also valid, and that, as fraud is never presumed, it will be held against demurrer that the contract was fair and legal. And, finally, it is argued that this court, in Sanders v. Dutcher, 168 Cal. 353, 143 Pac. 599, has given distinct recognition to contracts of this character. A reading of Sanders v. Dutcher will show that appellant is completely mistaken. The desert land entry in that case was made by Orpha C. Johnson. Her assignment to Sanders was an executed assignment, and under it he appeared as claimant. Thereafter she made a similar sale and assignment to the defendant Dutcher, and it was over these two executed assignments that their controversy was waged. Such manifestly is not the situation here presented. Here the contract was that these defendants should do all things necessary to procure and should procure patents, title under which patents was by virtue of the agreement then to be transferred to plaintiff. The contract was in distinct violation of the decisions of the Land Department, from one of which it may be profitable to quote at length. In the case of Herbert C. Oakley, 34 Land Decisions, p. 383, the Secretary of the Interior thus speaks:

> "While absolute assignments of desert land entries are recognized as valid, it does not follow that the language of the act of March 3, 1891, allowing such assignment, recognizes the right of the claimant to execute an executory contract to convey the land after the issuance of patent and thereafter proceed with the submission of final proof in furtherance of his contract. The result of the recognition of such a right of the claimant is clearly manifest, and the effect thereof might easily operate to nullify that provision of the act which declares that no person or association of persons shall hold by assignment, or otherwise, prior to the issuance of patent, more than 320 acres of such arid or desert land.
> "In the case of absolute assignment of such entries, the assignee assumes the position of an original entryman, so far as his qualifications to take are concerned; and he, being the person then charged with the submission of satisfactory proof of compliance with the law, is before the Land Department in his own right, and all future transactions respecting the entry are conducted directly with him. The Land Department, in such case, has before it the actual party in interest, and can deal with him personally. By the recognition of an executory contract to convey after patent, leaving only a nominal party in interest before the Department who would be permitted to submit proof of his own qualifications and compliance with the law, with no requirement as to proof of the right of the real beneficiary to take the land, a far different end may be accomplished, directly contrary to the spirit and intent of the Desert Land Law. By proceeding under such contract, any person or corporation might easily acquire a quantity of land greatly in excess of that allowed under the act. The Department, while recognizing the validity of absolute assignments of desert land entries, is clearly of opinion that any extension of the privileges accorded by the plain terms of the act, especially in the manner contended for by claimant, is entirely unwarranted, and proof of the existence of such contract should prevent the acceptance of the final proof. Otherwise the practical effect of an assignment is realized through the medium of such contract without any of the incidents thereof attaching; and an easy method of evading that portion of the act which prevents a single individual, association, or corporation from holding by assignment, or otherwise, under the Desert Land Law, more than 320 acres, is open to all, and this positive limitation effectively nullified. The clear intent of the Desert Land Law forbids recognition of contracts to convey after patent, and this, too, irrespective of the time the contract was made and regardless of whether or not the original entry was made honestly and in good faith."

Without regard then to the fair or unfair dealing of the defendants, it is manifest that their contract was against the policy of the law (Civ. Code, § 1667), and could not be carried out under the law.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

GRAY v. HUFFAKER et al. (S. F. 8074.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 20, 1917. Rehearing Denied Dec. 20, 1917.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE ⚷154—PAYMENT OF WIFE'S DEBT FROM TRUST FUNDS—LIABILITY OF WIFE—KNOWLEDGE.

Where a husband and wife joined in a mortgage on her separate property, the wife getting a part of the money raised, and paying off such part out of her own funds, she is, nevertheless, liable for money she consented to be paid by her husband to discharge the balance out of funds she knew he held in trust for another.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by John Gray against Jennie B. Huffaker and E. Huffaker. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appealed. Judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeals, First District, and comes before the court for a rehearing. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of the District Court of Appeals:

This action was brought by plaintiff to recover the sum of $1,105 from Jennie B. Huffaker and E. Huffaker, her husband, on a complaint for money had and received.

The record discloses that the controversy between the parties has been the subject of extended litigation, and shows in substance the following facts: Appellant E. Huffaker is an attorney at law, and was employed by the respondent, John Gray, to defend him upon a criminal charge amounting to a felony. Gray was convicted and sent to the state penitentiary. Upon his conviction Gray executed a deed conveying certain real property to Huffaker in trust for certain purposes not disclosed by the record. Subsequently, and while Gray was serving his sentence, Huffaker mortgaged the trust property and retained the moneys received thereunder, claiming the same as attorney's fees for defending Gray, and also for prosecuting certain civil suits in Gray's behalf. Thereafter demand was made upon Huffaker for a return of the moneys so received, and upon his refusal to pay suit was instituted by Gray for recovery of this sum. The court in that matter found that Huffaker had received $1,800 as trustee for Gray and was entitled to $1,274.15 as attorney's fees, and that he had been paid by Gray the sum of $284, and that out of the $1,800 received as trustee Huffaker was indebted to Gray in the sum of $1,105.32, and gave judgment accordingly. In the present action defendant recovered judgment against Jennie B. Huffaker for the sum of $836.85, which, with interest and costs, aggregated the sum of $1,149.50. This appeal is from said judgment.

The trial court found that defendant E. Huffaker, while acting in the fiduciary capacity of attorney for plaintiff, John Gray, received for his use and benefit the sum of $836.85 and that he (Huffaker) wrongfully and fraudulently turned over and delivered this sum to Jennie B. Huffaker, his wife, which sum was used for the purpose of liquidating an indebtedness represented by a promissory note and mortgage executed by Huffaker and his wife upon her separate property.

The judgment is based upon the theory that, Jennie B. Huffaker having received the benefits of the moneys wrongfully obtained by her husband, E. Huffaker, she should in good conscience be compelled to return the same to plaintiff, from whom it was fraudulently appropriated. It is not denied that the money fraudulently obtained was used for the purpose stated, but the contention of appellant is that, inasmuch as Jennie B. Huffaker did not in fact receive the actual moneys used in the transaction, but was the recipient only of the benefits flowing from the payment of the mortgage, an action for money had and received cannot lie against her. But in answer to this it may be said that an action for money had and received may be maintained whenever an equity arises from the circumstance that one has money which he ought to pay to another. Chung Kee v. Davidson, 102 Cal. 188, 36 Pac. 519; Smith v. Farmers' & Merchants', etc., 2 Cal. App. 377, 84 Pac. 348.

Appellants further contend that, even conceding the application of this rule, nevertheless the money borrowed by them from the bank was the debt of the husband, and not that of the wife, who gave her separate property as security, and that by the execution of the mortgage she became a mere indorser, and that, not having received any benefit from the mortgage at the time of its execution, she was not benefited by the payment thereof. This contention cannot be maintained. Both Huffaker and his wife received a portion of the money borrowed from the bank. Admittedly the money which is the subject of this action was received by E. Huffaker as trustee for respondent while acting as his attorney, and used by Huffaker to liquidate the mortgage in question. Moreover, a reading of the entire record shows some evidence that Jennie B. Huffaker received the benefit of the payment and satisfaction of the mortgage with knowledge on her part that the same was obtained with money received by her husband through the hypothecation of the trust property. Having received the benefit of such money in the manner indicated, she should in good conscience be made to return the same to the plaintiff, from whom it was fraudulently appropriated.

The judgment is affirmed.

E. Huffaker and Rudolph Hatfield, both of Oakland, for appellants. John L. McVey, of Oakland, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment for $1,149.20 upon a complaint against the defendants for money had and received to his use. The defendants appeal.

The two defendants are husband and wife. Prior to the transaction in question they had borrowed $2,300 of a bank, upon their promissory note, executed by both, secured by a mortgage upon the separate property of the wife. Seven hundred dollars of this money was used to improve the wife's property, and the remainder was appropriated by the husband to his own use with the wife's consent. The wife paid out of her own funds the $700 applied upon her property. Thereafter the husband paid the remainder due upon the mortgage upon the wife's property. In doing so he used $836.85 of money in his possession belonging to the plaintiff, John Gray, and held by said Huffaker in trust for Gray. The testimony of the wife, although vague and evasive, authorized a finding by the court that she knew that the money so used by her husband in discharge of the mortgage was the money of Gray, and was held by her husband in trust for Gray.

Upon these facts the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the money of Gray so appropriated to the use of the defendants, with interest from the time of such appropriation. There is no serious dispute over the proposition that the evidence established all of the aforesaid facts except the knowledge of the wife concerning the trust money. While, as we have said, the evidence of the wife is not entirely satisfactory on the point, it is sufficient to support the finding on that subject. There is no force in the claim that the money was not applied to the use and benefit of the wife. The mortgage was an existing lien on her property. Gray's money was used to discharge it, with her knowledge and consent. She received a benefit from his money to the same extent as if she herself had received the money and had applied it to pay the mortgage debt. Standish v. Babcock, 52 N. J. Eq. 628, 29 Atl. 327; 2 Beach on Trusts, § 707. There are no other points that require notice.

The judgment is affirmed.

SUPREME LODGE OF THE WORLD, LOYAL ORDER OF MOOSE et al. v. LOS ANGELES LODGE, NO. 386, LOYAL ORDER OF MOOSE et al. (L. A. 4069.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1917.)

1. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS 🔑16—SUBORDINATE LODGE — FORFEITURE OF LODGE PROPERTY.

The constitution and laws of a Supreme Lodge, an incorporated fraternal organization, provided that the Supreme Dictator might suspend or revoke the charter of any subordinate lodge in which case its property should be forfeited to the Supreme Lodge, and be taken in custody by the Supreme Secretary, and also that any subordinate lodge having been found guilty of violating any provision of the constitution, general laws, etc., might be suspended or have its charter revoked, and thereunder the charter of Los Angeles, No. 386, which had a large membership and provided a meeting place with lodge furniture, etc., was revoked without any notice, charges, hearing, or finding of guilt. Held, that such revocation and suspension were ineffectual, and did not work a forfeiture of the property of the subordinate lodge.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW 🔑278(1) — DUE PROCESS OF LAW — FORFEITURE OF LODGE PROPERTY.

In such case the contention that the subordinate lodge and its members assented to the provision under which the Supreme Dictator acted, and that such assent was in the nature of a contract estopping them from complaining of the revocation of their charter and the attempted forfeiture of their lodge property, etc., was invalid, as such forfeiture without notice, charges, or hearing, or finding of guilt, would be contrary to Const. U. S. Amend. 14, forbidding a deprivation of property without due process of law.

3. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS 🔑17 — FORFEITURE OF LODGE PROPERTY — RIGHT OF NEW LODGE.

Where the Supreme Dictator of a Supreme Lodge suspended and revoked the charter of a local lodge which was taking steps to incorporate, without any notice, charges, hearing, or finding of guilt so as to make a forfeiture of its lodge property ineffectual, the fact that a minority of its members continued their allegiance to the Supreme Lodge and organized a new lodge did not entitle them to the lodge property as against the majority members of the original local lodge, on the ground that the majority were seceders.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1151(2)—MODIFICATION OF JUDGMENT—DAMAGES.

In an action in claim and delivery by a Supreme Lodge to forfeit the lodge property of a local lodge whose charter had been suspended or revoked, an award of damages to defendants in an amount greater than that claimed in their answer would be reduced to such amount.

5. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS 🔑17—LODGE PROPERTY—RIGHT TO POSSESSION.

Where a Supreme Lodge revoked the charter of a subordinate lodge without notice, charges, hearing, or finding of guilt, so that such revocation was ineffectual to forfeit its lodge property, and the majority of the original lodge was a de facto corporation purporting to act as such, it was entitled to the possession of the property.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action in claim and delivery by the Supreme Lodge of the World, Loyal Order of Moose, a corporation, and others, against Los Angeles Lodge, No. 386, Loyal Order of Moose, and others. Judgment for defendants, motion for new trial denied, and plaintiffs appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Arthur H. Jones, of Indianapolis, Ind., L. S. Arnold, of Los Angeles, and Morganstern, McGee, Henning & Hardee, of San Diego, for appellants. Ingle Carpenter, Charles W. Fourl, and Georgia P. Bullock, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

VICTOR E. SHAW, Judge pro tem. Action in claim and delivery to recover possession of certain property, consisting of lodge furniture and furnishings, alleged to be wrongfully withheld by defendants from plaintiffs.

The material facts out of which the action arose, in so far as necessary to this decision, are as follows: The plaintiff Supreme Lodge of the World, Loyal Order of Moose, is a fraternal organization incorporated under the laws of Indiana. As declared in the articles of incorporation:

> "The object of the association shall be to organize subordinate lodges throughout the world. Such lodges shall have ritualistic ceremonies as prescribed by the Supreme Lodge of the World, Loyal Order of Moose; to unite in the bonds of fraternity, benevolence, and charity all acceptable white male persons of good character; to educate and improve all members and their families morally, socially, and intellectually; to assist the members and their families in times of need; to aid and assist the widows and orphans of deceased members of the order; to encourage its members in patriotism and obedience to the laws of the country and in the tolerance of religion."

In 1910, under a charter issued to it by said Supreme Lodge, Los Angeles Lodge, No. 386, Loyal Order of Moose, was organized as a subordinate lodge of said fraternity, the membership of which in 1913 was approximately 3,500. With funds obtained from initiation fees and membership dues, said Lodge No. 386 provided suitable quarters for meetings and use of its members, and, at a cost of upwards of $20,000, acquired the property which constitutes the subject of this litigation. In November, 1913, Lodge No. 386, purporting to act under the laws of this state, incorporated under the name of Los Angeles Lodge, No. 386, Loyal Order of Moose, to which lodge, as thus incorporated, all the property theretofore owned by the lodge was, in consideration of the assumption of liabilities of the vendor, transferred by bill of sale.

Section 7 of article 4 of the constitution and laws of the Supreme Lodge provides that:

> "When in the opinion of the Supreme Dictator the conditions of any subordinate lodge are such as to warrant it, he may suspend or revoke the charter of such lodge."

Acting under the authority conferred by this provision, and without notice or the preferring of any charges or according the lodge any hearing, the Supreme Dictator, on February 11, 1914, suspended the charter, and thereafter, on February 20, 1914, likewise without notice, charges, or hearing, revoked defendant's charter, and at the same time, acting under article 17 of the by-laws of the Supreme Lodge, which provides that, "in the event of the suspension, revocation, or surrender of the charter of a subordinate lodge by the Supreme Lodge, Supreme Council, or Supreme Dictator, as provided by the laws of the order, the charter, paraphernalia and all other property of the lodge shall be forfeited to the Supreme Lodge, and the Supreme Dictator, or some member duly authorized by him, shall take possession of said property and place the same in the custody of the Supreme Secretary," authorized certain members of Lodge No. 386 to take possession of the property and assets of the lodge, which, upon demand, refused to surrender the same, and appealed to the supreme forum, which, on April 1, 1914, rendered its judgment that the action of the Supreme Dictator in revoking the charter of Los Angeles Lodge, No. 386, Loyal Order of Moose, "be and the same are hereby approved and confirmed." Thereupon about 700 of the 3,500 members constituting Lodge No. 386 withdrew therefrom and formed a voluntary new lodge, assuming the name "Los Angeles Lodge, Loyal Order of Moose, No. 386," to which the Supreme Lodge issued a charter so designated. This action, in which certain members of the new lodge are joined as plaintiffs, followed, and the property in controversy was, in accordance with the provisions of the statute, delivered into the possession of plaintiffs. Upon trial an alternative judgment, as required in such cases, and wherein damages were adjudged for the wrongful taking and detention, was entered in favor of defendant, from which, and an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, they prosecute this appeal.

Appellants base their claim of right to the property: First, upon the action of the Supreme Dictator in revoking defendant's charter, as confirmed by the supreme forum, and the by-law of the Supreme Lodge providing that in such event all property of the subordinate lodge should be forfeited to the Supreme Lodge; second, that the property was impressed with a trust in that, notwithstanding the fact it was bought and paid for by the members of the lodge, it was dedicated to the specific purposes of its organization under the jurisdiction of the Supreme Lodge from which it held a warrant for its existence, which trust was repudiated by defendant in seceding from the Supreme Lodge.

[1, 2] In our opinion, neither position is tenable. As to the first proposition, the property in question was lawfully in the possession of defendant, having been acquired by it with funds to which the Supreme Lodge contributed nothing. This being true, it is entitled to retain possession thereof, unless there be some rule or by-law of the order which imposes upon it the obligation to deliver possession to the plaintiffs. The only provision upon which to base a claim of such duty is by-law 17 hereinbefore quoted. The forfeiture so provided for is based upon the action of the Supreme Dictator in revoking defendant's charter. As to this action the trial court, upon conclusive evidence, found that the Supreme Dictator revoked defendant's charter "without any charges having been filed against such lodge or the members thereof, and without notice of charges having been served upon the members of the lodge, and without a hearing upon any charges whatsoever," and that thereafter the supreme forum, upon the appeal had by said Lodge No. 386, by an order made, sustained the action of said Supreme Dictator in revoking the said charter. Not only is there an absence in the by-laws of any provision constituting a waiver of notice of the hearing of a proceeding upon which to base such alleged forfeiture, but article 3 of section 1 of the by-laws of the Supreme Lodge provides that:

> "Any subordinate lodge having been found guilty of violating any provision of the constitution, general laws, rules, and regulations of the order shall be suspended, or have its charter revoked, as may be determined by the Supreme Lodge or the Supreme Council, according to the laws of the order."

In Grand Grove, A. O. of D., v. Duchein, 105 Cal. 219, 38 Pac. 947, it is said:

> "It is well settled that a member of a benevolent association cannot be expelled without being given a hearing, and that a by-law which authorizes such a course is unreasonable and without effect"—citing in support thereof Fritz v. Muck, 62 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 69, Wachtel v. Noah Widows', etc., Society, 84 N. Y. 28, 38 Am. Rep. 478, and People v. Musical, etc., Union, 118 N. Y. 108, 23 N. E. 129, to which may be added Hall v. Supreme Lodge (D. C.) 24 Fed. 450, and Ludowiski v. Benevolent Society, 29 Mo. App. 337.

Continuing, the court says:

> "There is no distinction in principle between expelling a member from a subordinate grove and revoking the charter of the grove itself or suspending its charter."

In Grand Grove, etc., v. Garibaldi, 130 Cal. 116, 62 Pac. 486, 80 Am. St. Rep. 80, it is said:

> "The party accused must also have due notice of the trial of the charge, and an opportunity of being heard in his defense."

Appellants insist that defendant Lodge No. 386 and its members by their acts assented to the provision under which the Supreme Dictator acted, and that such assent is in the nature of a contract whereby they are estopped from complaining of the action of forfeiture taken; that, having agreed that upon a revocation of its charter, its property should be forfeited to the Supreme Lodge, and such revocation, though made without notice, charges, or hearing, having been made, the property ipso facto was transferred to the Supreme Lodge. This contention finds no support in the authorities cited, and is contrary to the provision of the Constitution of the United States to the effect that no one shall be deprived of property without due process of law. Const. U. S. Amend. 14. Moreover, our attention is directed to nothing in the constitution or bylaws of the order giving the Supreme Dictator or the Supreme Lodge the power to act thus arbitrarily without notice or hearing. The provision of the by-law empowering the Supreme Dictator to revoke the charter of a subordinate lodge does not provide that he may take such action without notice to the lodge of the charges upon which he proposes to act, and article 3, section 1, of the bylaws, hereinbefore quoted, provides for revocation of charters of subordinate lodges when they are "found guilty of violating provisions of the constitution, general laws, rules, and regulations of the order." This provision clearly implies notice and hearing of charges preferred. Unless so found guilty of some one or all of these acts, no ground would exist for the revocation of a charter. The action of the Supreme Dictator, confirmed on appeal by the supreme forum, taken without notice, was arbitrary and in violation of the principle of natural justice that no one shall be condemned without an opportunity to be heard in his defense. Moreover, it was in violation of said article 3, section 1, since it was taken without any finding that defendant was guilty of any offense for which either he or the Supreme Lodge was authorized to revoke its charter. Since the Supreme Lodge could only revoke the charter upon a finding, which implies a hearing, that it was guilty of violating some provision of the constitution, general laws, rules, and regulations of the order, it should follow that the Supreme Dictator could not, without express provision of waiver of notice, be deemed to possess greater powers than those of the Supreme Lodge itself.

It is unnecessary to decide whether or not a forfeiture of defendant's property would follow the revocation of its charter if duly made in accordance with law. That question is not before us. Suffice it to say that the purported revocation, since made without notice, charges, or opportunity to be heard, as to which there was no waiver, is ineffectual for the accomplishment of such purpose, and hence no forfeiture of the property could be declared as the result of such illegal and unwarranted act.

[3] As to their second proposition, appellants argue that the new lodge, organized by the 700 members withdrawing from defendant lodge, and for and on behalf of whom the individual plaintiffs sue, was entitled to the property for the reason that after the revocation they continued loyal and steadfast in their allegiance to the Supreme Lodge; in other words, they yielded to the unwarranted action of the Supreme Dictator, withdrew from the lodge, and, under a dispensation issued on March 14, 1914, by the Supreme Secretary, who acknowledged receipt of the charter and authorized the institution of the new lodge, to which, as therein stated, "if the constitution and laws of the Loyal Order of Moose are complied with in the institution of said lodge, a charter granting to the members of the aforesaid lodge all rights and privileges of membership in the Loyal Order of Moose, will be forwarded," formed a new one. The argument is based upon the contention that the members of defendant lodge, having repudiated their allegiance to the purposes for which the subordinate lodge was organized, were seceders therefrom, in support of which authorities are cited to the effect that, where a majority, however large, secede and renounce their allegiance to the supreme body, the minority, however small, who remain steadfast to the purposes of the order, are entitled to the lodge property. See McFadden et al. v. Murphy, 149 Mass. 341, 21 N. E. 868; Union Benev. Soc. v. Martin, 113 Ky. 25, 67 S. W. 38; Gorman v. O'Connor, 155 Pa. 239, 26 Atl. 379; and Kayley v. McCourt, 235 Pa. 304, 83 Atl. 830. Conceding this to be true, how can it be said that the members of defendant lodge are disloyal seceders, when, in protesting the unwarranted action of the Supreme Dictator in the attempted revocation of their charter, they exhausted all remedies in an effort to maintain their relation and allegiance to the Supreme Lodge, which, against its will and consent and over its protest, unlawfully refused to recognize it as a subordinate lodge? How can it be said the members who withdrew, thus severing their connection with defendant lodge, obtained and paid for a new charter, and by authority of the Supreme Lodge organized a new one, constitute a remaining minority of defendant lodge? Defendant and its members were not seceders, but, except for the severance of its relations with the Supreme Lodge due to the latter's action, continued in the use of the property, holding its meetings, collecting dues, and paying sick and death benefits as fully and to the same extent after the revocation of its charter as it had theretofore done.

Neither can its secession be predicated upon a resolution adopted by the lodge nearly a month after the action of the supreme forum, whereby it renounced its allegiance to the Supreme Lodge and declared that it did not recognize its authority. This was no more than an expression of its acquiescence in a helpless situation. Plaintiffs are in no position to complain because defendant, after being knocked down with a club, refuses to get up.

In the absence of a legal revocation of its charter, defendant lodge, as shown by this record, was at all the times a duly created, organized, and existing lodge, and, save and except in so far as prevented by the wrongful acts of the Supreme Lodge, continued in the exercise of its functions in accordance with the purposes for which it was organized, as provided in the constitution and bylaws of the organization. This being true, the withdrawing members who organized the new lodge can have no just right to the property acquired and used by defendant lodge for lodge purposes.

[4] In its answer defendant alleged that by reason of the taking and detention of the property it sustained damages in the sum of $20 per day during the time it was deprived of the use thereof. The property was taken May 25th and the judgment rendered August 18th. For this period of 85 days during which the property was unlawfully detained the court found that by reason thereof defendant suffered damages in the sum of $3,000. This was in excess of the amount demanded in the answer, since the damages alleged for such detention, at $20 per day for a period of 85 days, amounts to $1,700 only. In this respect the finding is erroneous, and the judgment should be modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $1,300.

There is ample evidence to support the finding that by reason of the removal and deterioration of the property, due to such fact, defendant was damaged in the sum of $2,500.

[5] Appellants further claim that the court failed to find that defendant at any time was entitled to possession of the personal property in controversy, or that the plaintiffs wrongfully withheld the same from its possession. In our opinion, there is no merit in such contention. To our minds, the question as to whether or not defendant was a duly incorporated lodge is immaterial. It was at least a de facto corporation purporting to act as such, and whether it be incorporated or a voluntary association would not affect the result of our conclusion. Stockton & L. G. Road Co. v. Stockton & C. R. R. Co., 45 Cal. 680; Los Angeles, etc., Band v. Spires, 126 Cal. 545, 58 Pac. 1049; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Church, 137 U. S. 572, 11 Sup. Ct. 185, 34 L. Ed. 784. The court found that all of said personal property involved in the controversy was in possession and control of the defendant; that all of said personal property described in the complaint was in possession of the defendant Los Angeles Lodge No. 386, Loyal Order of Moose, a purported corporation, at the institution of this action, and was given into the possession of the plaintiffs herein by virtue of an order indorsed upon the complaint, as provided by the Code; that plaintiffs had no right to said property or to the possession thereof.

Other points urged by appellants are disposed of by the conclusion reached herein; hence it is unnecessary to further consider them.

Upon going down of the remittitur, the trial court is directed to modify the judgment by deducting therefrom the sum of $1,300; and as thus modified the judgment and order are affirmed. And it is further ordered that appellants have judgment against defendant for the costs of this appeal.

HARPER v. SLOAN et al. (Sac. 2327.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑97 — "MINING PARTNERSHIPS"—CREATION.

Under Civ. Code, § 2511, providing that a mining partnership exists when two or more persons who own or acquire a mining claim for the purpose of working it and extracting the mineral therefrom actually engage in working it, it is not necessary to the existence of such partnership that the property be owned in fee by the partners, and where plaintiff, under a contract with the owners of mining property, was entitled to the possession of the property, and to purchase it on complying with certain conditions, he had such an interest in the property as could form the subject of a mining partnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mining Partnership.]

2. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑97 — MINING PARTNERSHIPS—CREATION.

Plaintiff had a contract with M. and L., owners of a mining claim, under which he was to take possession and have the privilege of working and developing the claim and of purchasing the property on terms therein specified. He made a contract with defendants, designating defendants as parties of the second part, and providing that whereas plaintiff wished to transfer to defendants two-thirds of his interest "under the aforesaid contract between himself and M. and L. shall pass to and vest in the said parties of the second part"; that defendants would make certain payments before dates therein specified and a further payment if they thought necessary; that the whole amount so paid, with the exception of plaintiff's expenses, should be used in developing and working such mining claim, which plaintiff should direct and control; that if the development and working of the claim should be permanently abandoned and any money paid by defendants should be unexpended plaintiff should return it; that if M. and L. conveyed the claim to plaintiff he would convey to defendants two-thirds thereof; and that thereafter plaintiff should have the management and control of the operation of the mine and be paid an adequate compensation. Held, that this agreement, which apparently omitted something, leaving the clause "shall pass and vest" without a subject, was intended to presently vest in defendants a share of plaintiff's interest under the contract with M. and L., and a partnership for the working of the mine was created between plaintiff and defendants; this construction not being defeated by the provisions for conveyance after plaintiff acquired title, and for a return of unexpended moneys.

3. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑97 — MINING PARTNERSHIPS—CREATION.

Even though no partnership existed until defendants became the owners of two-thirds of the claim, the full amount which they agreed to pay having been paid, they became the equitable owners of two-thirds of the property, and such equitable ownership was a sufficient basis for the existence of a partnership from the date when plaintiff obtained his deed from M. and L.

4. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑97 — "MINING PARTNERSHIPS"—CREATION.

Under Civ. Code, § 2511, providing that a mining partnership exists when two or more persons who own or acquire a mining claim actually engage in working it, it is not necessary that each of the partners shall actually perform physical work on the claim, and where defendants supplied money used in working the claim they were engaged in such work so as to create a partnership, though the work was being done by plaintiff alone.

5. MINES AND MINERALS 🔑99(2) — MINING PARTNERSHIPS—RIGHT TO ACCOUNTING.

Where there had been a mining partnership between plaintiff and defendants under which plaintiff expended money and labor, though it later was dissolved or abandoned, plaintiff was entitled to an accounting of the transactions prior to such dissolution or abandonment, in order to settle the relative rights of himself and his copartners.

6. PLEADING 🔑193(4)—DEMURRER—GROUNDS —LACHES.

In a suit for an accounting by a member of a mining partnership, his delay in seeking relief was not a matter which could arise upon a general demurrer to the complaint, as laches is a matter of defense.

7. PLEADING 🔑218(4) — DEMURRER — DISMISSAL OF COMPLAINT.

That a member of a mining partnership suing for an accounting had, in his pleading, sought to charge defendants with more than they were liable for, did not justify the dismissal of the action upon the sustaining of a demurrer for want of facts.

Melvin and Henshaw, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sierra County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by John Harper against J. T. Sloan and another. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Frank R. Wehe, of San Francisco, and W. I. Redding, of Downieville, for appellant. Charles F. Hanlon, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment of dismissal entered upon the sustaining of a demurrer to his amended complaint, without leave to amend. The demurrer was based upon both general and special grounds. The court put its ruling upon the single ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, in effect, gave this as its reason for refusing leave to amend. We shall therefore limit our consideration to the question actually decided by the court below.

The complaint states these facts: On December 24, 1898, James McGregor and B. B. Lewis were the owners of the Diadem quartz claim, an unpatented lode mining claim in Sierra county. On that day they made a written contract with the plaintiff, wherein it was agreed that Harper should take possession of the property, and should have the privilege of working and developing the same; such work, the extent of which was defined, to commence on or before May 1, 1899. Harper was to have the privilege of purchasing the property for $6,000, of which $3,000 was to be paid on or before November 1, 1899, and $3,000 on or before May 1, 1900. Upon payment of the purchase price in full, Lewis and McGregor agreed to convey the property to Harper. Harper's rights under the contract were to cease in case he should fail to do the work agreed upon, or to make the payments.

Upon the making of such contract the plaintiff took possession of the claim, and commenced negotiations with the defendants Sloan and Dwyer whereby said defendants "became jointly and equally interested with plaintiff in the said contract, and promised to engage with plaintiff in actually working said property and extracting the mineral therefrom." On February 9, 1899, and following the said negotiations, a written contract was made between plaintiff and said Sloan and Dwyer. This agreement, after referring to the contract of December 24, 1898, between Harper, McGregor, and Lewis, went on as follows:

> "Whereas the party of the first part [Harper] wishes to transfer to the parties of the second part [Sloan and Dwyer] two-thirds of his interest in and under the aforesaid contract between himself and James McGregor and B. B. Lewis, shall pass to and vest in the said parties of the second part, and the parties of the second part agree that they will, on or before the first day of March, 1899, pay to the party of the first part, the sum of four thousand dollars (4,000) and the sum of three thousand (3,000) dollars on or before the first day of June, 1899, and if, in the opinion of the parties of the second part, it should be necessary, the further sum of three thousand (3,000) dollars, on or before the first day of September, 1899. That the whole of the money so paid by the parties of the second part with the exception of the expenses of the party of the first part shall be used in the development and working of the aforesaid Diadem quartz claim, which the party of the first part shall direct and control; and if the development and working of the Diadem quartz claim should be permanently abandoned by the party of the first part, and any money paid by the parties of the second part should be unexpended, the party of the first part shall return the same to J. T. Sloan, one of the parties of the second part. That if James McGregor and B. B. Lewis should, according to the terms of their contract of December 24, 1898, convey the Diadem quartz claim to the party of the first part herein, the party of the first part will, within a reasonable time thereafter, make a conveyance to the parties of the second part of two-thirds thereof; and it is further agreed that thereafter the party of the first part shall have the management and control of the operating of the said mine, for which he shall be paid an adequate compensation."

The complaint goes on to allege that, upon the making of this agreement, plaintiff, on behalf of himself and said defendants, continued in the possession of the said property, and actually engaged in working the same, and commenced to extract the mineral therefrom, and that plaintiff and said defendants actually engaged in the working and development of said claim and extraction of the mineral therefrom, and ever since have continued in the actual working of said claim, and then became and ever since have been mining partners.

The defendants Sloan and Dwyer paid plaintiff the sum of $4,000 on or before March 1, 1899, and the sum of $3,000 on or before June 1, 1899, all of which was expended in the actual working of the property. The payment of the further sum of $3,000 on or before the 1st day of September, 1899, became necessary for the working of the property, and plaintiff requested payment of said sum from Sloan and Dwyer, but they refused to make said payment. Plaintiff and said defendants continued in the possession of the claim, the plaintiff managing and actually working the same for the partnership, until plaintiff had expended on the claim all of the said $7,000, and more than $2,000 additional, advanced by himself. After such expenditure he had extracted from the claim not more than $8,000 gross, out of which he paid the purchase price of the claim to McGregor and Lewis, and on December 8, 1899, said McGregor and Lewis conveyed the claim to plaintiff "in trust for himself and for said defendants Sloan and Dwyer as provided for in said contract." The plaintiff undertakes in his complaint to excuse his failure to make a deed of the two-thirds of the mine to Sloan and Dwyer. For reasons that will appear hereinafter, we need not detail the facts relied on in this behalf. The plaintiff alleges that he has always been ready and willing to execute a deed or deeds to the persons entitled thereto, and ever since the execution of the deed by McGregor and Lewis to him he has held two-thirds of the property in trust for the parties entitled thereto. With the consent of the defendant Sloan, the plaintiff continued the work until the partnership became indebted in the sum of about $2,000 during the year 1900. To meet this indebtedness the plaintiff was compelled to mortgage the property to one Sayles, and thereafter, in order to satisfy the Sayles mortgage, to execute a new mortgage to F. W. Sharon, to secure the sum of $2,250, and further sums. Plaintiff has continued in the possession of the property, and has made the annual expenditure of $100 necessary under the laws of the United States; he has also devoted considerable time to the management and control of the mine, the reasonable compensation for which would be the sum of $2,418. He has also paid taxes on the property aggregating $229.67. Including the sum due to Sharon, the mortgagee, the advances and obligations thus made and incurred aggregate the sum of $6,665.30, no part of which has been paid or contributed by the defendants, or either of them. Finally, the complaint, in order to anticipate a possible plea of the statute of limitations, alleges that Sloan and Dwyer were out of the state for the greater part of the time intervening between the making of the contract and the commencement of the action.

The prayer is for a decree that plaintiff holds the property in trust to the extent of one-third for himself and two-thirds in Sloan and Dwyer, or their successors; that an accounting be had of the affairs of the partnership and of said trust; that plaintiff have judgment against the defendants for their proportion of the said indebtedness and advances of plaintiff; that such sum be adjudged a lien on the property; and that the property be sold to satisfy the same.

The theory of the complaint is that the agreement between the plaintiff, Sloan, and Dwyer, and the transactions had under it, created a mining partnership between the three, and that plaintiff is entitled to an accounting of the affairs of such partnership, together with the incidental relief which would follow such accounting. The main contention of the respondents is that no such partnership was ever created.

Under section 2511 of the Civil Code:

> "A mining partnership exists when two or more persons who own or acquire a mining claim for the purpose of working it and extracting the mineral therefrom actually engage in working the same."

The respondents contend that there was no such partnership, because, at the date of the agreement between Harper, Sloan, and Dwyer, the parties thereto did not own, nor had they then acquired, the mining property, and that they did not "actually engage in working" the claim.

[1, 2] It is true that when the contract was made title was still in Lewis and McGregor. It is not necessary, however, to the existence of a mining partnership that the property which is to be operated be owned in fee by the partners. Under his contract with McGregor and Lewis, Harper was entitled to the possession of the property, and had the right, on complying with certain conditions, to acquire its ownership. This gave him an interest in the property, and such interest could well form the subject of a mining partnership. 3 Lindley on Mines (3d Ed.) § 798. The agreement between Harper, Sloan, and Dwyer was, we think, designed to pass to Sloan and Dwyer an undivided two-thirds of such interest. That agreement reads, in part, as follows:

> "Whereas, the party of the first part [Harper] wishes to transfer to the parties of the second part [Sloan and Dwyer] two-thirds of his interest in and under the aforesaid contract between himself and James McGregor and B. B. Lewis, shall pass to and vest in the said parties of the second part. * * *"

It is evident that, through inadvertence, there was an omission of some words which should have been inserted after the name "Lewis." The clause "shall pass to and vest," etc., is left without a subject. It is followed by a declaration that the parties of the second part agree to certain things. It seems reasonable to assume that the missing words were intended to set forth the reciprocal obligation of Harper; i. e., that the two-thirds interest shall pass to and vest in the parties of the second part. If thus completed, the agreement would read, in substance, as follows:

> "Whereas, Harper wishes to transfer to Sloan and Dwyer two-thirds of his interest in the contract between himself and McGregor and Lewis, Harper agrees that such two-thirds shall pass to and vest in Sloan and Dwyer, and Sloan and Dwyer agree that they will pay to Harper" the sums stated.

This mode of supplying the ellipsis is entirely in accord with the language preceding and following the omission, and indicates, we think, the meaning which the parties designed to express in their agreement. The subject-matter of the transfer mentioned in the agreement was two-thirds of Harper's interest under the McGregor and Lewis contract, and the parties looked to a present passing of such two-thirds. The respondents argue that the subsequent clause, requiring Harper to make conveyance to them of two-thirds of the property, if he should obtain a conveyance from McGregor and Lewis, shows that their interest and any partnership relation were to arise only when Harper should thus have made a deed to them. We cannot agree to this interpretation of the contract. The parties were contracting at a time when Harper could not transfer a legal title to the defendants, because he had not yet acquired it. Under the agreement, the defendants bound themselves to pay $7,000 before Harper should become entitled to a deed from McGregor and Lewis. It is not to be supposed that they were undertaking to make such payments without acquiring any interest in such rights as Harper then had. The provision for a conveyance, when Harper's interest should ripen into a legal title, did not prevent the present passing of two-thirds of Harper's existing rights under his contract with McGregor and Lewis.

The provision for a return to Sloan of unexpended moneys does not require a different interpretation. It merely prescribed a basis of settlement in the event, which did not take place, of an abandonment of the enterprise by Harper. Clearly the parties were dealing with the contingency of an abandonment by Harper before the exercise of his right to claim a conveyance from McGregor and Lewis. He was not, even during the period preceding his election to abandon or to pay the purchase price, operating the property for himself alone. He was to "direct and control" the development and working with the money furnished for that purpose by Sloan and Dwyer. The agreement contemplated that, until Harper should exercise his option or abandon the development, the property should be worked for the common interest of the three. If the operations during this period had resulted in large profits, and Sloan and Dwyer had, after Harper had obtained his deed, demanded a share of such profits, a court of equity would not have listened with much patience to a plea on the part of Harper that there was no partnership because he had not conveyed to his associates the interest in the claim to which they were entitled.

[3] But, if it be said that there was to be no partnership until the defendants had become the owners of two-thirds of the claim, the result would not be different. It is alleged that the defendants paid the $7,000 which constituted the full consideration for their acquisition of two-thirds. (The complaint does not show any default in the payment of the third installment of $3,000, which was to be paid only if, in the opinion of Dwyer and Sloan, it should be necessary.) Upon the payment of the full purchase price, therefore, Dwyer and Sloan became the equitable owners of two-thirds of the property, and such equitable ownership was a sufficient basis for the existence of a partnership, after the date when Harper obtained his deed from McGregor and Lewis. It is unnecessary, therefore, to inquire whether the facts set up by Harper in explanation of his failure to convey to the defendants were sufficient to excuse his omission.

[4] It is further contended, that, under the Code section already cited, the alleged partners must "actually engage in working the mine." While the complaint avers that plaintiff and the defendants continued in the possession of the claim, and actually engaged in working the same, the pleading, read as a whole, shows plainly enough that the work was being done by the plaintiff alone. The contract between the parties provides that the $7,000 to be paid by the defendants is to be used in the development and working of the claim, and it is alleged that this sum was actually so expended. We do not understand that it is essential to a mining partnership that each of the partners shall actually perform physical work upon the claim. Where one of them supplies money which is to be used in working the claim, he is engaged in such work as truly as is the one who devotes his own labor to the enterprise. 3 Lindley on Mines (3d Ed.) § 798; Lyman v. Schwartz, 13 Colo. App. 318, 57 Pac. 735. The cases cited by the respondents are not in point. They have to do with agreements whereby one is to work for another in a mine, receiving as compensation a share of the proceeds, or providing for the mere acquisition of an interest in a mine.

[5-7] If, then, there was a mining partnership under which the plaintiff expended money and labor, he is entitled to an accounting in order to settle the relative rights of himself and his copartners. If, by virtue of any later transactions disclosed by the complaint, the partnership was dissolved or abandoned, there still remains the right to an accounting of the transactions prior to such dissolution or abandonment. The plaintiff's delay in seeking relief is not a consideration which can arise upon a general demurrer to the complaint. If he was guilty of laches, it is a matter of defense. Nor need we inquire on this appeal whether the plaintiff was entitled to charge the defendants with all of the items of expenditure or indebtedness set up in the complaint. He may in his pleading have sought to charge the defendants with more than they are liable for, but this does not justify the dismissal of his action upon the sustaining of a demurrer for want of facts.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SHAW, J.; LAWLOR, J.

MELVIN, J. I dissent.

I adhere to the views expressed in the opinion in department.* Even if we reconstruct the contract between Harper and his vendees by inserting the words furnished by Mr. Justice SLOSS in his opinion it does not contemplate an immediate vesting in them of two-thirds of Harper's interest in his contract with his vendors Lewis and McGregor; and it seems to me that a transfer of present interest in the original contract could not have been in the minds of the parties, because Harper kept the right to abandon the mine at his sole pleasure, as well as to forfeit all rights under his agreement with the original locators. This privilege retained by Harper is not consistent, I believe, with a mining partnership then created between him and Sloan and Dwyer. That part of the agreement which gives to Sloan and Dwyer the privilege of refusing further advances after the exhaustion of their first payments is strongly indicative to my mind of the understanding between them and Harper that they were merely getting an option to purchase two-thirds of the interest which should be his if he could successfully meet the requirements of his agreement with McGregor and Lewis. If Sloan and Dwyer had been purchasing a present interest in Harper's contract with McGregor and Lewis, it would not have been necessary to insert in their agreement the clause to the effect that:

> "If James McGregor and B. B. Lewis should, according to the terms of their contract of December 24, 1898, convey the Diadem quartz claim to the party of the first part herein, the party of the first part will, within a reasonable time thereafter, make a conveyance to the parties of the second part of two-thirds thereof; and it is further agreed that thereafter the party of the first part shall have the management and control of the operating of the said mine, for which he shall be paid an adequate compensation."

I can see nothing in the contract itself which justifies the supplying of a verb of immediate assignment, and I do not agree with Mr. Justice SLOSS in supplying the words "Harper agrees," etc. Why should Harper in one part of the sentence express a wish to transfer his interest in the contract with McGregor and Lewis, and then fulfill the wish by executing an immediate transfer in another part of the same sentence? The words "the party of the first part wishes to transfer," etc., indicate a desire to make the transfer in the future. It seems to me therefore that a more logical reconstruction of the sentence would be as follows:

> "Whereas, the party of the first part wishes to transfer to the parties of the second part two-thirds of his interest in and under the aforesaid contract between himself and James McGregor and B. B. Lewis, and wishes that such interest shall pass to and vest in the said parties of the second part and the parties of the second part agree," etc.

This would give to the agreement a prospective operation so far as the transfer of Harper's interest is concerned, more in consonance with the rest of the instrument. If, after expending the moneys paid by Sloan and Dwyer and their refusal to advance any more, Harper had abandoned his contract with McGregor and Lewis, they would have had no recourse against him because they would have received just what they bargained for—an option to buy an interest in the contract and the mine in case of Harper's success. There was no provision in the agreement binding them to share Harper's losses beyond the payment of his "expenses"—not salary nor "compensation," such as that which was to be his in case they secured a two-thirds interest by assignment—and they were to have no voice regarding methods nor scope of operation. To be sure, there may be partnerships in which one partner has large powers of management and control of the business; but in analyzing this instrument we must remember that laymen signing such a contract would scarcely consider themselves partners if they were not plainly made by it sharers in the profits and losses. As I wrote in the opinion in department I repeat here:

> "The others advanced money for the purchase of Harper's interest in the mine in case he ever acquired any interest. There was no provision by which they were to share in the output, or be responsible for Harper's expenses in the operation of the property, until there should have been an actual conveyance of an interest to them by Harper, after he should have acquired it from the original locators."

HICKOX et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 2352.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 24, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 21, 1918.)

MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑385(1)—INJURY TO SERVANT — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — AMOUNT.

Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 289) § 17, subd. 2, declares that, if the injured employé has not so worked in his employment during substantially the whole of such immediately preceding year, his average annual earnings shall consist of 300 times the average daily earnings, wages, or salary which an employé of the same class working substantially the whole of such immediately preceding year in the same or a similar kind of employment, in the same or a neighboring place, earned during the days when so employed. A contracting painter who employed painters at the uniform wage of $2.50 per day engaged a painter who had been working intermittently to work for that wage. Shortly after he was engaged the painter fell and received injuries, and applied for compensation. Held that, there being evidence that the ordinary wage for painters paid in that locality was $4.50 per day, the commission was justified in making an award based on such wage instead of that received by the injured painter.

Application by W. J. Hickox and the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, a corporation, for a writ of review against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California and R. M. Searle. Writ denied.

Barry J. Colding and Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, all of San Francisco, for petitioners. Chris. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. W. J. Hickox was a contracting painter engaged in business in the city of Stockton, in the course of which he employed several other painters to whom he paid a uniform wage of $2.50 a day. The New Amsterdam Casualty Company was the insurer of said Hickox against his liability for compensation of employés under the Workmen's Compensation Act. One R. M. Searle entered the employment of said Hickox on the 24th day of May, 1917, agreeing to work for $2.50 a day. He had prior to that time been working intermittently in several towns of the San Joaquin valley and elsewhere, receiving wages ranging from $2.50 a day to $5, but not staying long in any one place or remaining long in any single employment. On May 26, 1917, while in the employment of said Hickox, he fell from a ladder and received an injury to his arm, in consequence of which he made application to the Industrial Accident Commission for compensation.

The evidence taken before the commission showed the foregoing facts, and also showed from the testimony of another contracting painter exclusively engaged in such work in Stockton that the standard wage scale in that city for painters was $4.50 per day. The commission awarded the applicant, Searle, compensation on the basis of a wage scale of $4.50 per day, and its award in that behalf the petitioners now seek to have reviewed by this court upon the ground that the commission in making said award acted without and in excess of its jurisdiction.

We are of the opinion that it is not within our province to review the award of the commission under the circumstances above stated.

Subdivision 2 of section 17 of the Workmen's Compensation Act reads as follows:

"If the injured employé has not so worked in such employment during substantially the whole of such immediately preceding year, his average annual earnings shall consist of 300 times the average daily earnings, wage or salary which an employé of the same class, working substantially the whole of such immediately preceding year, in the same or a similar kind of employment, in the same or a neighboring place, earned during the days when so employed." St. 1913, p. 289.

It would seem that the facts of this case bring it within the rule for the admeasurement of compensation above enunciated; and, there being a conflict in the evidence before the commission as to what the wage scale of painters is in the city of Stockton, it had jurisdiction to decide that matter, and with its discretion, in that respect we cannot interfere.

The application is denied.

HEBOJOFF v. GLOBE INDEMNITY CO. OF NEW YORK. (Civ. 1918.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 22, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 21, 1918.)

1. INSURANCE 🔑514—INDEMNITY INSURANCE — DAMAGES INCURRED OR PAID — "PAYMENT"—"PAID IN MONEY."

Under a policy insuring against loss by reason of accident to employés, and providing that no action shall lie except for reimbursement for the amount of a loss actually sustained and paid in satisfaction of a judgment duly recovered, the giving of a promissory note in discharge of a judgment against the insured is a "payment" of the debt when made in good faith and for that purpose; but where the provision is that no action will lie except for a loss actually sustained and "paid in money," the giving of a promissory note does not satisfy the terms of the policy, and the insurer does not thereupon become liable.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Payment.]

2. INSURANCE 🔑514 — GUARANTY AND INDEMNITY INSURANCE—DAMAGES INCURRED OR PAID.

An insurer against loss by reason of accidents to employés may, by a condition of its contract, against liability except for a loss paid in money in satisfaction of a judgment, protect itself against the difficulties which might attend the defense of an action in case payment was permitted to be made in property, the actual value of which would thus be in issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Knjaz Hebojoff against the Globe Indemnity Company of New York. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. Karl Lobdell, of Los Angeles (Gurney E. Newlin, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. I. Henry Harris (Charles A. Bank, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

JAMES, J. The appeal in this case is taken from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff. The plaintiff here first recovered judgment against a corporation named Pendleton Iron & Metal Company, which judgment was for damages for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff while in the employ of said corporation. At the time the injuries were suffered a policy of insurance had been issued by this defendant, insuring the Pendleton Company against loss by reason of accident to its employé. After judgment had been entered against the Pendleton Company in favor of plaintiff here, the Pendleton Company issued its promissory note to the plaintiff and thereupon caused the judgment to be satisfied of record, and thereafter an assignment was made by the Pendleton Company of all right of action which it had as against the appellant here under the contract of insurance. This action was then brought on account of such assigned claim.

[1] The principal point argued in the briefs refers to that term of the policy of insurance which reads as follows:

> "No action for the indemnity against loss provided for in insuring agreement 'I' of this policy shall lie against the company, except for reimbursement of the amount of loss actually sustained and paid in money by the assured in full satisfaction of a judgment duly recovered against the assured after trial of the issue, nor unless brought within two years after such judgment shall have been paid. * * *"

Preliminarily it may be stated that the insuring agreement "I" referred to in the above quotation covered all principal loss which might be suffered by the assured. Appellant urges this court to decide, first, that under agreement No. I, providing that loss must be paid in money before an action like this can be maintained: (1) Payment by a promissory note is no payment at all; (2) that if the giving of a promissory note in satisfaction of the judgment debt against the assured constitutes payment in the ordinary case, such conclusion could not be applied here where the contract expressly provides that the loss must be paid "in money." As to whether the giving of a promissory note in discharge of liability of an assured is to be considered as payment of the debt, where made in good faith and for that purpose, is a question no longer open to much difference of judicial opinion. The question is fairly settled by the authorities in the affirmative. This court had occasion to consider the precise contention made here under the first head, in the case of Rodgers v. Pacific Coast Casualty Co., 164 Pac. 1115. In that opinion will be found cited the principal cases, reference to which we also find in the briefs of counsel here submitted. We refer to that decision as fully expressing our present conclusion upon the matter presented. We rest upon that conclusion not without recognizing that a forceful argument may be made on the other side of the question. We recognize that where a promissory note is given in satisfaction of a judgment it may be contended with some logic that no new debt is created; that the transaction assumes the form of substituting different evidence for the same debt, which latter is not in any way changed as to its amount. We think, however, that the law is fairly settled that the giving of a promissory note, where the understanding is clear to that intent, may operate to extinguish a debt and be considered as payment thereof.

Passing to appellant's second proposition, to wit, that the added requirement of the contract obligating the assured to pay "in money" must be actually satisfied before action is brought: The policy of insurance here exhibited is one of indemnity as distinguished from one insuring against liability; that is, the insurer here agrees to indemnify for loss actually suffered by the assured, and not to indemnify for liability incurred which liability would have been complete upon the entry of judgment against the policy holder. In construing the term of the contract to which our attention is now directed, the reason for its insertion in the agreement and the purpose and intent to be served should be examined. It may reasonably be inferred that the insurer, recognizing the law that the assured under an ordinary indemnity agreement might satisfy a claimant's judgment in ways other than by the payment of money, determined to guard against that contingency; this by expressly requiring that the assured should be deemed to have suffered a loss only when he had paid "in money" a liability accrued against him. That this term should be considered as one affecting the contract of the insurer in a material way seems quite plain. The requirement is to make the matter of the amount of loss one which is to be measured by the dollars expended and so place within the reach of the insurer easy proof as to loss actually suffered. Should we construe the term not to be of the substance of the contract and permit the loss to be recovered regardless of the kind of property which the assured parted with, then it might happen that the latter had paid in land, jewelry, or other merchandise, and thus an issue would arise as to the actual value of the thing given in payment of the obligation against which indemnity was claimed.

[2] We have no doubt at all that an insurer can by the condition of its contract relieve itself from the difficulties which might attend such a defense in an action brought upon its policy. Our attention is called by respondent to the case of Herbo-Phosa Co. v. Philadelphia Casualty Co., 34 R. I. 567, 84 Atl. 1093, and we are told that the condition in the policy there considered is the same as that now before the court, and that it was there held that the term "paid in money" was satisfied where promissory notes were given by the assured. It is true that the opinion discloses that the term there considered was the same, but on a close examination of the opinion we are unable to determine that the same question was there made as we have to decide here; that is, the only question that seems to have been decided was as to whether, under a policy of indemnity insurance, payment might be made by the assured giving promissory notes. The court holds that the payment may be so made, which is in consonance with our conclusions heretofore and hereinbefore expressed. We do not regard that case as authority upon the question here particularly urged. The court in Eberlein v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, 164 Wis. 242, 159 N. W. 553, while not deciding the question, suggests that the term requiring the assured to pay his liability in money may be one of substantial effect. Our conclusion upon this branch of the case makes it unnecessary to consider in detail other points urged on behalf of appellant.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Ex parte RUST. (Cr. 717.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 27, 1917.)

PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS 🔑6(5) — WHO ARE—OSTEOPATHS.

The act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 722) regulating the practice of medicine and surgery provides for examinations of persons desiring to follow those professions, and for the issuance of two forms of certificate, one designated a "physician and surgeon certificate," and the other a "drugless practitioner certificate." St. 1913, p. 1097, § 10, relating to the practice of optometry, declares that the provisions of the act shall not be construed to prevent duly licensed physicians and surgeons from treating or fitting glasses to the human eye. Held, that an osteopath is not entitled to practice optometry, the examination for license to practice osteopathy being entirely different from that of "physicians and surgeons," and an osteopath being a drugless practitioner, and not embraced in the term.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Physician; Surgeon.]

In the matter of the application of C. G. Rust for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Charles F. Hanlon, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Louis H. Ward, of San Francisco, for respondent Oliver Dibble. John D. Harloe, of San Francisco, for Sheriff of City and County of San Francisco.

PER CURIAM. The return of the sheriff to the writ in this case shows that the petitioner is held upon a commitment of the police court of the city and county of San Francisco for violating the law regulating the practice of optometry. In support of his demand that he be discharged from custody the petitioner contends that by virtue of his being the holder of a certificate entitling him to practice osteopathy he was by the terms of the act itself regulating the practice of optometry excepted from its prohibitory provisions. The exception referred to is contained in section 10 of said act (Stats. 1913, p. 1097), and is in the following language:

> "The provision of this act shall not be construed to prevent duly licensed physicians and surgeons from treating or fitting glasses to the human eye."

The question to be determined, then, is whether an osteopath, licensed under the statute regulating that profession, is within the purview of the optometry law a licensed physician and surgeon.

The act of 1913 regulating the practice of medicine and surgery (Stats. 1913, p. 722) provides for the examination of persons desiring to follow these professions, and for the issuance of two forms of certificate, one designated a "physician and surgeon certificate," and the other a "drugless practitioner certificate." The distinction between these certificates is quite marked, and they are issued as the result of a different examination; and it is very apparent to us that the term "duly licensed physician and surgeon," as used in the section of the act above quoted, has direct reference to the holders of the former class of certificates to the exclusion of the holders of the latter. The cases cited by petitioner from other jurisdictions holding that an osteopath may be said to engage in the practice of medicine and surgery have, in our opinion, no application to the facts of this case, where the question is much narrower and is one of statutory construction. Under our statute we are clearly of the opinion that the petitioner is not a "duly licensed physician and surgeon."

It results from this conclusion that the writ should be discharged. It is so ordered, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

Ex parte NORTHON. (Cr. 577.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 22, 1917.)

1. HABEAS CORPUS 🔑27—GROUNDS—WANT OF JURISDICTION.

St. 1915, p. 1225, § 4d, provides that no person under the age of 18 years at the time of the commission of an alleged crime shall be prosecuted until the matter has been first submitted to the juvenile court. Section 6 provides that whenever a complaint is filed in any other court, and it shall be suggested or shall appear to the judge or justice that the person charged was under the age of 18 years, he shall immediately suspend all proceedings on the charge and examine into the age of such person, and if it appears to his satisfaction that such person was under the age of 18 years, he shall certify the case to the juvenile court. Held that, while it was apparently error for a justice of the peace on a preliminary hearing to refuse to hear testimony as to the age of the defendant, the suggestion of under age did not deprive him of jurisdiction so as to justify the discharge of the defendant on habeas corpus, from custody under the justice's commitment, especially as section 6 apparently authorizes the juvenile judge to examine the case and commit defendant for prosecution or certify the case back to the magistrate.

2. HABEAS CORPUS 🔑3—EXISTENCE OF OTHER REMEDY.

On habeas corpus by a person in custody under a writ of commitment, issued by a justice of the peace, holding him to answer for trial on the charge of murder and against whom the district attorney has filed an information charging him with murder, he will not be discharged because of the failure of the justice of the peace to certify the case to the juvenile court, as he will have an opportunity in the proceeding on the information to raise every question affecting the matter.

Original petition by Leslie Northon for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

Lewis R. Kirby, of San Diego, for petitioner. W. F. Schuermeyer, Dist. Atty., and James G. Pfanstiel, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Petitioner herein seeks to be discharged from the custody of the sheriff of the county of San Diego. The return made to the writ shows that the sheriff claims the right to keep petitioner in custody by virtue of a writ of commitment issued on the 22d day of October, 1917, by a justice of the peace, whereby petitioner was held to answer for trial in the superior court on the charge of murder. The return further shows that following the order of commitment an information was filed by the district attorney in the superior court formally charging petitioner with the crime mentioned, and that proceedings thereunder are pending. The particular ground urged as a reason why the order sought should be granted is that at the preliminary examination of petitioner it was suggested to the justice that petitioner was under the age of 18 years, and that, therefore, the proceeding should have been certified to the juvenile court under the provisions of the act of the Legislature of 1915. Stats. 1915, p. 1225. A transcript of the testimony heard and proceedings had before the justice of the peace is appended to the petition. It appears therefrom that before any witnesses were sworn counsel for defendant stated to the court that the defendant was 17 years of age, and asked that the court certify the case immediately, "not to proceed with the examination, but to certify it to the juvenile court." Counsel then offered the father of petitioner as a witness to confirm the statement as to the age of the defendant, and the justice thereupon replied:

> "At his last appearance before the court the defendant was asked as to his age, and he said he was 17. Let the record show that the court stated he had been advised he was under the age of 18, and the motion to certify is now by the court denied."

This objection, having to do with the age of the defendant, was interposed throughout the examination, and the justice of the peace, at the conclusion thereof, made his order holding the defendant to answer for the crime charged; and it may be remarked that the evidence produced before the magistrate showed that the petitioner, in conjunction with another person, committed a most deliberate, cold-blooded, and dastardly murder.

[1] The argument is here advanced that the order prayed for should be made on the ground that the justice of the peace, after the suggestion was made as to the defendant before him being under the age of 18 years, was without jurisdiction to further proceed in the matter. We have examined the several sections of the juvenile court law and cannot agree with petitioner's counsel in this conclusion. It is true that section 4d of the act referred to first provides that no person under the age of 18 years at the time of the commission of the alleged crime shall be prosecuted until the matter has been first submitted to the juvenile court. Section 6 of the same act provides that whenever a complaint is filed in any court other than a superior court charging a person with a crime—

> "and it shall be suggested or shall appear to the judge, justice or recorder before whom such person is brought that the person charged was at the date the offense is alleged to have been committed under the age of eighteen years, said judge, justice or recorder, shall immediately suspend all proceedings against such person on said charge and examine into the age of such person, and if, from such examination, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said judge, justice or recorder, that such person was at the date the offense is alleged to have been committed under the age of eighteen years, he shall forthwith certify to the juvenile court of his county," etc.

It will be seen that a magistrate is not deprived of jurisdiction of the charge or proceeding where the suggestion is made that the person prosecuted is under the age of 18 years. The act makes it the duty of the magistrate to hear evidence to ascertain the age of the party, where suggestion is so made. The action of a justice in refusing to hear testimony as to the age of a defendant appears to us to be an error, but the magistrate is not divested of jurisdiction in the matter before him. If this position is sound, and we are confirmed in our belief that it is, then the order sought should not be here granted. The juvenile court law does not in terms forbid the prosecution for crime in the superior court of a person under the age of 18 years, for in section 6 of the act above cited there is a provision which would appear to authorize the juvenile judge to examine the case and commit the defendant for prosecution, or to certify back to the magistrate any such case which may have been sent to him under the provisions of the juvenile law.

[2] Moreover, the petitioner herein is now before the superior court under charge made by the information of the district attorney. In that proceeding he will be given opportunity to raise every question affecting the matters which he urges here. People v. Oxnam, 170 Cal. 211, 149 Pac. 165. Our conclusion is that the order of commitment under which the sheriff has justified his detention of petitioner is not invalid or void by reason of the facts shown.

The writ is discharged, and petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the county of San Diego.

2. Intoxicating Liquors 🔑32(2) — Election as to Licensing Sale—Proceedings under Wylie Act.

Under the Wylie Act (Acts 1911, p. 599) §§ 1, 4, 6, no duty was incumbent on the board of trustees of a city, by way of submitting to the people the proposition contained in a petition for an election as to whether the sale of alcoholic liquors should be licensed, until the filing of the clerk's written certificate showing the petition to have been signed by the requisite number of qualified electors, and in order that the board might have been compelled to submit the question at a special election, the certificate must have been filed not later than October 8th, the petition having been filed September 20th, and September 30th having been the last day allowed by the statute for filing by the clerk of his certificate showing the result of his examination of the petition, while the last day before the six-month period preceding the next general state or municipal election, mentioned in section 6 of the Wylie Act, was October 8th.

WORKS, Judge pro tem. This controversy arises under the provisions of an act of the Legislature familiarly known as the Wylie Act, found in the Statutes of 1911 at page 599 and also printed in Deering's Gen. Laws as Act 1696. Section 1 of the statute provides, to quote so much of it only as bears upon this case, that:

> "Qualified electors of any incorporated city * * * numbering not less than twenty-five per cent. of the number of votes cast for all candidates for Governor," in the city "at the last preceding election for Governor, * * * may petition the * * * board of trustees * * * of such city * * * to call an election to vote upon the question, whether the sale of alcoholic liquors shall be licensed in such city. * * *"

Section 4 is as follows:

> "Upon the filing of said petition the clerk of the body to which it is addressed shall forthwith examine it, and from the great register ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors of the territory described therein, and, if necessary, he shall be allowed extra help for that purpose, and within ten days from the date of filing such petition he shall certify in writing the result of such examination and shall file this certificate with the petition. If the clerk finds the number of qualified signers to be insufficient, he shall immediately send a written notice to the person who filed the petition, stating the number of qualified signers he has found thereon, and that they are not sufficient; and the petition may be amended within ten days from the date of such notice by the filing of a supplementary petition. The clerk shall within ten days after such amendment make like examination and certification of the amended petition. If it is still found insufficient he shall notify the person who filed the petition of that fact, without prejudice, however, to the filing of a new petition to the same effect. If the petition shall be certified as sufficient, the legislative or governing body having jurisdiction over the territory described therein shall, within the time prescribed herein, call an election to be held in such territory to vote upon the question whether the sale of alcoholic liquors shall be licensed therein."

Section 6 provides in full:

> "If said petition shall be certified as sufficient within six months and not less than forty days before the holding of the next general state or general municipal election within the territory therein described, such question shall be submitted at said general state or general municipal election; otherwise a special election to vote upon the question shall be called to be held within not less than thirty nor more than sixty days after the petition has been certified as sufficient, provided, that no election under this act shall be held within two years of any previous election held under this act within the same territory."

Pursuant to the provisions of this act, certain electors of the city of Watts, of whom petitioner was one, petitioned the respondent board of trustees, on September 20, 1917, to call an election in the city to determine the question whether the sale of alcoholic liquors should be licensed therein. These facts are disclosed by the petition in the present proceeding, which also alleges, among other things, that upon the filing of the petition addressed to the board, the city clerk forthwith examined it and from the great register ascertained that it was signed by the requisite number of qualified electors under the act; that, within ten days from the date of filing, the clerk certified the result of his examination; that he presented the petition at a meeting of the board of trustees on October 9th, together with his certificate showing it to be sufficient; that at a meeting of the board held October 30th an ordinance calling a special election in accordance with the prayer of the petition was denied passage; that no ordinance calling a special election in the premises has ever been passed; and that the board refuses to call such an election and will not call one unless ordered to do so by this court. The answer shows, and the fact is, that the board has ordered the question submitted at the next general municipal election.

There was very little evidence introduced, as the greater part of the facts involved in the controversy were covered by stipulation. It has been noted that the petition in this proceeding, after alleging that the city clerk certified to the sufficiency of the petition for the calling of the election within ten days after its filing, further states that he "did present to the board of trustees the said petition and his said certificate on October 9, 1917, at a regular meeting of the board." The theory of the petitioner, as explained at the argument, was that the clerk had ascertained the sufficiency of the petition within the ten days next after it was filed, and had thereupon made his written certificate showing its sufficiency, but that he had withheld the paper from the files of the board until October 9. It was contended that this course of events amounted to a filing of the written certificate within the ten days. Whether that argument could have been successfully maintained in this proceeding against the board of trustees need not be considered, for evidence was totally lacking to justify the assumption of fact upon which it was based. The clerk, Virgil R. Franklin, was called to the witness stand by the petitioner. His testimony showed that he had so far examined the petition asking for the election, within the prescribed ten days, as to ascertain its sufficiency, but that he had neither written nor signed any certificate showing the result of his examination prior to October 9. There was no other evidence upon this question. The conduct of the clerk in the respect just mentioned was flagrant and inexcusable, and deserves the stamp of severe condemnation. His course appears to have been followed for no other reason than to thwart the desires and to violate the rights under the law of the signers of the petition to have a special election called at which should be submitted the question contemplated by the statute.

The chronology of the events bearing on this controversy, under the law and the evidence, is as follows: On September 20, 1917, the petition asking for the calling of an election was filed. September 30th was the last day allowed by the statute for the filing by the clerk of his certificate showing the result of the examination of the petition which he says he actually made before that date. Under the Municipal Corporation Bill (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 2348, § 852) the next general municipal election is to be held in Watts on April 8, 1918. The next general state election will be held in November, 1918. The last day before the six-month period preceding the next general state or general municipal election, which period is mentioned in section 6 of the Wylie Act, was therefore October 8, 1917. The certificate of the clerk was written, signed, and filed on October 9th, one day after the expiration of the period immediately preceding the six months.

The petition in this proceeding alleges that the members of the board of trustees knew, on October 2d, that the clerk had examined the petition asking for an election during the ten days next succeeding its filing, and that he had then found it sufficient, but the allegation is denied in the answer, and no evidence was offered to support it. We must therefore find that the members of the board had no actual knowledge on the subject. Can we say that, under the law, it was their duty to know what the clerk had done in the premises in advance of the filing of a written certificate, and to know what was in his mind as a result of his acts, and that therefore they had a constructive knowledge on the subject? We are unable to see how we can make that assertion. While, under the terms of the act, the petition for an election was addressed to the board and was filed with the board, it is made the duty of the clerk alone to examine such a petition and to certify to its sufficiency or insufficiency. We have already referred in fitting terms to the clerk's amazing dereliction of duty, but the stigma which justly attaches to him can in no way, that we can perceive, be fastened upon the board. We can see no reason why the members of the board should have been or could have been expected to make inquiry into the progress of the clerk's work nor into the state of his mind concerning his work. They were called upon to act only when a written certificate by the clerk should be filed showing the petition sufficient.

[1] The rule that officers are presumed to have done their duty does not assist us out of the dilemma. We do not reach that point in this case, for the question here is whether there is an unperformed duty resting upon the trustees. It is only after we shall have ascertained that such a duty exists, that we may begin to indulge the presumption as to its proper performance. If we look for help to the maxim that a thing which ought to have been done will be regarded as done, we are reminded that the maxim also includes the proviso that the presumption may be indulged only "in favor of him to whom, and against him from whom, performance is due" (Civ. Code, § 3529); and the question in this action, again, is whether there is an unperformed act due from the board. If that be the case, then we may perhaps begin to regard the act as having been done.

[2] We are not able to escape the conviction that no duty was incumbent upon the board of trustees, by way of submitting to the people the proposition contained in the petition for an election, until the filing of the clerk's written certificate showing the petition to have been signed by the requisite number of qualified electors, and that, in order that they might have been compelled to submit the question at a special election, the certificate must have been filed not later than October 8th. We are not called upon to say what relief, if any, the signers of the petition for an election may have or might have had against the clerk for his shameful violation of official duty; although we should have a different question to decide if proceedings to compel the clerk to issue his certificate had been instituted between September 30th and October 9th.

The petition for a peremptory writ of mandate is denied.

TIDEWATER SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. MERZ. (Civ. 1737.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 26, 1917. On Motion for Rehearing, Dec. 26, 1917. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 24, 1918.)

CORPORATIONS ⟹76—STOCK SUBSCRIPTION—CONDITION—NECESSITY OF ACCEPTANCE.

A subscription for stock, signed, without any payment, on the condition imposed by the subscriber and indorsed on the back of the contract and signed by the company's agent, that the subscriber could return the stock within 10 months and receive back his note or cash, all of which the agent, not purporting to have authority to accept the condition, agreed to submit to the company, for its acceptance or rejection, is not binding on the subscriber, so as to require his seasonable exercise of option to return; his proposition not having been submitted to the company, and so not accepted by it, as was necessary, there having been merely an entry on its books of the subscription without the condition.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by the Tidewater Southern Railway Company against G. Merz. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, for appellant. H. Scott Jacobs, of Hanford, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action brought by plaintiff to recover the sum of $2,500, together with 7 per cent. interest thereon from November 14, 1911, upon the following contract:

> "Agreement to Purchase Stock. I, the undersigned, hereby subscribed for 2,000 shares of the common stock of the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, a corporation, formed and existing under the laws of California, and having its principal place of business in the city of Stockton, state of California. I hereby agree to pay for such stock the sum of $2,500, one year note, the full par value thereof, and to make such payments to said corporation at the time and in the manner following: $2,500 upon the signing of this agreement, and a further payment of $—— on or before the —— until the full purchase price of said shares shall have been paid, when a certificate of stock shall be issued to purchaser. Said corporation, to which I agree to make payments as aforesaid, is hereby authorized to demand, collect, and recover the money hereby agreed to be paid. Payment must be made direct to the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, at its offices, Room 4, Physicians' Building, Stockton, California.

The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and defendant had judgment, from which plaintiff appeals.

It is alleged in the complaint and found by the court that the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company was a duly organized corporation in 1910, and continued so to be until March 11, 1912; that about the 16th day of February, 1912, and continuously thereafter to and including March 11, 1912, the Tidewater & Southern Transit Company was a railroad company duly organized; that on or about March 11, 1911, "the said Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company duly amalgamated and consolidated its capital stock, properties, roads, equipments, adjuncts, franchises, claims, demands, contracts, agreements, obligations, debts, liabilities, and assets of every kind and description with the capital stock * * * liabilities, and assets of every kind and description of the said the Tidewater & Southern Transit Company," and by such amalgamation and consolidation "there was created a new railroad corporation named Tidewater Southern Railway Company," since which amalgamation the said last-named company has been and now is a railroad corporation duly organized under the laws of this state, with its principal place of business in the city of Stockton, and is the successor of all the several capital stocks, properties, roads, equipments, etc., of the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company and of said the Tidewater & Southern Transit Company, respectively, and that the purposes for which the said companies were formed were the same, and that by virtue of said amalgamation and consolidation the plaintiff, on or about the 11th day of March, 1912, "succeeded to and became the owner of, and ever since has been and now is the owner of, that certain subscription agreement" hereinbefore set forth.

It is alleged in the complaint that prior to said consolidation the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company gave to defendant, and defendant received, due notice of said intended consolidation, "and did not dissent or object thereto, and has, at all times, acquiesced therein and consented thereto"; that at all times since the subscription of defendant for stock in said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, and continuously thereafter to March 11, 1912, the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company was at all times ready, able, and willing to deliver to defendant the said stock in the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, and that since said consolidation the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company and the Tidewater & Southern Transit Company and plaintiffs have, and each of them has, at all times been and are now and is able, ready, and willing to deliver to defendant the said stock in said Tidewater Southern Railway Company. It is further alleged that on November 14, 1911, the said agreement to purchase stock was accepted by said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, "and it and plaintiff, and each of them, have duly performed all of the conditions of said subscription agreement to be performed by them to this time"; "that said agreement, constituting new articles of association or incorporation, referred to in paragraph III of the original complaint on file herein, provided that all stockholders in each of said constituent corporations, to wit, the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company and the Tidewater & Southern Transit Company, should forthwith and ipso facto be and become stockholders in the plaintiff corporation to the same extent and in the same amount as they and each of said stockholders respectively held stock in either of said constituent corporations respectively at the time of the consummation of the aforesaid consolidation"; that prior to the commencement of the action the Tidewater Southern Railway Company demanded payment of the defendant of the foregoing mentioned amounts; that defendant has not paid the said sum of $2,500, nor any part thereof, and the whole is due and unpaid; that defendant did not make, execute, or deliver to plaintiff or the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company the $2,500 note referred to and mentioned in said subscription agreement, or any note, or any writing other than said subscription. Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment, etc.

A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled and defendant answered: Denied on information and belief the averments in the complaint as to the organization of the various corporations and their consolidation and the facts in relation thereto. Denied that plaintiff succeeded to or became the owner of said subscription agreement. Denied that prior to said consolidation or at any time or at all the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company "or any one else gave to defendant, and defendant received, due or any notice of said intended alleged consolidation or amalgamation of the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company with the said the Tidewater & Southern Transit Company, and denies that defendant has, at any or all times, acquiesced therein or consented thereto." Denied that said companies or either of them had, as alleged, or at all, been or now is ready, able, or willing to deliver to defendant the said stock in the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company. Denied that on or about November 14, 1911, or at any other time, or at all, defendant "subscribed or signed the agreement set forth in paragraph IX of said complaint." Denied that the plaintiff, Tidewater Southern Railway Company, demanded payment from defendant of the amount mentioned in the complaint, or any part thereof, and denied that the said sum or any sum, principal or interest, is now due or owing from defendant to plaintiff.

By an amendment to the answer defendant further denied that either of said companies has "duly or at all performed all or any of the conditions of said subscription agreement to be performed by them to this time or at all"; denied that by the agreement constituting new articles of association or incorporation referred to in the complaint, all or any of the stockholders in each of said constituent corporations or either of them "should forthwith, or otherwise or at all, or ipso facto, or otherwise or at all, be or become stockholders in the plaintiff corporation to the same extent or any extent, and in the same amount or in any amount, as they or each or any of said stockholders respectively held stock in either of said constituent corporations respectively at the time of the consummation of the alleged consolidation, or otherwise or at all." For further and separate answer, alleges:

> "That the only contract or agreement to purchase stock that this defendant ever made with said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, was a conditional contract wherein and whereby said defendant had the right to return the stock mentioned in said contract at any time within ten (10) months after receipt thereof, and receive back his note or cash, and that said subscription contract was in the words and figures following, to wit."

Then follows a copy of the contract as set out in plaintiff's complaint. And it is alleged:

> "And that as a part and portion of said contract, and as the consideration for entering into said contract on the part of the defendant, there was, on said 14th day of November, 1911. Indorsed on the back of said contract, and signed by the sales manager, the following:
> " 'Nov. 14/11.
> " 'On ten days' notice ten months after date to the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Co., bearer of this contract No. 9489, can return the within named stock and receive his note back or cash back or pay note and keep stock.
> " 'Tidewater & So. Railroad Co.,
> " 'By Frank Avery, Sales Mgr.'
> "And that said defendant would not have entered into any contract or agreement to purchase any stock whatever from said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company had not said sales manager, as a part of said contract and as the consideration therefor, moving to said defendant, signed the said contract above mentioned."

In addition to the findings of the court in accordance with the averments of the complaint relating to the organization and consolidation of the several companies named and the capitalization as therein alleged, and the purposes for which said companies were organized and that plaintiff succeeded to and became the owner of all the interest of the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company in and to said contract mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, the court found:

> That it is not true that prior to the consolidation of the said companies the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company gave to defendant, and defendant received, due notice of said intended consolidation. "It is true that defendant did not dissent or object thereto, but it is not true that defendant has at all or any times acquiesced therein or consented thereto." That it is true that at all times since November 14, 1911, to on or about March 11, 1912, the date of said consolidation, the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company was at all times able, ready, and willing to deliver to defendant the said stock in said company mentioned in the agreement set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and its certificate or certificates therefor. That since said consolidation of said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company and the Tidewater & Southern Transit Company, the said plaintiff has been at all times, and now is, able, ready, and willing to deliver to defendant stock in said Tidewater Southern Railway Company, and its certificate or certificates therefor. That it is true that on or about November 14, 1911, defendant signed "a certain document in writing wherein he agreed to subscribe for 2,000 shares of the common stock of the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, a corporation, and agreed to pay therefor the sum of $2,500, by giving his note upon the delivery to him of the certificates for said 2,000 shares, but that said agreement to purchase stock was a conditional contract, wherein and whereby said defendant had the right to return the stock mentioned in said contract at any time within 10 months after receipt thereof, and receive back his note or cash, and that said subscription contract was in the words and figures following, to wit." Then follows the contract as set out in the answer, with the indorsements thereon, signed by Frank Avery, as hereinabove shown. "That it is true that said defendant would not have entered into any contract or agreement to purchase any stock whatever from said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, had not said sales manager, as a part of said contract and as the consideration therefor, moving to said defendant, signed the said contract above mentioned." "That it is not true that said agreement to purchase stock was on the 14th day of November, 1911, or at any time or at all, accepted by the said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company; but the whole of said contract, including the said portion of said contract indorsed on the back of the duplicate above mentioned, was never submitted to nor presented by said sales manager to said corporation last named and was never accepted by said corporation; and by reason thereof no contract or agreement was ever entered into between said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, a corporation, and the said defendant. It is not true that it, said the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company and plaintiff, or either of them, have duly or otherwise performed all or any of the conditions of said subscription agreement to be performed by them to this time." That it is true that, by the provisions of the agreement or consolidation referred to in the complaint, all of the stockholders in each of the constituent corporations of said consolidated corporations "should forthwith and ipso facto be and become stockholders in the plaintiff corporation to the same extent and in the same amount as they, and each of said stockholders, respectively held stock in either of said constituent corporations respectively at the time of the consummation of the aforesaid consolidation." That it is true that prior to the commencement of this action, plaintiff Tidewater Southern Railway Company demanded payment from defendant of the foregoing mentioned amounts. That it is true that the defendant has not paid the principal, $2.500, and interest thereon, and it is true that defendant has not paid any part thereof. That it is true, also, that defendant did not make, execute, or deliver to plaintiff or the Tidewater & Southern Railway Company the $2,500 note referred to and mentioned in the agreement set forth in the complaint, or any note or any writing other than said agreement.

As conclusions of law, the court found that the defendant is entitled to judgment against plaintiff and for his costs of suit.

There was evidence sufficient to suppport the findings: That the defendant had no notice of the consolidation referred to in the complaint or that the plaintiff corporation was the result thereof and that defendant did not consent to or acquiesce in said consolidation; that the contract signed by defendant was indorsed by the sales manager of the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company in the terms as shown by copy thereof, and that said indorsement formed a part of the contract entered into by defendant and as the consideration therefor, and that defendant would not have entered into any contract to purchase said shares had not the sales manager signed the contract as above mentioned; that neither of said companies has duly or otherwise performed all or any part of the conditions of said subscription agreement referred to in the answer to be by them performed.

Defendant testified that he refused to sign the proposed subscription agreement in its then form, and on his refusal the sales manager, Avery, said, "Well, I will send this whole thing in (including the indorsement), and they can accept it or reject it as they see fit;" and the defendant said, "All right; with that I will sign it." He further testified that he was never notified by the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company that his subscription was accepted; that he was never offered any shares of its stock, nor did any one ever tender or offer to him any shares of the plaintiff company, until counsel for plaintiff at the trial introduced and tendered 2,000 shares of said company's stock. He testified, further, that he visited the office of the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company at Stockton "within the ten months after November 14, 1911," and saw the secretary, who knew "what he wanted to find out about," but was told that the president, Mr. Bearce, for whom he inquired, was not there; that he then went to San Francisco, to the office of the company there, but failed to meet Mr. Bearce, and was never thereafter in communication with the company until he received a letter introduced in evidence by plaintiff. This was a letter dated April 6, 1914, written by plaintiff's attorneys calling defendant's attention to the contract of November 14, 1911, informing him that plaintiff is the successor in interest of all the property of the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company, and calling upon him to pay the obligation of November 14, 1911. To this letter defendant's attorney made answer, by defendant's instructions:

> "That the terms of the subscription were never complied with by the company. The stock was never delivered to Mr. Merz, no demand was ever made on him for payment of his subscription or any part of it. Mr. Merz understood that the subscription was canceled."

Some further fruitless correspondence ensued, and on November 9, 1914, three years after the subscription agreement was signed, the complaint in this action was filed.

Mr. Bearce, president of plaintiff corporation, who was also secretary of the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company when this subscription agreement was signed, testified that Avery was a stock salesman of the latter company in November, 1911; that he was furnished with subscription blanks and literature, which were to be made in triplicate, and "was sent out to solicit subscriptions for that company"; that the agreement set forth in the complaint was sent in to the office and recorded in the subscription book in November, 1911; that he loaned Avery $200 "on account of his commission for this sale"; that these subscriptions were always considered as accepted when sent in, and that there was a form of letter which was sent out, thanking the subscriber (there was no evidence that defendant received any letter acknowledging receipt of the agreement, and he testified he never received from the company any notice of any kind). The witness testified that the salesmen, of whom there were 30, were under his charge; "that agents could sell on time or partial payments; in fact, probably four-fifths of the stock was sold on partial payments." He testified:

> That the writing on the back of the agreement set out in the answer "is Avery's handwriting." "The Court: Q. Did you, when you sent your agents out, give them any written instructions in regard to their authority to sell stock? A. No; when they went to work we gave them a prospectus outlining the proposition, and we gave them a lot of indorsements from Stockton and Modesto—different bankers. The Court: Q. I asked you if they had any written instructions. A. No; except the written contract. There was never any resolution passed other than a general resolution giving me the complete charge of the general management, the handling of the business—charge of the whole company. The Court: Q. Of the sale of the stock and management of everything concerning it? A. Yes, sir; I have not got that written contract here. The Court: Q. Did that written contract provide their powers as agents? A. Well, they were entitled by that contract— The Court: Q. Just answer that, yes or no. A. Yes; they couldn't make any alterations. The Court: Q. You had that in there? A. Yes. The Court: I think that contract ought to be admitted in evidence. Mr. Chester: If there is such a contract, we will get hold of it and mail it to you. The Court: He says there was such a contract. A. There were with agents; not with Avery in particular; most of them we had contracts with."

The contract was not produced, and no other evidence was given upon the question of Avery's authority or instructions. The witness testified further:

> That Avery "turned in about $50,000 worth of business. I cannot remember how many of these little documents he sent in. We sold a million dollars worth of stock and about twenty-five hundred subscribers; if a selling agent used up one book he would get another one. * * * As the subscriptions were received in the office they were entered in this book, and from there they were transferred to a ledger."

Appellant states in its brief:

> "There is only one question presented, and that is whether or not defendant executed the subscription agreement above referred to," the one set out in the complaint.

If this were the only question, there could be but one answer, for it is admitted that defendant signed this agreement. Realizing, however, that there is something more in the case, defendant takes up the question of "the effect of the writing upon the back of the duplicate (given defendant), which was not embodied in the subscription agreement sent to the company." The position taken by appellant is that:

> "In cases of subscriptions for stock any contract, written or oral, which is not made a part of the contract filed with the company and is thereby kept from the knowledge of the other stockholders, is a constructive fraud on the other stockholders and is void, and that the subscription agreement filed with the company will be enforced as if the collateral or so-called secret agreement had not been made."

It is claimed that this precise question was decided in Quartz Glass & Mfg. Co. v. Joyce, 27 Cal. App. 523, 150 Pac. 648. That case was cited by this same appellant wherein it was plaintiff in the action against one

Vance, reported in 31 Cal. App. 503, 160 Pac. 1097, wherein it was pointed out that in the Joyce Case:

> "The question involved was the validity of a stock subscription agreement by the terms of which the promissory note given for the purchase price of the stock was to be paid out of dividends to be thereafter declared by the corporation. The court held that this practically amounted to a gift of the stock in violation of the provision of section 359 of the Civil Code, and that the said agreement of the parties having that effect was therefore void."

It is true that the court in the Vance Case referred to the rule:

> "That secret collateral agreements as to stock subscriptions, by which the subscriber gains an advantage over other subscribers, are void, for the reason that such secret advantages are in the nature of a fraud upon subsequent subscribers and upon persons who afterwards become creditors of the corporation."

It was shown in the Joyce Case that the principle did not apply for reasons there given, among others, equally true in the present case, that it did not appear that there were other subscribers who could have been defrauded by the plaintiff's reliance upon the respondent's subscription, nor did it appear that there was any subsequent creditor of said corporation who could or did rely thereon in dealing with the said corporation, nor was it shown that there was any secrecy contemplated or connived at by the respondent in the making of the collateral agreement "by which he was permitted within 10 months thereafter to cancel his subscription by recalling his note." Nor did it appear that the respondent "had any knowledge of the fact that the authorized agent of the corporation failed to also indorse such agreement upon the original subscription which said agent retained on behalf of the corporation." The court said in the Vance Case:

> "Whatever secrecy there was in respect to this agreement was imparted entirely by the corporation itself through the act or neglect of its authorized agent; and this being so, and no rights of subsequent subscribers or creditors being involved in the case, it would be a manifest fraud upon the defendant to permit the corporation to take advantage of its own wrong by repudiating its agreement while enforcing the defendant's note, which was evidently given only because of the reservation in said agreement permitting its recall."

The court also in that case cited the case of Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Land Co., 164 Cal. 464, 129 Pac. 582, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013, quoting the following language:

> "The right to return the stock and recover the sum agreed to be paid upon such return was a material and indivisible part of the consideration upon which the plaintiff agreed to become a stockholder. As between the parties it would be manifestly unjust to permit the corporation to retain the money paid by plaintiff, and at the same time to repudiate the promise which it gave in exchange for the money. The obligation to pay, upon a return of the shares, the sum agreed to be paid, is not to be viewed as a new undertaking, arising after the plaintiff has assumed the relation of stockholder. * * * The sale to plaintiff was conditional. He never became a stockholder except subject to the qualification that he might return his shares upon the stipulated terms."

In the Vance Case the facts were, as stated in the opinion, that:

> "On December 14, 1911, the defendant executed a subscription for 500 shares of the capital stock of the Tidewater Southern Railroad Company, for which he agreed to pay $625 on or before 10 months after date, giving his promissory note for that amount. The authorized agent of the corporation who solicited and received the subscription had two copies thereof, one marked 'original' and the other 'duplicate,' both of which were signed by the defendant and the agent on behalf of the corporation; the original being retained by him for the company and the duplicate being delivered to the defendant. On the back of the duplicate the following memorandum was written: 'Dec. 4, '11. Ten months after date if holder of this contract is for any reason dissatisfied we agree to return note or cash equivalent. H. C. Coffin, Tidewater Southern Railroad Co.' This writing was not indorsed on the back of the original subscription retained by the agent for the company. Within 10 months of the date of his subscription, the defendant requested the return of his note, which request the corporation refused to comply with, but, on the contrary, transferred the note to the plaintiff herein, who brought this suit. The defendant pleaded the foregoing facts by way of defense to the action, and upon proof of the same judgment went in his favor."

The judgment was affirmed. The action was brought upon the promissory note, and therein differs from the facts in the present case, in which it appeared that no note was ever executed and no shares ever issued until the suit was brought, when the plaintiff came into court and made tender thereof. The Vance Case differs from the present case, also, in that the defendant in that case, within 10 months of the date of the subscription, requested the return of his note. In the present case the defendant made an effort to ascertain something about the matter within 10 months, but saw no one authorized to act with reference to it.

It will be noted that the subscription contract contemplated payment for the shares by the execution of a promissory note, which for some unexplained reason he was never called upon to execute and never did execute. The indorsement on the back of the contract, it is true, contemplated the giving by defendant of notice to the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company that he desired to return the stock "and receive his note back or cash back or pay note and keep stock." It seems to us that treating the indorsement as an indivisible part of the contract, defendant lost none of his rights by not giving the notice contemplated in the indorsement, and that considering all the facts of this case and the facts upon which the Vance Case was decided, the latter case is here applicable.

A somewhat similar question as here involved was before this court in Tidewater Southern Railway Company (the same plaintiff as here) v. Harney, 32 Cal. App. 253, 162 Pac. 664. In that case the defendant subscribed in writing for 500 shares of the stock of the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company for which she agreed to pay $500. The subscriptions were made out in triplicate, as in the present case, and at the time of subscribing the defendant executed her note for $500 for said stock. The duplicate subscription, retained by defendant, had written on the back thereof the following:

> "July 25—11. Ten months from date, if holder of contract wishes, we agree to take said stock off purchasers hands at the purchase price of $1.00 per share. Tidewater & Southern R. R. Co., by R. U. Morey, Sec. Dept."

This was not written upon the original subscription retained by the company. Some time after the consolidation of the companies as referred to, and after the organization of the plaintiff corporation, the action was brought on said promissory note. In the opinion written by Mr. Justice Burnett, we held that the main features of the case were similar to those of the Vance Case, supra. It was also held that this collateral agreement was the controlling consideration for the note and could properly be shown by parol. It was also held that:

> "The transaction must be considered, of course, in its entirety, and the effect [of the conditional obligation] is the same as though the contract were fully expressed in one instrument."

Attention is also called to the fact, as exists in the present case, that the interests of no stockholders or creditors are involved. It was also held, and we are satisfied should be so held in the present case, that:

> "Appellant should not be permitted to deny the authority of the agent to enter into such conditional contract. The agents were authorized to sell stock; they had the blank subscription book. In the sale of the stock they represented, therefore, the corporation. The purchaser was not warned nor put upon inquiry as to any limitation to the authority of the agent in receiving subscriptions. The purchaser had the right to assume that the salesman was authorized by the corporation to do those legal acts which the nature of his employment seemed to warrant. The agent, in other words, was ostensibly clothed with unlimited authority, and upon familiar principles appellant should not be heard to disavow and repudiate the contract made by him."

It is further shown in the opinion that there was some evidence justifying the inference that Mr. Bearce, the president of the corporation, had knowledge of this conditional agreement, and while that fact lends support to the conclusion reached, it was not the essential feature upon which the decision rested. Speaking further of the agent, the court said:

> "It was the duty of the agent to make the proper indorsement on the 'original' subscription. If he had done so, the corporation would have had through that channel actual knowledge of the entire contract. But by the fraud of the agent the said indorsement was not made, and as far as respondent is concerned, the case must be viewed then as though said indorsement had been made and acquiesced in by appellant; for the act of the agent under the circumstances is the act of the principal, and the latter must suffer the consequences of the agent's failure to do as he agreed. This particular phase of the case is discussed with great leaning by Mr. Justice Lorigan in Otis Elevator Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 163 Cal. 31 [124 Pac. 704, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529], wherein is an elaborate exposition of the doctrine that 'a principal is liable to third persons not only for the negligence of its agents in the transaction of the business of the agency, but likewise for the frauds, torts, or other wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business.' * * * It was manifestly the duty of the agent herein to file the original of the actual agreement of the parties with the corporation. He was acting directly within the scope of his authority when he secured the contract and filed it with the principal, and his fraudulent omission of a material part of the subscription must be regarded in the same light as would be a fraudulent addition of a material term. The result is that the status of the parties was fixed as though the agent had done his duty, and appellant is deemed to have ratified the conditional contract."

It is also held in that case that there was no merit in the contention of plaintiff that the defendants should have resorted to an independent action for damages to enforce her claims under the contract for the reason that:

> "The consideration for the note was involved, and of course that can be set up as a defense to an action on said note. Or if we view the element of fraud to which we have adverted, attention may be directed to the established and permissible procedure as set forth in Field v. Austin, 131 Cal. 379, 63 Pac. 692, and other cases, recognizing three methods by which a party defrauded may obtain relief as follows: (1) Cancellation or rescission, whereby the defrauded party procures an instrument to be set aside and himself to be restored to his original position; (2) affirmative relief by an action to recover a pecuniary compensation for the injury sustained by the fraud of the defendant where no cancellation is necessary as the basis of such recovery, and (3) defensive relief (which is in the present case resorted to) whereby the fraud is set up by way of defense to defeat an action brought to enforce an apparent obligation or liability."

We are satisfied with the conclusions reached by the trial court, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

On Motion for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Appellant has petitioned for a rehearing in the above-entitled cause after decision rendered by this court affirming the judgment of the lower court.

The material facts involved in the controversy clearly appear in the former opinion, and need not here be reiterated. In that opinion it was said:

> "It seems to us that, treating the indorsement as an indivisible part of the contract, defendant lost none of his rights by not giving the notice contemplated in the indorsement, and that considering all the facts of this case and the facts upon which the Vance Case was decided, the latter case is here applicable."

This language, it is claimed, lends itself to some confusion, and petitioner herein takes the position that by the Vance and Harney Cases the option on the back of the duplicate must be regarded as a part of the contract (and those cases so hold), binding upon both parties, though said option was never communicated to petitioner, that thereupon it became the duty of Merz, if he desired to terminate this relationship, to so notify the corporation within the 10 months specified in the said option, and that therefore the court is in error if it intends to say that Merz need not so notify the appellant corporation within the said time.

Even conceding that this contention of petitioner is correct, we are of the opinion, after a very careful re-examination of the record, that petitioner is not entitled to a rehearing, and that the result reached by the trial court was a correct one. It is to be remembered that, upon being solicited for a subscription by appellant's agent, Avery, Merz declined to enter into any agreement unless he was given a 10 months' option to return his stock and receive his money back. It is at once apparent that the negotiations between Avery and Merz constituted at least one of two things: Either they amounted to an offer from the company through its agent to Merz, or constituted an offer from Merz to the company. If the former be the true aspect in which to view the transaction, then we should indeed have a similar condition to that existing in the Vance and Harney Cases, namely, that Avery, as agent, had authority to enter into the contract, as modified by the option, and that therefore said contract was completed, and Merz made a stockholder, upon the signing of said contract. Viewing the case in this light there would be no question but that Merz would have to exercise his option of returning his stock within the period stipulated in said option; that is, 10 months from the date of the signing of the contract, and that not having done so, he has no standing in court.

But appellant overlooks the effect of Merz's testimony as to the negotiations, which is the only evidence upon this phase of the case. Merz was asked:

> "Q. Now, just state to the court what was said by Mr. Avery with regard to the acceptance or nonacceptance of this contract, and what, if anything, Avery was going to do with this contract—whether or not he was to submit it to the company, as was stated."

And his answer was:

> "A. He stated that it was customary to make a payment on this, these subscription agreements for stock, and I refused to make that, and he says, 'Well, I will send this whole thing in, and they can accept it or reject it as they see fit; and I says, 'All right; with that I will sign it.' "

This shows clearly that, in taking the contract, Avery did not purport to act with authority to bind the company or to assume the responsibility of accepting for the company a subscription on the conditions imposed by Merz, but that both parties understood that Merz's proposition was an offer to be submitted to appellant for such action as it might take. Therein does this case differ substantially from the Vance and Harney Cases, where the offer came from the agent acting and purporting to act within the apparent scope of his authority. And in this connection it is now settled that where the proposition or offer does not come from the corporation, but from the subscriber, the subscription must be accepted by the corporation. Appellant then argues that:

> "It has been repeatedly held that the subscription is accepted by the corporation when it makes an entry thereof in its books, spends money on the faith of it, or otherwise treats the subscription as being accepted. Clark & Marshall, Private Corporations, § 439b, p. 1366."

Even assuming this to be a correct statement of the law of this state, it has no application here, for the very obvious reason that the offer or proposition of Merz was never submitted to appellant. The entry upon its stockbook, which it is claimed constitutes an acceptance, was of the original proposition made by Avery to Merz, minus the option feature, and was not the proposition submitted by Merz and intended by him to be submitted to appellant. Merz's proposition, as already pointed out, was fraudulently retained by Avery. Obviously, then, no contract was entered into. The corporation, because of its agent's fraud, received, and thereupon accepted, a proposition essentially different from that submitted by Merz, a proposition that had previously been refused by him. No mutual rights were ever created, and so none could be lost. Viewed in this light, it is a sound conclusion that Merz lost no rights by not giving the notice contemplated in the indorsement.

Whatever is said in our former opinion regarding the application of the Vance and Harney Cases to the instant case must likewise be understood in the light of what is here said. There is nothing at all inharmonious between those cases and this.
